4. Still another unique characteristic of the Bible is its incuriosity. Man is prone to follow up incidental thoughts and events. He is apt to forget his main theme and become absorbed in side-issues. He is fond of episodes. Hints and peeps have a strong tendency to lead him away from his central pursuit. But a little observation will show that the Bible is unlike human nature in this respect. It starts out to give an account of the origin, development, trials, and fulfillment of a certain scheme called Redemption. Nothing has distracted its attention from this one object. The lightnings, thunders, and earthquakes of cotemporaneous events, did not even turn its eye from the mark set before it. It does not say anything merely to gratify curiosity. It throws no light on the destiny of the ten tribes. It does not tell us how the ship got along after Jonah had been hurled from it. It gives no account of Mary's closing years. It contains no pen-pictures of the Apostles. It never indulges in guessing, theorizing, or speculation. It ignores man's curiosity, and regards only his needs. It is like a father carrying his sick child to the doctor. He does not linger by the way to tell the little one all about everything it may chance to point its finger at. He hastens to his destination. In its unbroken self-possession and uninterrupted mindfulness of its one aim, the Bible is consistent with all that is claimed for it.

5. The Bible makes God the all-important idea. He is King of kings and Lord of lords. Men are only his creatures, children, and servants. Viewed in one aspect, they are very insignificant beings. They are but of yesterday, and know nothing. They are carried away as with a flood. Their lives are but a sleep—a mere nap. Only the Almighty is great. It is the eternal duty of man to love him with all his heart, soul, strength, and mind (Luke x, 37). Now all this is reasonable—nothing else would be reasonable—on the supposition that there is an everlasting and infinite God, who is our Creator, Preserver, and most bountiful Benefactor.

6. To me there is an evidence of the superhuman in the Bible in its immense thoughtfulness and infinite suggestiveness. It is not a large volume. But there never was a man that could place his hand on it and say, "I know and understand all it contains." The most diligent student closes his investigations of it, feeling, like Newton in the presence of the Universe, that he was but a gatherer of shells on the shores of the unfathomable sea. Men can master other books. It does not require much application to comprehend all that Aristotle, Plato, Cicero, or any other philosopher, ever wrote. Whatever proceeds from man can be grasped and mastered by man. But the Bible cannot be so grasped and mastered. Hence it must be more than human.

7. The Bible is exposed to the same objections, and defensible by the same arguments, as Nature. Is the Bible old? The world is older. Have men quarreled over the Bible? They have waged fierce wars for the possession of disputed tracts of the earth's surface. Is it said that the Bible is self-contradictory? Polytheistic nations have brought and still bring the same charge against the physical forces. Does the Old Testament seem to approve of heartless severity, under some circumstances? It is not equal in this respect to the remorseless elements. Even the genial sun strikes men dead. Has the Bible been differently understood on some minor points? The Creation has shared the same misfortune for thousands of years. Is the Bible exposed to human blundering and tampering? So is Nature. The original channels of rivers have been changed. The white man's cities are built on the Indian's hunting grounds. The woodman clears the forest, and thereby lessens the average quantity of rain and diminishes the mean depth of streams. Hills are made low and valleys are filled up by the picks and shovels of civilization. Does the Bible seem to contain dry and worthless portions? They are neither more dry than the Sahara desert, nor more worthless than Nova Zembla. Are there some things in the Bible "that would shock the mind of a child"? The mind of a child would be shocked by a big dog, a thunderclap, or a corpse. Does somebody say the Bible is generally a very defective book? J. Stuart Mill pronounced Nature generally a very imperfect concern. Thus we might go through the whole list of cavils and objections, and show that every one of them presses as hard against the constitution and course of Nature as against the Old and New Testaments. Now, does this exposedness to the very same criticisms not show that Nature and the Bible emanated from the same Mind, and that they were constructed on the same plan? But no one contends that Nature is of human origin. Why, then, not admit that the Book that is made on the same general principle, that is open to the same objections, and defensible by the same arguments as Nature, is of superhuman origin?

8. An argument may be based on the exhaustiveness of the Bible. It embraces every moral duty. While some of its regulations were expressly local, national, and temporary, the great bulk of its precepts are adapted to all times, places, and conditions of man. It may not have an explicit rule for every possible emergency; but it has a principle out of which a rule can be made impromptu. It will be extremely embarrassing to account for this feature of it, and claim that it is all of man, and especially such men as the Hebrews were. How could an ancient people compile a system of morals adapted to the varying conditions of all coming ages? Above all things, how could a secluded and narrow-minded people like the Jews give being to a set of principles suitable to the whole world no less than to themselves? We find that all human ordinances, laws, and constitutions become impracticable with time. But Christendom has never felt that the Bible needs a codicil or amendment. The occasional revisions of versions are made expressly to keep it from changing with the constant mutations of language. Who but an All-wise God could thus prepare a Book of universal and permanent adaptation?

9. This brings us to another kindred argument, viz: That the cardinal principles of the Bible were far in advance of the ages when they were first announced. Its pronounced Monotheism came forth from a country notorious for its Polytheism. The credit for this can be hardly given to the Jews, for Monotheism continued among them more in spite of them than with their favor. Nor can this be accounted for by attributing it all to Moses, for he was raised and educated for forty years under polytheistic influences. The idea of an absolutely holy God was new to the world at the time of its first promulgation (Ex. xv, 11; Lev. xix, 2). The conception of a spiritual Being originated in an age of universal idolatry. The Messiah, the Son of Man, or Humanity, came forth from among the Jews when they were the most clannish and bigoted. That great doctrine, peculiar to Christianity—JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH—was expounded most thoroughly, and advocated most heartily by a man who had been a life-long Pharisee!

How could all this be, on the principle that like begets like? How could such lofty ideas spring up from the low level of Polytheism, Idolatry, Carnality, Bigotry and Self-righteousness? The phenomenon has no parallel in history. Mahomet borrowed his best "revelations" from the Bible. Buddha was only the apex of the mountain of contemporaneous sentiment. But the leading doctrines of Scripture were, at the time of their first announcement, above, ahead of, different from, and uncongenial to, the people through whom they were given. The most rational explanation of this anomaly is found in the words of the Apostle: "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners, spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets" (Heb. i, 1).

10. I have concluded long ago that the teachings of the Bible are reasonable and practicable, if for no other reason than that they must be caricatured before they can be attacked. The doctrines of Christianity are not the monstrosities they are declared to be by Infidels. Let me make a few specifications.

It is not meant by the doctrine of Total Depravity that unregenerate men have no conscience; or that they do not admire virtue; or that they are incapable of noble actions; or that they are as corrupt as they can possibly be. By it is only meant that man is by nature alienated from God; that that alienation tends to increase; and that there is no recuperative power in the soul independently of Divine aid (Hodge's Outlines of Theology, p. 251). Now, is it not true that human nature is more disposed to evil than to good? Is it not true that the majority of mankind love and indulge in sin? Is it not true that the average boy will remember a dirty couplet much more readily than a noble sentiment? Does the deep depravity of the natural heart not reveal itself in a special lust for defiling Purity and deflowering Virtue? The facts of daily life establish the doctrine of Total Depravity, in its authorized sense.

Repentance is a most reasonable requirement. If a man has sinned, should he not be sorry for it? Should he not determine to sin no more? Should he not confess his sin—or, in the language of Society, apologize—to him whom he has wronged? Should he not do his utmost to repair the injuries of his misdeeds? You will answer, Yes. Well, that is Scriptural Repentance (2 Cor. vii, 10; Prov. xxviii, 13; James v, 16; 1 John i, 9, Luke xix, 8).

You have repeatedly sneered at Faith. By doing so you attack the foundation of everything. The child, like the just, lives by Faith. The value of civil tribunals is only proportional to Faith in testimony. Withhold Faith from human veracity, and all history is worthless. People would not travel if they did not have Faith in engineers, conductors, and sea-captains. The whole superstructure of mathematics is founded on Faith in unproved axioms and postulates. Science is based on Faith in the uniformity of natural laws. How can Faith be preposterous in Religion, when it is indispensable, practical, and scientific everywhere else?

The Faith expounded and inculcated by the New Testament, is not the silly thing that Infidelity would make it. It rests on knowledge, reason, and argument (2 Tim. i, 12; 1 Peter iii, 15). It is confidence in the Being, Veracity, and Goodness of God (Heb. xi, 6; Rom. iv, 3). It is a firm reliance on his Wisdom and Love (Rom. viii, 28). It includes in its character and manifestations all the duties and privileges of life: "Faith without works is dead" (James ii, 20). "Add to your faith virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity" (2 Peter i, 4-10). "If ye love me, keep my commandments" (John xiv, 15). Thus, we find on examining the New Testament that Faith is indeed a "reasonable service" (Rom. xii, 1).

Belief in a personal Devil is not absurd. Absurd uses have doubtless been made of it. But the existence of evil spirits is made highly probable by experience and observation. Wicked thoughts often spring up in our minds independently of our volitions and excogitations. And they come at times when we least invite or desire them. They cannot come from God; for nothing but good can proceed from him. Nor are they the fruit of our own thinking; for they often come so unexpectedly that they surprise and shock us. They are forced upon us. It is not irrational to suppose that those evil thoughts are the suggestions of a personal tempter, coming, in some undiscovered way, in contact with our minds. We know that the nearness of some persons occasionally affects our minds in a peculiar way, before we are aware of their presence. Why may the proximity of Satan not act on our thoughts in a similar manner, operating both as a suggesting and catalytic force?

How is it that you frown so indignantly over the notion of a personal Devil, while you can bestow such pretty smiles on Spiritualism?

The everlasting misery of the wicked is a doctrine you affect to abhor. In order that you may abhor it the more, you deform it. Such words as "seething," "roasting," "frying" belong exclusively to the Infidel's vocabulary. They are not found in the Bible, in connection with this subject. It would be no more than just for you to confine yourself to the language and ideas of the Scriptures when you speak of it.

This matter is too vast to be discussed here. Suffice it to say that Nature and the Bible agree in regard to it. Society never forgives where there is sin and no penitence. Endless punishment is often the penalty of violating physical law. We see continually that it is the tendency of a bad character to solidify and become permanent. This fact alone places the doctrine of eternal punishment on the basis of probability. Where there is continued sin there must be continued wretchedness. Observation teaches us further that there is no efficacy in mere suffering to regenerate the sufferer. There will be nothing in the inner character of the wicked, and there will be still less in their surroundings, to inspire a hope that they will ever become good, and consequently, happy. For a fuller discussion of this subject let me refer you to the sixth chapter of my little work on "Hell and Damnation."

You will scarcely deny that such Scriptural requirements as Humility, Patience, Contentment, Industry, Frugality, Benevolence, Charity, Forgiveness, Forbearance, Peaceableness, Gentleness, in short, the precepts of the twelfth chapter of Romans, are all well and good.

I have enumerated some considerations which, to my mind, show that the Bible is of superhuman origin. If you take these considerations separately, you may be able to dispose of them on some other theory; but when you unite them, they become a ten-stranded cable that cannot be broken. When I take up the Bible and find that it is tractable; that it is as simple as Wisdom; that it is a marvel of candor; that it is strangely incurious; that it is absolutely and permanently exhaustive as a code of morals; that it is of immense thoughtfulness and suggestiveness; that it subordinates everything to the one idea of God; that it is open to the same objections and defensible by the same arguments as Nature; that its characteristic doctrines were in advance of, and uncongenial to the times when they were first proclaimed; and that its teachings, when correctly apprehended, correspond to the realities of life and the dictates of reason—when I ponder over this nexus of facts, I cannot but conclude that the Bible is superhuman, and consequently Divine.

I do not think that I am given to visionariness, mysticism, or transcendentalism. I can hardly bear such things as Dr. Cummings' writings. But I am nevertheless satisfied that the Old Testament contains such a thing as Prophecy, that is, definite predictions of future events, given prior to any foreshadowings of their character. I refer only to such predictions as stand fulfilled in our presence to-day, namely, the destinies of certain cities, governments, and nations. When this argument is examined critically, minutely and cumulatively, it will be found overwhelming and invincible. I cannot too highly recommend to you Keith's great work on this subject. It is even a demonstration. But the reality of Prophecy involves the actuality of Revelation.

The character of the Apostles will bear the closest scrutiny. They were sensible, unsophisticated men, coming neither from the murky miasma of degraded ignorance on the one hand, nor from the mystic haze of scholasticism on the other. They were in the prime of manhood when called to be disciples. They could read and write. They were familiar with the Scriptures. Whilst they were docile, they were not credulous. Thomas would not believe in the Resurrection of Christ until he had had the evidence of sight and touch. They went forth to preach only that which they had seen and heard. They warned the churches against credulity, admonishing them to try the spirits whether they were of God. They were certainly sincere and conscientious, for they yielded up their lives rather than their convictions. They consecrated their time and energies to proclaim a risen Lord. Their ministry was an amazing success. And their success was not owing to the emoluments they offered, as in the case of Julian; or to the sword they wielded, as in the case of Mahomet; or to the prestige of a noble ancestry, as in the cases of Buddha and Confucius; but to the simple story of a Crucified Christ. They would not have undertaken such a work if they had not themselves believed, clear down in the deeper depths of their souls, the message they had to deliver; and they could not have succeeded, under the existing circumstances, if God had not been with them. The words of Robert Dale Owen will apply to their case: "The longer I live, the more I settle down to the conviction that the one GREAT MIRACLE of history is, that a system of ethics so far in advance as was the Christian system, not only of the semi-barbarism of Jewish life eighteen hundred years ago, but what we term the civilization of our own day, should have taken root, and lived, and spread, where every opinion seemed adverse, and every influence hostile" (Greeley's Recollections of a Busy Life, p. 582).

Perhaps you will allow a word of personal experience. It will at least show that the Bible does not strike everybody who studies it in the same way that it does you. The more I acquaint myself with it, the more am I astonished at its contents. It is a perennial fountain to my soul. I rise from it ready to say, like Jacob at Bethel, "How dreadful is this place! this is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven." I find in it a feast both for the intellect and for the heart. It is as full of wisdom as a father's counsel, and as full of affection as a mother's bosom.

"How precious is the Book divine.
By inspiration given!
Bright as a lamp its doctrines shine,
To guide our souls to heaven."

There are many masterly treatises on this subject. No Infidel is consistent, not to say just, until he has given them a thorough examination. In addition to the works mentioned already, here and there, I will specify Butler's "Analogy"; Paley's, Chalmers', Addison's, Alexander's, and Barnes' "Evidences of Christianity"; Lardner's Works; Pascal's "Thoughts"; Walker's "Philosophy of the Plan of Salvation"; and Henry Rogers' "Superhuman Origin of the Bible." These were remarkably clear-headed men. Christianity invites the world to study their writings.

The Bible has always had its defense. Perhaps the tactics of the defenders have sometimes been injudicious; but the fortress has never been taken. The cry has repeatedly gone up, "Raze it! Raze it!" The criers have become first hoarse, and then silent; but the old citadel has always stood. The new armor and new attacks of the enemy have been promptly met by new equipments and renewed valor. Weapons that have served their time are honorably laid aside. The ancient castles of England are useless to-day, except as objects of curiosity to an occasional traveler or antiquarian; but formerly they were the salvation of the realm. So some of the former arguments for Christianity have fallen into disuse, the implements of the foe having changed. But castles are changed only for Gibraltar. The Gospel was never so unconquerable as it is to-day. It is only suicide to attack it. "God is in the midst of her; she shall not be moved: God shall help her, and that right early. The heathen raged: the kingdoms were moved: he uttered his voice, the earth melted. The Lord of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge (Ps. xlii, 5-7).

Your well-wisher, G. H. HUMPHREY.

Voltaire.

He devoted his life and talents to the extirpation of abuses in Church and State. To this end all the resources of his vast learning, his unrivalled wit, and brilliant genius were directed. Happily, he sustained high social relations with some of the first personages in the Government, and, being left in independent circumstances, bribery and the frowns of power never swerved him from his course. Had he been isolated from society, and thrown, in youth, penniless on the world, his great talents might not have saved him from the common fate of so many superior souls, weighed down by poverty, who, in that age of the world, yielded to the blandishments of wealth and power, and became the easy instruments of tyranny in high places. But Voltaire stood high above these influences. He disdained all those political advantages which his wealth, his powerful connections, and his talents might easily have secured him, and, at an early age, he entered the great struggle for popular rights which was then just beginning to agitate the minds of men, not as a subaltern, or a mercenary waiting for some one to conduct him into the fray, but as a leader, ready to rush into the van, and to direct the storm and the whirlwind.

Fitly to relate what he did for suffering humanity, at this crisis and in this cause, would fill a volume, and a volume so bright and redeeming as to atone—in the minds of reasonable men—for all the faults, real and imaginary, with which his most malignant enemies have loaded his memory.

It has almost passed into a proverb that it was the pen of Voltaire, more than all other causes combined, that stimulated the French revolution—that mighty reaction of the human mind against centuries of wrong and oppression. Nor was the influence of his writings in favor of human liberty confined to his own country. It was felt with almost equal power in other parts of Europe, as well as in America. It is scarcely an exaggeration to say that it requires no very critical examination of Voltaire's works to discover in them the germ both of the Declaration of Independence and of the Constitution of the United States. His far-reaching vision saw in the not far distant future the ultimate emancipation of the race from both religious and political slavery, and his fertile brain furnished for their guidance those principles of equity and toleration which are, in our day, the leading and familiar landmarks under all systems of free Government.

While the mind of Voltaire was filled with valuable facts, which he could draw forth at will, it was equally fertile in original conceptions. There is scarcely a great reform by which, in later times, the progress of man has been accelerated, that is not in some way connected with his name.

Capital and Labor.

One of the most vital questions, and one which is bound to force itself upon the American people within the next few years, is that of capital and labor—the contest between aristocracy and the laboring men. An effort may be made to suppress it or keep it in the background, but it will not down. So long as a few designing monopolists like Vanderbilt and Tom Scott are steadily securing within their own grasp the principal wealth of the country, while millions of toilers are going hungry and almost naked, and hundreds of thousands are unable to procure work to earn bread for their starving families, this question will inevitably crowd itself to the front.

There is something wrong in our system of political economy. The wealth of the nation is mainly in the hands of a monied aristocracy, while the great bulk of the people are sinking in abject poverty. The few are rolling in affluence while the masses are stung with poverty and hunger. Our system of laws is wrong, our plan of taxation is defective. This nation can never be prosperous unless there is labor for all to perform and every mouth has food to put into it.

There is a remedy for the character of ills our country is suffering under, and it will be well if its inhabitants meet the issue in time and prevent the evil that awaits us in future. The remedy does not consist in mobs, in anarchy, in strikes, nor in the wanton destruction of millions of dollars' worth of useful property.

The mad conduct of senseless mobs cannot but work mischief to the body politic. They may be the legitimate result of a wrong course of policy, but they will never prove a sensible remedy. Burning cities, towns, dwellings, bridges, railroad-cars, smashing locomotives, tearing up tracks, destroying flour, pork, and cattle, cannot benefit the starving millions nor aid the needy. They are not, and never will prove to be the remedy for the ills we endure. They may possibly serve to cleanse the political and financial atmosphere, as storms and thunderbolts do the physical atmosphere, but they can never construct; they can never build up what is needed to make the nation prosperous and happy.

The working men in this country are immensely in the majority. They have the power to apply the curative in their own hands. It is quite needless to rush headlong into riot and anarchy. If they will keep their heads cool; if they will inform themselves thoroughly of the needs of the hour; if they will act in concert in the reforms to be effected, and use the ballot which they have in their hands; if they will elect to the position of law-makers honest and reliable men who will carry out the wishes of the people, and will insist upon justice being executed in every department of the government, there will be no necessity of resorting to madness and folly.

By means of the ballot the working men of this country can, if they will, effect almost any reform they may decide upon to carry through. They are the power which makes the laws, which executes them, and these laws may be changed to suit the necessities of the times, and all emergencies that may arise. If the laws of the country are wrong, the people have themselves to blame for it.

Let the workingmen of the country, then, look this matter squarely in the face, and let them use the power which they hold in their grasp. If it be decided that it is better for the railroads to be in the hands of the Government than in the power of monopolies who are rapidly growing richer while the masses are growing poorer, then let the policy be inaugurated. If it is decided that no man ought to own twenty thousand, ten thousand, five thousand, or one thousand acres of land, while hundreds of thousands cannot own an acre, let it be made illegal for any man to own of the earth's surface—to which every man has an equal natural right—more than a given amount, say a maximum of five hundred acres. If it is found that the tendency of the nation's wealth is to work into the hands of the designing robbers and thieves, while the millions are sinking lower in poverty and want, let laws be so constructed that this state of things cannot always continue. Let taxation be graduated in such a way that the expenses of the Government be defrayed exclusively by the taxes upon the property of the excessively rich.

It will not be a hard plan to devise so construct a national policy that it will not be possible or desirable for any man to accumulate an excessive amount of wealth. If he does so, let him be excessively taxed. There is land enough in the country for all if it is not allowed to accumulate in the hands of a few. There is labor enough for all to perform if right systems prevail. There is food enough for every mouth if the wealth and the labor is duly apportioned. Wherever wrong exists, wise councils, prudent and determined action on the part of the masses are a thousand times better than rashness and destruction. Humanity has done all that has been done towards subduing this planet to the progressed condition it now occupies. It has cleared up the forests, it has opened up continents; it has made a garden of countless millions of acres of land. It has plowed the vast ocean with huge vessels of wood and iron; it has constructed canals and railroads through and over mountains, over rivers, through forests, over plains. It has built cities, manufactories, colleges, schools, and various places for public instruction. The gods have done nothing for this world. Man has done all that has been accomplished. Let him not become discouraged or indifferent. Let him work on in concert and with a steady purpose, ever striving to make this earth fairer, brighter, and happier.

"The Indian Saint, or Buddha and Buddhism."

The author of this work—Mr. Charles D. B. Mills,—has favored us with a copy, and we have looked over its pages with a great deal of pleasure. It appears to be a faithful account of the life and teachings of one of the best and most wonderful men that ever lived—the founder of a system of religion that has existed longer, has a larger following than any other, and is to-day devoutly believed in by one-third of the inhabitants of the globe, and the influence of which has been kindly, peaceful, and beneficent.

In opening the life of Sakya-Muni, the author says: "In the Eastern World to-day bow united millions of devout worshipers before Buddha. His statues are in the temples; his adoration is celebrated with incense of sandal-wood and odors of flowers; his birth-place and theatre of action is the holy land of the church of believers, and immense topes in India have been erected over his real or supposed relics. The vast Viharas or monasteries, built in the olden time, have been thronged with monks eager to learn the law, and the successors of them still stand in Ceylon, Birmah, Thibet, Mongolia, China, and Japan. No other name is held in such reverence; Buddha is the incarnation, the great messenger from the heavens to men, his word is the supreme gospel, the way of salvation for all. No other faith has had such a following, none ever spread so quickly so far, or kept for itself stronger hold on the public mind.

"For about twenty-five centuries now this religion has been current; albeit expelled from the land of its birth, it has wide prevalence in Central and Eastern Asia, and gives thus far no sign of any dissolution or decay. By the Pacific wave it is borne to our own coast, and we are brought thus face to face with it—perhaps under one of its coarser and more degenerate types—as one of the practical problems of our times."

In the second division of the work—"The Effect"—the author uses this language: "The success that attended the preaching of this new faith was wonderful. Preaching itself was a novelty, for Burnout says that, so far as he finds, it was a thing unheard of in India before. Even during the lifetime of its founder, his doctrine must have obtained a considerable prevalence, slow at first, doubtless, making its conquests at the hardest, but gaining each year, until at length it became broadspread over the country. It supplanted Brahmanism largely on its own soil. We have no means of knowing what its numerical strength then was, but the following must have been large. The old was effete, gone utterly to decay, and the preaching of salvation by a method so simple, natural, pure, and enforced by life and earnestness so devoted and transparent, could not fail to draw followers. It brought quickening regeneration in the midst of prevailing death. It was a simple word of repentance and obedience of high consecration and pure living, practicable and intelligible, so far as the ethical and transcendent truths that dwell in light inaccessible can be brought to the understanding. There was no ceremonial, no elaborate system of expiation and deliverance. The handwriting of ordinances was blotted out; the immense structures broken down which priestly device had thrown about the soul to hedge it out from God. What a sense of relief it must have brought to many a poor, sick, weary, and harried one, those may somewhat imagine who have known the like in their own experience."

Among the quotations from Buddha's teachings, room can be afforded but for a few. "By quietness overcome anger; by good, evil; by liberality, greed; by openness and truth, dissembling and falsehood."

"There is no fire like lust; no bondage like hatred; no toil (snare) like perturbation; no river like desire."

"Good people shine from afar, like the snowy mountains; bad people are not seen, like arrows shot by night. He who holds back rising anger like a rattling chariot, him I call a real driver. The rest but hold the reins."

"Health is the greatest of gifts; contentedness the best of riches; trust the best of relatives; Nirvana the sum of delights."

Speak the truth; yield not to anger; give when asked of the little thou hast: by these three steps thou shalt go near the gods."

The book is divided into six parts. The first, two as indicated; III, The Man and the Thought; IV, Sentences of Scripture; V, The Doctrine; VI, The Fine Problem.

The work as a whole gives a very clear view of Buddha, his life, and teachings. Price $1.50.

OUR LIBERAL FRIEND, A. B. BROWN, of Worcester, Mass., on Friday evening of last week, gave, before the Liberal Club in Science Hall, an interesting lecture upon the "Indispensable in Architecture." He dwelt largely upon the importance of ventilation and of buildings being supplied with the essential, indispensable vitalizing fluid, the oxygen of the atmosphere. His lecture was well received, and elicited a lively discussion. Brother Brown purposes to give a portion of his time to delivering Liberal and scientific lectures, and it is to be hoped our Liberal friends over the country will extend the hand of welcome to him.

If our patrons who are in arrears only knew how badly we are needing money, we cannot but think they would, hundreds of them, remit us the amount they owe us, and thus render us able to meet our daily and weekly expenses. We do not want to mention this matter often, but we really think that those who have not yet sent us the money for THE TRUTH SEEKER for the current year ought to do so without further delay. We are needing the money, and those who withhold from us that which is justly ours, and which we seriously need, are doing the good cause an injury. Is not a wink as good as a nod to a blind horse?

THE long, cool evenings of Autumn and Winter will soon be with us. The season for reading has come again. It is a good time now to lay in a new supply of Books. We hope those intending to purchase books this Fall and coming Winter will not forget that we are in the book business. We will be glad to sell any of the books we publish ourselves, or any published by others, either in Europe or America. Those who will favor us with their orders shall be promptly served. Libraries and Societies furnished at a liberal discount. Price-Lists sent upon application.

TIME AND TIME-KEEPERS.—A brief sketch of the Rise and Progress of the Horological Art.—It is a little pamphlet containing a history of the rise and manufacture of the various kinds of apparatus for measuring and keeping time, from the sun-dial, hour-glass, clepsydra or water-clock, the original crude clocks and watches, down to the perfect Matile watch, which is a minute repeater, striking on musical bells the hour, the half hour, the quarter, and the number of minutes which have elapsed of the unexpired quarter. It tells the time to the fifth of a second, and notes the passage of two distinct events or occurrences at the same time, as the timing of two horses starting at different times. It shows the days of the week, the month, and the month of the year. It notes the recurrence of the 29th of February in leap year. It shows the phases of the moon by means of a diminutive moon daily progressing on a miniature horizon. Those wishing one of these interesting pamphlets should send to L. & A. WHEN THE BLOSSOMS COVER US, DARLING.—This is the name of another of Charlie Baker's new songs. It can be had from any music dealer in the United States, or from the publisher, F. W. Helmick, No. 50 West Fourth Street, Cincinnati, O., by sending 35 cents.

When the blossoms cover us, darling,
With their bloom of white and gold,
And our faces are hid from each other
In the churchyard, so white and so cold,
Of the many dear ones who will never
See our faces or greet us again,
Are there any kind hearts in that day, love,
Who will think of us, care for us then?

ANGER dies soon with a wise and good man.
THE deeper the sorrow the less tongue hath it.
As if you could kill time without injuring eternity.
SIGNS are small measurable things, but interpretations are illimitable.

LEARNING without thought is labor lost; thought without learning is perilous.

OUR own heart, and not other men's opinions, forms our true honor.—Coleridge.

WISDOM is the talent of buying virtuous pleasures at the cheapest rate.—Fielding.

As words can never be recalled, speak only such words as you never wish to recall.

HAVE no respect for any man who has to feel the public pulse to learn his private duty.

ENERGY will do anything that can be done in this world; and no talents, no circumstances, no opportunities, will make a two-legged animal a man without it.

KIND words do not cost much. They never blister the tongue or lips, and we never heard of any mental trouble arising therefrom.

THE chief secret of comfort lies in not suffering trifles to vex us, and in prudently cultivating our undergrowth of small pleasures, since very few great ones, alas! are let on long leases.

THE history of the world teaches no lesson with more impressive solemnity than this: That the only safe guide of a great intellect is a pure heart; that evil no sooner takes possession of the heart than folly commences the conquest of the heart.

NEVER be cast down by trifles. If a spider breaks his thread twenty times, twenty times will he mend it again. Make up your mind to do a thing and you will do it. Fear not; if trouble comes upon you, keep your spirit though the day be a dark one.

THEOLOGICALS maintain that the virtuous are miserable in this world in order to be happy in the next, and that the vicious are happy in this world to be punished in the next. These men are certainly very profound, but there is neither sense nor utility in this. Why not permit the virtuous to be rewarded here as well as hereafter? This one is at least as certain as the next. Besides, the whole doctrine is absurd—an encouragement to knaves, and a discouragement to honest men.

On the Death of a Loved Child.

And thou art dead, as young and fair,
As aught of mortal birth,
And form so soft and charms so rare
Too soon returned to earth.

BYRON.

Pale Monarch, thou hast nipped a sweet bud of promise,
That gladden'd our fireside with love and with song,
Her innocent smile and her eloquent prattle,
No more shall unite with the world's busy throng.

Oh death, why not bind up the hearts that are bleeding,
For thy cold icy chill now deepens the gloom,
Not one gleam of fond hope, or a bright star of promise,
Do cheer the sad Mourners that visit her tomb.

But death, we give our loved babe to thy keeping,
That played with the sunbeams and plucked the wild flower,
For to her they were as the wild Mountain daisy
That blossoms unknown and fades in an hour.

But some say, the Angels have winged thy glad spirit
To the realms where the glorified triumphantly sing,
Where loved ones and friends, who through Christ's crucifixion,
Were redeemed by his blood, which robbed death of his sting.

And some say, you are watching and guiding my footsteps,
And guarding my pillow when the night winds do sigh,
And when death dims the eye, that is now weeping with sorrow,
You will welcome me home in the sweet by and bye.

If such is the power of thy angelic spirit,
That you can leave that fair clime, to revisit our home,
Come and sing me a song, when the landscape is smiling,
And reveal thy pure spirit, when I am musing alone.

Come when the Moonbeams steal o'er Mountain and Valley,
Come when the stars gem the dark vault of night,
Come when the birds in the woodlands are nestling,
Come when the cold chill of death dims my sight.

But what Mortal beheld those bright spirits returning
From that dream-land of fancy, with scenes so sublime,
In vain have we sighed when in solitude weeping,
For the foot-prints of Angels on the old sands of time.

But we know, beloved dust, you to dust are returning,
To unite with the dew drop, the rivulet or flower,
For the violet fringed cloud, with its rain drops that's floating
Once flowed through our veins with a magical power.

Sweet off-spring of love, the earth was thy mother,
But her loveliness, like rosebuds, possesses a thorn,
The child of her womb, with pestilence she scourges,
Her attributes are the whirlwind, the earthquake and storm.

But I must say farewell, all nature resounds it;
The wild bird that tuned her last note sang farewell;
Not a leaf or a flower that the North wind has blasted
But recalls to my memory that sad word "Farewell."

The Old Testament.

By PROF. W. ROBERTSON SMITH, OF THE UNIVERSITY OF ABERDEEN.

(This article was contributed by Prof. Smith to the new edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica, now in course of publication; and for writing it the author has been suspended from the ministry by the Free Church of Scotland, and is to be tried for heresy. The general agency for the six New England states is in the hands of our Liberal friend, FRANK RIVERS.)

The word Bible, which in English, as in the medieval Latin, is treated as a singular noun, is in its original Greek form a plural—the (sacred) books—correctly expressing the fact that the sacred writings of Christendom are made up of a number of independent records, which set before us the gradual development of the religion of revelation. The origin of each of these records forms a distinct critical problem; and for the discussion of these questions of detail the reader is referred to the articles on separate Biblical books. The present article seeks to give a general account of the historical and literary conditions under which the unique literature of the Old and New Testaments sprang up, and of the way in which the Biblical books were brought together in a canonical collection, and handed down from age to age. The Biblical development is divided into two great periods by the manifestation and historical work of Christ. In its pre-Christian stage the religion of revelation is represented as a covenant between the spiritual God and his chosen people the Hebrews. In accordance with this, and in allusion to Jeremiah xxxi, 31, Jesus speaks of the new dispensation founded in his death as a new covenant (2 Corinthians xi, 25). Hence, as early as the second century of our era, the two great divisions of the Bible were known as the books of the Old and of the New Covenant respectively. Among Latin-speaking Christians the Greek word for covenant was often incorrectly rendered testament, and thus Western Christendom still uses the names of the Old and New Testaments.

Old Testament—Struggle and Progress of Spiritual Religion; Priests, Prophets, etc.—The pre-Christian age of the Biblical religion falls into a period of religious productivity and a subsequent period of stagnation and mainly conservative tradition. The period of productivity is also a period of contest, during which the spiritual principles of the religion of revelation were involved in continual struggle with polytheistic Nature-worship on the one hand, and, on the other hand, with an unspiritual conception of Jehovah as a God whose interest in Israel and care for his sanctuary were independent of moral conditions. In this long struggle, which began with the foundation of the theocracy in the work of Moses, and did not issue in conclusive victory until the time of Ezra, the spiritual faith was compelled to show constant powers of new development—working out into ever-clearer form the latent contrasts between true and false religion, proving itself fitter than any other belief to supply all the religious needs of the people, and, above all, finding its evidence in the long providential history, in which, from the great deliverance of the Exodus down to the Captivity and the Restoration, the reality of Jehovah's kingship over Israel, of his redeeming love, and of his moral government, were vindicated by the most indisputable proofs. As it was only the deliverance from Egypt and the theocratic covenant of Sinai that bound the Hebrew tribes into national unity, the worship of Jehovah was always acknowledged as the national religion of Israel. But from Joshua to Samuel national feeling was far weaker than tribal jealousy; and in the political disintegration of the people the religion of Jehovah seemed to be nearly lost in local superstitions. During this period the chief centre of monotheism was the sanctuary and priesthood of the ark; and it was from the priestly circle that Samuel arose to reunite the nation by recalling it to the religion of Jehovah, and thus to prepare the way for the splendid age of David and Solomon. But though Samuel was by education a priest, it was not as a priest, but as a prophet, that he accomplished this work. In all ages a priesthood is conservative, not creative; and it was only as a growing and creative power that the still undeveloped spiritual religion could live. While it was the business of the priest faithfully to preserve religious traditions already acknowledged as true and venerable, the characteristic of the prophet is a faculty of spiritual intuition, not gained by human reason, but coming to him as a word from God himself, wherein he apprehends religious truth in a new light, as bearing in a way not manifest to other men on the practical necessities, the burning questions of the present. Unlike the priesthood, the prophets never formed a regular guild. It was an axiom that the gift of prophecy was bestowed by the inward and immediate call of Jehovah. But from the time of Samuel we find a regular succession of prophets working out the spiritual problems of the national faith with ever-increasing clearness, and gathering round them, sometimes in regularly-formed communities, a circle of disciples and sympathizers which, though never, perhaps, numerically considerable, embraced the names of David and other leaders of Hebrew history, and impressed the stamp of prophetic influence on every part of the national life. From this time the priests hold only the second place in the history of the Old Testament religion; sometimes they even appear as the opponents of the prophetic party, whose progressive ideas are distasteful to their natural conservatism and aristocratic instincts. But, on the whole, the more enlightened ministers of the central sanctuary continued to share with the prophets the task of upholding a lofty religious tradition, and not unfrequently both characters were united in one person. It was, in fact, only through the priests that the ideas of the prophets could receive public sanction in the ordinances of religion, as it was only through rulers like David, or Hezekiah, or Jehu, that they could influence the political conduct of affairs.

A just insight into the work of the prophetic party in Israel was long rendered difficult by traditional prejudices. On the one hand the predictive element in prophecy received undue prominence, and withdrew attention from the influence of the prophets on the religious life of their own time; while, on the other hand, it was assumed, in accordance with Jewish notions, that all the ordinances, and almost, if not quite, all the doctrines of the Jewish church in the post-canonical period, existed from the earliest days of the theocracy. The prophets, therefore, were conceived partly as inspired preachers of old truths, partly as predicting future events, but not as leaders of a great development, in which the religious ordinances as the religious beliefs of the Old Covenant advanced from a relatively crude and imperfect to a relatively mature and adequate form.

The proof that this latter view, and not the traditional conception, is true to history, depends on a variety of arguments which cannot here be reproduced. That the religious ideas of the Old Testament were in a state of growth during the whole prophetic period became manifest as soon as the laws of grammatico-historical exegesis were fairly applied to the Hebrew Scriptures. That the sacred ordinances were subject to variation was less readily admitted, because the admission involved a change of view as to the authorship of the Pentateuch; but here also the facts are decisive. For example, the law in Exodus xx, 24, Thou shalt make an altar of stones, on other altars than that of the central sanctuary (cf. Deuteronomy xxxiii, 19). This practice, accordingly, was followed by Samuel, and was fully approved by Elijah (1 Kings xix, 14). But the worship of Jehovah on the high places or local sanctuaries was constantly exposed to superstitious corruption and heathen admixture, and so is frequently attacked by the prophets of the eighth century. It was undoubtedly under their influence that Hezekiah abolished the high places. The abolition was not permanent; but in the reign of Josiah, the next reforming king, we find that the principle of a single sanctuary can claim the support not only of prophetic teaching, but of a written law-book found in the temple, and acknowledged by the high-priest (2 Kings xxii, 23). The legislation of this book corresponds not with the old law in Exodus, but with the book of Deuteronomy. But perhaps the clearest proof that during the period of prophetic inspiration there was no doctrine of finality with regard to the ritual law any more than with regard to religious ideas and doctrines, lies in the last chapters of Ezekiel, which sketch at the very era of the Captivity an outline of sacred ordinances for the future restoration. From these and similar facts, it follows indisputably that the true and spiritual religion which the prophets and like-minded priests maintained at once against heathenism and against unspiritual worship of Jehovah as a mere national deity without moral attributes, was not a finished but a growing system, not finally embodied in authoritative documents, but propagated mainly by direct personal efforts. At the same time these personal efforts were accompanied and supported by the gradual rise of a sacred literature. Though the priestly ordinances were mainly published by oral decisions of the priests, which are, in fact, what is usually meant by the word law (Torah) in writings earlier than the Captivity, there can be no reasonable doubt that the priests possessed written legal collections of greater or less extent from the time of Moses downward. Again, the example of Ezekiel, and the obvious fact that the law-book found at the time of Josiah contained provisions which were not up to that time an acknowledged part of the law of the land, make it probable that legal provisions, which the prophets and their priestly allies felt to be necessary for the maintenance of the truth, were often embodied in legislative programmes, by which previous legal tradition was gradually modified. Then the prophets, especially when they failed to produce immediate reformation, began from the eighth century, if not still earlier, to commit their oracles to writing; and these written prophecies—circulating widely in a nation which had attained a high degree of literary culture, and frequently cited by later seers—disseminated prophetic teaching in a permanent form. Long before this time music and song had been practiced in the prophetic circle of Samuel, and were introduced under David into the service of the sanctuary. Another important vehicle of religious instruction was the written history of the nation, which could not fail to be generally set forth in the theocratic spirit in which all loftier Hebrew patriotism had its root. And, indeed, the literary diffusion of spiritual ideas was not confined to the direct efforts of priests and prophets. In spite of the crass and unspiritual character of the mass of the people, the noblest traditions of national life were entwined with religious convictions, and the way in which a prophet, like Amos, could arise untrained from among the herdsmen of the wilderness of Judah, shows how deep and pure a current of spiritual faith flowed among the more thoughtful of the laity. Prophecy itself may, from one point of view, be regarded simply as the brightest efflorescence of the lay element in the religion of Israel, the same element which in subjective form underlies many of the Psalms, and in a shape less highly developed tinged the whole proverbial and popular literature of the nation; for in the Hebrew commonwealth popular literature had not yet sunk to represent the lowest impulses of national life.

Friendly Correspondence.

J. J. HUGHES, Wyandott, Kan., writes: Your last reply to your reverend opponent is splendid—one of the best of your many good things. Keep on, and whack it to him for Christ's sake. You must be the busiest man in America to get out the reading matter that you do. You are certainly earning success, and, I trust, establishing your paper on a firm financial foundation. I think THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best paper I have ever seen, and as near perfect as any one could wish. I would like to have it larger, and hope I may live to see it increased in size. Send Christianity sprawling—spread it—spread it so thin that we shall lose sight of it forever.

J. M. COOK, Lake Village, N. H., writes: THE TRUTH SEEKER is doing a big work. If times were not so hard I could send you twenty-five subscribers. My paper goes the rounds of the neighborhood. The pious belch out some awful threats against me; but it does not matter, for I know all consistent Christians feel the same persecuting spirit if they do not show it to the world. I have had a long experience as a Spiritualist and know Spiritualism to be true. My wife who passed to spirit life is often with me. The spirit of Alvah Tucker, one of your old patrons, visits me and talks as he did when alive. He says THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best bible ever published. I am a great admirer of Mrs. Slenker. She must be an excellent woman, to write as she does.

W. R. WOODEN, Tecumseh, Mich., writes: Four weeks ago I commenced taking your valuable little sheet, and since reading the first have watched for the coming of the others with the greatest of interest. I find it to entertain a vast amount of reading matter, and of that kind that is ennobling in man to read, for it has the power to throw off the dark clouds that have overhung mankind and civilization for ages past. It brings a new light to him; hands him a stronger staff, enabling him to enjoy life and not dwell in constant fear of a jealous God and a cunning devil. My good wishes are with you in the work you are engaged in. "Money have I none, but all that I have give I unto thee." I am studying law and intend to attend lectures this winter. I was reared among Christians, but when I attained the age of reasoning I found a better path and a more enlightened one.

C. HASTINGS, Carlisle, Iowa, writes: "Collection" just received, and I am greatly pleased with its appearance. It is just such a book as every Liberal should be blessed with. Should Sankey come around we will challenge him to sing "Hold the Fort" from our revised edition. I had the pleasure of hearing Ingersoll deal death and no resurrection to old theology, at Des Moines. The best of it was to hear the hearty cheers that went up from fifteen hundred people as the rusty old dogmas went rumbling among the rubbish of the past. Oh, but Bob is a genius, and would revolutionize the world could he have a hearing.

ISAAC VAN SCHOICK, Jamesville, N. Y., writes: I enclose one dollar for the "Collection," which is quite little enough money for such a work, according to published accounts of it. The Liberal public has long been in need of this very book. I hope that hereafter none of our number will put it in the power of a priest to pronounce anathemas over his dead body. I feel like pointing the finger of scorn at any professed infidel who yet persists in employing the services of any of the canting hypocrites. It is full time that this hydra-headed monster called Christianity was crippled, and every Freethinker and friend of mankind ought to make every effort for that result. I hope you will be able to rush the "Champions of the Church" through before long, and give us a reliable account of those bloodsuckers of society. I wish to place that work and the "Sages" side by side in my library, so I can show Christians the contrast between their champions and ours.

J. W. MANSFIELD, Portland, Maine, writes: About one year ago I wrote you that I had been sick over four years (having lost the use of my body and limbs below my hips), and confined to my chair and bed. I have been a business man of means, but a long sickness and severe losses have used up my property. I sent you twenty cents and requested you to send me a few copies of your paper, and you have generously sent it to me for a whole year. When I wrote you I anticipated I might get better, but, after over five years of helplessness and suffering, I still find myself an invalid. In my sick room I have found your spicy, instructive little sheet a weekly visitant, a welcome, progressive comforter. Hundreds of dollars would not buy the comfort, pleasure, and instruction its weekly contents have conferred upon me in the long, lonesome days of a sick room. I do not know how to get along without it. Yet I must render you my profound thanks for your generosity, and regret that I have not the means to purchase a copy of all the works you have for sale. I trust THE TRUTH SEEKER will find its way into every school district of our land.

DR. BAILEY, Hazel Dell, Ill., writes: I was always dull. When I was a child I was too obtuse to be called smart. I was eight years old before I knew there were no boogers up garret; I was ten before I knew there was no good old Santa Claus such as our folks described. How could such good people as father and mother be mistaken? Was the query that embarrassed me. But I have been dull and backward all my life. I was thirty before I knew there was no hell, forty before I knew there was no devil, fifty before I knew there were no angels, and sixty before I knew there was no God. A preacher was describing to me the other day the impassable gulf. I told him I thought the devil and his volunteers had a long march to get around the end of it. He said heaven commanded a perfect view of hell across the gulf. I desired him to state in a P. S. in his next communication to headquarters that the seat I had engaged of one of the divine agents might be set apart for Kate Bender, the throat-cutter, as she might be able to look upon such a panorama and sing, while I could only howl.

MICHAEL JOHNSON, Monroe, Utah, writes: Please accept my sincere thanks for sending me that incomparable work, "The Analysis of Religious Belief." I have read the book slowly and carefully, and I can say without hesitation that it is the most masterly production I have ever seen of the kind. It is so entirely disinterested and without prejudice throughout, which is a feature in books of this description so rarely met with, that I would say to all classes of Liberals: If you have not the above-named book, try and get it by all means: you cannot fail to appreciate it. THE TRUTH SEEKER is as welcome and as indispensable as ever. I will state, however, that in one particular I do not like it fully as well as I did some time ago. And that is in the changing of your portrait on the front for that of Ben Franklin. With due appreciation and respect for all the good that Franklin ever did, what was it, after all, compared with that of Ingersoll, an Underwood, or D. M. Bennett. And, besides that (I judge other Liberals by myself), whose features would the readers of dear TRUTH SEEKER like to see represented so well as those of its beloved and respected editor? But, of course, if modesty, or any other consideration on his part, forbids it, we must submit to it as the only alternative we have at our command. Brother Bennett, your unceasing efforts in publishing your paper and so many valuable books is commencing to be a power in the land, to spread light and knowledge, and to overthrow superstition; and I will say, may the blessings of all the Liberals throughout the land flow unto you in the shape of large cash-accompanied orders for TRUTH SEEKERS and Truth-inspired books. This is my humble prayer, in the name of Truth, Reason, and Liberty. Amen.

Prospectus—Beyond the Veil.

POSTHUMOUS WORK OF PASCHAL BEVERLY RANDOLPH.

Through the minds and agency of Fanny H. M'Dougall and Luna Hutchinson, they having been brought together by a series of singular circumstances. Together they wrote by spirit dictation and impression, most faithfully and sincerely trying to give the true meaning of whatever was revealed, either through clairvoyant vision or otherwise, as unfolded to them by different ones in spirit life, of whom Emanuel Swedenborg was the controlling spirit of the hand. Several new and beautiful revelations are given of the life beyond, embracing many subjects of deep interest, besides descriptions of the formation of Spirit Spheres, Death or Spirit Birth, the Transit, also Food, Clothing, Habitations, Employments, Amusements, Travels, Education, Oral Instruction, Asylums for the Care and Cure of the Insane and Idiotic, and much more which the table of contents will show of the twenty-two chapters the book contains.

It is believed that it will be found an entertaining and profitable book, affording pleasant thoughts and cheerful contemplations for the minds of those on this side the Veil, lessening the shadows that have so long darkly hung between this and the after-life.

The eminent English lecturer and author, (Charles Bradlaugh's associate) is engaged as the regular London correspondent of THE EVOLUTION.

Readers of this paper will also recognize among some two score of famous names who have promised regular contributions to THE EVOLUTION, their own favorites, Miss Susan H. Wixon, Mrs. Sara A. Underwood, B. F. Underwood, and Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker. The best late words of Huxley, Tyndall, and Darwin, of Lubbock, Clifford, and Harrison, and of other leading European authors, thinkers, and investigators, will be found, as well as the freshest and most earnest thoughts of the best writers in America, in THE EVOLUTION.

The EVOLUTION favors the scientific method of thought and investigation. It opposes all systems of religion which are inconsistent with science. It encourages a wholesome and discriminating taste for literature, by its extended reviews of new books and magazines, thereby saving to its patrons largely in time and money by leading them to reject the worthless, unprofitable, and corrupt, and accept the untainted, appropriate, and desirable.

Another leading feature will be the popular condensation of recent science. The paper is not open to mere controversy, but is a free platform for opposing ideas within the limits of relevancy and courtesy. Persons who desire a comic paper or illustrations of pugilism are not urged to subscribe. The support of all earnest and thoughtful lovers of their country and their kind, who can tolerate absolute independence in the treatment of political, social, religious, scientific, and literary questions, is respectfully invited.

No. 12 contains leading essays on The Great Strike; Civil Service Reform; Newspaper Thought and Feeling; The Chinese in California; Free Discussion; A Song of Hope; the Evolutionism of Descartes; Opium and the Opium Eaters; Letters from Charles Darwin, M. D. Conway, and others; To Liberals, Deists, and Patriots; Review of Lewis on Life and Mind; Remedial Effort; Evolution—A Humorous Poem.

Every other number contains a list of books desirable for Liberals.

No. 13 will be a "LABOR QUESTION" number. Contents—Three leading articles on the Labor Question, by J. D. Ball, Henry Edger, and "Plantus"; Science of Right Living, by Miss Wixon; The Good Old Times, by Prof. Watkins; Longevity of Scientific Men; Christianity and Islamism; Sale's Koran, and other books, by the Editor; Paul the Founder of Christianity, by Prof. Wilder.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The EVOLUTION, No. 10, for June, is a superior number, abounding with excellent articles by writers of acknowledged ability. As a review of politics, religion, science, literature and art, it is very promising and deserves to be successful. It is quite a handsome periodical of 24 large pages.—Boston Investigator.

The EVOLUTION is a handsome paper, evidently prepared by some Radical (or independent, as he prefers to call himself), without the least reverence for authority or old belief, and full of aggressive ideas. It is clear that a practical hand is at work in its columns. The EVOLUTION finds the reason for its existence in the declaration that there is a large class in the country who have outgrown their political faiths, and a still larger class who have outlived their ecclesiastical creeds, while independency in Church and State is held to be without a proper representative in the journalism of the day. This effort to fill the gap is fresh and aggressive, and is good enough to live.—N. Y. Daily Tribune. The original articles show good ability. There is a field for an organ of free, broad, scientific thought in this country, and the ambition to supply the want is a worthy one.—Home Journal.

It is a journal resembling the English periodicals of its class in size, shape, and appearance, and evidently meaning to resemble them in literary quality. An independent exponent of advanced thought, an able review of politics, religion, science, literature and art.—N. Y. Evening Post.

The last number is an excellent one. The article on "Industrial Education" is alone worth the price of the number.—Grand Rapids Times.

The increase in the number of Liberal Journals is one of the most cheering indications of progress, and we hope this enterprise will prosper.—New Age.

The June number of that excellent periodical THE EVOLUTION, has just been issued. It is better than any of the preceding numbers. All the articles are original and extremely varied.—Telegram.

It is neatly gotten up, is ably conducted, and eminently respectable.—Truth Seeker.

The number (11) is a good one, and the publication seems to progress in excellence. The June number had some striking articles. An exhaustive review, etc.—New Haven Palladium.

Its views on all subjects are of the ultra-radical style, and in science and religion it veers towards the Materialistic views of Huxley and other pitiable wretches. If brains and money can make it a success, it will be successful.—Catholic Mirror, Balt.

It is the ablest organ that Radicalism ever had in this country.—Jewish Messenger.

The EVOLUTION is a distinct advance on all previous skeptical papers published in America. It contains some very fine articles on important topics, which are discussed fearlessly and thoughtfully.—Secular Review and Scientist, London, Eng.

OPINIONS OF EMINENT PERSONS.

It is an excellent paper, which I should be glad to serve in any way in my power.—Moncure D. Conway.

I wish your journal every possible success.—Charles Darwin.

The handsomest periodical ever published in America. It is just right. Don't change it.—A. Williams & Co., Boston, Mass.

I admire it; I esteem it; I love it; and I will help to sustain it.—Martin Hartman.

It is just the kind of paper I should like to see sustained.—S. C. Cleveland.

I would willingly give twice the yearly subscription price rather than that an effort so noble as yours should fail.—Wm. Dean.

It has the ring of the true metal, and deserves well of humanity.—La Ruy Sunderland.

This number meets my views nearer than any newspaper I have read.—Wiley Britton.

Occupies an important place not at all supplied by other journals. In tone and thought, and in the high intellectual and literary aim of the paper, it seems to me quite superior to all others with which it might properly be compared.—John H. Clifford.

One of the most appetizing things I have seen.—Chas. W. Buck.

Most earnestly do I wish you abundant success.—Elizabeth F. N. Denton.

The EVOLUTION is the best paper ever published.—Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson.

There is need of just such a paper.—Mrs. Sara A. Underwood.

Terms of subscription, payable in advance, postage included, $3.00 for 1877 (26 numbers), $1.50 for the first twelve, including six monthly issues. Monthly issues singly 15 cents. Underwood-Marples Debate.

HELD BETWEEN

B. F. UNDERWOOD

AND THE

Rev. JOHN MARPLES,

At Napanee, Ont., July, 1875. Continuing four nights.

PROPOSITIONS DISCUSSED.—First, "That Atheism, Materialism, and Modern Skepticism are illogical and contrary to Reason." Marples affirming; Underwood denying.

Second, "That the Bible, consisting of the Old and New Testament, contains evidence, beyond all other books, of its divine origin." Marples affirming; Underwood denying.

Reported by JOHN T. HAWKE, of the Toronto Leader, and revised by the disputants. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents, by mail.

MR. MARPLES writes to Mr. UNDERWOOD: "Copies of the Debate were sent me and I have looked them through, and on the whole I approve of them very much. You have done me full justice. . . I intend to push the sale all I can."

Notes and Clippings.

THE Rev. John R. Smith, of Boston, has been sentenced to five years in the State prison for forgery.

CINCINNATI publishers who brought out the Bradlaugh-Besant book have been arrested for sending obscene publications through the mails.

A TRAMP had entered a widow's cot,
One dark, uncanny night;
She felled him with a big slung-shot;
Such was the widow's might.

THE American Board of Foreign Missions has received $20,000 less in donations this year than last, and appeals for money to save itself from "an embarrassing debt."

DEACON ELLS has eloped with the funds of a Rockford county eleemosynary institution. The religious wriggler has managed to elude his pursuers, so far as heard from.

THE following announcement appeared in an English paper: "St. James' Church—On Sunday next the afternoon services will commence at half-past three and continue until further notice."

THE notorious Texan murderer, Wesley Hardin, has been captured, and is now in jail in Austin, Texas. He is only twenty-eight years of age, but he has killed upwards of twenty men.

THE American Bible Society issued last month 49,112 copies of a certain obscene book known as the Bible. How long is this wholesale corruption of morals to be winked at by Mr. Comstock!

MR. TRUDELVE, a London publisher, is to be proceeded against by the Society for the Suppression of Vice, for having republished Robert Dale Owen's "Moral Physiology," a work which has been unmolested for forty years.

DR. CONROX, the papal ablegate to Canada, has alarmed the ultramontanes and delighted the Liberal Catholics by becoming a patron of St. Patrick's Literary Society of Quebec, an organization so unorthodox that it is alluded to as the "Guibord Institute."

FELIX ROJAS, of the city of Talca, Chili, is one hundred and thirty-six years of age. For thirty years of his life he was a habitual tippler, and he has used tobacco for the last hundred and twenty years. It is feared that his love for the weed will yet bring him to an untimely end.

A MEMBER of a colored Baptist church in Memphis, Tenn., has been excluded from the fellowship of his brethren for dancing and singing "Shoo Fly" along the streets. When this brother shall next engage in saltatory exercises on the public highway, he must select a more devotional tune, "Old Hundred," for instance.

SOME of our clerical brethren seem to be pretty hard driven for subjects to preach on, if we may judge from the announcement that a sermon will be delivered on "A man getting out of a ship." Whether this refers to Noah on Mount Ararat, or the dumping of Jonah into the sea, or the landing of Boss Tweed in Spain, or a tramp getting out of a canal boat, it is hard to say.

SOMEBODY in the London Times suggests a way to prevent suffocation by smoke. If your house is on fire and your room is filled with smoke, take a pillow case, saturate it with water, making a small hole in it to look through, and place it over the head. This will make an admirable impromptu respirator in the densest smoke. He speaks of its success in various instances.

A QUARRELsome BAPTIST IN KENTUCKY.—The Rev. Tilman Perkins, of the Methodist Church, in administering the ordinance of baptism to a burly, two-hundred pound convert, recently, in Little river, let his subject go to the bottom of the water. The recipient of the initiatory rite, nothing daunted, rose to the surface shouting, and seized the administrator by the waist, paid him in kind for his services. Perkins was rescued from his unhappy dilemma by the intervention of a number of the brethren, when they all came up out of the water together.—Trigg County Democrat.

THE Philadelphia Grand Jury for August, in their presentment, use the following language: "The Grand Jury feel it also to be their duty to testify against the desecration of the Holy Sabbath by the sale of intoxicating drinks, and especially in the handing round of wine in our churches, to rouse the dormant devil in the reformed drunkard by his sip of wine on communion day."

THE "ministerial bureaus," or preacher's employment agencies, of Boston, where pulpless parsons apply for a job, report that the supply of ministers is far in excess of the demand. They say that many of the churches are "doubling up" or employing "lay effort." One of the agents, when interrogated as to the reasons for such economic measures, replied, "O-various. A lay exegesis of the Scriptures should satisfy the yearnings of the poor these hard times."

THE inhabitants of Indore, India, to the number of 15,000, recently held a grand prayer-meeting, and implored their gods—they have many and funny old gods, those benighted heathen—to send down rain. After a hard day's prayer, the gods were prevailed upon to open their hearts and their flood-gates, and the rain descended in torrents. Oh, for a few such gods in America! What this country really needs is a few first-class, prayer-answering, funny old Hindoo gods.

DR. H. V. REDFIELD, of Alabama, thinks that army life during the late war cured more dyspeptics than bullets killed. He thinks it is the out-of-door life of the Southern people that very much saves them from dyspepsia, considering that they use so much fried meat and hot bread. The prevalence of dyspepsia in the Eastern States he attributes to the extensive use of pies and cakes, and thinks he would rather risk his digestion upon Southern biscuit than New England pies.

A SOUTHERN Methodist District Conference for want of a better subject, took up that of manners in church, and passed resolutions to the effect that the preacher ought to avoid the frequent drinking of water while preaching; that he ought not to finger the leaves of the Bible nor pound the desk; that he ought to avoid hawking and spitting; that men should always wear their coats in church, and that when people are compelled to go out they should not "stalk along the aisles like mules crossing a country bridge."

CHILDREN are fearful creatures, they are so apt to speak the truth when the interests of other people and not of themselves are involved. A little chap was taken to church for the first time, where the minister officiated in a surplice. He was continually fighting and asking, "Ma, is he not done? When will he be done?" The minister stood to make the closing prayer, raising his hands, when the little fellow turned to his mother with horror pictured upon his face—"Ma, he is a swelling up again."

A MODEL PRAXER.—Lannon and Donnelly had a little dispute. Donnelly argued—with his fist—that Lawrence was wrong. Lannon replied—with his fist—that Donnelly was mistaken. Donnelly brought his keen and incisive sarcasm, in the shape of a butcher-knife, to bear upon Lannon, who at once gave up the discussion and sought the aid of what law they had on hand at the Jefferson Market Police Court. Officer McSally, with a club, a revolver, and a warrant, was sent to implore Mr. Donnelly to come and wrestle some law. Officer McSally found Donnelly and family revictualing at the dinner-table. After a few minutes' muscular conversation, the officer convinced Donnelly, with the aid of his eloquent revolver, that he was under arrest. Then Mrs. Donnelly fainted. When she recovered she arose to her knees, made the sign of the cross, interlocked her fingers, turned her face toward heaven—that is, she gazed upward—and uttered a prayer that was more remarkable for its intense fervor and unlimited strength than for any charity that could be discerned in it. She invoked all sorts of maledictions upon Mr. Lannon, but she hoped these would be multiplied many times upon his wife. She prayed that "Mrs. Lannon would have two million children, and that every one of them would live; and that all of them should be deaf, dumb, blind, consumptive, and have perpetual leprosy; that they would never be rid of the toothache and ear-ache while young, so that their mother could not sleep, and that they would all be beggars and thieves and murderers when they grew up." Besides all these afflictions the prayer specified as an additional curse on the Lannons, "that all these children, when they die, shall be consigned to the infernal regions, and that their mother might be placed in plain sight of their endless torments without the power to even speak to them." Donnelly was taken before Justice Bixby and locked up, in default of $300 bail for his good behavior. He was told that if he did not manage in some way to restrain the outrageous religious enthusiasm of his wife something terrible would be done to her.

THE Sun, in commenting on the death of the Daily Witness, has the following: "People couldn't stand being preached to every day, and the religious common places dealt out to them were unendurable. The fog ends of old sermons printed as leading articles; the dreary tracts which filled so many columns; the cheap and frequently spurious accounts of morbid religious experiences in men, women, and children; and the namby-pamby religious sentimentalities, were not the sort of stuff that an active and intelligent community could feed on. Tons on tons of good paper are yearly wasted in the publication in other forms of just this sort of pious writing, until the sight of a tract has become almost sickening to thousands of men who honor real religion and try to regulate their lives in accordance with its precepts. There was no call, therefore, for still further glutting the market with a journal devoted to the dissemination of the same kind of trash. The men who start these religious daily papers know only one way of performing their task. It is to repeat the familiar phrases of tracts and sermons, phrases which by much repetition have often lost their force, which fail to express sincere convictions, and make no impression on the reader, who knows as soon as he has looked at the first sentence of the article just what he will be bored with if he reads it through. There is wanting in such writing the ring of manly and independent thought and the freshness of originality. It is a dinner of old scraps offered to men of robust appetites. These religious editors never have a new idea. They keep hammering away at the old themes, are as timid as fawns, and are unable to put themselves in sympathy with existing society, so eager for information and so trained by the so-called secular papers to appreciate good and honest writing. Religion to those professional pietists is a body of phrases, a lot of Oriental figures of speech, a set of emotional experiences; and it has few points of contact with the actual lives of the individuals who are here working for their living, while beset with temptations, and groping about to find the meaning of things. You can't put people off with religious platitudes in a paper. They may stand them when delivered with rhetorical skill from a pulpit, but they won't waste their time in reading them every morning as diluted in a journal. Moreover, how can an evangelical newspaper prosper when the evangelical church fails to effectively meet the infidelity of the age? We see modern science vigorously assailing the very foundations of Christianity, and laughing at the defense appointed defenders of the faith are making. We see ministers dodging the missiles sent against them, instead of going out to fight the foe to the bitter end. The faith which has been handed down to us is in danger from its enemies, skepticism is spreading rapidly among the young men of education, and among the older men the seeds of unbelief are being sown broadcast. Is the evangelical church in earnest? Does it really believe the doctrines it professes? Does it still hold that their acceptance by men is necessary to salvation? If it is sincere in its convictions, then the time has come to defend them with all its valor against a foe who is boasting of his prowess. If the Church expects to win a victory over the columns of Infidelity, so rapidly recruiting, and bringing to bear the strongest weapons of argument, it will need to march against them with something more effective than the pop-gun of sentiment and the blank charges of threadbare phrases easily rolled off the tongue. Its writers and its speakers, its journalists and its pulpit orators will have to fight as if they meant business, and were not play soldiers kept for show on a holiday. Religious namby-pambyism is out of date."

Events of the Week.

A HOTEL and several other buildings were burned in Brattleboro, Vt. Loss, $35,000.

IN Van Zant county, Texas, beef is sold at three cents. The greatest trouble is to get the three cents.

A SOMNAMBULIST in Jersey City while out taking an early walk in his sleep, fell from the second-story window of his residence and was fatally injured.

INTELLIGENCE has been received that one of the Davenport Brothers, widely known as mediums, died in Australia, of consumption arising from bursting a blood-vessel.

THE Pope's health is said to be again declining. It is perhaps about time for him to yield the control of this little globe which he has been conducting for near thirty years as vicergerent for God.

THE prospects for an improvement in business are said to be good. More grain is being shipped to Europe than ever before, and merchandise generally is moving lively. Everybody is willing that good times shall come.

THE funeral of Thiers was generally observed and largely attended. His death was a national loss which cannot be replaced. He was one of the most valuable citizens of France, and the cause of republicanism lost a friend in him.

WE HAVE had a week of rather pleasant Fall weather, if we except the storm of last Friday and Saturday, which did considerable damage in New Jersey, blew over some bath-houses on Coney Island, and partially destroyed a hotel. God was looking after his children.

FOUR boys who were taking a pleasure ride in a row-boat on the Hudson opposite the city were upset by a ferry-boat, and three of the number were drowned and the fourth came near being drowned while a gentleman was trying to rescue him. A boat very timely came to their relief.

A MYSTERIOUS cattle disease has broken out in Franklin county, in the northern part of the State. Several valuable cows have died, and the excitement among stock-raisers is great. The disease resembles the tick found on Texas cattle, and none have taken it except those who have come in contact with Texas cattle.

FRANK LESLIE, the enterprising publisher of some thirteen illustrated papers and magazines, has failed for $350,000. The assignee, Mr. England, will continue the publication of the various publications. The cause of the failure is said to be too heavy operations in real estate, which largely depreciated on his hands.

ONE of the largest deeds of conveyance received at the Register's office for over a year was left for record a few days ago. It was for the entire block bounded by Fifth and Madison avenues, Seventy-eighth and Seventy-ninth streets, which was conveyed by Marcellus Hartley and wife, to Robert G. Dun, as trustee for Dun, Barlow & Co., the Commercial Agency men. Price, $424,000.

THE gardeners in this vicinity are sadly complaining at the low prices their produce has brought this season. The crops of garden vegetables have been so abundant and the prices have ruled so low that they have not been remunerative. Cabbages are selling at $1 per hundred; potatoes $1.50 per barrel, with little or no demand for beans, corn, tomatoes, etc. Still when we poor people go to the dealers to buy these articles we find we have to pay enough for them.

THE intelligence from the seat of war is conflicting. One day we have it that the Russians have badly whipped the Turks, have taken Plevna and other important points, and in a day or two we receive other despatches saying that all that is false, and that the Turks are the winners; that the Russians had retreated above the Upper Lom in the direction of Biela; that the Turks occupied Ablara, and that their army was north of the Balkans. It is not easy for us to understand how much to believe and what to discard, but so far the Turkish accounts seem to be the most reliable, and at the latest advices they seem to have the advantage.

Humphrey-Bennett Discussion.

BENNETT'S REPLY. NO. XII.

IS THERE A STRONGER PROBABILITY THAT THE BIBLE IS DIVINE THAN THAT INFIDELITY IS TRUE?

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Dear Sir: Miss Ophelia, in Harriet Beecher Stowe's "Uncle Tom's Cabin," when brought in contact with the improvidence and thriftlessness in the South, used often to exclaim, "How shiftless, O, how shiftless." Upon reading over your last letter, and perusing your arguments in favor of the divinity of the Bible, I am impelled in a similar manner to exclaim, How weak, O, how flimsy! Is this the best that can be done to hold up the heavenly origin of that Jewish book? With all the works before you of learned professors, bishops, and clergymen of all grades and denominations, who have spent their lives in the cause of theology and ecclesiasticism, and with whose arguments you are familiar, are your lucubrations all that can be said in favor of the superhuman character of that antique volume? I must confess myself not a little disappointed. I certainly expected you would present some arguments that possessed weight, and potency, but you have not done so. They show ingenuity and shrewdness, but I think there is not a solid, convincing argument in all you have said. In giving your reasons why we should regard the Bible as superhuman, that it is superior to human effort and ability in a single particular, the question arises, upon reading your defense of the book, can it be possible that Mr. Humphrey has succeeded in convincing himself? Have you assuredly found proofs that that melange of legends, big stories, narratives, tales, accounts of wars, rapine, and murder, poems, wild songs, incantations, collected maxims and proverbs, amoroseness, crudity, obscenity, and vulgarity, is something higher, purer, and grander than man has been able to produce? I cannot believe that you have, and I am half inclined to think that even you need fuller proofs of the workmanship of the God of the Universe in that promiscuous volume. I cannot think you find in it such evidences of divinity as to entirely satisfy your own mind. There is a question, too, whether you are fully sincere in your allegiance to it. It seems to me you have too much intelligence to firmly believe that man has not been able to produce such a book, and that God must needs descend from heaven and write it, superintend its countless transcriptions, its changes, its additions, its translations, its printing, its binding, and all the rest of it. No, I believe you comprehend that everything that has ever been done towards that compilation has been the work of human hands and human minds—and minds, too, of not an extraordinary and exalted character.

Before examining your cable of ten strands or divisions, I will briefly notice some of your other points. You are yet hardly able to get over the exhibit of your brethren of the cloth. Well, perhaps it was a little rough and a little unkind to show them up in that wholesale manner, but while you were striving so hard to establish that Infidelity is consistent with immorality, and worked so laboriously to show that certain unbelievers were sensual, I deemed it quite in order to enquire whether Christianity is not also consistent with immorality, and whether many of its brightest teachers have not shown special fondness for that which is regarded as low and sensual. It seemed proper to enquire whether the Christian religion keeps all its advocates strictly in the paths of purity and self-denial. It may perhaps be unpleasant to find that the followers of Jesus, who have a divine religion to aid them, have been much more inclined to stray into by and forbidden paths of sin than unbelievers are who lay no claim to guidance from on high. I mentioned only such cases as were at hand, and hardly thought you would complain because I did not make out a fuller report, but let me assure you the subject is not exhausted. I gave not one case in twenty of clerical sinfulness that has come to the light, and probably not one case in twenty is ever suffered to come to the eyes of the public. I promised you that for every case of a prominent Freethinker whom you could show had led an immoral or sensual life, I would point out twenty or fifty shepherds of the flock who had despoiled the lambs of their folds, and have been more governed by the influence of fleshly lusts than the spirit of heavenly purity. I still adhere to that promise.

I hardly expected you would endeavor to justify the conduct of lecherous clergymen by the apostles. If the clergy are better now than when Jesus was upon earth, he must have gathered a gay and festive set around him. I think I never before heard Judas cited as an excuse for the frailties of modern divines. I had been more inclined to suppose that he was one of the actors in the great scheme of salvation that had been devised from the beginning of eternity. That in the foreknowledge of God, the necessary work of Judas was laid out and apportioned to him, and that he helped in acting his part to make the salvation of one in a hundred of the human race a matter of possibility. Was not the betrayal of Christ a necessary link in the chain of the divine plan of salvation? Did he not have to be betrayed to the authorities before he could be arrested, tried and put to death, and thus be made an atonement for the sins of the world, or rather one hundredth part of it? Credit Judas, then, with having faithfully acted his part in the grand divine drama and not constitute him a scapegoat for the filthy sins of the modern clergy.

You must be "hard up" for arguments to bring in the lectures that have been delivered before the Liberal Clubs. They have nothing whatever to do with the questions we have under discussion. I will use no more space than to say that nothing immoral has been rendered before either Club, and that the Herald did not comprehend the lecture it undertook to criticize, was clearly shown in the Graphic on the following day. It is a part of the constitutions of the Liberal Clubs of this city that they do not endorse and do not hold themselves responsible for any sentiments that may be uttered on their platforms. They simply allow free speech. Any lecturer may avow what he believes to be right, subject to the free discussion of the members which follows. Is this system so shocking to you that you feel impelled to specially denounce it?

You introduce Wales and Scotland with their high degree of morality and intelligence, where the Bible is most read and best understood, as an evidence of its divine character. They may read the Bible very much in those countries, but the facts brought out in the recent Bradlaugh-Besant trial in London, and which too are well-known truths, are that in one of your Bible countries at least, Scotland, there are more illegitimate children than in any other portion of Great Britain, and exceeded by no other country of Europe. In the use of ardent spirits, in proportion to population, it has long been known that Scotland leads all the nations of the earth. Do you mean, then, that those come from Bible influences? Let me call your attention to a general truth connected with this question. The Bible is distinctively a book of the Protestants. Catholics attach but little importance to it, and read it very little, while their opponents, the Protestants, look upon it as an emanation from heaven, read it with the greatest reverence, and absolutely make a fetish of it as really as any old fetish-worshippers ever did of their crude idols. Well, in Protestant countries there are nearly double the number of children born out of wedlock that are born in Catholic countries. It is possible the examples of Abraham, Jacob, David, Solomon & Co., may have their effects. So much for Bible influences!

You represent me unfairly; you say I intimate that the Bible is of no value because it is old. I used no such argument. I have never disapproved of the Bible on account of its age. I will rather concede that its antiquity entitles it to some consideration. I have a natural veneration for everything that has great age. The Universe is old, truth is old, matter and force have existed for a very long time—I have great respect for them, but because a book is old, it does not necessarily follow that God wrote it. Men were able to write thousands of years ago, and God was under no necessity to write their books for them. Unfortunately, the Bible is not so old as many suppose. There is not a particle of proof that any part of it (save, perhaps, the Gentile Book of Job) had an existence seven centuries before the Christian era. In the reign of Josiah (630 B. C.) Hilkiah the priest claimed to have found the Book of the Law in the temple, and it was read before the king. It produced great consternation, and it was very evident that they had never heard it before. During the Jewish captivity it is said that their sacred writings were lost, and that Esdras and his scribes reproduced them. This was about five centuries B. C. Others strenuously claim that much of the Old Testament was not written until the time of the Maccabees (250 B. C.). There are in several of the books idioms and expressions which show that they were written at a comparatively modern date. One thing is painfully certain—the by whom written, and when written, of those books are very little known.

You don't seem to like the Bible picture I gave you of Jehovah. You say they are mostly figurative expressions designed to set forth the Lord's great abhorrence of sin. I call that a priestly dodge, and it fails entirely to meet the case. These positive assertions that God has horns in his hands, that smoke comes out of his nostrils, and a sword out of his mouth; that he roars and shouts like a drunken man; that his fury is poured out like fire; that he throws rocks from heaven upon his children; that he gets angry every day; that he swears; that he is full of indignation; that he is stirred with jealousy; that he delights in war and bloodshed; that his arrows are drunken with blood; that he whets his glittering sword, and does a great deal more in the same line, seem hardly the happiest method of representing the character of a being who is all love, kindness, sympathy and mercy! The picture is brutal and repulsive. I could not love a being answering that description.

You appear desirous to dismiss the subject of the Bible contradictions which I mentioned, by saying they are "a jumble" and unworthy of refutation. If a defense of that kind explains the hundreds of self-contradictions which the Bible contains, the most damning proof on any subject can be rebutted. If a man is arraigned for murder, and hundreds of witnesses swear that they saw him do the deed, he would only need to say, with a sanctimonious drawl, "Such evidence is a mere jumble, and is unworthy of a serious refutation"—and he would be acquitted. It has been noticed that in several instances you have adopted the tactics of the small boy who, when reading, could not pronounce the hard words, and so skipped them whenever he met them. And, like him, you have found it convenient to "skip" several difficult words. Among other things I stated emphatically that Christianity is a system of religion made up of the rites, ceremonies and dogmas of pagan systems that existed before it. I charged that there is nothing new nor original in the Christian religion, and called upon you to disprove it if it is not so. I charged you with upholding a borrowed system of myths and superstitions purloined from the old pagan religions that had existed at an earlier date. I averred that the world had believed in some forty saviors, mostly born of virgins, and a large portion of whom had been crucified for the salvation of the world. These you very prudently skipped over without a word. Your style of defense may explain, to your own satisfaction, why God in some places is said to have been seen and talked with face to face, that Moses, Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and seventy elders saw the God of Israel, and in other places that no man had seen him at any time, or could see him and live; why in one place it is said that God moved David to number the people of Israel, and in another place that it was Satan who caused him to number them; why the important matter of Christ's bodily ascension into heaven is stated in three or four different ways—to wit: in Acts, that he ascended from Mount Olivet; in Luke, that it was from Bethany; and, in Mark, that it was from a room in which the eleven sat at meat, while Matthew and John did not deem the affair of sufficient moment to mention it at all—and hundreds of other contradictions positive and palpable—but to me it is no explanation at all. Nor can you, or any other theologian, explain these things to the satisfaction of honest, sensible people. You may call a selection of quotations like these a "jumble"—and that term is correct enough when applied to the book as a whole—but it does not satisfactorily reconcile the contradictions.

I see that, as a kind of excuse for the blunders of your God and his scribes, you undertake to show that contradictions may be found in the writings of Thomas Paine! You present one or two that appear to be such, but the others bear no resemblance thereto. But what of it all? Thomas Paine was only a man. He claimed nothing more. He wrote his own thoughts, and made no pretensions to guidance from on high. No one claims that his works are divine, unless truth adds divinity to a man's writings. If his productions were full of contradictions, it would be no excuse for the conflicting statements and blunders made by your God. A single self-contradiction or imperfection in a work which is claimed to be divine completely overthrows its claims to divinity. God must be too perfect to make mistakes or to contradict himself.

As a specimen of your fairness in showing up Paine's self-contradictions, you quote these two passages from his "Age of Reason": "I have furnished myself with a Bible," and, "I keep no Bible." Now, you must know that the latter passage is found in the first part of the "Age of Reason," which was written when he had no Bible at hand, and the other passage is in the second part, written after he had provided himself with a copy. Is there the slightest contradiction in a person's saying, "I keep no Bible," when he had none, and, "I have furnished myself with a Bible," after he had procured one? You have thus reversed the order of the quotations, putting the one first written when he had a Bible, and setting the one from the first part, when he had not yet obtained one to contradict it! Is that a strictly honest presentation of Paine's words? Is it indeed the best excuse you have to offer for the positive and oft-recurring contradictions of your Bible God, or his writers? Is God not better than Paine? Cannot you afford to be just toward Thomas Paine?

In your eleventh letter you attempt to prove the truth of the absurd flood story, that the ocean was raised to the tops of the highest mountains, by showing that some sea-shells and marine deposits have been found on elevated portions of the earth. This does not prove that the surface of the ocean was once raised up to where the tops of the mountains now are. Had this been the case the sea shells and other marine deposits would not have been taken up there, because shells do not float on the surface of the water; but it is another proof that the mountains of the earth, sometime in the long ages of the past, have been raised up from the bed of the ocean, and of course taken marine debris along with them. Sir Charles Lyell thus speaks of the remains of ancient corals which he found at the falls of the Ohio, near Louisville: "Although the water was not at its lowest, I saw a grand display of what may be termed an ancient coral reef formed by zoophytes which flourished in a sea of earlier date than the carboniferous period. The Alps and their related mountains, and even the Himalayas, were not yet born, for they have on their high summits deep sea beds of the cretaceous and even of later dates" (Story of Earth and Man, p. 89). Your scientists who wrote the Bible knew nothing of this fact, nor that this continent presents indisputable proofs that it is older than the Himalayas of Asia, and that the highest mountains of the earth have been forced up from the sea level. But I would give more for the testimony of one such man as Lyell than for the word of the combined forty or fifty writers who got up your wonderful Bible, with all the divine aid they had to help them, included.

You attempt to prove, too, that excavations at Nineveh confirm Biblical archaeology. They do nothing of the kind; but they do prove that the Jews, during their captivity, borrowed from the Babylonians and Ninevites their views of cosmogony and incorporated them into their Bible stories which were written after their return to their own country.

Let me next examine your ten-stranded cable in favor of the superhuman origin of the Bible, and which you say cannot be broken. The proper way to become acquainted with any cable or rope and with the material of which it is composed, is to examine it closely, strand by strand. If the individual strands, as you almost confess with regard to your cable, are weak or rotten, or are composed of bad materials, it is impossible to have a good cable, that cannot be broken. It will be little better than a rope of sand, that must part at the first heavy strain that is brought to bear upon it. To prove the Bible is superhuman you ought to understand that it is incumbent on you to show that at least portions of it are above the power of man to produce. If there is nothing in it but what man can write, it is perfectly proper to relegate it to human minds and not to an unseen, unknown power outside of the Universe. Before it can be admitted to be divine, I repeat, it must be shown that it is not in the power of man to produce it. This you have failed to do.

The first strand of your cable is that the Bible is just about the right size. Who has the authority to say what is the exact size of divinity? Who shall say it is not larger or that it is not smaller than the Bible? If a certain size must be attained before a piece of manuscript can be divine, how is it with the parts that were written first, the Pentateuch, which is popularly supposed to be the oldest book in the collection—though it is not? If size is an essential to divinity, the first books could not have been divine because of this defect. If the New Testament is essential in making up the right size, the Old Testament could not have been divine without it. If the book is just the right size to be divine, it is perhaps fortunate that several books were lost, among which may be named "The Wars of Jehovah," "Joshua's Division of the Holy Land," "Solomon's Natural History," "The Annals of Solomon," "The Annals of Nathan," "The Annals of Gad," "The Life of Solomon by Ahijah," "The Life of Solomon by Iddo," "The Acts of Rehoboam," "The Chronicles of Judah or Israel," "The Book of Jashar," "The Life of Hezekiah," "The Life of Manasseh," "The Prophecy of Ahijah," "The Book of Shemaiah," "The Sayings of Hosea," etc., etc.; if these had all been preserved they would doubtless have increased the size to such an extent as to destroy its divinity. What if the councils which decided which books should constitute the sacred canon had voted in or voted out a few more, would not the effect upon the divinity of the whole been most disastrous? How came you to know just how much it takes to equal divinity? How can you decide that, inasmuch as Deity is infinite, that his book also must not be infinite, and therefore the Hindoo Scriptures, which are so voluminous as to be almost infinite, are not more divine than the Jewish Scriptures? Your first strand will certainly not bear much of a strain.

Your second strand is simplicity. Now, I am disposed to concede the simplicity of any one who would present such an argument in favor of the divinity of the Bible, but is it any simpler than the story of Blue Beard, Cinderella, the Cow jumping over the Moon, and the whole catalogue of Mother Goose's Nursery Rhymes? If simplicity proves the divinity of the Bible, may it not be used as a criterion by which to determine the divinity of these other and similar works. Is not all that is simple necessarily divine? Had you the Book of Daniel or the Book of Revelations in view when you were so struck with the simplicity of the volume? I have known men to spend almost a lifetime poring over these two books, and they knew as little about their meaning at last as they did at first. If the Bible possesses such extraordinary simplicity, why is it that legions of priests, at an expense of many millions of dollars per year, are necessary to explain its meaning to the people? and why is it, if its simplicity is so marked, that the several branches of the Christian Church spend generations in bitter contention over its language? Finally, how does your admiration for its perfect simplicity agree with your sixth strand, where you say "There never was a man who could place his hand on it and say, 'I know and understand all it contains.' The most diligent student closes his investigations of it, feeling, like Newton in the presence of the Universe, that he was but a gatherer of shells on the shores of the unfathomable sea. Men can master other books. It does not require much application to comprehend all that Aristotle, Plato, Cicero, or any other philosopher ever wrote. Whatever proceeds from man can be grasped and mastered by man. But the Bible cannot be so grasped and mastered by man. Hence, it must be more than human." Here is a striking case of blowing hot and cold at the same breath. Your second strand is that the Bible is so simple that it can be easily understood—no "pomposity," or "sophomority" about it, everybody can understand it—hence it must be divine; but in your sixth strand you say it is so complex and hidden that no man can understand it—hence, it must be divine. These strands certainly will not unite in making a strong cable. I must confess that I do not think much of either of them.

Your third strand, candor, does not have much strength. The Bible has no more candor than thousands of other books that men have written. This strand adds nothing to your cable.

Your fourth strand, incuriosity, I can make very little of. How you make incuriosity a proof of divinity is a puzzler to me. Was not God a little curious when he came down in the cool of the day and walked in the garden to see what Adam and Eve had been doing? Was he not a trifle curious when he descended from heaven to see what the Sodomites had done, and whether their conduct was in keeping with the cry that had gone up to him? Was he not a little curious when he put Abraham to the severe test of seeing if he would put his own child to death and offer him as a burnt offering? Did he not show commendable curiosity on many other occasions? No, no; incuriosity is not a proof of divinity. Try again, Brother Humphrey.

Your fifth strand I cannot comprehend sufficiently to get its full meaning. I believe you mean that the Bible is divine because God is King of kings and Lord of lords. I fail to see the connection. This is a very weak strand.

Your sixth I have quoted and found it completely neutralized by your second. They utterly contradict and destroy each other.

Your seventh strand, the close resemblance between the Bible and nature, is decidedly far-fetched. The Bible bears no more resemblance to nature than any other book does. In fact it bears less. It tells many impossible stories that are in utter variance with every principle of nature. There is very little harmony between nature and that queer old book. No. 7 is very weak.

Your eighth, exhaustiveness, has no more strength than the preceding. With all its exhaustiveness, what great truth, what science, what field of knowledge or philosophy has it exhausted? Did it exhaust cosmogony, astronomy, geology, chemistry, archaeology, mathematics, geography, biology, physiology, zoology, the nature of force and matter, the character of mind or intellect, philology, meteorology, pneumatics, hydrostatics, and all the numerous arts that exist in the world? No, it exhausts none of these, and scarcely touches them. It exhausts nothing except it be the stories of wars, bloodshed and the sexual relations of a crude, semi-barbarous people. No. 8 might as well have been omitted.

Your ninth, that the Bible was far in advance of the ages in which it was announced or written, has little more strength than its fellow strands. It is impossible to see that the Bible had this peculiarity. We have just seen that in none of the sciences which afterward came to be well understood in the world did the Bible advance beyond its age and time. You aim to make a good deal of Monotheism. The Jews, like their brothers, the Arabs, seemed more inclined to Monotheism than many of the ancient nations, but whether this quality possesses much special excellence is a debatable question. If Monotheism has proved more advantageous to the world than Polytheism or Notheism it is hardly yet ascertained. There is as much proof of the existence of a hundred gods as there is of one, and it is hard to be discovered how the belief in a single god is more conducive to virtue than the belief in numerous gods. Besides the Jews were not confined to one God. In the first chapter of Genesis the word translated God—Elohim is plural and means Gods. Further along in the original Hebrew we have El, El-Shadai, Adonai, Yahveh, Jah, Jehovah and others. The greater part of these were separate characters, but the translators rendered them all Lord and God—another exemplification of the dishonesty which the Scriptures cover. No. 9 contains no strength.

Your tenth and last strand I judge was thrown in for "good count," or as a makeweight. You wish to establish the fact that the Bible is the most reasonable and practicable of books. You could hardly set up a more absurd claim. A great portion of it is opposed to reason, and its practicability is of a very thin quality. In this respect it certainly does not surpass great numbers of other books. Who goes to the Bible when he wishes to learn the dictates of reason and to gain practicable information? It is only pious souls who imagine that the book is a voice from the throne of God who go to its pages for anything of a practicable character.

I have thus examined your "ten-stranded cable," and I cannot find that the strands amount to anything separate or that they possess any more strength when united. It seems very strange that you and the Christian world should depend upon such an imperfect cable to hold the ship of truth to her moorings. I must again express my surprise that you are able to present no stronger arguments in proof of the divinity of the book you so ardently revere. I cannot see how you were yourself won by such weak and inadequate reasoning. It is strange, too, that the world of Christendom is led along year after year and generation after generation by such deficient arguments. Millions, like yourself, give their assent to the divine origin of the Bible, when, as now, if the actual proofs of its divinity are called for, they turn out like the strands of your cable, possessing neither tenacity when alone, nor the ability to give strength to one another when combined.

I think I can give better reasons why the Bible is not divine than your ten are in favor of its divinity. In doing so I may repeat some that have already been used, but will arrange them in numerical order, similar to yours; and you may, if you please, call them strands in the great anti-biblical cable which is impossible to be broken.

1. There is no assertion from the writers themselves that they were directed or influenced by God.

2. It is wholly unknown, in nearly every instance, who the writers of the various books were, or whether they were men of credibility.

3. The time is not known when many of the books were written. A discrepancy of one thousand years, or more, exists between the time when it is claimed that they were written and the time when they really were written.

4. The matter contained in the book is largely crude and coarse, and is principally a mere narrative of events that were supposed to have occurred within the limits of an obscure nation occupying an area, in a hilly country, smaller than many of the small States in this Republic.

5. As everything the Bible contains could have been written without aid from any god, it is utter folly to assume that such a party had anything to do with it. There is not a chapter nor a verse in the whole compilation superior to human ability, and it is the height of absurdity to accord to divinity that which is wholly within the scope of humanity.

6. It is largely historical in character, and contains matter in the narration of which no divine aid would be necessary. It presents no more proofs of divinity than thousands of histories and detailed descriptions of that with which the world has been filled.

7. The coarseness and indecency of large portions of the book repudiate the idea of its being the work of the superior spirit of the Universe.

8. It is full of errors and contradictions, stating many points and incidents in language bearing two or more constructions.

9. It has many errors in chronology and in fact, making mistakes in some instances of hundreds of years.

10. The writers of the book were ignorant of the simplest truths of Nature which the merest schoolboy now clearly comprehends, such as the rotundity of the earth, the sun being the centre of the solar system, the phenomena of rain, rainbows, eclipses, the recurrence of day and night, the seasons, etc.

11. It contains many absurd and impossible statements which are opposed to the system of Nature and the laws which govern the Universe, as the story of creation, the snake story, the story of the flood, of the parting of seas and rivers, of Joshua stopping the heavenly bodies, of Jonah three days in the belly of a fish, of three men being thrown unharmed into a superheated furnace, etc. Its talk about the "ends," "pillars" and "foundations" of the earth, and of the stars falling to the earth, is simply ridiculous.

12. Its writers were unscientific and mostly unlearned men who were entirely ignorant of hundreds of things in science and general knowledge that are familiar in the world to-day. The Bible writers had no knowledge imparted to them beyond what had been attained by the nations then existing upon the earth.

13. It contains no greater literary ability, no finer language, no more elevated thought, no purer morals, than are contained in other writings and books written as early or earlier and which are not supposed to have been written by gods.

14. It imparts very crude ideas of Deity, the Supreme Power of the Universe, giving it the form of man, with all the passions, impulses, whims, and foibles that pertain to an unprogressed, passionate, ungovernable human being. The description which it gives of his form and appearance is revolting even to a child.

15. It imparts very little practical, useful information touching the affairs of life, and gives imperfect instructions upon such subjects as man most needs to know.

16. It is largely made up of accounts of savage wars, carnage, and bloodshed, with plentiful details of marrying, concubinage, of the begetting and bearing of children, of experiments in cattle-raising, rapes, adulteries, etc., etc., disgusting to the refined mind.

17. If it was of any value to the people of the earth at the times in which it was written, and if it was the highest form of literature and science which the world then possessed, it has ceased to be of any vital importance to mankind save as a work of antiquity, and in this view it is worthy of preservation and respect, but not as a book written by God.

18. The Bible teaches that God made the earth, and all the stars and worlds that compose the Universe less than six thousand years ago, while science teaches us with unerring truth that some of the far away suns and stars whose light meets our eyes on a clear night are so far distant that at the velocity at which light travels it would require hundreds of thousands and even millions of years for their light to reach our globe. Geology and its students have made it positive that this earth has existed as a globe for millions of years, and innumerable proofs can be brought to confirm it. How idle then to talk about this world and those distant orbs being less than six thousand years old.

19. The Bible teaches that vegetation of all kinds, including herbs, grasses, shrubbery, trees, etc., flourished and perfected their flowers, seeds and fruits before the sun came into existence, and before rain had ever fallen upon the earth. Every sensible person knows that this cannot be true.

20. The Bible teaches that the first created organic existences were grass, herbs and fruit trees, but geologists have found imbedded in the primitive rocks of the earth fossils of low forms of animal life found only in water which existed on the planet. It is established beyond a doubt that the fuci, the mollusca and the polyparia and other low forms of animal life existed ages before there was a spear of grass, a plant, a shrub or a tree upon the face of the whole earth.

21. The Bible teaches that the race of man has existed less than 6,000 years, while numerous discoveries have been made of the bones of men which have been excavated from deposits in caves and caverns, and other localities where they are found side by side with the bones of cave-lions, cave-bears, cave-hyenas, mastodons and various other animals which passed from the earth many thousand years ago. Crude implements, belonging to a primitive period called "the Stone Age," when man only knew how to form his knives, his axes, his spears, his arrow-heads, etc., of stone and flakes of flint, have been found in such quantities and in so many localities, as to entirely set Bible chronology aside and prove positively that man has existed on the earth at the very least one hundred thousand years, and probably much longer.

22. The errors of omission on the part of the Bible writers were as great as those of commission. They never alluded to the original fiery condition of the earth when its heat was so great for incomputable ages that organized life of any kind was utterly impossible on the earth.

23. Nothing is said in the Bible about the Glacial Period, which scientists have positive proofs existed for a long time on the earth, when vast bodies of ice were moved by the water a little as icebergs are now, when immense rocks were frozen in the ice and thus transported great distances. If it was the intention of the Bible writers to give information of what had taken place on the earth, the glacial period should not have been omitted.

24. The Bible teaches nothing of the topographical changes that have from time to time taken place upon the earth. It says nothing of islands and continents and mountains emerging from the ocean, while the plainest teachings of science give the positive information that the Alps, the Appenines, the Himalayas, the Ural Mountains, the Rocky Mountains of our own continent, the Andes, the Alleghanies, the Catskills, and all the other mountains on the face of the globe have either emerged from the bed of the ocean, or by internal fires and forces, have been upheaved from comparatively low ground. This was not all done at one time, nor within the same period. On the tops of some mountains are found remains of the devonian age; on others, of the carboniferous period; on others again, of the cretaceous period, showing that the several mountains of the globe were elevated at different periods, and at long eons of time apart.

25. The Bible neither contains a hint about the rotundity of the earth, nor does it contain a lisp of the existence of the vast Continent of America extending from the North Pole, or near it, to the 60th degree of south latitude, a distance of nearly ten thousand miles, and embracing every variety of climate, soil and topography, though it antedates, in existence as a continent, Europe, Asia and Africa. It was not because the Bible writers did not regard this older part of the world as worthy of mention, but because they were so ignorant of the facts of geography that they knew nothing about its existence, that made them neglect to speak of it; and the source of their information and inspiration was as ignorant as themselves.

26. While the most important truths of the Universe were entirely omitted and ignored, rambling tales, stories of blood and carnage, sketches of the lives of worthless priests and prophets, heartless tyrants, shameless women, stories filthy enough to cause the boldest man or woman to blush at their recital, genealogical descents, unpronounceable names, enigmatical and meaningless passages, and repetitions of semi-historical events make up the great bulk of what you reverently call the "Holy Bible," the "Book Divine," the "greatest gift of God to man," etc., all of which is an hallucination—a fallacy of the strongest kind.

27. Many parts of the Bible are so far-fetched, obscure and unintelligible that they are totally worthless to everybody. How much good has the Book of Daniel, the Book of Revelations, and many other parts of the Bible, ever done to the world? None at all; but have been a cause for interminable puzzling, disputing, speculating and conjecturing.

28. Scarcely any book ever published has contained so many errors and inaccuracies. King James' translation was published in 1611; in 1711 it was corrected by bishops Tenison and Lloyds, thousands of errors having crept into it. In 1669 Dr. Blayney corrected a multitude of new errors, reformed the text in many places and rectified some material errors in chronology. More recently "the British and Foreign Bible Society, after having circulated millions of copies of it, have declared that a faithful examination of it gives rise to serious doubts whether it can be truthfully called the word of God." The American Bible Society in 1847 appointed a committee of its members to prepare a standard edition of King James' version, free from typographical errors. They accordingly prepared such an edition, correcting, as they stated, twenty-four thousand errors, but so alarmed were they at the attacks made upon it, that it was withdrawn, and the American Bible Society continues to this day to circulate a book, for the word of God, containing—according to their own confession—twenty-four thousand errors. The Bible Revision Committee at present remodeling and improving the Word of God, in England, are said to have reported one hundred and fifty thousand errors of one kind and another in the present version. When they bring out their new version it will be so changed from the one in use that it is questionable whether the most ardent Bible-worshippers will be disposed to accept it as their revered word of God.

29. The several books of the Bible are all of them mere transcripts of transcripts, not one of the original manuscripts being now in existence and has not been for the last thousand years. It is easy to understand that copies from copies must become very full of errors. Of the New Testament books alone there are said to be thirty-two thousand different versions. God would hardly be likely to trust an important word of his to such possibilities of mutation and corruption.

30. The Bible misleads men by inducing them to believe that God can be placated and gratified by spending one day in seven in idleness; by slaying and burning bulls, rams, he-goats and other animals; and by praise, adulation, and prayer. It is not reasonable to suppose that the God of the Universe is in any way affected by any such frivolous performances.

31. The Bible leads people to believe that sin can be forgiven by certain ceremonies or penances being performed, while Nature teaches that there can be no forgiveness for a law once violated or a wrong act once committed.

32. The Bible has made millions of human beings miserable by the inculcation of a belief in hell and in a devil to torment them through the endless ages of eternity. There is nothing in Nature that gives the least foundation for such a horrible belief.

33. The Bible has done more towards degrading woman and towards keeping her in subjection to the masculine gender than any other influence in the world. From the passage, "Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee," unto "Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands as unto the Lord," woman has been made a mere slave to tyrant man, and it is only when the spirit of the Bible, in this respect, has been disregarded that woman has assumed her true position in life, an equal of man in all respects.

34. The Bible sanctions slavery. From its earliest chronology, when the oldest books were written, down to the close of the Book of Revelations, the Bible has justified and enjoined human slavery. It established it in many instances, and hardly ever has condemned it. The influence which the Bible shed in favor of slavery cost this country a protracted, bloody, and expensive war, costing hundreds of millions in treasure and at least a million of the best lives in the land. Mrs. Annie Besant, the courageous Freethinker and eloquent orator of England, uses this language: "Cursed is Canaan; a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren," said the Bible from ten thousand pulpits, but man arose and swore that, Bible or no Bible, the slaves should go free. The Bible has bolstered up every injustice—it has bulwarked every tyranny—it has defended every wrong. With toil and pain and bloodshed have the soldiers of Liberty wrung from the reluctant hands of priests and Bible-worshippers every charter of our freedom and every triumph of our cause."

35. The Bible has retarded the progress of science. The Jewish Scriptures have been brought forward to knock down and strangle every new thought and every effort to reach something higher. The priests have stood like highwaymen on the road to progress, and to every passerby have shouted: "Your reason or your life!" Prof. Denton says, "Science has flourished not because it has had the Bible to help it, but in spite of its direst opposition. Astronomy discovered that the earth is round and revolves, but the Bible taught something else, and hence the astronomer was an infidel and astronomy a dangerous science. Geology proved the world to be millions of years old, and the wail over its infidelity has not yet subsided. It is well known that man was on earth ages before the time of the creation of Adam, according to the Bible, but how cautious men are in saying so! and how theologians denounce those who dare to do so; for it is not in agreement with the unknown writer of Genesis. It will be generally acknowledged that universal man is not descended from one pair, and that man had a natural origin; but our scientific men, especially Americans, have a padlock on their lips, and orthodoxy keeps the key."

36. The Bible approves Polygamy—one of the twin-relics of barbarism. In the cases of Abraham, Jacob, David and Solomon we have abundant proof that the Bible did not condemn the multiplicity of wives and concubines which these patriarchs and saints indulged in.

37. The Bible sanctions murder and the reckless taking of human life. This was carried to such excess that some days as many as five hundred thousand are reported killed in a single day, and of God's own people. There is nothing in the Bible that represents God as being opposed to the effusion of human blood. On the other hand, there are many passages showing that he delighted in it. He is often styled the God of battles, the Lord of Hosts, etc. In fact he seems to have a special fondness for blood, both of men and animals.

38. The Bible recognizes the right and justice of putting people to death for very trivial offenses; for instance for picking up sticks on the Sabbath, the refractoriness of children, committing adultery and other offenses no greater than these.

39. The Bible discriminates in favor of the Jews and against other nations, making the God of the Bible to be partial and deficient in justice. Meat unfit for the use of the Jews was allowed to be sold to aliens and strangers, and these were submitted to many exactions and indignities not visited upon the Jews.

40. According to some passages in the Bible, it approves of human sacrifices, as in the case of Jephtha, the hanging of two sons and five grandsons of Saul to stop a famine, and the law given in Leviticus xxvii, 29, which requires that everything, whether man or beast, devoted to the Lord, shall surely be put to death.

41. The severity of the Bible against witches has been the apology for a great amount of cruelty and taking of human life. The Bible injunction, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live," has indirectly caused the torture and death of probably hundreds of thousands of persons entirely innocent of witchcraft. The inhuman zealots who in Europe and in this country so cruelly persecuted, tortured and put to death the thousands of unfortunate wretches who were stupidly supposed to be witches or to be bewitched, got their warrant, their authority, their impetus from the Bible. They were persistent admirers and worshippers of that book.

42. The Bible teaches that belief is a merit worthy of eternal life and disbelief a crime deserving of eternal punishment. This doctrine which seems to me totally absurd, has been the cause of incalculable mischief in the world. As belief and disbelief are arbitrary qualities or conditions not subject to choice or whim, but to evidence and reasons presented—a person being unable to believe anything and everything that may be required of him, the injustice of this doctrine is most apparent.

43. The entire sentiment of the Bible that God selected the Jews from among all the nations of the earth to be his chosen, peculiar people—the only nation to be loved while all others were hated—does great injustice to the Universal Father, and has imparted very wrong estimates of his character and attributes, and has worked much evil in the world.

44. The Bible inculcates the absurd idea that labor is a punishment, and was inflicted upon man in consequence of his disobedience in eating of a certain fruit. It teaches that but for this disobedience man could have lived in perpetual ease and idleness, everything he needed growing spontaneously for him. This pernicious belief has worked vast evil in the world. It has placed a disgrace upon honest labor, and kept man back in the night and indolence of barbarism. We well know that labor has been man's salvation. It has raised him from the low estate of the savage; it has aided him to subdue this planet to his use; it has enabled him to plow the ocean with his countless sails and steamers; to build cities, construct highways, canals, railways, and to make a delightful garden of a large share of the earth's surface. It has been the direct cause of the civilization and progress that exist in the world to-day, and without it man would have remained a brutal savage, and this in spite of the fundamental teachings of the Bible. Labor, instead of being a curse, a stigma, has been the greatest blessing that has befallen mankind.

45. The doctrine the Bible teaches, that the end of the world is near at hand, has been a source of immense damage. It has caused thousands upon thousands to neglect their business and the necessary cares of life, to abandon and give away their property; to become hopelessly insane, to wander over the country like vagabonds until, miserable mendicants, they become the most pitiable objects in the world.

46. The doctrine that it is the height of excellence and virtue to live abject lives here, to take no thought for the morrow, to court ignominy, to practice painful self-denial, to live in want and penury, to neglect the common duties of life for the sake of riches in the future world, for the sake of crowns of gold to wear upon the head, for the sake of living in a city with gates of pearl and with streets paved with gold, has worked incalculable mischief with the simple dupes who have believed this syren song. Poverty and degradation here, for the sake of riches and splendor hereafter, has been a source of great evil, retarding enterprise, encouraging indolence and mendicancy. Its influence has been most pernicious.

47. The Bible is inferior to many works which men have perfected. It has been produced since the pyramids of Egypt were built, since the Sphinx was executed, since the Obelisk was erected—which is cut from a single stone, weighs three hundred tons, and is still standing—since the colossus of Ramses II., which weighs nine hundred tons, was constructed: long since the construction of the monolithic temple weighing five thousand tons described by Herodotus, the one immense stone of which it is made having been transported, no one knows how, the whole length of the valley of the Nile to its delta; since the sculpture, bas-reliefs, obelisks, monuments, and temples with the most elaborate inscriptions, which were executed more than thirty-five centuries ago. These works were performed by men, and they certainly were far more difficult of accomplishment, and would seem to need the aid of the gods far more than the writing of the tedious details, the filthy stories, and the questionable history of the Bible. Why not as well insist that the gods or a god helped them to perform those stupendous works as to force us to acknowledge that a god must have assisted the writers of the Jewish Scriptures?

48. The greater portions of the Bible were undoubtedly written since the Institutes of Menu were penned, since the voluminous Vedas and Puranas were written, since the grand teachings of Zoroaster and the Avesta were committed to parchment; long since the cuneiform inscriptions of Nineveh and Assyria were executed; since many of the sacred writings and inscriptions of Egypt were produced; about the time, perhaps, that the Indian saint, Buddha, and the wonderful sayings he uttered, and the grand old Chinese philosopher, Confucius, with his eminently practical and useful precepts and morals. All these were written by men, and you will hardly claim that Jehovah had anything to do with them; and as they are, in point of ability, purity, and grandeur, equal, and more than equal, to the Jehovistic sacred writings, it is preposterous to insist that these could not have also been written by men.

49. The Bible is an advocate and supporter of kings and tyrants. It recognizes the divine right of kings to rule over the masses of the people, who are required to render implicit obedience and to be nothing more nor less than slaves. It does not introduce nor advocate the republican and higher forms of government, which, as civilization and intelligence advance in the world, are found to be vastly better for the masses of men than monarchy and tyranny. The God of the Bible was little more than a big king or despot who, with an arbitrary power, led his hosts, and proudly tyrannized over a nation of slaves.

50. The Bible establishes and sustains a privileged class, a divine aristocracy which has ever been a most oppressive burden to mankind. I mean the priesthood. One twelfth of the men of Israel were set apart to be priests to the other eleven parts. They performed no manual labor, but served in the sanctuary or temple, and performed divine ceremonies, such as slaying the bullocks, rams, and he-goats used for sacrifice (very likely they helped to eat them, too), together with making peace offerings, offerings of prayer and praise, and attending to the various celestial affairs of like character. For these very important services they were granted an immunity from toil, and were supported in an easy, idle life. One tenth of the products of the labor of the entire people had to be paid in to support this privileged class, and the masses were required to look up to them and revere them almost as though they were little gods. Priestcraft has ever been an onerous burden upon the backs of the people. Priests have ever been an unproducing, idle class of ecclesiastical aristocrats for whom the laboring people have been compelled to toil. The priests, in all systems of religion, have claimed that they knew more about the gods, the devils, and their wills and purposes, than all the world beside, and have claimed to be able to act as mediators between the gods and the people, that they had great influence at the courts of the gods, that they could influence them with their prayers and placate them by their adoration, their praise and their offerings. The people have for thousands of years been fools enough to believe these representations, and to think they must have priests to perform their business with the gods for them, to tell the gods what the people wanted, and to tell the people the will of the gods toward them and what they required of them. For performing this heavenly brokerage business, for thus acting as go-betweens to and from the gods and their vassals, the priests have made an extremely good thing of it. They have lived upon the fat of the land, they have dressed in the finest of linen, broadcloth and costly furs, they have received a great amount of reverence, and thousands of exquisite favors have been granted them by the female portion of their flocks which you prefer I should not allude to, and all this without blistering their hands, without soiling their fine garments, or without causing the perspiration to start from their brows. They have been par excellence, the celestial aristocracy here below, and to prove that they were entitled to all the honors bestowed upon them they claim they have a commission from the throne above the clouds. Though they have been liberally rewarded for their very valuable services, they have not proved to be always useful and always harmless. They have been extremely busy and extremely officious. They have instigated many theological dissensions among men; they have raised many ecclesiastical points and formulated many new creeds which they have required the people to accept. Nor have they been willing to keep out of the political field. They have instigated countless quarrels, embroglios, contests, wars and caused incalculable bloodshed. O yes, they have been a very costly luxury to poor credulous mankind, and I cannot think a kind, heavenly Father, full of kindness, love and compassion, whom you tell us sits upon his throne a little way above the clouds, keeping his loving and benignant eye always upon us, would ever have devised or countenanced such an institution as the priesthood. It is wholly of human origin.

I have thus given you my fifty-stranded cable of reasons why the Bible should not be regarded as the production of the Supreme Power of the Universe in place of your ten-stranded cable. I modestly think my strands are at least five times as strong, individually, as yours, and as there are five times as many of them, my cable, mathematically speaking, must be two hundred and fifty times as strong as yours! The relative difference between the two is undoubtedly as great as that—as thousands are daily coming to see. The book which so many have made a fetish of and worshiped almost precisely as fetish worshippers used to worship their idols, is being daily more and more understood in its true character. It is becoming widely comprehended that it is a book entirely of human production, and manufactured, as all other books are, and that it exhibits no more marks of divinity than any other book. Let me here give one more somewhat extended quotation from Col. R. G. Ingersoll, whom, I am sorry to notice, you regard with little favor:

"According to theologians, God, the father of us all, wrote a letter to his children. The children have always differed somewhat as to the meaning of this letter. In consequence of these honest differences, these brothers began to cut out each other's hearts. In every land where this letter from God has been read the children to whom and for whom it was written have been filled with hatred and malice. They have imprisoned and murdered each other, and the wives and children of each other. In the name of God every possible crime has been committed, every conceivable outrage has been perpetrated. Brave men, tender and loving women, beautiful girls, and prattling babes have been exterminated in the name of Jesus Christ. For more than fifty generations the Church has carried the black flag. Her vengeance has been measured only by her power. During all these years of infamy no heretic has ever been forgiven. With the heart of a fiend she has hated; with the clutch of avarice she has grasped; with the jaws of a dragon she has devoured; pitiless as famine, merciless as fire, with the conscience of a serpent. Such is the history of the Church of God.

"I do not say, and I do not believe, that Christians are as bad as their creeds. In spite of church and dogma, there have been millions and millions of men and women true to the loftiest and most generous promptings of the human heart. They have been true to their convictions, and with a self-denial and fortitude excelled by none, have labored and suffered for the salvation of men. Imbued with the spirit of self-sacrifice, believing that by personal effort they could rescue at least a few souls from the infinite shadow of hell, they have cheerfully endured every hardship and scorned every danger. And yet, notwithstanding all this, they believed that honest error was a crime. They knew that the Bible so declared, and they believed that all unbelievers would be eternally lost. They believed that religion was of God and all heresy of the Devil. They killed heretics in defense of their own souls and the souls of their children. They killed them because, according to their idea, they were the enemies of God, and because the Bible teaches that the blood of the unbeliever is a most acceptable sacrifice to heaven.

"Nature never prompted a loving mother to throw her child into the Ganges. Nature never prompted men to exterminate each other for a difference of opinion concerning the baptism of infants. These crimes have been produced by religions filled with all that is illogical, cruel and hideous. These religions were produced for the most part by ignorance, tyranny and hypocrisy. Under the impression that the infinite ruler and creator of the Universe had commanded the destruction of heretics and Infidels, the Church perpetrated all these crimes.

"Men and women have been burned for thinking there is but one God; that there was none; that the Holy Ghost is younger than God; that God was somewhat older than his Son; for insisting that good works will save a man, without faith; that faith will do without good works; for declaring that a sweet babe will not be burned eternally because its parents failed to have its head wet by a priest; for speaking of God as though he had a nose; for denying that Christ was his own father; for contending that three persons, rightly added together, make more than one; for believing in purgatory; for denying the reality of hell; for pretending that priests can forgive sins; for preaching that God is an essence; for denying that witches rode through the air on sticks; for doubting the total depravity of the human heart; for laughing at irresistible grace, predestination and particular redemption; for denying that good bread could be made of the body of a dead man; for pretending that the Pope was not managing this world for God, and in place of God; for disputing the efficacy of a vicarious atonement; for thinking that the Virgin Mary was born like other people; for thinking that a man's rib was hardly sufficient to make a good sized woman; for denying that God used his finger for a pen; for asserting that prayers are not answered, that diseases are not sent to punish unbelief; for denying the authority of the Bible; for having a Bible in their possession; for attending mass, and for refusing to attend; for wearing a surplice; for carrying a cross, and for refusing; for being a Catholic, and for being a Protestant, for being an Episcopalian, a Presbyterian, a Baptist, and for being a Quaker. In short, every virtue has been a crime, and every crime a virtue. The Church has burned honesty and rewarded hypocrisy, and all this, because it was commanded by a book—a book that men had been taught implicitly to believe, long before they knew one word that was in it. They had been taught that to doubt the truth of this book, to examine it, even, was a crime of such enormity that it could not be forgiven, either in this world or in the next.

"The Bible was the real persecutor. The Bible burned heretics, built dungeons, founded the Inquisition, and trampled upon all the liberties of men.

How long, O how long will mankind worship a book? How long will they grovel in the dust before the ignorant legends of the barbaric past? How long, O how long will they pursue phantoms in a darkness deeper than death?"

With your usual accuracy you say: "Such words as seething, roasting, and frying belong exclusively to the Infidel vocabulary." Allow me once more to correct you. They legitimately belong to the theory of countless millions of people being submerged in the lake of eternal fire and brimstone in which you so fondly believe. If the unfortunate wretches cast in the burning lake will not seethe, roast and fry, pray what is the reason, and where is the wrong in using the terms? But, to show you that these words do not belong exclusively to the "Infidel vocabulary," permit me to make a few quotations from strictly orthodox sources upon your favorite theme, "Hell and Damnation":

In Baxter's "Saint's Rest" he thus rapturously addresses himself to sinners: "Your torment shall be universal. . . . The soul and the body shall each have its torments.

The guilt of their sins shall be to damned souls like the tinder to gunpowder, to make the flames of hell take hold of them with fury. . . . The eyes shall be tortured with sights of horror, and hosts of devils and damned souls. The ears shall be tortured with the howlings and curses of their companions in torments. Their smell shall be tortured with the fumes of brimstone, and the liquid mass of eternal fire shall prey upon every part. . . . No drop of water shall be allowed to cool their tongues; no moment of respite permitted to relieve their agonies."

The saintly Bunyan gives this delectable picture: "All the devils in hell will be with thee howling and roaring, screeching and yelling in such a hideous manner that thou wilt be at thy wits' end, and be ready to run stark mad again from anguish and torment. . . . Here thou must lie and fry, and scorch, and broil, and burn for evermore."

An evangelical poet, catching the fiery refrain, thus sweetly sings:

"Clattering of iron, and the clank of chains;
The clang of lashing whips, shrill shrieks and groans,
Loud, ceaseless howlings, cries, and piercing moans.
Meanwhile, as if but light were all their pain,
Legions of devils, bound themselves in chains,
Tormented and tormentors, o'er them shake,
Thongs and forked iron in the burning lake.
Beholding eternal flames, and wreathed with spires
Of curling serpents, rouse the brimstone fires.
With whips of fiery scorpions scourge their slaves,
And in their faces dash the livid waves."

The Rev. Mr. Benson, a prominent Methodist commentator of England, uses this language:

"Infinite justice arrests their guilty souls and confines them in the dark prisons of hell, till they have satisfied all the demands by their personal sufferings, which, alas! they never can do. . . . God is present in hell in his infinite justice and almighty wrath as an unquenchable sea of liquid fire, where the wicked must drink in everlasting torture. His fiery indignation kindles and his incensed fury feeds the flame of their torment, while his powerful presence and operation maintains their being and render all their powers most acutely sensible, thus setting the keenest edge upon their pain, and making it cut most intolerably deep. He will exert all his divine attributes to make them as wretched as the capacity of their natures will admit. . . . Number the stars in the firmament, the drops of rain, the sands on the sea shore, and when thou hast finished the calculation, sit down and number all the ages of woe. Let every star, every drop, every grain of sand, represent one million of tormenting ages; and know that as many more millions still remain behind them, and so on without end."

The Rev. Mr. Ambrose, in a sermon on Dooms-day, drew this picture:

"When the damned have drunken down whole draughts of brimstone one day, they must do the same another day. The eye shall be tormented with the sight of devils; the ears with the hideous yellings and outcries of the damned in flames; the nostrils shall be smothered, as it were, with brimstone; the tongue, the hand, the foot and every part shall fry in flames."

This delicate delineation of the loveliness of hell is from the pen of the Rev. J. Furniss, C. S. R. R., and was published by authority in England, and was part of the instruction designed for the young:

"We know how far it is to the middle of the earth; it is just four thousand miles; so if hell is in the middle of the earth, it is four thousand miles to the horrible prison of hell. Down in this place is a terrific noise. Listen to the tremendous, the horrible uproar of millions and millions and millions of tormented creatures, mad with the fury of hell! Oh, the screams of fear, the groanings of horror, the yells of rage, the cries of pain, the shouts of agony, the shrieks of despair, from millions on millions! There you hear them roaring like lions, hissing like serpents, howling like dogs, and wailing like dragons. There you hear the gnashing of teeth and the fearful blasphemies of the devils. Above all, you hear the roaring of the thunders of God's anger, which shakes hell to its foundations. But there is another sound. There is in hell a sound like that of many waters. It is as if the rivers and oceans of the world were pouring themselves with a great splash down on the floor of hell. Is it, then, really the sound of waters? It is. Are the rivers and oceans of the earth pouring themselves into hell? No. What is it, then? It is the sound of oceans of tears running down from countless millions of eyes. They cry forever and ever. They cry because the sulphurous smoke torments their eyes. They cry because they are in darkness. They cry because they have lost the beautiful heaven. They cry because the sharp fire burns them. . . . The roof is red hot; the walls are red hot; the floor as like a thick sheet of red hot iron. See, on the middle of that red hot iron floor stands a girl. She looks about sixteen years of age. She has neither shoes nor stockings on her feet. The door of this room has never been opened since she first set her feet on this red hot floor. Now she sees the door opening. She rushes forward. She has gone down upon her knees upon the red hot floor. Listen, she speaks. She says: 'I have been standing with my bare feet on this red floor for years. Day and night my only standing place has been this red hot floor. Sleep never came to me for a moment, that I might forget this horrible burning floor. Look at my burnt and bleeding feet. Let me go off this burning floor for one moment—only for a short moment. Oh, that in this endless eternity of years, I might forget the pain only for one single moment.' The Devil answers her question. 'Do you ask for a moment—for one moment to forget your pain? No, not for one single moment during the never-ending eternity of years shall you ever leave this red hot floor.'"

I am aware, Bro. Humphrey, of your fondness for this kind of literature, and I would gladly favor you with many other choice extracts of the same kind which I have in my possession, but a feeling of mercy for our readers prompts me to desist. I will furnish you much more of the same kind of interesting reading matter at any time you wish it. It is a beautiful picture, is it not? How can anybody help loving a religion which has such a hell and loving a God capable of getting it all up? I trust I have convinced you that the words seething, roasting and frying do not belong exclusively to the "Infidel vocabulary."

In alluding to your personal experience, you say that the more you make yourself acquainted with the contents of the Bible, the more astonished you become at the same; that it is a perennial fountain to your soul; that you rise from it ready to say, like Jacob at Bethel, "How dreadful is this place. This is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven"; that you "find it a feast both for the intellect and for the heart. It is as full of wisdom as a father's counsel, and as full of affection as a mother's bosom." I cannot but be struck with the different effects that it produces upon you and myself. It does not make me feel that way at all. It awakens no special fervor in my breast, and does not enthrall me "worth a cent." Looking upon it as I would upon any other book, wholly man-made, it fails to arouse my religious feelings. I presume you feel very much the same, when you read that old book, as does the Brahmin when he reads his Vedas, the Buddhist when he pores over the sacred inculcations of Saykia Muni, the Parsee when he peruses the maxims and precepts of Zoroaster, the Chinese when he reads the excellent sayings of Confucius, the Mohammedan when he rises from the Koran, and the Mormon when he has filled his soul from the fountain of the Mormon Bible, the plates of which the prophet, Joe Smith, asserted that he obtained in a miraculous manner, but which is really an unpublished romance written in Bible style by an ex-Methodist preacher named Spaulding. I look upon you as occupying the same mental plane as they, and I regard you all as being equally in error concerning the divine afflatus which you severally imagine you draw from your sacred bibles. I only hope that you may all learn to look to the truths of Nature for guidance, and discard all superstitions and antiquated myths.

I am a trifle amused at your efforts to prove the existence of God from the "bumps" on a man's head. If the central portion of the head being high proves a God, does not being full over and back of the ears also prove a Devil? Is it not rather a weak conception that the shape of men's skulls make the slightest difference with the existence or non-existence of a divine being? If there are more men with low heads than high ones, would not the majority be against your God, and would he not be ruled out? If God has no place to exist except in men's skulls, is it not about time that he stepped down and out?

The question of the existence of a God does not legitimately belong in this discussion, but as it has been introduced, and you devote considerable space to the subject, I will consider it for a few moments. You say, "let us begin at the beginning." That is very well; but where is the beginning? When was it? Before we begin at the begin ning, is it not well to be sure there was a beginning? You say, too, "It is self-evident that something must have existed from eternity." How about the beginning of that something that has ever existed? Did it have a beginning? Did eternity have a beginning? Did space have a beginning? Of course not, and it will be impossible to find their beginning to begin at.

I accept it as a self-evident proposition that something cannot come from nothing. All the gods that men ever dreamed of could not make something of nothing. As Ingersoll says, "Nothing considered in the light of raw material is a most decided failure." By no process that has ever been discovered, can nothing be converted into something. By all the skill which the world has possessed not one grain of substance or matter has ever been destroyed or created from nothing. From these premises it is very easy to arrive at the conclusion that whatever exists to-day ever did exist in some form, for it is, we see, totally impossible to speak or create or evolve something from nothing. Matter may pass through interminable changes and transformations, but it can neither be increased nor lessened.

You speak of Force and make an effort to connect it somehow, mysteriously, with your Deity. Force is a concomitant, an integral part, an eternal attendant upon Matter. There can be no Force without Matter, and equally no Matter without Force. These are in certain degrees convertible one into the other. We know that matter often contains latent force, and that the forces in the Universe unite in organizing matter in comparatively solid form. All matter by the agency of force is susceptible of taking the ethereal forms, and all ethereal forms, by the aid of force and chemical affinity, are capable of taking solid forms. All matter is charged with force or life. There is no inert matter, there is no dead matter. Life and force exist everywhere where matter is, and matter in some form exists everywhere where space is. Matter or substance is as infinite as space or eternity, and had a beginning just as much and no more. Force is as beginningless as matter. Neither could have begun; neither can end.

These being accepted as truths, and truths I verily believe them to be, there is little chance of your supernatural, personal, anthropomorphic, Jewish God with parts and organs—necessarily occupying but a single point in the Universe at a given time—ever coming into existence; and there is absolutely no office for him to fill, no place for him to occupy, nothing for him to do. All the forces that now exist in the Universe ever did exist, and they acted as perfectly decillions of ages ago as they do to-day. In view of these grand conceptions, how crude, how weak and puerile is the idea that the Jewish Jehovah is superior to them all, and, six thousand years ago, spoke the boundless Universe into existence from nothing! This is undoubtedly one of the most baseless vagaries ever indulged in by the human mind. To my conception it is vastly grander and vastly truer to accept the great fact that the glorious Universe, with all its intricacies, all its potencies, all its possibilities, all its ever-changing forms and forces, ever existed in perfection as it exists to-day, than the childish belief that a few thousand years ago it was somehow brought into existence by a deity in the form of a big man who had passed countless eons somewhere or nowhere, surrounded by nothing, and reposing in perfect idleness. For me, I repeat, it is much easier to accept the fact that the Universe ever existed, with all its substance and all its force, than to admit the eternal existence of a god capable of devising and speaking it all into existence, or creating it from nothing. If we admit that substance always existed, we might as well go a little farther and admit that force and its immutable laws also always existed.

You speak of Mind, of its inherent laws, etc., and seem to think it has a domain and an existence apart from the Universe. Nothing, to my view, can be more erroneous. Mind belongs to the Universe, and is simply a function of organized matter, the same as any other faculty or function of the body. It has no domain by itself, no separate existence. There is not a particle of proof that mind or intellect has ever existed except as produced by an organization adapted to its production. Mind or thought is only generated through the medium of the brain and nervous system, the same as the sight is produced by the eye and optic nerves, hearing by the mechanism of the ear and the auricular nerves, and muscular strength by the muscles, tendons, etc. These are all equally sustained by the food taken into the stomach, and when digested and assimilated passes into chyme and chyle, and by means of the circulatory apparatus is carried over the entire system. When a man recuperates his stomach with a healthy meal, digestion at once begins, and the latent force in the food is assimilated and imparted to physical functions, and whether he walks twenty miles, chops a cord of wood, carries three tons of coal up as many flights of stairs, or works ten hours at writing or other mental labor, the process that goes on in his organization is much the same; the food that has been eaten and digested goes to supply the waste that is produced by the effort made, be it physical or mental, and if this effort is continued and the waste is kept up, additional food from time to time must be taken. If the food is shut off the man cannot continue to walk, he cannot continue to chop wood nor carry up coal, and equally impossible will it be for him to continue his mental labor. Our thoughts are just as much the result of the food we eat as is our muscular strength or any other function of our organization. Truly has it been said that the finest poems and dramas that have ever been written are simply well-digested and well-assimilated meat, bread, and potatoes. With a good organization and proper food, good thoughts can be produced, and without them they cannot be. There is no existing proof, I repeat, of any thoughts, any mind, any intellect, unless it is produced by an organization adapted to the purpose. A Great Central Intellect, a vast fountain of mind, is equally absurd as to talk about a great ocean of sight, a central fountain of hearing, a grand reservoir of taste, or a general storehouse of muscular strength. All are alike the production of organization, and can exist in no other way.

I will also assume the responsibility of saying there is no proof in existence of any deity, god, power or force outside of the Universe, and until such proof is found it appears to be the height of absurdity for theologians to persist in asserting that there is such force or deity. It may be very true, that "the fool hath said in his heart, there is no God," but he is equally a fool when he asserts dogmatically, with his lips or with his pen, that there is a God. All the substance, the powers and forces, I again repeat, that have an existence belong to the Universe and are parts of it, and there is not the first particle of proof of any supernatural power or of any force superior to, or outside of the Universe. All the powers and forces, I said, that exist to-day have ever existed in some form, and there is no possibility of matter or force being spoken into existence by a power or a person outside of it, there is nothing above it, there is nothing below it. It embraces all space and all existence, it is the all in all. A beginning of the Universe is utterly incomprehensible. The beginning of a god is far less absurd, for we know thousands of them have had beginnings and endings.

You say, "It is self-evident that something must have existed from eternity;" and I regard that as one of the most sensible utterances in your entire letter. It seems the most rational conclusion an intelligent being can come to. If it is true that something cannot come from nothing, it is the only conclusion that can be arrived at. If, then, we have got so far along as to understand that something must have existed from eternity, it is equally easy to comprehend that all matter or all something has existed from eternity. If you admit that anything has existed from eternity, it is but a step further—and a very reasonable one to take—to conclude that everything has existed from eternity. It is far easier for the mind to admit that everything has ever existed than to think that but a part of it, called God, has ever existed, and he or it made the remainder from nothing.

You, as other theologians do, attach great importance to the design argument in proof of the existence of a God, and perhaps it is the best proof you have; but it really amounts to nothing, for, you know, The proposition that proves too much proves nothing. If the design that is shown, or is apparent, in the Universe proves that it was designed and created, it also proves that the designer, necessarily superior to the Universe in every particular, and much fuller of design and wonderful adaptability—must inevitably have had a designer; and then you may imagine designers of designers and creators of creators, until your mind is bewildered and perfectly at sea. Do you not see that when you start out with the proposition that whatever possesses adaptability, fitness, design, potency and power must have had a creator having all these qualities in a superior degree to the thing created, that that creator must also have had a creator? And, reasoning in this way, where will you stop? You may go on forever getting up gods, creators of universes, and gods, creators of gods!

There are some things, or qualities, which, as you can easily imagine, were never designed, were never invented, and never had a beginning. Among these may be mentioned time, space, the fact that two units are twice as many as one, that between two hills there must be a valley, that a straight rod four feet long must have two ends, that a three-year-old child cannot become three years old in a minute. There are thousands of other similar truisms, which, you will readily admit, were never "designed." They necessarily have an eternal existence. So, in fact, it is with every truth, every principle, every fact in the Universe; they were never designed, they were never invented, they ever existed. You say, "the argument from design is absolutely conclusive." Nothing of the kind. It just proves nothing at all; and the more the operations of the Universe are investigated, the more it will be understood, that the Universe works to no design, and operations and events are as they are, because they can be no other way. You flippantly use the word chance, and insinuate that the Universe is a chance affair. Nothing is more absurd, and you ought to fully understand it. There is no chance in the operations of the Universe. Causes and effects are inevitable and unalterable. There is no chance about it. It is your God who is a chance-God. By chance he took a notion to make the Universe after he had spent an eternity in inactivity; by chance he made man and woman so that they fell and spoiled his job at the very first temptation; by chance he made a devil that has ever since circumvented him; by chance he selected a race of people as his special favorites whom he could not control; by chance he made men so sinful that he had to drown out the world; by chance the world got so full of sin that he was obliged to come down himself to earth and be crucified to appease his own anger, and by chance he has miserably managed all his complicated affairs. Talk no more about chance, unless it is in connection with your own chance-God.

If you can comprehend the truth that there are natural causes only, and that every event that has ever taken place was the result of a natural cause sufficient to produce it, you will be able to understand not only that no supernatural cause or causes are necessary, but that a design was also out of the question.

You imagine you see in every form of life an intricate design, but it is in imagination only. Every production of the Universe, as I said, has been the result of natural causes and not of supernatural causes. Every organ and function of the animal kingdom has resulted from the forces of nature and the environments of the animal. Take the organ of the eye for instance. It is an intricate piece of machinery, and probably shows as great a degree of design as anything in existence. But distinguished biologists tell us that the eye is wholly the result of natural causes, and was produced by the rays of the sun in connection with a perfect nervous system. All animals with comparatively perfect nervous systems and who live in the sunshine have eyes more or less perfectly developed. Such animals as have no nervous system or live permanently where there is no sunlight have no eyes. In the lower forms of animal life the eye was preceded by prehensiles or feelers which acted in part as eyes. In the evolution of animal life, and by the influence of the sun's rays, the prehensiles gradually shortened and perfected until a perfect eye was produced. It was the natural forces which produced this change, and not the supernatural.

It is well known that if animals are kept permanently from the action of the sun's rays the nerves of the eye become atrophied, paralyzed, or useless, and the eye is destroyed, as in the case of the fishes taken from the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky, where for generations they had existed in darkness. They had spots on the head that looked like eyes, but they were not eyes; the fish were as blind at one end as at the other. When those fish were exposed to the rays of the sun for an extended time the eye was gradually re-created and the sight reproduced. There was no supernatural power here, no God; neither in the original production, the loss of the eye, nor its reproduction. God had just as much to do with it in one case as in the other.

You doubtless have read of the cases of the unfortunate victims of religious persecution which Napoleon's army set at liberty from the Roman Inquisition. Some of them had been kept in dungeons and dark prisons for thirty or forty years, during which their organizations had slowly adapted themselves to surrounding conditions, and they could see a little in the darkness of their confinement, but when brought into the full light of the sun the rays were too powerful and they were made utterly blind. Now, God had just as much to do with destroying their sight as he had with immuring them in the dungeons of the Inquisition, and he had as much to do with that as he had with designing their eyes. Very much is laid to his charge that he is just as innocent of as are you and I.

Nearly a century ago James Hutton of Scotland, a gentleman of deep reasoning, and a member, by the by, of the Presbyterian Church, gave much thought and attention to the secondary rocks. He was the first to advance the theory that rocks were formed under the ocean where the great weight of the water prevented the volatile portions from escaping from the effects of the great heat which prevailed there, and that from the combined igneous and aqueous agencies the secondary rocks were produced, long before man existed on the earth. The theory startled Europe and it was soon discovered that Hutton had unwittingly disposed of God and made the Universe perform what had been attributed to God. The theory was so damaging to theology that Hutton was thrown into disgrace. His wife left him because he was an Atheist. The Church and his friends discarded him. Like a hero, however, he retained his views, but undoubtedly the severe frigidities with which he was treated shortened his days. But after his death, James Hall, a chemist, made a series of experiments with his crucible and retort and demonstrated beyond doubt that Hutton was correct. Though the rocks were subjected to ever so high a heat, if the gaseous parts were by pressure prevented from escaping, a new union would take place, with marble and other rocks as the result. Hutton's speculations have ripened into a settled scientific fact, and his views are accepted by all the learned scientists of the day, though they entirely dispense with the services of a god in forming the rocks which compose the crust of the earth. The more scientists investigate these subjects, the more do they find natural causes equal to all emergencies, and that there is no room for a God in the Universe, and nothing for him to do.

With Tyndall I believe the Universe—or matter—possesses all the power and potencies to perform all the results that take place, and that no outside agency is necessary or possible. In this regard you wrong Tyndall and others. He believes in no supernatural God that is in opposition to the laws of the Universe, and operates outside of or above them. There is hardly a first-class scientist of the day who believes in a power, force or deity without the Universe. They believe that the Universe contains all the substance and all the forces that have an existence.

You speak some three different times about the ape being an Atheist, and assume that the nearer a man is to an ape the more likely he is to be an Atheist. As usual, you are entirely wrong. You know nothing about the ape being an Atheist. He probably neither believes in a God nor disbelieves in one. But this we do know, the farther back we trace man to his primitive condition, but a remove from the animal kingdom, the more we find he believed in gods. He located bad gods and good gods in every department of Nature—in the storm, in the lightning, in the winds, in the heat, in the cold, in light and in darkness, and in every element and condition, but as he has advanced in civilization and intelligence, his gods have grown fewer and thinner, and at length his God has become so attenuated and ethereal that he is wholly intangible and impalpable, and the nearer he comes to nothing at all and nowhere the better it is for all concerned. When a superstitious man becomes wholly emancipated from supernatural gods, he will have more time and freedom to study the laws of the Universe and to learn vastly more from real facts than he can ever know from all the myths and invented gods that the world has ever been cursed with. Your talk about "inquiring at the office," and the necessity of "consulting the Divine Scriptures" if we would be admitted into the inner courts of nature, is mere theological twaddle. There is nothing in it whatever.

It makes but little difference what men who have preceded us have believed upon the subject of deity. Their light upon this subject was in proportion to their degree of intellectual development. Those who lived fifty and one hundred years ago were no guides for you and me to be governed by. We must investigate and decide for ourselves, draw our own conclusions, and be guided by our own convictions. Of one thing I feel fully assured; and that is, that no man who has lived in years that are passed, or is alive at the present time, has ever been able to find a substance, a power or force outside or independent of the Universe, and when they have thought that they believed in a god, amorphous or anthropomorphic, they have entered entirely into the field of conjecture and speculation.

I am well aware that men have devised Brahma, Ormuzd, Fohi, Osiris, Mithra, Indra, Baal, Zeus, Jupiter, Odin, Thor, Jehovah, Allah, Mumbo Jumbo, and countless other gods of more or less reputation, but I believe them all to be figments of the human brain, having no existence in any other locality. I have about the same respect for any one as I have for the others and as much fear of one as of the others. There is just as much proof that the African Mumbo Jumbo was the author of the Universe as that the Asiatic Jehovah was. Every nation and every man has a right to get up a god of his own, and this right has been very extensively exercised; and, as I said in my last reply, no two gods thus manufactured agree in all particulars.

In closing let me say, I revere the glorious Universe, with all its powers, potencies, and possibilities, some parts of which we can all see, and of which all are infinitesimal fractions, far more than an ideal something or nothing which no man has ever seen, never can see, knows nothing about and never can know anything about. Yes, I venerate the grand, infinite, powerful, ever-prevalent Universe, far more than I do the old Jewish divinity who, as has been quaintly described, was "one who raised up enemies that he might conquer them—made promises that he might break them—caused moral diseases that he might cure them—who permitted his favorite people to go after other gods that he might butcher them. A God who was before time was; cogitated before there was anything to cogitate about; who made the Universe before there was anything to make it of, and did before there was anything to do. A God who formed man in his own image, though his own image had no form; created an author of evil, though not himself the author of any evil; who caused his children to commit the most abominable crimes, and suffer the intensest agonies, though not himself the cause of either criminality or agony. A God who saw the work he had performed was very good, yet presently discovered that it was very bad; foreknew that man would sin, yet was indignantly astonished that he did sin; foreknew that the forbidden fruit would be eaten, yet damned the whole human race because it was eaten. A God who, though always in all places, occasionally came down from heaven just to see how the world wagged; though always of the same opinion, occasionally changed his mind; though in good temper frequently got into a towering passion; though always merciful to perfection, yet often murdered millions of innocent human beings; and though without parts, upon a particular occasion showed his back parts, and on another occasion his full figure to some seventy-five men.

"A God so deceptive as to send upon his people 'strong delusions' that they might believe a lie, so very silly as to suffer himself to be checkmated by the Devil, and so ferociously cruel that no human tyrant could ever equal him in monstrous severity and vengeance. A God whose presence would make a hell of heaven; whose virtues are vices (Ex. xx, 5), whose reason would disgrace an idiot (Ex. xxi, 21), whose laws would shock a savage (Num. xv, 31-35), whose fickleness provokes derision (Jer. xv, 6), and whose whole character is a horrible compound, an 'intense concentration' of the worst vices which have stained the worst human natures (Ex. xxxii, 27; Ezek. xiv, 9; 1 Kings, xxii, 21, 22). 'He is the all-wise being who made man upright, but could not keep him so; made the Devil, but could not control him; made all things pure, yet could not preserve them from corruption; who doomed countless millions for the innocent error of an individual; destroyed by the Deluge every living soul because of their wickedness, except three pair, who begat a second race as wicked as the first; provided an eternal heaven for the fools who accept, and eternal hell for the wise who reject his 'holy Gospel'; who after begetting himself upon somebody else, sent himself to be mediator between himself and everybody else; after being derided, spurned, cursed, hated, laughed at, scourged and nailed to the cross, got himself decently buried as preliminary to mounting once more to the right hand of himself, from whence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead, when there shall be neither quick nor dead. Whose history should be written in blood, for indeed it is a bloody history; whose name inspires disgust, for it is the name of an imaginary fiend, and whose religion should be universally execrated, for it is the religion of horror."

I have thus given a dim picture of the God of the Jews, the God of the Christians, the God of the Rev. G. H. Humphrey; but not the God of D. M. Bennett. You deem it a great virtue to believe in your god and a great sin to believe in mine. Like thousands of other theologians, you heap odium upon me because I cannot believe in your vengeful personal God, a personal devil, a burning hell, and all the other miserable theological rubbish of which your system is composed, but I cannot help it. I must believe in that which seems reasonable and truthful to me, and can only wonder how you can accept that old Jewish monstrosity whose portrait is feebly portrayed above. I esteem my god, the Universe, as much superior, in every sense of the word, to the fickle tutelary god of the Jews as the glorious sun that illuminates the entire solar system is brighter than the tiny lightning-bug. You go on, if you choose, in still believing your absurd superstitions, myths and fables. I can afford to wait patiently for the steady advance of truth and the further appreciation of the operations of the grand Universe. I am satisfied the time is surely coming when few sensible men will entertain the crude opinions you still persistently hug to your bosom, and when the truths of nature and reason will far transcend all belief in gods, devils, holy ghosts, virgin-mothers, fatherless sons, and every fable and myth of which theology is composed.

Begging pardon for detaining you so long, I remain,

Sincerely yours, D. M. BENNETT.

Humphrey-Bennett Discussion.

One more letter from the Rev. G. H. Humphrey and one more reply from ourselves completes this discussion. It will be immediately issued in book form—a 12mo. volume of 500 pages—will be well bound, and will be sold at the very low price of $1.00, sent by mail. It will also contain brief sketches of the two contestants and an index to the contents of the volume. The Discussion covers a good deal of ground, and will be valuable for reference as well as for perusal.

Those wishing copies will please notify us. Those who wish the work to sell again will be allowed a liberal commission. It will doubtless be a good book to sell. Both sides being fairly presented, it ought to sell among believers as well as unbelievers. It will be ready about October 1st.

We would announce to our readers that THE TRUTH SEEKER and The Spiritual Offering, a sprightly monthly magazine published in St. Louis by Nettie Pease Fox, will be furnished postpaid for a year for the low price of $2.50 or $1.25 for six months. Let readers who wish a good Materialistic and a good Spiritualistic publication make a note of this piece of intelligence and act upon it.

Portraits in Oil.

Our artistic friend and patron, E. McGregor, of Flushing, N. Y., has beautifully painted our picture in oil colors. It is executed in the finest style, and is said to look more like us than we look like ourselves. To those who wish their pictures thus painted, we cheerfully recommend our friend McGregor. We feel sure he will execute a fine piece of work and render entire satisfaction. We think he paints portraits of imperial size on a metal plate, ready for framing, at the low price of $6.00. Send him a photograph (imperial size) on paper, (not mounted,) and in due time you will get a finely executed painting in oil colors that will remain unchanged for a thousand years. Address E. McGregor, Flushing, N. Y.

ISIS UNVEILED: A Master Key to the Mysteries of Ancient and Modern Science and Theology. By Mme. H. P. Blavatsky. Mr. J. W. Bouton has in press a work with the above title, which will be published in a few days. In his prospectus he says: "The recent revival of interest in Philology and archaeology, resulting from the labors of Bursen, Layard, Higgins, Müller, Dr. Schliemann, and others, has created a great demand for works upon Eastern topics. No subject of investigation is more attractive and less understood than the Religious Philosophy of the Orientals. The religious and scientific wealth of the oldest peoples on earth has been so jealously guarded that the many have denied the existence of anything worth seeking; and the few so discouraged by the obstacles in the road that, for the most part, they have been compelled to abandon the search. Mme. Blavatsky enters the field well equipped. A native of Asia—her childhood passed among the Calmucks, Tartars, Persians and other Eastern peoples; her maturity among Hindoos, Cingalese, Thibetans, and Egyptians—Oriental traditions, languages, literature and mythology, have long been her chief study and occupation. She is most careful in stating facts and opinions, always presenting quotations of undeniable authenticity. Numerous translated extracts from the Kabala, the Hermes, the Vedas, etc., are interspersed throughout the work. To the scholar and the specialist, to the philologist and the archaeologist, this work will be a most valuable acquisition, while to the general reader it will be especially attractive because of its fascinating style and pleasing arrangement." The work is divided into two volumes—one devoted to Science, one to Religion—of about 650 pages each, and will be sold for $7.50. We can furnish it.

Sayings of Buddha.

A man who cherishes lust and desire, and does not aim after supreme knowledge, is like a vase of dirty water, in which all sorts of beautiful objects are placed—the water being shaken up men can see nothing of the objects therein placed; so it is, lust and desire, causing confusion and disorder in the heart, are like the mud in the water; they prevent our seeing the beauty of supreme reason. But remove the pollution, and immediately of itself comes forth the substantial form. So also when a fire is placed under a pot, and the water within is made to boil, then whoever looks down upon it will see no shadow of himself. So the three poisons which rage within the heart, and the five obscurities which embrace it, effectually prevent one attaining supreme reason. But once get rid of the pollution of the wicked heart, and then we perceive the spiritual portion of ourselves which we have had from the first, although involved in the net of life and death—gladly then we mount the Paradise of all the Buddhas, where reason and virtue continually abide.

Where is the "God of Ananias and Sapphira"?

MR. EDITOR: This question was suggested to my mind a few weeks ago by reading Beecher's "prayer before sermon," in a paper called the Christian Union, which was handed me by one of Beecher's worshippers. In this prayer Henry thus libels his God. He says: "Our Father who art so tender and gentle, the stretching forth of thy hand is not for thunder, and the looking forth of thine eye is not for lightning to blast us—thy heart is full of joy!" I do not include this last assertion in the libel, for God says, "I will laugh at your calamity and mock when your fear cometh"; "They shall call and I will not hear"; "I will send strong delusions that they may believe a lie and be damned."

Now, any being that can amuse himself in this way—by torturing the beings that he has forced into the world and out of it—must have a "heart full of joy"; yes, it must be chock full and running over with such joy as he felt when he sent the big flood to drown the world, and the shower of fire and brimstone on Sodom, and the fire that consumed one hundred Catholic Christians at Holyoke, Mass., or that burned the 320 in the Brooklyn theatre, the one hundred or more that were crushed and bruised, mangled and burned or frozen at the Ashtabula bridge catastrophe. But why multiply cases to show causes for his constant joy, when a thousand such things are occurring before our eyes every year?

I digress here to say, what no sane man will deny, that any being or person who will permit any great or small calamity, like those just mentioned, to occur, if it be in his power to prevent it, is just as guilty, morally and legally, as if he had, with his own hand, applied the incendiary torch or misplaced the switch.

Now for the libel. As I have said, it reads thus: "The stretching forth of thy hand is not for thunder, and the looking forth of thine eye is with lightning to blast us!"

N. B. I am reasoning from an orthodox standpoint. The great doctrine of the old creeds, and some of the new ones, is that God "worketh all things [not a part] after the counsel of his own will," and that "he hath foreordained whatsoever cometh to pass" (see Westminster Catechism). Again, "Not a sparrow falleth to the ground without your heavenly Father's notice." And to show that there are beings in the shape of men that hold and teach publicly this doctrine, I refer your readers to a sermon preached in Chicago, lately, in which the godly man said, "I believe the burning of this [Brooklyn] theatre was a judgment of God on the wicked city of Brooklyn"; and one-half of the bigoted dupes of the church believe it to-day.

Now, I want to ask Henry (on "honor bright") was not God's hand "stretched forth in thunder," and was not the "looking forth of his eye with lightning" on purpose "to blast" those unfortunates who perished in that theatre, and those at the Ashtabula bridge disaster, and those at Holyoke, and in all the great calamities that afflict the world? Let me refresh his godly mind a little. Let him ask those thirty poor widows, with their one hundred and twenty orphan children whose only hope of food and raiment was swept into oblivion, when their husbands and fathers perished amid those scorching flames, and then tell them that God's heart, which he says is so "tender and gentle," did it for his "honor and glory"; tell them that he could have prevented it if he had been disposed to do so, and tell them that the worst savage that inhabited the world (having been "born again") would have arrested the flames, and would not have suffered one of these to perish. I don't think any of the red-handed rebels that attempted to destroy our nation's life would have precipitated such a catastrophe.

Beecher believes in the God of Calvin, whose heart, when he tortured to death over his slow fires the noble Servetus, was joyous, of course, on that occasion; and, being always "full of joy," he must have rejoiced to behold the indescribable agonies of all who suffered, are still suffering, and will continue for long years to suffer, from the above mentioned heart-rending calamities. Let me tell Henry what one of his Brooklyn cotemporaries, the great humanitarian, man-loving Rev. J. W. Chadwick, says of his (Henry's) "always rejoicing God." He said in a sermon, in Brooklyn, Oct. 31, 1875, "I would rather, a thousand times over, not believe in any God than in such a God as Calvin's [and, he might have added, Beecher's]. And I would rather, a hundred times over, not believe immortality at all than believe in it as implying the eternal misery and anguish of 999 out of every thousand who pass the gates of death." This great, grand and loving sentiment should make the name of the man who uttered it immortal.

John Stuart Mill said: "Whatever power such a being as Calvin's god may have over me, there is one thing he shall not do—he shall not compel me to worship him. I will call no being good who is not what I mean when I apply that epithet to my fellow creatures, and if such a being can sentence me to hell for not so calling him, then to hell I will go." Good, noble, fearless, honest man!

What do you think of that, Henry? Where is Comstock? And what will those great evangelical Siamese twins, Moody and Sankey, say to such talk? And what will they say when I tell them the fact that all our Materialists, who include the best scientists of the world, and all intelligent and well educated Spiritualists, who are counted by millions, hold the same sentiments and views as Mill and Chadwick? Also that thousands are leaving the various orthodox sects and embracing with us the great gospel of humanity and justice, which is founded on natural reason and common sense. Truly, the religious world moves though the twin evangelists stand still and look backward.

Gems of Thought.

It is error, only, and not truth, that shrinks from inquiry.—Thomas Paine.

THE Universe, considered as a whole, is unchangeable. Nothing is eternal but space, atoms, force.—Draper.

A MAN should never be ashamed to own he has been in the wrong, which is but saying, in other words, that he is wiser to-day than he was yesterday.—Pope.

TO BE truly great, it is necessary to be truly good and benevolent, for all other distinctions the clouds of the valley will cover, and the greedy worms destroy.

It is the business of little minds to think; but he whose heart is firm, and whose conscience approves his conduct, will pursue his principles unto death.—Thomas Paine.

DOES God wish the lip worship of a slave? a sneak? of the man that dares not reason? If I were the infinite God, I would rather have the worship of one good man of brains than a world of such men.—Ingersoll.

WHAT then remains for us? Is it not this—the acquisition of knowledge, the cultivation of virtue and of friendship, the observance of faith and truth, and unremitting submission to whatever befalls us, a life led in accordance with reason?—Draper.

HAPPY indeed are those whose intercourse with the world has not changed the tone of their holier feelings, or broken those musical chords of the heart, whose vibrations are so melodious, so tender and so touching in the evening of their lives.

ALL revelation is, necessarily, a mere fiction. That which men call chance is only the effect of an unknown cause. Even of chances there is a law. There is no such thing as Providence, for nature proceeds under irresistible laws, and in this respect the Universe is only a vast automatic engine. The vital force which pervades the world is what the illiterate call God.—Draper.

DON'T wait for to-morrow to be happy. Enjoy life as you go along. Find pleasures in your every-day employment, and beautify every moment of your labor by a sweet, bright, hopeful spirit within. Open wide the doorways of your heart, and invite the blessed sunshine of happiness to enter therein, and it will bathe your soul in bliss and joy, even as the glorious beam of the great orb of day fills all nature with light, life, and beauty.—Mrs. E. D. Stenker.

UPON ancient dynasties of Ethiopian and Egyptian kings—upon Greek and Roman, upon Arab and Ottoman conquerors—upon Napoleon dreaming of an Eastern empire—upon battle and pestilence—upon keen-eyed travelers—Herodotus yesterday, Warburton to-day—upon all and more the unworldly Sphinx has watched, and watched like a Providence with the same sad, tranquil mien. And we, we shall die, and Islam will wither away, and the Englishman straining far over to hold his loved India, will plant a firm foot on the banks of the Nile, and sit in the seats of the Faithful, and still that sleepless rock will lie watching, and watching the works of the new busy race, with those same sad, earnest eyes, and the same tranquil mien everlasting. You dare not mock at the Sphinx.—Kinglake.

POETRY lifts the veil from the hidden beauty of the world, and makes familiar objects be as though they were not familiar. It reproduces all that it represents; and the impersonations clothed in its Elysian light stand therefore in the minds of those who have once contemplated them, as memorials of that gentle and exalted content which extends itself over all thoughts and actions with which it co-exists. The great secret of morals is love, or a going out of our own nature, and an identification of ourselves with the beautiful which exists in thought, action, or person, not our own. A man, to be greatly good, must imagine intensely and comprehensively; he must put himself in the place of another, and of many others; the pains and pleasures of his species must become his own. The great instrument of moral good is imagination; and poetry administers to the effect by acting upon the cause.—Shelley.

AH! what do we not owe to those who have had the courage to disbelieve and how tenderly we should hold them in mind! The men who bore hard names through life, and after death harder names piled like stones over their memories! The men who lived solitary and misunderstood, who were driven by the spirit into the wilderness, who were called Infidels because they believed more than their neighbors, and heretics because they chose the painful pursuit of truth in preference to the idle luxury of traditional opinion; and Atheists, because they rested on a God so large that the vulgar could not see his outline, and image-breakers, because they adored the unseen Spirit; and deniers of Christ, because they affirmed the Eternal Word. What do we not owe them, who went about shaking their heads and murmuring No with their lips, their hearts all the while saying Yes to the Immortals! They, after all, are the builders of our most splendid beliefs. It is they who have quenched the vengeful fires of hell, and burned up the selfish chaff of heaven. It is they who have taken the discord out of the heart of God, and made his countenance shine upon his creatures. It is they who have hunted the old Devil from the highways and byways of creation. Who but they have practically taught us the preciousness of the rational life, have rescued us from the tyranny of establishments and creeds, and purchased with their blood the soul freedom which is our native birth-right?—O. It is said that within the last seventeen years the persons in India who have perished from famine are equal in number to the entire population of Scotland.

THE Cincinnati Methodist Conference has the tallest Methodist preacher in the United States. He measures six feet seven inches in height, and his favorite hymn is "Nearer, my God, to thee," by several inches.

SOME of the members of a church in Hazelwood, Pa., have applied to the courts for an injunction to prevent the introduction of an organ into the church. They do not believe in machine worship.

PROF. MARSH, in his Nashville address before the American Association for the Advancement of Science, declared that "to doubt evolution to-day is to doubt science, and science is but another name for truth."

A RUSSIAN army chaplain, preaching to one of the regiments departing for the seat of war, described the torments which would await the coward in the other world, by depicting hell as a place in which the sufferer would be up to his neck in brandy, and unable to drink a drop.

THE Y. M. C. A. of this city attempted to secure the Hippodrome for another Moody and Sankey revival this year, but the manager of another kind of circus outbid them. Sawdust and spangles will be revived, and the jester and his horse will take the place of Balaam and his ass.

NINETY-SIX British peers have signed a letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury protesting against the use of "The Priest in Absolution," and declaring that the practice of auricular confession on the principles set forth in that book will destroy all friendly relations existing between laity and clergy.

INDICATIONS of a prehistoric people, which are plentiful in southwestern Colorado, have lately been discovered in western Nevada. Antique pottery and undecipherable writings on the rocks are the most common tokens. At one place, engraved upon a rock, is the nude figure of a man, holding in his right hand a shrub, the outlines of which show considerable skill.

Old churches in New York seem to meet an ignoble fate. The Central Presbyterian church in Broome street, near Centre, is now used for stabling horses; the old Moravian chapel in Houston street is degraded into a concert saloon, while the adjoining parsonage serves as a lager beer saloon; and a Catholic church on Eighth street is converted into an upholstering establishment.

Two Seventh-Day Baptists were recently fined four dollars each in a town in central Pennsylvania for working on Sunday. They refused to pay, and were sent to jail for four days. They claim that the State law of 1794 is unconstitutional, and that it is opposed to any Sabbath at all, since it abolishes the Sabbath of Scripture and ordains a new one, which is really no Sabbath.

THE excavation of the earth-covered and ruined seaport of Ostia on the Mediterranean is proceeding rapidly. Some beautiful columns and mosaic floors in fragments have already been found; and the archæologist Fiorelli expresses his belief that a proper handling of the old docks and quays will bring to light some curious maritime implements once used against the fleets of Carthage.

THE colored camp-meeting at Pamrapo, N. J., which was to have been closed last Saturday, will remain open for another week, in consequence, it is alleged, of the liquor-dealers in the vicinity having raised sufficient money to defray the expenses of the brethren. There has been a great out-pouring of spirits from the dealers' black bottles and a consequent in-flooding of cash to their pockets.

A KENTUCKY paper says: The Rev. Tillman Perkins, of the Methodist church, colored, in administering the ordinance of baptism to a two hundred-pound convert recently, in Little River, let his subject go to the bottom of the water. The recipient of the initiatory rite rose to the surface shouting, and, seizing the clergyman by the waist, paid him in kind for his services. Mr. Perkins was rescued from his unhappy dilemma by the intervention of a number of the brethren.

In directing attention to the fact that a Madrid professor, Juan Manuel Orti y Lara, has just published a book called "La Inquisicion," in which he enthusiastically defends the Inquisition, and pleads for its restoration in Spain, the Churchman (Episcopalian) reminds its readers that the book has been expressly approved by a special censor sent by the Vicario Ecclesiastico of Madrid, and according to the censor is a brilliant defense of the "sublime tribunal of the Holy Inquisition, the bulwark of our holy religion," an institution "as greatly beloved by the Church as it is reviled and cursed by the monster of heresy."

AN annual high-mass, with prayers to St. Emiguis, has been ordered in the Roman Catholic churches of California, by Archbishop Sadoc, with a special view to gain divine protection against earthquakes. St. Emiguis was an Italian who made many converts to the Roman Catholic faith, and against whom the devil is said to have employed earthquakes effectually. Earthquakes—that is, all respectable and law-abiding ones—will please take notice, and consider themselves squelched. Archbishop Sadoc should try the high-mass cure on the terrible famine in India; and while he is about it, he might reinforce Gen. Howard in his Indian campaign with the highest mass in his magazine.

HYPOCRISY PREFERRED TO HERESY.—Two colored ministers were brought before the colored Baptist Association in session at Suffolk, Va. One was charged with teaching that St. John, while on the island of Patmos, was ridden over by seven horses and escaped injury, because the Lord entered into the horses' hoofs and prevented them from harming his servant. His defense was rather unique, but he had to follow Galileo's example—he had to recant. The other was charged with teaching that the Lord did not know everything. Some novel arguments were put forth in his defense, but he also was compelled to come to the stool of repentance, and promise to be a heretic no more.

PREACHERS' MISTAKES.—Zion's Herald tells the story that at a "protracted meeting" in W., some years since, a young local preacher of very good presence and of more than ordinary abilities expressed some surprise that a certain minister had been received into the Conference; for, said he "I heard him announce his text from 'our Lord's Gospel by St. Ezekiel.'" That local preacher, however, in the evening, announced his text as in "Paul's letter to Peter," fourth chapter and eighth verse! "The end of all things is at an end; be ye sober and watch unto prayer." Frequently repeating in his discourse "the end of all things is at an end," a minister present ascended the pulpit, and on the next repetition, pulled his coat and said: "Hand, brother, hand!" The preacher in his warmth and earnestness turned to the congregation and said: "The brother behind me says 'hand'; but no matter: hand, head or foot, I tell you 'the end of all things is at an end! be ye sober and watch unto prayer!'"

In Peterboro, England, the old custom still is kept up of raffling for Bibles by six boys and six girls, in order to carry out the provisions of the will of queer old Dr. Wildrie, a Puritan minister, who died early in the eighteenth century. A saucer containing the dice is placed on the communion table, and six of the twelve young persons who get the largest number are to have a Bible apiece. The six Bibles are purchased at a cost of not over seven shillings each. In order to make this remarkable proceeding as religious as possible, the minister kneels at the communion table, and prays for divine direction on the throwing of the dice—a sort of grace before gambling. Thus, dice-throwing, if done piously and in the fear of the Lord, is not sinful.

THE Rock Hill (S. C.) Herald, of the 29th ult., vouches for the truth of the following statement: "On Sunday last three infant negro children were killed at the negro camp-meeting at Steele Hill, in upper Lancaster, by being stamped and rolled upon by shouting women. Strange to say, too, these tragic proceedings took place, not under the arbor where the main crowd was gathered, but off a little way in tents." We well remember having seen such fat wenches so filled with the spirit or some thing, who bounded and bounced themselves around, falling upon those who were so unfortunate as to be near them. They were so happy at being filled with Jesus that they cared for nothing but to shout and bounce. Woe to the child they fell upon. One avalanche of this kind would have been sufficient to crush out the infantile life.

THE Rev. Dr. M. M. Osborn, of Rondout, is accused of telling the following, among other yarns, about Brother Snyder, a class leader in his Methodist church: "He came to this country when young, and received a hymn-book from his parents with the injunction never to part with it under any consideration. While crossing the Atlantic he made it a daily practice to read his much beloved book. One morning while he was thus engaged the ship gave a sudden lurch, and the book dropped overboard. The owner mourned its loss for five days. At the expiration of that time the sailors hauled a shark on board. After it was cut open, what should be seen glittering in the sun's rays but the lost hymn-book." That story was better in its original form. It was a grindstone and a small boy instead of a hymn-book in the old version. But the hymn-book will do for a change.

HOW MORMONISM WAS INVENTED.—The Rev. Mr. Spaulding was out of the active ministry in Ohio, near Palmyra, we believe, running a small iron-foundry, and, being a man of literary tastes, employed his leisure moments in weaving a romance. It was a time when the work of the mound builders was creating wide interest, the implements of cookery and war being unearthed, showing the existence of a forgotten race. He entitled his production "Manuscript Found," the idea being that the romance woven by the ex-preacher was dug out of one of the mounds in the region. It was a history of ancient America, not all written at once, but as leisure spells and the fancy fell to him Mr. Spaulding would add to it. His writing was no secret in the neighborhood. Mr. Spaulding was prevailed upon to read his production to his neighbors as it progressed. It was written in Bible phraseology, and made as quaint as possible. Among the attentive listeners at these readings were Joe Smith and Sidney Rigdon, the same who founded Mormonism. Not only did Smith hear the manuscript read, but he borrowed it for a week or so, giving as a reason that he wanted to read it to his family, who had been unable to attend on Mr. Spaulding's readings. Not long afterward, it will be remembered, Smith claimed that an angel had revealed to him the existence of a buried history of aboriginal America, the plates of which, it is alleged, were dug up, and the book of Mormon made as a translation of their inscriptions. The widow of Mr. Spaulding and her daughter, Mrs. Dr. McKinstry of Monson, compared the Smith Bible with the parson's romance, and they were essentially the same. The similarity was so overwhelming as to leave no doubt that Smith copied in full the Rev. Mr. Spaulding's writing, and made out of it bodily his divine revelation.—Springfield Republican.

Events of the Week.

In the international shooting match which recently came off at Creedmoor, the American team was victorious by ninety-two points.

EX-PRESIDENT GRANT is now making the tour of Scotland and is having numerous honors paid him. He very naturally fraternizes with the countrymen of his forefathers.

It is reported that the Cuban insurgents have recently received a cargo of arms and ammunition. It was landed upon an unfrequented part of the coast by a schooner from a Southern port.

LEWIS MYERS, County Treasurer of Auglaize County, Ohio, from whose office some $30,000 was taken on the night of Sept. 6th, has been arrested on a charge of complicity in the robbery.

A COLLISION between a passenger train and freight train occurred on the Philadelphia and Erie road, Pennsylvania. A baggage car and an express car were burned and two men burned to death.

THREE more savings banks and banks of small calibre in this city and Brooklyn have suspended within the last few days. Those who have money deposited in such institutions have grounds for feeling restless.

FOR a week we have had very pleasant and warm weather for the fall season, feeling much like the warmest part of the summer. Corn must be maturing finely over the country. If it ripens well it will be one of the finest crops ever produced.

AN unusual number of suicides have taken place lately, and several of the unfortunate persons were people in good circumstances and moving in good society. Others were persons in straitened circumstances, out of business, or who had sustained losses.

THE President and his party still seem to be swinging around the circle. They have made the circuit of Ohio and have gone to Louisville and other Kentucky towns. The President is said to have made some sixty speeches, in all, since he started out on his travels.

THE sentence of fine and imprisonment pronounced upon Gambetta in France has created great excitement among the Republicans, and he has taken an appeal from the unjust sentence. It is thought he will be triumphantly elected to the Corps Legislatif, and that that will annul the sentence.

WM. M. TWEED has been testifying to statements relative to the huge ring thefts that were committed in this city a few years ago. They implicate men of both political parties, members of the Legislature, etc. The affairs of the city, as well as the State, have been in the hands of very dishonest men.

DURING the past week the Turko-Russian war has been prosecuted with bloody vigor. Very heavy fighting has been done before Plevna. The Russians have made repeated attacks, and have as often been repulsed and with very heavy loss. The Turks possessed great advantages in fighting behind breastworks and in having the American repeating rifle. That deadly arm mowed down the Russians with fearful havoc, and the Czar will long have occasion to regard the American rifle as the cause of his defeats and the loss of many thousands of the flower of his army. From the reports we get it is impossible to give the exact number of the losses, but they are high up in the thousands, probably in the neighborhood of 20,000. Gen. Skobeloff, the Russian commander, admitted that half his army had been destroyed, that his officers were nearly all killed, and that his "regiments did not exist." The Russians appear to be equally unsuccessful in Asia and in Europe. The Turks have done splendid fighting, and if their two armies have formed a junction as reported, they will probably soon be enabled to prosecute active operations against the Russian forces. In the meantime, the Czar is getting in bad odor with his own people. The war is unpopular, and a revolution at home would not be at all unlooked for. If he should lose his crown it would be only a just requital for the ill-advised course he has pursued toward the people of Turkey.

Humphrey-Bennett Discussion.

HUMPHREY'S FINAL LETTER. NO. XIII.

IS THERE A STRONGER PROBABILITY THAT THE BIBLE IS DIVINE THAN THAT INFIDELITY IS TRUE?

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Your disquisition on Atheism is a mixed mixture of theoretical errors with historical blunders. You have epitomized Büchner pretty well; but do you not know that Dr. Büchner is only a second-rate man among the thinkers of Germany? He has done but little more for philosophy in that country than Ingersoll has done for jurisprudence, science, emancipation, and Union in this. Perhaps "Dr." is as becoming a title for one who has added nothing to the sum-total of scientific knowledge, as "Colonel" is for a man who was not heard of until after the War. You go out of your way to expatiate on Chance. Of course, you did not remember that this word was first introduced into philosophy by the atheistic Democritus, the father of the atomistic theory. You must have been speaking at random when you said that I "wronged Tyndall and others." I am prepared to say that the "first-class scientists of the day" do "believe in a power, force, or deity without the Universe."

The late Agassiz was a religious man. Perhaps you remember that he opened his School of natural history, on Penikese Island, with prayer.

Principal Dawson, the leading geologist of Canada, believes in the Bible as firmly as in the white marble layers of the earth's crust. He has written several books to reconcile Scripture and science.

Prof. James D. Dana, of Yale, accepts the records of Genesis as implicitly as those of Geology.

Dr. Asa Gray, the great botanist, concludes his Address before "The American Association for the Advancement of Science," 1872, as follows: "Let us hope, and I confidently expect, that it is not to last; that the religious faith which survived without a shock the notion of the fixedness of the earth itself, may equally outlast the notion of the absolute fixedness of the species which inhabit it; that in the future, even more than in the past, faith in order, which is the basis of science, will not—as it cannot reasonably—be discovered from faith in an Ordainer, which is the basis of religion."

Daniel Kirkwood, the eminent mathematical discoverer, believes in a personal God and in an exalted Christ.

Prof. Marsh, whom Huxley complimented in his Chickering Hall Lectures, is a very firm believer in a living God.

The Duke of Argyll, who is no mean scientist, is an orthodox Christian (See his Reign of Law).

Janet stands among the first philosophers of France; but he has written a book expressly to combat Büchner's teachings.

Prof. Owen is perhaps the first comparative anatomist of the age; but it is well known that he has no sympathy with atheistic materialism.

Mivart is a thorough Theist, as his late work on Evolution shows.

Sir Wm. Thomson says: "Overpowering proof of intelligence and benevolent design lie all around us, and if ever perplexities, whether metaphysical or scientific, turn us away from them for a time, they come back to us with irresistible force, showing to us through nature the influence of a free will, and teaching us that all living beings depend upon one ever-acting Creator and Ruler" (Address before the British Association at its meeting in Edinburgh, 1871).

Dr. Wm. B. Carpenter has penned such sentiments as the following: "The Immutability of the Divine Nature is nowhere more clearly manifested than in the continuance of the same mode of action—not merely through the limited period of Human experience, but, as we have now strong reason to believe (on Scientific grounds alone), from the commencement of the present system of the Universe—which enables us to discern somewhat of the Plan on which the Creator has acted, and is still acting." "A deeper scrutiny has shown us that the Man of Science cannot dispense with the notion of a Power always working throughout the Mechanism of the Universe; and that on scientific grounds alone, this Power may be regarded, as the expression of Mind" (Mental Physiology, N. Y., 1875, pp. 428, 691-708).

R. A. Proctor is certainly no Atheist. His first series of Astronomical Lectures in this country was delivered under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association of New York. I find his works full of recognition of an Almighty God (See his Our Place among Infinities, N. Y., 1875, pp. 34, 38, 39, 43, 44, 312, etc.). In his last Lecture in Association Hall, New York, delivered Oct. 22, 1873, he said: "Inasmuch as the work is a study of science—that is to say, a knowledge of the works and ways of God—it cannot but lead to higher ideas of the wisdom and omniscience of the Almighty."

If Tyndall is not a professed Theist, in the accepted sense of that word, neither is he an Atheist. His works betray a deeper belief in God than he is willing to avow in words. He nowhere asserts that Matter and only Matter exists, or that mere Force is sufficient to account for the existence and condition of the Universe. In answer to Napoleon's question, "Who made all these?" he says: "That question remains unanswered, and science makes no attempt to answer it. . . . Science is mute in reply to these questions. But if the materialist is confounded and science rendered dumb, who else is prepared with a solution? To whom has this arm of the Lord been revealed? Let us lower our heads and acknowledge our ignorance, priest and philosopher, one and all. . . . You never hear the really philosophical defenders of the doctrine of Uniformity speaking of impossibilities in Nature. They never say, what they are so constantly charged with saying, that it is impossible for the Builder of the universe to alter His work. . . . They have as little fellowship with the atheist who says there is no God, as with the theist who professes to know the will of God" (Fragments of Science, N. Y., 1872, pp. 93, 121, 162). In his famous Belfast Address he implies that Matter had "a Creator"; asserts that "physical science cannot cover all the demands of his (man's) nature"; and declares that "the whole process of evolution is the manifestation of a Power absolutely inscrutable to the intellect of man. As little in our day as in the days of Job can man, by searching, find this Power out."

J. Stuart Mill said in the "general result" of his discussion of Theism, that "the indication given by such evidence as there is, points to the creation, not indeed of the universe, but of the present order of it, by an Intelligent Mind, whose power over the materials was not absolute, whose love for his creatures was not his sole actuating inducement, but who nevertheless desired their good" (Three Essays on Religion, N. Y., 1874, p. 242).

Like Tyndall, Herbert Spencer stoutly contends that he is neither a Pantheist nor an Atheist. True, he would not call himself a Theist; but he attributes the origin of the Universe to an "Unknown Reality." He says that "if science and religion are to be reconciled, the basis of reconciliation must be this deepest, widest and most certain of all facts,—that the Power which the universe manifests is utterly inscrutable" (First Principles of a New System of Philosophy, N. Y., 1869, p. 46).

Mr. Darwin is not so vague or "inscrutable." He is in no sense an Atheist. He admits the agency of a First Cause in a personal Creator. In the conclusion of his "Origin of Species" he says: "I see no good reason why the views given in this volume should shock the religious feelings of any one. . . . Authors of the highest eminence seem to be fully satisfied with the view that each species has been independently created. To my mind it accords better with what we know of the laws impressed on matter by the Creator, that the production and extinction of the past and present inhabitants of the world should have been due to secondary causes, like those determining the birth and death of the individual. . . . There is grandeur in this view of life, with its several powers, having been originally breathed by the Creator into a few forms or into one" (N. Y., 1873, pp. 421 428-9).

I trust you will not misunderstand me. I do not say that these men all believe in God in the same sense that a Christian does. I only hold that none of them deny the existence of God; hence, they are not Atheists.

It is true that little imitators have tried to deduce Atheism from their philosophy, and some Christians have charged it with that tendency. How prone men are to take an ell where they get an inch! In the same way Calvinism has been confounded with Fatalism, and Liberty with License. We are to judge of the opinions of these men only from their own words.

Your notion of the Universe rests on an assumption, which, as the preceding extracts show, the "first-class scientists of the day" regard as utterly inadmissible. No theory that excludes contrivance and design from the world can possibly account for all its phenomena. Blind force could never contrive such wonderful compensations and correspondences as Nature exhibits. Mindless matter could not produce such prospective arrangements as often meet our eyes. There is nothing in the condition of an unborn infant calculated to provide milk for it when born. There is nothing in the life-germ of an egg that could conceivably furnish itself beforehand with the yolk-food necessary to its nourishment previously to hatching. The same remark will apply to the seeds of plants. There is a prophetic element in Nature that can not be explained without reference to a designing Mind. The words of the psalmist and the prophet are at once more sublime and more true than the dogmatic deliverances of atheistic Materialists: "The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth his handiwork. Day unto day uttered speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge" (Ps. xix, 1, 2). "Lift up your eyes on high, and behold who hath created these things, that bringeth out their host by number: he calleth them all by names by the greatness of his might, for that he is strong in power; not one faileth" (Is. xl, 26).

Your last Reply bristles with distortions, garblings, half-truths, and untruths. No Christian believes the Bible in the sense you attribute to it.

You speak of all the Biblical writers as "unknown." They were not more unknown than other classic authors. This species of "criticism" has been applied to other than Scriptural writers. It has been maintained that there never was such a man as Homer, and that the Iliad is only a compilation of floating rhapsodies. It has been held that the histories of Herodotus are the work of a later hand. It has been argued that "Shakspeare" was none other than Lord Bacon. Some Catholic "critics" have ascribed the Roman classics to the monks of the Middle Ages. These notions are generally regarded only as erudite absurdities. It is the conviction of mankind that the ancient classics are really the compositions of the men to whom they have always been ascribed. On the same principle, it is believed that the books of the Bible were written by those whose names they have ever borne.

As to those books that are anonymous, they are trustworthy, because the Jewish nation, from the very first, received them as authentic, and because their historical contents are attested by collateral records, while their didactic portions carry their own recommendation. Such pastorals as Ruth and Esther, and such lyrics as the nameless Psalms could have no more intrinsic value from the names of their authors. Like Junius' Letters, or the "Nebular Hypothesis," they rest entirely on their own internal character. Legal documents that have been approved by the court, and duly filed, continue authentic forever, though the names of the clerks who wrote them may not be known. The tune of "Old Hundred" is not a whit less precious because its composer cannot be ascertained.

You put the formation of the Canon entirely too late. Dr. Samuel Davidson is certainly Rationalistic and scholarly enough to suit you. Some of his statements are extravagant, and, like all his later writings, Germanolatrous. But he was compelled to admit that the ten words proceeded from Moses himself; that the song of Deborah, the Psalms of David, and the odes of Solomon, were genuine; that Ezra edited the Pentateuch; that the prophets were included in the completed Canon; and that the New Testament was received as an infallible guide before the close of the second century (The Canon of the Bible, London, 1877, pp. 5, 9-11, 85, etc.). The Greek translation of the Old Testament, known as the Septuagint, was made in the latter half of the third century before Christ. From this we see that the Jewish Scriptures were at that time already compiled and received by the nation. That the New Testament Canon was collected at an early date is proved by the fact that it contains no rudiments of the Romish corruptions that began to develop so soon, and are so manifest in the Apocryphal New Testament, such as Mariolatry, transubstantiation, pontifical supremacy, etc. When we remember that the books constituting the Canon were included in it because they had always been authoritative, we feel at once that there is no real difficulty in this matter (See art. "Canon," in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible).

You seem to be possessed by the "strong delusion" that the ancient Jews offered human sacrifices. You misunderstand Lev. xxvii, 29. That verse only says that everything devoted of men shall not be redeemed; but shall surely be put to death. Moses certainly would not so stultify himself as to make a thing lawful in one place that he had prohibited elsewhere. Kitto says on this subject: "It is under these circumstances (the prevalence of human sacrifices) a striking fact that the Hebrew religion, even in its most rudimental condition, should be free from the contamination of human sacrifices. The case of Isaac and that of Jephthah's daughter cannot impair the general truth, that the offering of human beings is neither enjoined, allowed, nor practiced in the Biblical records. On the contrary, such an offering is strictly prohibited by Moses, as adverse to the will of God, and an abomination of the heathen" (Cyclopedia of Biblical Literature, article "Sacrifice, Human").

The Bible is not "an advocate and supporter" of tyrants. It is not its fault if interested men have so misconstrued it. The Hebrews were taught to rebel against the inhuman Pharaoh. They were forbidden to "rule one over another with rigor" (Lev. xxv, 43, 46, 53). The Jewish kings were removed for oppressing the people (2 Chron. xvi, 10). The Old Testament is so far from advocating the cause of monarchs—to say nothing of tyrants—that the Israelites were censured for demanding a king (1 Sam. viii.). Jahn describes the character of the Jewish Commonwealth as follows: "From the circumstance, that the people possessed so much influence, as to render it necessary to submit laws to them for ratification, and that they even took it on themselves sometimes to propose laws, or to resist those which were enacted; from the circumstance also, that the legislature of the nation had not the power of laying taxes, and that the civil code was regulated and enforced by God himself, independently of the legislature, Lowman and John David Michaelis are in favor of considering the Hebrew government a Democracy. . . . The Hebrew government, putting out of view its theocratic features, was of a mixed form, in some respects approaching to a democracy, in others assuming more of an aristocratical character" (Archæology, Sect. 219). Thus, the Bible gives no color of sanction to tyranny. It enjoins submission to kings as the best course to pursue where those kings "rule in righteousness." It says we had better sometimes bear the ills we have than fly to others that we know not of. It discourages riotousness and seditiousness. But it recognizes distinctly the right of the people in the affairs of government (See Ex. xix, 7-9; Num. xxxvi, 1-9; Sam. xi, 14, 15).

The Bible has not done more toward degrading woman than any other influence in the world. What are the facts? Is the Bible surrounded by more feminine abasement than any other "influence"? Are the Chinese, Hindoo, Mohammedan, Hottentot, or the Indian women in a better condition than those where the Word of God is known and respected? Was woman dishonored among a people where a Miriam conducted the chorus of praise, and where a Deborah judged the nation and led its armies to victory? Is the doctrine—whether it be true or not is immaterial to this point—that she was made the vehicle of the Incarnation degrading to woman? Where is the book that reflects such honor on female purity and beauty as the Bible? Are not the female seminaries and colleges of our land almost all under the auspices of religious denominations? Of course, the husband is the head of the wife. This is no less a dictum of nature and reason than of the Scriptures. Does Infidelity mean that a hen-pecked husband is the finishing-stroke of a perfected civilization? The late M. Thiers was not "influenced" by the Bible. He "was always a skeptic." When a young man he seduced a stock-broker's wife, lived on terms of criminal intimacy with her until her death, and subsequently made his own bastard daughter his wife.—N. Y. Herald, Sept. 4, 1877. Would such be your ideal method of exalting the fair sex? Is the "Free-Love" doctrine that woman is to be "kept" only until Lust is tired of her, more ennobling than the inspired maxim, "So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies. He that loveth his wife loveth himself. For no man ever yet hated his own flesh; but nourisheth and cherisheth it, even as the Lord the Church" (Eph. v, 28, 29)?

Neither did the Bible approve of polygamy. God created but one wife for one man. The bigamy of Lamech is mentioned as a monstrosity. The Deluge swept these primeval Mormons from the earth. Noah and his family were monogamists. The Mosaic law did not commend, far less command polygamy. That law bore a relation to it similar to that of the Constitution of the United States to Mormonism. Plural marriages were regulated where they could not be prevented. Their numerous wives were a reproach and a snare to those who had them. The Apostles were monogamists. Jesus says that only two are made one flesh by marriage (Mat. xix, 6). According to the New Testament, the husband is the head of the wife, not of wives (Eph. v, 23). Monogamy, then, is the Christian Law.

The "various readings" of original copies, and the defects of translations do not modify the meaning of the Bible in any perceptible degree. Are Shakspeare's plays less magnificent because editions differ in some of their words and phrases? Is the Crystal Palace ruined by a flaw, or a particle of sand here and there in its materials? Do a few typographical errors materially affect any book? Certainly not. So the slight inaccuracies of manuscripts and versions do not substantially change the doctrines of the Bible.

As has been said already, the Bible was not intended to be a text-book of natural philosophy. Its allusions to science are incidental, but always respectful. It was designed from the very first to be a teacher of moral and spiritual truth. We are to expect only that from it. It has nothing to do with such disputed matters as the Glacial Period. When will men begin to realize that it is not a treatise on astronomy, geology, mathematics, navigation, fashion, dentistry, or cookery? When will they learn that it was only given to answer those questions, Whence am I? What am I? Whither am I going? How may I be prepared to go?

You say there could be no vegetation before light. Very well; Genesis says Light was about the first thing that was called forth (Gen. i, 3). We cannot know all about the order of the creation. Possibly the Light was at first diffused and illocal, and that the mention of the sun on the fourth day signified only the collection of the Light into that central orb. In that case, the sun was not made exclusively the light-bearer until late in the evolution of the Universe (See Lange on Genesis, ch. i).

The wonderful events recorded in the Bible do not necessarily make it suspicious. A book on geology will tell us of things quite as startling and unusual. Dinotheria, megatheria, mastodons, hairy elephants, bats bigger than eagles, and forests of inconceivable luxuriance and density were miracles compared with the present products of the earth. If marvels that have ceased to be make the Bible incredible, they do fully as much in the same direction for geology.

I had two objects in view when I arranged those self-contradictions of Thomas Paine: 1st. To show that you can half-worship some writings, though they contain discrepancies, which shows that the alleged "self-contradictions of the Bible" are not the real reasons of your enmity against it. All would be well had you such charity for the failings of the patriarchs as you have shown to corrupt but impenitent Infidels. All would be peaceable, if you came to the Bible with a tenth of the indulgence that you give to the blundering, outgrown writings of scoffers and doubters. Your prejudices are as inveterate against Christianity as they are blind in favor of Infidelity. 2nd. I wanted to show that the ideas of any man could be made to appear self-contradictory, with a little garbling, disjointing, collocation, and then leaving them "without comment." You say I quoted Paine unfairly. I know I did in some instances; but I did it in scrupulous imitation of your treatment of the Bible.

The Bible does not exactly "teach that belief is a merit worthy of eternal life and disbelief a crime deserving of eternal punishment." It is not the mere abstract belief or disbelief, that saves or condemns, but the inevitable outcome of those states of the soul. These words are used in the Scriptures in a sense that comprehends man's entire character, inwardly and outwardly. Besides, the Bible does not say that there is saving merit even in Faith. Faith is only a condition of salvation. The Merit, on the ground of which the Divine Acceptance is accorded to the sinner, is vested in the Lord Jesus Christ.

You fail to perceive that the Bible contains any doctrines peculiar to itself. I have specified several of them, which, it seems, you did not notice. Let me then recapitulate, and give you some of them. They will show the originality of the Bible, and its superiority over all other venerated books.

1. It teaches MONOTHEISM. The Zend Avesta "contains prayers to a multitude of deities" (Clarke's Ten Great Religions p. 187). "The religion of the Veda is Polytheism" (Müller's Chips from a German Workshop vol. i, p. 27). Even Renan admits "that the Jewish race was the first of all the nations of the world to arrive at the knowledge of one God" (Ibid p. 344). The Monotheism of the Koran was borrowed from the Bible.

"Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God is ONE LORD" (Deut. vi, 14). Such was the Jew's confession of faith. El Shaddai, Adonai, Jah, and Jehovah, were only different names for the same Being. It is true that the word Elohím is in the plural number; but it is what Hebrew grammarians call the plural of majesty. It is always used with singular verbs.

I repeat, then, that Monotheism distinguished the Jews from all ancient nations, and the Bible from all "sacred books."

2. That God is eternal and infinite was a conception peculiar to the Jews. The Gentiles did not regard even the greatest of their gods as the "everlasting Father," and as "the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity" (Is. ix, 6; lvii, 15).

3. Spirituality in worship is a requirement of the Bible alone. The rites of Bacchus, Venus, and all other heathen gods and goddesses were at best but sensual orgies.

4. The doctrine of Justification by Faith is not taught in any book but the Bible.

5. The Idea of a divine Comforter is unknown outside of the New Testament. "I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you forever, even the spirit of truth" (John xiv, 16, 17, 26). The Gentiles had their succoring and avenging gods; but they conceived of none whose specific office it was to console and soothe the sorrowful children of men. It has never been said of but One: "God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes" (Rev. xxi, 4).

I am not now contending for the truth of these doctrines. I only claim that they are peculiar to the Bible. I might add many to their number; but this will be sufficient for our purpose.

We have touched on the slavery question under the first proposition. Instead of repeating, I will refer you to Letter v.

The Bible does not encourage idleness. On the contrary, it says: "He becometh poor that dealeth with a slack hand; but the hand of the diligent maketh rich" (Prov. x, 4). "If any would not work, neither should he eat" (2 Thes. iii, 10). "If any provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel" (1 Tim. v, 8).

You say "the Bible has retarded the progress of science." That is farther from the truth than the East is from the West. The grandest works of art, such as Raphael's, Da Vinci's, and Angelo's, are traceable to its influence. Haydn, Mozart, Mendelssohn and Handel founded their master-pieces on its sublime conceptions. It was the suggester of Milton's Paradise Lost. The plays of Shakspeare are spangled with its words and expressions. The English version of it has done more than any other agency to establish the uniformity and preserve the purity of the English language. Christendom knows of no University where it was not read at its dedication. We have seen under the second proposition that believers in it have done incomparably more than unbelievers to promote learning and science. There is even at the Vatican—that capitol of Roman Catholicism—such an immense collection of art, science, and literature as would elicit an everlasting boast from Infidels if—yes, if—they had anything like it anywhere on the face of the earth. While the "Liberals" of New York are scolding everything, "defending Communism," "apologizing for murder and inviting to adultery," that good old Presbyterian elder, Mr. Jas. Lenox, is putting some of his finishing touches on one of the finest Public Libraries in America. And so it has always been. The Christian, deriving his motive from the Bible, has done the work, while the peevish Infidel, inhaling his inspiration from "immortal hate," has stood by, with a magnifying and multiplying glass in his hand, to find faults.

You say that any man of average intelligence could write another such a book as the Bible. How then has it happened that no one has done it? Why does somebody not try it? There is plenty of ink and paper in the world. Let us see some one attempting it. Ah! I am mocking the inability of man. He cannot state a moral principle, or lay down a moral precept, that was not anticipated by that Book. There is no room for another Bible, because the one that we have covers all the earthly duties of man.

Your wholesale condemnation of the Bible is an insult to the intelligence of all Christendom. If it is the absurd, indecent, inconsistent, barbarous, injurious conglomerate that you represent it to be, the millions who read it must be either knaves or fools. They are fools, if all its alleged imperfections really exist, and they fail to see them. They are knaves, if they see them, and then decline to speak of them. You imply that only the few who are Infidels are acute and honest in regard to this matter. It would be difficult to decide which is the greater in this case, the esteem of these few for their own intelligence and frankness, or their insulting disesteem of the intelligence and frankness of everybody else.

Well, I must pass many of your misstatements by, and draw the discussion to a close. I will say but little in general review, and will give no recapitulation. The reader will do his own retrospect and summing up. I wish, however, to mention McGuire's "Religious Opinions and Character of Washington," New York, 1836. It is a solid work, demonstrating the correctness of my position. Paulding's "Life of Washington" is also worth reading. I have recently seen a volume with the title "The Domestic Life of Thomas Jefferson," by his great-grand-daughter, Sarah N. Randolph. It pronounces Randall the "most faithful" of Jefferson's biographers. This implies the great-grand-daughter's endorsement of what Mr. Randall says about Jefferson's religious views. Let me also refer you to Carpenter's "Inner Life of Abraham Lincoln" (pp. 185-196), for more light on Lincoln's religious character.

This discussion has been pleasant to me. You have made no personal remarks calculated to wound my feelings. You have met me with uniform politeness. I can say the same of all the attaches of the office. Mr. Eugene Macdonald, the foreman of the printers, has always been kind, good-natured and obliging. I will remember you all not only with interest but esteem. The heat of the controversy may have made us at times a little tart, but our friendship, I trust, has not failed to grow.

I am not unconscious of my deficiencies. I have omitted many strong points. I have given but hints, which I hope the reader will follow up. The "Evidences of Christianity" all volumes. I have scarcely given the alphabet of them. Your Replies have been about twice as long as my Letters. But your task was twice as difficult. A mass of words, boiled up, and containing endless repetitions, was probably better calculated than anything else, to give your cause some slight appearance of strength. It is when the advocate has a bad or doubtful client that he speaks longest to the jury. For my part, I have endeavored to avoid the cuttle-fish's style of conducting a combat. It has been my aim to be clear, and to the point.

I wish to protest against the common insinuation that preachers are hampered. There are doubtless many instances where the pew exerts too much influence over the pulpit. But I do not think that there is a class of men more free to give expression to their minds than ministers. We all know how largely the press is given to time-serving. Politicians are always trying servilely to strike the vein of the popular humor. "Business is business;" and policy has usurped the place of principle in trade and commerce. Should a clergyman become an Infidel, and begin to preach Infidelity, he would not miss his hearers much sooner than an Infidel editor would lose his subscribers, should he become a Christian. Look at the position of an Infidel publisher and bookseller: it is not natural for him to encourage a change of opinion, and, like the ancient sorcerers, (Acts xix, 19,) forfeit his stock. There are no men in the world that are trying to use and manipulate their patrons so as to make money out of them, more persistently than "Liberal" publishers and lecturers. "Freethinkers" are restrained thinkers, as much as anybody.

Permit me again to warn the reader that Infidel writers are not always reliable. John Adams was correct when he said that Bolingbroke was a "superficial, haughty, arrogant, supercilious dogmatist." The American Cyclopædia says truly that Voltaire "was not a great thinker, not a great poet, not a great historian . . . not authentic." Chadwick, a "liberal" Unitarian, says Paine made "appalling blunders" (Lecture on Paine, p. 24). Bro. Bennett says on the strength of hearsay—which to the reader is "hearsay upon hearsay"—that Bismarck is a "decided skeptic," if not an Atheist (Sages p. 876), whereas Heseckiel, in his authentic "Life of Bismarck," says he is not only a theist but a communicant (p. 453). Mr. Mendum, of Boston, publishes a volume of Hume's Essays, without intimating that they are abridged and mutilated. He also continues to circulate Macnaught on Inspiration, after the author has reconsidered and repudiated the position maintained in that book. My authority for saying Mr. Macnaught has given up those views are Dr. H. E. Thomas, Pittsburgh, Pa., and Dr. Wm. M. Taylor, of New York—both formerly of Liverpool, near Everton, where Mr. Macnaught resided for many years.

The Infidel, as well as the Christian, should go himself, as far as possible, to the original sources of knowledge. This is the world's great need. But, unfortunately, Infidels are very deficient in this respect. They read a skeptical work with implicit, or blind faith, while they do not read the other side at all. Paine's "Age of Reason" is issued again and again; but Watson's Reply is out of print. This is a reproach, not to Christians, who do not need it, but to Infidels, who point so often to the motto, "Hear both sides, and then decide." I have attended a great many "Liberal Club" meetings. I know exactly what they are. They pretend to be very generous. But nothing seems ever to be left unsaid that might hurt a Christian's feelings. Malignancy and flippancy are nearly always shown in the discussion of a religious subject. The speakers are given to going out of their way to make thrusts at Christianity. It is generally observable that, while a really good argument may be quietly appreciated by a few, it is the coarse joke, the silly pun, or the mean insinuation that "brings down the house." It is very seldom that there are present any indications of sober thought, wide-ranging reading, or accurate investigation of any kind. Herein lies the danger of Infidelity: it keeps its victims ignorant of the facts and truths of Christianity. Where Infidels have gone to the trouble to examine thoroughly its "many infallible proofs" (Acts i, 3), a revolution of opinion has generally followed. When Thomas drew near, and touched the risen Lord, his doubts disappeared. When Athenagoras proceeded to make careful inquiries into the nature and support of the Gospel system, he ceased to doubt it, and became a defender of it. When the young Chalmers gave Butler's "Analogy" a serious consideration, he was compelled to conclude that the balance of probabilities was in favor of the Christian Religion. When Gilbert West proceeded to examine the proofs of the Resurrection of Christ, in order that he might the more completely disbelieve and disprove it, unexpectedly to himself, he was made to see that that Fact was more undeniable and certain than anything in history. Lord Littleton started out to show the absurdity of Christianity, from the conversion of St. Paul; but after studying that event in all its relations, he came to the conclusion that it was an absolute demonstration of the truth of what he had intended to prove false. David Nelson has written a book on "The Cause and Cure of Infidelity." Every Infidel in the world ought to read it. Mr. Nelson was himself a skeptic for many years. He had a wide experience with that class of men. He found them, as a rule, ignorant of the Bible. He observed that almost every one of them who gave the evidences of Religion a dispassionate and thorough examination, ended by believing in it. Would to God that every skeptic would make the experiment! I am confident that if the Infidel would give the works that I have mentioned in Letters viii and xii an unprejudiced, thorough, and thoughtful reading, he would give up his Infidelity.

Many are deluded into the belief that Christianity is losing ground. It is a vain fear for the Christian, and a vain hope for the Infidel. The last five years have been remarkable for accessions to the churches. The world never had so many Bibles, churches, ministers, and genuine believers as it has to-day. The Gospel is not losing its hold on the people. There are no churches so well attended in New York and vicinity, as those in which the simple Gospel is preached. The churches of Dr. Hall, Dr. Taylor, Dr. Bevan, Dr. Cuyler, Dr. Duryea, Dr. Armitage, Dr. Storrs, Dr. Hepworth, Dr. Deems, Dr. Tyng, Jr., etc., etc., are full every Sunday, while the congregations of Frothingham, Alger, Adler, etc., are never immense, after all the coaxing, beckoning, and drumming up of sensational advertisements. The Bible Society is not bankrupt yet. Last year it issued 881,056 Testaments and Bibles. The songs of Sankey and the preaching of Moody have charms for the masses that Infidelity can never emulate.

It has always been the wishful cry of its enemies that the Christian Religion is "dying out." They thought so when Christ was crucified and buried; but he arose, leading captivity captive. They thought so when the Apostles were dispersed from Jerusalem; but that only spread it the faster. They thought so when the Roman Emperors put thousands of Christians to death; but the blood of the martyrs was the seed of the Church. They thought so when Julian apostatized, and turned all his influence against it; but Julian died exclaiming, "O Galilean, thou hast conquered!" They thought so when the English Deists made their big boasts; but Deism is out of fashion, and the Word of God is as quick and powerful as ever. They thought so when the French Atheists set up a Goddess of Reason, offered human sacrifices to her, and declared Death to be an eternal sleep. But those Atheists have passed away; and their memory is the red-light danger-signal of history, warning the world away from their footsteps. They thought so when the German Rationalists flooded the Fatherland with their "destructive criticisms"; but Rationalism is on the wane, and giving place to Evangelical truth. Some think so now, when Materialism is vaunting itself; but Christianity has overcome that foe before, and it will vanquish him again. The gates of Hell shall not prevail against the Church of Christ!

I am about to lay my pen aside. Let us, Friend Bennett and dear readers, take a serious view of life. We all know that the world is not just as it ought to be. There is weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth all around us. O the Niagara of souls that is plunging over the precipice of ruin, in our sight every day!

O the havoc of sin! How shall we banish it from our own hearts and from the world? is the question of questions. The possibilities of human nature are at once appalling and pleasing to contemplate. How much man is capable of suffering or enjoying! How a bad character keeps petrifying and becoming more and more unchangeable! How vast is the vista of immortality, opening out before us! Eternity should be the motive power in our lives. The fashion of this world passeth away. The earth itself will run its course and die. The old clock of Time, whose ticks are centuries, will stop at last. Time shall be no more. Human schemes and theories will sink successively into oblivion, like a baby's dreams. But the Word of our God shall stand forever. Let us take unto ourselves the whole armor of God, that we may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all to stand (Eph. vi, 10-18). Let us run no risks about everlasting things. Good bye, and God bless you, for Christ's sake. Yours in the bonds of friendship,

G. H. HUMPHREY.

Heaven, Leaven and Meal.

"The kingdom of heaven is like leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal till all became leavened."

Why was heaven then called a kingdom?

Because of the barbarism of the age—don't call it so now.

What is the Leaven?

Pure Heaven-born Democracy—Liberty, Equality, Fraternity—Love and good will.

Why did a woman take the leaven and hide it in the three measures of meal?

Bless your dear souls, don't you know? The Lords of creation have, for ages on ages, been tugging away with might and main, with the laudable intent of evangelizing the world. They are now about to "rise and report progress," which, in legislative parlance, means much talk—little do.

What is meal?

Humanity in general, as fast as prepared to receive advanced ideas, and square their lives by living truth.

There are more than three measures now, and will be lots more, for humanity is on the ascending grade.

PRENTISS.

Be silent when a fool talks.

Be hard-headed and soft-hearted.

As we are, so we view the world.

CHILDREN are the to-morrow of society.

Sayings of Buddha.

Who is the good man? The religious man only is good. And what is goodness? First and foremost it is the agreement of the will with the reason. Who is the great man? He who is strongest in the exercise of patience. He who patiently endures injury and maintains a blameless life—he is a man indeed. In reflection, in life, in consolation, in study, I never for a moment forgot the supreme end, Reason. Lust and desire, in respect of a man, are like a person who takes a lighted torch and runs with it against the wind. Foolish man! not letting go the torch, you must needs have the pain of a burnt hand; and so with respect to the poison of covetousness, lust, anger, envy, the misery to the person will be just like the self-inflicted pain on the hand of the foolish man bearing the torch.

Interrogatories to Jehovah.—No. 32.

Great Jehovah, with thy permission we will continue to examine those passages which are found in thy word that appear to bear adverse meanings and stand in contradiction one with the other.

In Matt. xx, 30, does it not say two blind men sat by the wayside and hailed Jesus as he passed, while does not Luke in narrating the same circumstance, speak of but one blind man?

Does not Matthew (viii, 28), say Jesus met two men coming out of the tombs, while Mark (v, 2), says it was but one? Was it a peculiarity of Matthew to see double?

Does not Matthew say thy son was crucified about the third hour, while John says it was the sixth hour?

Do not Matthew and Mark both say thy Son was reviled by both the thieves who were crucified with him, while Luke says it was one?

Does not Matthew say vinegar and gall were given him to drink, while Mark says it was wine and myrrh?

Does not John say that Satan entered Judas while at supper, and does not Luke say it was before supper?

Does not Matthew say Judas returned the thirty pieces of silver, while is it not stated in Acts that he bought a field with them?

Is there not a serious discrepancy about the manner of Judas' death? Does not Matthew say he hanged himself, while in Acts it is stated that he fell and burst himself asunder, and all his bowels gushed out?

Does not John say one woman came to the sepulchre, while Matthew says it was two, while Mark has it three and Luke near a half dozen? Were they accurate counters?

Does not Luke say two angels visited the sepulchre, and that they stood, while Matthew and Mark speak of but one, and says he sat? In this instance, where Matthew had the lesser number, was it because it was a spirit and hard to discern?

Does not Matthew and Luke say that the women went and told the disciples of the resurrection of Jesus, while Mark says they said not a word to any man about it?

Do not Mark and John say that Jesus appeared first to Mary Magdalene only. Does not Matthew say he appeared to the two Marys, while Luke has it that he appeared to neither of the Marys.

According to Matthew was not Jesus to be three days and nights in the heart of the earth, but according to the authorities was he more than two nights and a day in his grave?

Does not Matthew say that the disciples were immediately after the resurrection commanded to go into Galilee, while Luke says they were commanded to tarry in Jerusalem?

Does not Luke and John say that Jesus first appeared to the eleven disciples in a room in Jerusalem, while Matthew has it that it was on a mountain in Galilee?

Is there not an unaccountable and unpardonable discrepancy about the place of his ascension? In Acts (i, 9, 12), does it not say he ascended from Mount Olivet, while Luke has it that it was from Bethany, Mark that it was in a room where the disciples sat at meat, while Matthew and John had nothing to say about it? Was it a matter of so small consequence that they had not a word to say upon the subject of his departure from the earth?

Was the writer of Hebrews xi, 17, correct in speaking of Isaac as the only begotten son of Abraham? Was not Ishmael regularly begotten, and had not Abraham several other sons whom were all begotten?

Did not Abraham, being one hundred years old, require thy help to beget Isaac, but afterwards beget at least six children without any divine assistance?

Did not thou in Gen. xiii, 14, 15 and other passages, promise to Abraham the land of Canaan and to his seed forever, while by Acts vii, 5, and Heb. xi, 9, 13, is it not plain that the promise was never kept, and that his seed never received the Promised Land?

By 2 Chron. xxii, 1, is it not clear that Ahaziah was the younger son of Jehoram, while by 2 Chron. xxi, 16, 17, is it not equally clear Jehoahaz was the youngest son?

By 2 Kings viii, 17, 24, 26, does it not appear that Ahaziah was twenty-two years old when he began to reign, being eighteen years younger than his father, while by 2 Chron. xxi, 20, and xxii, 1, 2, that he was forty-two years old and two years older than his father? Is it easy for a son to be older than his father?

Does it not say in 2 Sam. vi, 23, that Michal, the daughter of Saul, had no children to the day of her death, while in 2 Sam. xxi, 8, are not the five sons of Michal mentioned?

Does it not say in 2 Sam. xxiv, 1, that thou movedst thy servant David to say, "Go number Israel and Judah," while in 1 Chron. xxi, 1, does it not explicitly state that it was Satan who provoked him to do it? Does it not follow, then, that thou and Satan are one and the same person or that one of these statements is false? How are men to decide which is the true and which the false?

Is there not a rather palpable disagreement between the results of that census given in the two different books? In 2 Sam. xxiv, 9, does it not say that the warriors of Israel numbered 800,000 and of Judah 500,000, while in 1 Chron. xxi, 5, are the numbers not given at 1,100,000 of Israel and 470,000 of Judah? If the two writers were equally inspired by thee, is it not singular how they should disagree to the amount of nearly 300,000? If one is false, how can we tell which is the one?

According to Samuel, did not David sin in numbering the people, although moved by you or by Satan, as the case may be, while in 1 Kings xv, 5, does it not say that David never turned aside from anything thou commandest him save only in the matter of Uriah the Hittite?

According to 2 Sam. x, 18, does it not say that David slew on a certain occasion seven hundred Syrian charioteers and forty thousand horsemen, while in 1 Chron. xix, 18, is the number not given as seven thousand charioteers and forty thousand footmen? Was seven hundred and seven thousand both right, and was horsemen in one place and footmen in the other equally correct?

Is it true in both statements that David paid fifty shekels of silver for a threshing floor, including a lot of cattle as given in 2 Sam. xxiv, 24, and in 1 Chron. xxi, 25, it says he paid six hundred shekels of gold? Is there not too much difference in the two statements to both be true?

Is it not stated in 1 Sam. xvii, 4, 50, that David slew Goliath, while in 2 Sam. xxi, 19, taking out the words which the translators supplied, does it not say that Elhanan slew him? If the latter is the true statement, does it not deprive David of a great share of the early reputation that was accorded him?

Does not thy word teach that children are punished for the sins of their parents, and that they are not punished for the sins of their parents? That man is justified by faith alone, and that he is not justified by faith alone? That it is impossible to fall from grace, and that it is not impossible to fall from grace? That no man is without sin, and (1 John iii, 9, 6, 8) that Christians and those born of thee cannot commit no sin? That there is to be a resurrection of the dead, and that there is to be no resurrection of the dead? That rewards and punishments are bestowed in this world, and that they are to be bestowed in the future world? That annihilation is the portion of mankind? (Job iii, 11-22; Eccl. ix, 5, 10; Eccl. iii, 19, 20), and that endless misery is the portion of all mankind? That the earth is to be destroyed, and that it is never to be destroyed? That no evil shall happen to the godly and that evil does happen to the godly? That worldly good and prosperity are the lot of the godly, and that worldly misery and destitution are the lot of the godly? That worldly prosperity is a blessing and a reward for righteousness, and that worldly prosperity is a curse and a bar to a future reward?

Does not thy word teach that the Christian yoke is easy and that it is not easy? That the fruit of God's spirit is love and gentleness, and that the fruit of God's spirit is vengeance and fury? That prosperity and longevity are enjoyed by the wicked (Job xxi, 7, 8, 9; Ps. xvii, 14; Eccl. vii, 15; Jer. xii, 1), and that prosperity and longevity are denied to the wicked? (Job xviii, 5, 12, 18, 19; Eccl. viii, 23; Ps. lv, 23; Job xxxvi, 14.) That poverty is a blessing; that riches is a blessing, and that neither poverty and riches are a blessing? That wisdom is a source of enjoyment, and that it is a source of vexation, grief and sorrow? That a good name is a blessing, and that it is a curse? That laughing is commended and that it is condemned? That the rod of correction is a remedy for foolishness, and that it is no remedy for foolishness? That temptation is to be desired, and that it is not to be desired? That prophecy is sure, and that it is not sure? That man's life was to be one hundred and twenty years, and that it was to be seventy years? That miracles are a proof of divine mission, and that they are not a proof of divine mission? That Moses was a very meek man, and that he was a very cruel man? That all Scriptures are inspired, and that some Scripture is not inspired? That Elijah went bodily up to heaven, and that no man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of Man? (John iii, 13.)

Is it not extremely difficult to understand how a God of perfect truth can talk on both sides of so many subjects, and how he could contradict himself pointedly in so many instances? Is it possible that a God of perfect truth can state so many contradictions, half of which at least must be untrue, or that he would influence anybody to write them? Is it not far more reasonable to conclude that these various writings were produced by different men at different times, and that they are not chargeable directly to thee? Is it not perfectly easy for men to be in error, but impossible for thee to be mistaken?

THE BIBLE OF HUMANITY. By Jules Michelet. Translated from the French by Vincenzo Calfa. New York, J. W. Bonton. 8vo. Price $3.00. This volume will be a valuable assistant to the student of evolution—the evolution of mind and religion. Beginning with the Vedas of India, it traces the course of religion down to the present. It is an epitome and analysis of the bibles of the past, and points the way to the bible of the future—Science. Unlike many works on the same subjects, it is not dry or uninviting; on the contrary, it reads like a novel or a poem; and no novel could be more interesting. Yet it is not trifling nor flippant. Michelet carries the warm coloring of the artist and the vivid imagery of the poet into the domain of history without detracting from its accuracy; he criticises as a philosopher, and the work has lost none of its spirit in the hands of the translator.

Michelet gives to the word Bible a comprehensive meaning. He says: "Mankind have incessantly deposited their thoughts in a canon Bible. Every people writes there its peculiar record. These records are very clear, but different in form, and in a very free handwriting; herein the form of great poems and historical accounts; therein the form of pyramids and statues. A god sometimes, or a city, express much more than books, and without a word uttered, they express the very soul."

The work does not pretend to be a classification or history of religions; but it follows the central idea, the motive—which is the same in all religions—and traces it to its logical conclusion.

Of the Jewish Bible he says: "It is assumed to be dogmatic; but it cannot be so, because it is very incoherent. The religious and moral principle fluctuates infinitely from Elohim to Jehovah. In its morality there is the same discord. The variety and elasticity of this book has been nevertheless of much use, when the father of a family—a severe Israelite or a staunch Protestant—read certain chosen fragments and expounded them to his family, pervading them with an inspiration which is not always in the text. Who would put this text in the hands of a boy? What woman, without casting her eyes down, will dare say she has read it throughout? It often presents all at once the unveiled impurity of Syria, and many a time the exquisitely calculated and relished sensuality of gloomy and subtle minds which have gone through everything. Humanity cannot sit forever in that landscape of ashes to admire the trees 'which formerly may have been there.' Humanity cannot stay like the thirsty camel, that, after a day of traveling, they lead to a dry torrent [water-course] and say, 'Drink, camel, this has been a stream. If you wish to have a sea, hard by there is the Dead Sea, and on its shores there are salt and pebbles for pasturage.'"

In conclusion he says: "Justice is not the founding of yesterday, but the mistress and the heiress that wishes to return home—she is the true lady. Who was before her? She can say: 'I did spring up in the dawn at the glimmerings of the Vedas. In the morning of Persia I was the pure energy in the heroism of work. I was the Greek genius, and emancipation by the might of a word: Themis is Jove. God is Justice itself.'"

THE HUMPHREY-BENNETT DISCUSSION; or, Christianity and Infidelity, will soon appear in a 12mo volume of nearly 550 pages. Sent by mail for one dollar. Let every person wanting a copy send in his order early.

Col. Ingersoll and the "Observer."

The following characteristic letter has been sent by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll to the New York Observer, a paper devoted to orthodoxy, and superstition. In the language of the unregenerate sons of sin, it had better put up or shut up. In case it does not accept the offer, perhaps some other Christian, who has more faith in Jesus and less knowledge of history, can induce the Colonel to extend his invitation. It is a square and fair challenge.

To the Editor of the New York Observer:

I have been informed that you accepted, in your paper, an offer made by me to any clergyman in San Francisco. That offer was, that I would pay one thousand dollars in gold to any minister in that city who would prove that Thomas Paine died in terror because of religious opinions he had expressed, or that Voltaire did not pass away serenely as the coming of the dawn.

For many years religious journals and ministers have been circulating certain pretended accounts of the frightful agonies endured by Paine and Voltaire when dying; that these great men at the moment of death were terrified because they had given their honest opinions upon the subject of religion to their fellow-men. The imagination of the religious world has been taxed to the utmost in inventing absurd and infamous accounts of the last moments of these intellectual giants. Every Sunday-school paper, thousands of idiotic tracts, and countless stupidities called sermons, have been filled with these calumnies.

Paine and Voltaire were both believers in God—both hoped for immortality—both believed in special Providence. But both denied the inspiration of the Scriptures—both denied the divinity of Jesus Christ. While theologians most cheerfully admit that most murderers die without fear, they deny the possibility of any man who has expressed his disbelief in the inspiration of the Bible, dying except in an agony of terror. These stories are used in revivals and in Sunday-schools, and have long been considered of great value.

I am anxious that these slanders should cease. I am desirous of seeing justice done, even at this late day, to the dead.

For the purpose of ascertaining the evidence upon which these death-bed accounts really rest, I make to you the following proposition:—

First.—As to THOMAS PAINE: I will deposit with the First National Bank of Peoria, Illinois, one thousand dollars in gold, upon the following conditions:—This money shall be subject to your order when you shall, in the manner hereinafter provided, substantiate that Thomas Paine admitted the Bible to be an inspired book, or that he recanted his infidel opinions—or that he died regretting that he had disbelieved the Bible—or that he died calling upon Jesus Christ in any religious sense whatever.

In order that a tribunal may be created to try this question, you may select one man, I will select another, and the two thus chosen shall select a third, and any two of the three may decide the matter.

As there will be certain costs and expenditures on both sides, such costs and expenditures shall be paid by the defeated party.

In addition to the one thousand dollars in gold, I will deposit a bond with good and sufficient security in the sum of two thousand dollars, conditioned for the payment of all costs in case I am defeated. I shall require of you a like bond.

From the date of accepting this offer you may have ninety days to collect and present your testimony, giving me notice of time and place of taking depositions. I shall have a like time to take evidence upon my side, giving you like notice, and you shall then have thirty days to take further testimony in reply to what I may offer. The case shall then be argued before the persons chosen; and their decisions shall be final as to us.

If the arbitrators chosen by me shall die, I shall have the right to choose another. You shall have the same right. If the third one, chosen by our two, shall die, the two shall choose another; and all vacancies, from whatever cause, shall be chosen upon the same principle.

The arbitrators shall sit when and where a majority shall determine, and shall have full power to pass upon all questions arising as to competency of evidence, and upon all subjects.

Second.—As to VOLTAIRE: I make the same proposition. If you will substantiate that Voltaire died expressing remorse or showing in any way that he was in mental agony because he had attacked Catholicism—or because he had denied the inspiration of the Bible—or because he had denied the divinity of Christ.

I make these propositions because I want your people to stop slandering the dead.

If the propositions do not suit you in any particular, please state your objections, and I will modify them in any way consistent with the object in view.

If Paine and Voltaire died filled with childish and silly fear, I want to know it, and I want the world to know it. On the other hand, if the believers in superstition have made and circulated these cruel slanders concerning the mighty dead, I want the world to know that.

As soon as you notify me of the acceptance of these propositions I will send you the certificate of the bank that the money has been deposited upon the foregoing conditions, together with copies of bonds for costs.

Yours truly, R. G. INGERSOLL.

Freethought and Emotion.

MR. EDITOR: During the recent holidays, the season of festivity and friendly reciprocations, there was observable, as usual, a great display of emotion among church-going people, and in Sunday-schools. I regret to have to write of the absence of this emotional enjoyment among Liberals and their families. Yet it is a lack that is surely felt, and is the most conspicuous defect in our system, or want of system. The religious feeling of friendliness may be cultivated with advantage in securing proselytes to our apparently wavering ranks, thus making it subserve and promote the interests of truth, instead of wasting it on a shadowy phantom. That there are obstacles in the way is true, but are they insuperable to the various grades of Infidels? Shall it continue to be said, The arguments advanced are fair and carry with them an air of truth, but somehow, beautiful as they are in the abstract, they fail to attract? As generally presented to the untaught, unreflecting mind, there is a want of poetry and glitter that in this connection almost always pleases. The church folks know how to meet this requirement of the human mind. In addition to the demoniac and fairy tales with which they demoralize as well as amuse the imaginations, they meet together for interchange of sentiment, and to rehearse "the old, old story," in song and with dramatic effect—both patent agencies in producing deep impressions. The holy inflatus thus excited, they enjoy themselves generally. The children, too, have their Christmas carols and pleasant times, ever looking forward to the time when their patron saint, Santa Claus, will visit them with toys and candies. With such potent auxiliaries, eminently grateful to the emotional nature, there need be no marveling at the success churches attain, as witness the emotional character of the Moody and Sankey gatherings. Truth is beautiful, reason is beautiful—dual sovereignties, the all in all to the progressive student, but the undeveloped and youthful minds need to have both illustrated and made attractive with the garlands and graces of poetry woven around them. Man is an emotional as well as a reasoning being. The question as the source whence these faculties were derived is doubtless exceedingly interesting, but whatever side of the controversy truth may yield its favors, we, in the meanwhile, will be safe in accepting them, one and all, as beneficent gifts of Nature. Hence, the emotional part of our being contributing in a large measure to the enjoyments of life, is surely worthy of a fair and honest expression. It cannot be the part of reason to ignore any mental endowment, but rather in seeking out and correcting the abuse to which the erring one has been subjected. I need not refer to the agencies which from all time have labored to prevent every truthful and generous impulse, saving only those that subverted their selfish and sinister ends. I would if I could vindicate the exercise of every legitimate sentiment, under the control of the understanding and wise teaching, not that of priestcraft, but inculcations deduced from Science and Philosophy. Had such pabulum been supplied to the devotees of superstition from infancy upwards, the foolish figments, offspring of a diseased imagination, could never had an existence.

This touches the case, the germ or source of all sentient and intellectual emotion. There is apparent a cloud of inexplicable mystery that I and doubtless many other anxious seekers would be glad to see Brothers Bennett or Underwood using their utmost endeavors in trying to unfold. So far as I have seen, the enquiry stops here, and the whole matter is summarily relegated to the domain and outcome of mere circumstances. Does inquiry cease here? I think not. It seems unsatisfactory since it is inconceivable that life and intelligence could develop into such noble attitude without a preëxisting germ from which it sprung.

Cannot devotedness enough be stirred up in the cause of truth among professed truth seekers? In this way, even, where two or three are met together the saviors of truth, inquiry and research will be amongst you, leading on to deeper knowledge and more perfected manhood. But we do not need to resort to artifice or fiction; there is abundance of material in the physical universe to supply all the demands of the faculties of wonder, ideality. Yes, and without much if any detriment, a spice of veneration too. Not the abuse, but an enjoyable, rational use of them. The allegation stigmatizing reason as cold and dry, is a great mistake, and can only have a being among those in whom the foolish tales, and nothing more, have been indoctrinated from infancy. Reason has for its theme all that is in the Universe. It indorses a recognition of the beautiful and poetical in nature, and feels the beatific influence of music inciting to brave thoughts and noble acts of high-toned manhood.

Although it deprecates in trumpet sounds the evil rule of priestcraft, creeds and formulas of worship, yet it smiles benignantly on all that hastens the attainment of manhood and welcomes with smiles the glorious beauties manifest in the truthful reality as they come fair and untainted from the great volume of Nature.

We should have meetings, places in which to discuss these interesting matters amongst ourselves; lecture-rooms where occasionally advanced Liberals may excite our enthusiasm about the wonders pertaining to the creation, worlds, and the laws that govern them. Inquire into the nature of nebulae, that form of matter in space antecedent to the solar system, from which it was formed. Whence its origin, if any, or if as conjectured, the debris of a preëxisting Universe, which in its turn, was the formation of the ruins of a prior system, and so on in endless cycles of changes, looking backwards into the inconceivable eternity of time.

In this connection the Laplacean theory of astreuous evolution cannot fail to enthuse the merest tyro, thus leading him into fields of wonder and grandeur transcending that in the Bible and all sacred literature combined. Geology, too, perhaps no less interesting in its revelations from the maternal bosom of mother earth; the formation of seas, land and all the differentiation therein. Amidst the infinite assemblage of objects claiming attention and admiration, perhaps the most absorbing is the appearance of life and intelligence upon the scene, animal and vegetative. Its manifold forms, why I have diversified, if by an instantaneous feat of power, or as Darwin, Wallace and Huxley explain it, all emerging by a process of evolution from the mysterious unknowable. Who reads or hears lectures on such subjects without feeling there is a spell-like power in them to which he is drawn as if by magnetism? Who is there whose heart is not made purer, warmer by the refreshing beauty of the natural landscape? Nay, even its masterly representative in art, whoever he or they may be, they are not to be envied; and it may be safely evered they do not belong to the class of Nature's worshipers. The reproach, however, is with the people, it is referable to their would-be soul-comforting teachers. Instead of unfolding the volume of Nature and teaching a love of the True, the Good and the Beautiful, the priests of the present steadily pursue the examples of their predecessors, using the instrumentalities bequeathed them to suppress every free aspiration in that direction. Onward and upward, Excelsior has been their motto, but specious figments alluring to the unreflecting and dulling the faculties at last into almost hopeless inanity that otherwise might have been pure and radiant with light.

Permit me to iterate the need of more vitality, firmer bonds of union. Let us learn from the Church folks; they put life and devotion into it. It seems to me something in this order is imperative. It is a shame superstition counts its millions in a land of free schools and boasted intelligence. Why is it so? Simply because the knowledge essentially needed is not that which is most liberally dispensed. The monstrous fabric of superstition is in the ascendancy supported by pliant ignorance, while the earnest truth seeker, though far more enlightened, is generally poor, therefore finds it up-hill work to oppose the giant fraud.

I should be glad to see every subscriber of the brave TRUTH SEEKER wield his pen in advocacy of of some such movement as above suggested in every town, city and village. It would be a premise of the outcoming of a vital force, encouraging the hope that the dream of the Golden Age is not an utopian vision, but a beautiful reality.

With much esteem for your earnest truthfulness, Yours truly, J. E. METHVEN.

THE progress of the world has come from those who stood up above the age in which they lived, and have dared to think new things. Every improvement in machinery, every practical and social improvement of the world, has come from some new thought cherished and carried out into realization.

"GIVE me a larger eye," says the astronomer, "and I will reveal to you another rank of worlds marshaled behind those you now behold." Rear, therefore, stronger minds, and they will lift up the race to sublimer heights of dignity and power.

Meditations of a Hindoo, Prince and Skeptic.

All the world over, I wonder, in lands that I never have trod,
Are the people eternally seeking for the signs and steps of a God?
Westward across the ocean, and northward ayont the snow,
Do they all stand gazing, as ever, and what do the wisest know?

Here, in this mystical India, the deities hover and swarm
Like the wild bees heard in the tree-tops, or the gusts of a gathering storm;
In the air men hear their voices, their feet on the rocks are seen.
Yet we all say, "Whence is the message, and what may the wonders mean?"

A million shrines stand open, and ever the censor swings.
As they bow to a mystic symbol or the figures of ancient kings;
And the incense rises ever, and rises the endless cry
Of those who are heavy laden, and of cowards, loth to die.

For the Destiny drives us together, like deer in a pass of the hills.
Above is the sky, and around us, the sound and the shot that kills;
Pushed by a power we see not, and struck by a hand unknown.
We pray to the trees for shelter, and press our lips to a stone.

The trees wave a shadowy answer, and the rock frowns hollow and grim,
And the form and the nod of the demon are caught in the twilight dim;
And we look to the sunlight falling afar on the mountain crest,
Is there never a path runs upward to a refuge there and a rest?

The path, ah! who has shown it, and which is the faithful guide?
The heaven, ah! who has known it? for steep is the mountain side,
For ever the shot strikes surely, and ever the wasted breath
Of the praying multitude rises, whose answer is only death.

Here are the tombs of my kinsfolk, the first of an ancient name,
Chiefs who were slain on the war-field, and women who died in flame;
They are gods, these kings of the foretime, they are spirits who guard our race—
Ever I watch and worship; they sit with a marble face.

And the myriad idols around me, and the legion of muttering priests,
The revels and rites unholy, the dark unspeakable feasts!
What have they wrung from the silence? Hath even a whisper come
Of the secret—whence and whither? Alas! for the gods are dumb.

Shall I list to the word of the English, who come from the uttermost sea?
"The Secret, hath it been told you, and what is your message to me?"
It is naught but the wide-world story how the earth and the heavens began,
How the gods are glad and angry, and a Deity once was man.

I had thought, "Perchance in the cities where the rulers of India dwell,
Whose orders flash from the far land, who girdle the earth with a spell,
They have fathomed the depths we float on, or measured the unknown main—"
Sadly they turn from the venture, and say that the quest is vain.

Is life, then, a dream and delusion, and where shall the dreamer awake?
Is the world seen like shadows on water, and what if the mirror break?
Shall it pass as a camp that is struck, as a tent that is folded and gone
From the sands that were lamp-lit at eve, and at morning are level and lone?

Is there naught in the heaven above, whence the hail and the levin are hurled,
But the wind that is swept around us by the rush of the rolling world?
The wind that shall scatter my ashes, and bear me to silence and sleep
With the dirge, and the sounds of lamenting, and voices of women who weep.

Manners and Customs of Ye Iowans, A. D. 1877.

OSCEOLA, IOWA, Aug. 31, 1877.

MR. EDITOR: Camp-meetings and almost tropical heat abounds. The two-weeks' meeting was well attended as to mere numbers. In the Turko-Russian war the female Circassian "camp-follower" is there in all her frail beauty—so in the camp-meetings here with business forethought, the commissariat for the "soldier of the cross" despatched a few wagon-loads of female "camp-followers."

The usual exhortations, inward groanings, gambling, betting, side-shows, piety and pollution were all mixed up as usual in admired confusion.

On the whole it is a poor excuse for those gatherings, to assert there is any good resulting from them, and that the chaff must be winnowed from the wheat. If ten grains of good wheat be mixed with a bushel of dirt and chaff, it is but a sorry business to winnow; but after winnowing if nothing but smut remain, what then?

Who is the man most unsupportable to us? He whom we have offended, and whom we can approach with nothing.

By PROF. W. ROBERTSON SMITH, OF THE UNIVERSITY OF ABERDEEN.

Close of the Old Testament Development.—Formation of the Canon.—The struggle between spiritual and unspiritual religion was brought to a crisis when the prophetic predictions of judgment on national sin were fulfilled in the fall of the kingdom of Judah. The merely political worship of Jehovah as the tutelary God of the state was now reduced to absurdity. Faith in the covenant God was impossible except on the principles of spiritual belief. Nor did the restoration by Cyrus affect this result. No political future lay before the returning exiles, and continued confidence in the destiny of the race was not separable from the religious ideas and Messianic hopes of the prophets. To obey the law of Jehovah, and patiently to await the coming deliverer, was the only distinctive vocation of the community that gathered in the new Jerusalem; and after a period of misfortune and failure, in which the whole nation seemed ready to collapse in despair, this vocation was clearly recognized and embodied in permanent institutions in the reformation of Ezra and Nehemiah (445 B. C.). But with this victory the spiritual religion passed into a stationary state. The spirit of prophecy, long decadent, expired with Malachi, the younger contemporary of Nehemiah; and the whole concern of the nation from this time downward was simply to preserve the sacred inheritance of the past. The exile had so utterly broken all continuity of national life, that that inheritance could only be sought in the surviving monuments of sacred literature. To these, more than to the expiring voice of prophecy in their midst, the founders of the new theocracy turned for guidance. The books that had upheld the exile's faith, when all outward ordinances of religion were lacking, were also the fittest teachers of the restored community. Previous reformers had been statesmen or prophets. Ezra is a scribe who comes to Jerusalem armed, not with a fresh message from the Lord, but with "the book of the law of Moses." This law-book was the Pentateuch, and the public recognition of it as the rule of the theocracy was the declaration that the religious ordinances of Israel had ceased to admit of development, and the first step toward the substitution of a canon or authoritative collection of scriptures for the living guidance of the prophetic voice. A second step in the same direction is ascribed to Nehemiah by a tradition intrinsically probable, though of no great external authority. He, it is said, collected a library which, besides documents of temporary importance, embraced "the books about the kings and prophets, and the writings of David" (2 Maccabees ii. 13). Certainly a complete body of the remains of the prophets, with an authentic account of the history of the period of their activity, must soon have been felt to be scarcely second in importance to the law; and so Nehemiah may very well be supposed to have begun the collection which now forms the second part of the Hebrew Bible, embracing, under the general title of the Prophets, the historical books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings (earlier Prophets), and the four prophetic books of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and of the twelve minor prophets (later Prophets). The mention of the writings of David implies that Nehemiah also began the formation of the third and last part of the Hebrew canon, which comprises, under the title of Ketubim (Scriptures, Hagiographa), the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, the five Megillot or rolls (Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther); and, finally, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles. It is certain, however, that this part of the collection was not completed till long after Nehemiah's time; for to say nothing of the disputed dates of Ecclesiastes and Daniel, the book of Chronicles contains genealogies which go down at least to the close of the Persian period. The miscellaneous character of the Ketubim seems, in fact, to show that, after the Law and the Prophets were closed, the third part of the canon was open to receive additions, recommended either by their religious and historical value, or by bearing an ancient and venerable name. And this was the more natural because the Hagiographa had not the same place in the synagogue service as was accorded to the Law and the Prophets.

The time and manner in which the collection was absolutely closed is obscure. The three-fold division of the sacred writings is referred to in the "Prologue to the Wisdom of Sirach" (Ecclesiasticus) about 130 B. C., but Jewish tradition indicates that the full canonicity of several books, especially of Ecclesiastes, was not free from doubt till the time of the famous R. Akiba, who perished in the great national struggle of the Jews with the Emperor Hadrian (Mishna, Jadaim, 3; Ediot, 5). The oldest list of canonical books, given by Josephus (c. A. D. 1. 8), is of somewhat earlier date. Josephus seems to have had quite our present canon; but he took Ruth along with Judges, and viewed Lamentations as part of the book of Jeremiah, thus counting twenty-two books instead of the twenty-four of the Talmudic enumeration, and of the present Hebrew Bible. There is other evidence that only twenty-two books were reckoned by the Jews of the Christian century; and it appears that this number was accommodated to that of the letters of the Hebrew alphabet. Even in the time of Jerome, Ruth and Lamentations were not uniformly reckoned apart. The expansion of the Talmudic twenty-four to the thirty-nine Old Testament books of the English version is effected by reckoning the minor prophets one by one, by separating Ezra from Nehemiah, and by subdividing the long books of Samuel, Kings and Chronicles. In this reckoning, and in the very different order of the books, we follow, in the main, the Alexandrian Greek and Vulgate Latin versions. But the Alexandrian differed from the Hebrew canon in more important points. The line of distinction between inspired and human writings was not so sharply drawn, and the Greek Bible not only admitted additions to several of the Hagiographa, but contained other apocryphal books, of some of which Greek was the original tongue, while others were translations of Hebrew or Aramaic writings. [TO BE CONTINUED.]

How a Good Man Aided the Devil.

We copy the following from the Terre Haute Daily Express. It is mainly correct, and serves to show how small beginnings sometime develop into something larger:

It sometimes happens that wrong comes from the best of acts, and that a conscientious soul is forced by circumstances into an alliance with the Evil One. A singular case of this kind has come under our notice. One of the best men in our neighboring town of Paris, Ill., is Mr. William Moore, editor of the Prairie Beacon and Valley Blade. He is an honest man, a just man, a religious man; in fact true goodness oozes from every pore of his system; it shows itself in his benignant expression, and shines from the "windows of his soul." He would not wrong any one, and he would seem to be the last man in Paris that the Devil would pick out to use. But we will not anticipate.

In the summer of 1873, there lived in Paris an oldish man, of fifty summers or more, named D. M. Bennett. He had been up and down the world, sometimes well-off, but usually poor. At the time of which we write he was poor, and was engaged in the seed business, cultivating a patch of seventy-five acres of ground in seeds. Bennett had traveled some and had picked up many heterodox notions; he had read Thomas Paine, and in fact was no better than an Infidel. He relished an argument, and he had an idea that he knew a great deal about religious questions. It happened that he got into a controversy with a Christian minister in Paris, and the minister presented his side of the argument to the public in the Prairie Beacon and Valley Blade. Bennett wanted to reply in the same newspaper, but the good editor, albeit one of the kindest and most indulgent of men, could not think of printing such wicked utterances, and he gave a flat refusal. Bennett thought he was wronged and he brooded over the matter as he spaded and hoed in his little seventy-five-acre seed-garden. He was an obstinate, hard-headed man, much given to having his own way. One day he said to a neighbor, "By jingo, if old Moore won't print what I have to say, I'll start a paper of my own." Then Bennett buckled down to work. He wrote and wrote until he had enough manuscript to fill a small sheet, and he came over to Terre Haute and hired an ungodly job-office to print it. He called it THE TRUTH SEEKER, and it was to be issued monthly. It was not large, but it was awfully wicked. Bennett had never been in any publishing business before, but he took a great fancy to the work. In a month or two he got the notion in his head that Paris and Terre Haute weren't big enough for him, and he must go to New York to publish his newspaper. He seemed to think that he could reach more people of his way of thinking from New York. So he sold everything he had and packed off to New York. He was able to raise just about five hundred dollars. He rented a cheap room high up in a Gotham block and began to print his TRUTH SEEKER. He had just got his first number out when the panic of '73 came. The business outlook was not promising. Soon after, he lost a part of his capital through the failure of a publisher with whom he had dealings. Things began to look pretty blue for Bennett. If he hadn't been so obstinate and opinionated he would have given up and gone back to seed-growing. Some days he only had bread to eat, and some days hardly that. But he kept on printing heresy and wickedness in his paper, and then he began to print tracts and books, and he even went to work and wrote books himself. He began to call himself a publisher! His paper ran up to a large circulation, and he made some money. A citizen of Terre Haute who visited him lately found him in rooms opposite the Mercantile Library, just off Broadway, surrounded with evidences of prosperity and success. Bennett said that his was one of the largest Infidel publishing houses in the world; that he owned then nearly ten thousand stereotype plates of freethinking books and tracts, and that he was supplying that kind of literature to large numbers of booksellers throughout the country. And then he told how it all came from the Prairie Beacon and Valley Blade shutting him out from a hearing in Paris, and he added, "If that pig-headed old Moore had printed what I had to say, I have no doubt that I should be raising and putting up seeds in Paris to-day."

It is plain that the good Mr. Moore was used by the Devil to aggravate Bennett into working out these great schemes of iniquity. It will always be a question whether it would have been better for him to have held Bennett in by printing his reply or not. Certainly, it is an awful thing for any man to feel that he is responsible, even indirectly, for the publication of such sinful works as D. M. Bennett is printing by the wagon-load.

Choice Selections from "Fox's Book of Martyrs."

"March 25th, being Easter, in the morning, at St. Pancras in Cheapside, the crucifix with the pyx (the vessel in which the host was kept) was taken out of the sepulchre, before the priest rose to the resurrection: so that when, after his accustomed manner, he put his hand into the sepulchre, and said very devoutly, 'He is risen, he is not here,' he found his words true. For this joke, however, one Marsh, who a little before had been put from that paragon because he was married, was with his wife committed to separate comports. A cat also was hanged upon a gallows, at the cross in Cheapside, appareled like a priest ready to say mass, with a shaven crown: her two fore-feet were tied over her head, with a round paper, like a waiver-cake, put between them (p. 20). At Cook-ran, near Lancaster, a carpenter was bargained with for a cheap wooden Savior; the man cut out such a journeyman-looking mortal that the people did not like to bow down to it; the carpenter claimed his pay, and when the cause came before the mayor, the latter decided in his favor, saying, 'If the log be too ugly for a God, put a pair of horns on it, and it will make an excellent devil.'

"The supposed conception of Queen Mary occasioned several ludicrous prayers to be offered for the accomplishment of that event in the male line; but neither crosses, holy water, masses, nor penances, availed with the deity, who laughed to scorn their future expectation of a Catholic heir, and the Queen's abortion, which proved to her deep mortification, was to all true believers a source of secret hope and gratitude" (p. 21).

Mrs. Kent at the Long Island Grove Meeting.

MR. EDITOR, Dear Sir: On Sunday, Aug. 26th, Mrs. S. W. Kent lectured at the Liberal Camp-ground, in Merriek, Long Island. Subject, the "Philosophy of Good and Evil." One of the "Truth Seeker Hymns" written by Susan Wix and one by Mrs. Kent were sung by the audience with fine effect, Mrs. Hyatt and Nellie Henderson leading the music. It was a glad and cheerful sound that woke the echoes of the woods of Long Island to the tune of "Auld Lang Syne," with the words,

O bright the day that dawneth now,
And brighter still shall be,
When gloom will vanish from each brow
And trammelled thought be free,
Then truth shall gild the mental sky,
While error fades away;
For science, kindling every eye,
Proclaims the coming day."

The speech that followed was in perfect harmony with the hymns. She went on to show that all evil was but misdirected good, and worked its own cure either by sharpening the intellect in order to remove every obstacle that prevents man from mastering his world, or where he cannot control the forces of Nature. It brings him into deeper sympathy and closer relationship to his fellow-man. She also showed that there could not be two distinct persons from whence came what we call good and evil. Even theology has conceived of God as an omnipotent being against whom there can be no successful opposing will. A good man may permit what he cannot hinder, but a god would be a partner in every crime which he had power to prevent. Just as a citizen becomes guilty when he hears a plan to rob or murder and takes no steps to warn the victim or complain to the magistrate, or as the magistrate who, so-informed, takes no step to arrest the parties who were plotting crime. She traced the present theological ideas of God and Devil back to Milton's "Paradise Lost," and showed the utter immorality of the whole theological doctrine of the origin of evil. Satan, after the revolt in heaven, was not sent to so safe a place as Russia sends her political offenders when she banishes them to remote Siberia, from whence they can never escape to disturb the peace and quiet of the Empire. God, with less foresight than the Russian Czar, sent his political offenders to hell, and, it having no bottom, they dropped through, reached this new-made planet, and led Mother Eve with all her posterity into evil. The more advanced theologians are now becoming ashamed of this poetic legend, and with Pope, they, as well as the lecturer, think that

"Hell was built on spite, and heaven on pride."

She took the scientific view of the subject and reasoned that good and evil were not absolute terms having their origin in two objective beings of the same names—less one letter as in Good, and plus one letter as in Devil—but were merely relative terms expressive of conditions over which man could exercise almost unlimited control.

At the close of her lecture, under a hot August sun, she seemed to gather in the sun's rays, becoming intensely earnest; her voice clear and strong, she poured forth her soul's deep convictions; that when man ceased his vain efforts after unattainable knowledge, and his hopeless search after other worlds, seeking "houses not built with hands eternal in the heavens," then, and not till then, could there be a hope that enlightened man might master this world and put all things under his feet, every evil thing, whether savage beast, venomous reptile, or poisonous insect, must serve him or perish by his hand. The evils that afflict society will first be mitigated, then gradually disappear under the influence of science and humanity. Slavery and the powers that maintained it must either perish together, or the powers must recognize good in freedom. Superstition and the religions that are built on it will either perish together or recognize good in science as the only source of truth. Under human intelligence knowledge must succeed faith, and this world rise in importance as other worlds vanish, with the faiths which were their evidence and the hopes which were their substance. To serve man will be the highest duty, while to serve God, whom no man by searching can find out, will be supreme folly. For it is too true that he who assumes to know most about other worlds knows least about the world in which he lives. Mystery vanishes by the same door at which science enters. And the love of God is too often accompanied by hatred of man. As the lecturer closed, the audience manifested their approval by prolonged applause.

Then followed a lively debate. One gentleman affirmed that he liked most of the lecture, and admired the earnest and eloquent manner of its delivery. "But what does all this knowledge amount to," said he, "unless we know the beginning and the end of all things? You talk about the 'laws of Nature,' but cannot God, who is the author of all law, suspend them at his will? I myself can break a law of Nature." He referred to a falling leaf. "The law of gravitation," said he, "would carry it to the earth, but I hold out my open palm and stop it, and thereby break the law; and surely, God might make the sun and moon stand still when it was his divine will."

To this I replied: "Can you by searching find out God?"

"No."

"Have you children?"

"Yes."

"Do they ever ask you questions about things their names and uses?"

"They often do, sir."

"Well, do you tell them to stop asking questions about trees, animals, rivers, mountains, sun, moon, and stars, until you have found the first thing that existed before all other things existed, or that last thing that will exist when all other things have ceased to exist; or do you, like a wise and good father, explain what you know and say nothing about what you do not know?"

He laughed, the audience laughed, and he good-naturedly admitted that it was better to teach a child what he knew than what he knew nothing about.

Then I said: "When you stopped the falling leaf you did not break a law of Nature, and so far as I know, no man ever has or can break a law of Nature. But a law of Nature can break you, my dear sir. By an organic law, you require to breathe oxygen incessantly. Now lie down under water for fifteen minutes, and you will cease to breathe and become an organic remnant, and, as an animal, broken forever by the organic law. A leaf may be blown by the wind out of the palm of your hand, or you yourself may be blown by the wind to the earth, but in neither case is there a law broken. The leaf had but little specific gravity and fell slowly. Had it been a falling cannon ball moving toward the earth with great velocity, your hand would have been better off somewhere else than trying to intercept it, for it must assuredly have shattered that member to pieces. And had God stopped the earth in its motion toward the east, every Jew and Gentile would have moved westward at a velocity so great that it would have been difficult to distinguish one from the other, and every inhabitant and every living thing on this globe would have perished." Everybody laughed again, and the hunter of first causes and breaker of Nature's laws vanished like the ghosts of the Middle Ages.

A grave Methodist brother accused Mrs. Kent of teaching Atheism by denying a first cause and excluding God from the moral government of the Universe. In answer to this I asked:

"Where is God?"

"O, he is everywhere."

"Are you and I somewhere?"

"Of course we are."

"Are we a part of him?"

"Yes, we are."

"Are we good or bad?"

"We are bad, totally bad."

"How, then, can we be a part of the infinite God, who is wholly good, and not be perfect; and if we are not a part of him he cannot be infinite. It is you who are the Atheist, and not she, my dear sir. She said nothing about undiscovered beings, while you deny his existence by asserting an existence which is impossible even in your own thoughts. She dealt with the known, you with the unthinkable. She speaks of a world that may be improved; you admit that an imperfect world did come from a perfect first being. If you are correct, it is equally thinkable that a fiend could produce an angel. If you are, as you say, a part of God and are ignorant and wicked, then one part of him must be ignorant of the other, and god and devil are contained in the same being. Your religion is a cold and dreary Atheism, and you are wandering in the thick darkness of infinite nonsense, or your own finite ignorance of the knowable."

After the close of the meeting Mr. Hyatt and others expressed a desire to see an organization effected. "Having for its foundation, Science, and in the interest of Humanity."

Yours truly, G. L. HENDERSON.

Paine's Age of Reason.

SETH WILBUR PAYNE, Editor.

The attention of the Independent Reasoners of America is called to a new candidate for their favors. The first number of Paine's Age of Reason will be issued on the 15th of October, 1877, and regularly on the 15th of each month thereafter. It will contain sixteen pages of four wide columns each, and will be the largest, by near one-half, of any known Liberal monthly in the world. It will be the steady aim and earnest endeavor of its proprietor to make the Age of Reason acceptable to the advanced thinkers of this country. In the orthodox sense, it will be intensely infidelic, but in the purpose of its editor it will be a fearless, fair-dealing, first-class Liberal family journal. Just such a publication as the man of unfettered mind and the members of his household will delight to read, show their company and to pass around among their orthodox neighbors. Every Independent Thinker can but be pleased with it, and such are respectfully solicited to give it their support. Specimen copies fifteen cents. Address

SETH WILBUR PAYNE,
141 Eighth St., N. Y.

It will be perceived that it is proposed to issue another Liberal paper in this city, and even in this building. Liberalism is spreading and the readers of Radical thought are daily increasing. May all the Liberal journals of the country do well.

TESTIMONIALS.

I admire the ingenuity of your parallelisms.—Prof. W. D. Whitney, of Yale College, New Haven, Conn.

I very greatly admire your extreme ingenuity and your enthusiastic support of the Mythological element in Hebrew history.—Dr. Thos. Inman, of Bristol, England.

A mighty mine of research and speculation.—Chicago Daily Inter-Ocean, Feb. 10, 1877.

This book will repay perusal, because it will help the reader to think—and that in a new direction, and is certainly entitled to be regarded as a valuable contribution to the fund of human thought, even by those who will stoutly deny both its premises and conclusions.—Chicago Daily Tribune, Feb. 17, 1877.

Among the many attempts recently made by scientists to crush the Bible, this is unquestionably the most vigorous.—Chicago Daily Times, Feb. 10, 1877.

This book is strictly what its title purports it to be. All the great miracles of the Bible are solved by Science.

Prospectus—Beyond the Veil.

POSTHUMOUS WORK OF PASCHAL BEVERLY RANDOLPH.

Through the minds and agency of Fanny H. M'Dougall and Luna Hutchinson, they having been brought together by a series of singular circumstances. Together they wrote by spirit dictation and impression, most faithfully and sincerely trying to give the true meaning of whatever was revealed, either through clairvoyant vision or otherwise, as unfolded to them by different ones in spirit life, of whom Emanuel Swedenborg was the controlling spirit of the band. Several new and beautiful revelations are given of the life beyond, embracing many subjects of deep interest, besides descriptions of the formation of Spirit Spheres, Death or Spirit Birth, the Transit, also Food, Clothing, Habitations, Employments, Amusements, Travels, Education, Oral Instruction, Asylums for the Care and Cure of the Insane and Idiotic, and much more which the table of contents will show of the twenty-two chapters the book contains.

It is believed that it will be found an entertaining and profitable book, affording pleasant thoughts and cheerful contemplations for the minds of those on this side the Veil, lessening the shadows that have so long darkly hung between this and the after-life.

Gems of Thought.

GREAT souls have wills, others only feeble wishes.

RECEIVE your thoughts as guests, and treat your desires like children.

AT court people sing that they may drink; in a village people drink that they may sing.

PRINCIPLE, like truth, needs no contrivance: it will tell its own tale, and tell it in the same way.—Thomas Paine.

ALL errors have only a time; after a hundred millions of objections, subtleties, sophisms, and lies, the smallest truth remains precisely as before.

THERE lingers about the human heart a strong inclination to look upward—to revere; on this inclination lies the source of religion, of loyalty, and also of the worship and immortality which are rendered so cheerfully to the great of old.—Bulwer.

THAT a man should be punished for having come to an honest conclusion, the honest product of his brain; that an honest conclusion should be deemed a crime and so declared, is an infamous, monstrous assertion, and I would rather go to hell than to keep the company of a God who would damn a child for an honest belief.—Ingersoll.

A MAN who foolishly does me wrong, I will return to him the protection of my ungrudging love; the more evil comes from him, the more good shall go from me: the fragrance of these good actions always redounding to me, the harm of the slanderer's words returning to him. For as sound belongs to the drum, and shadow to the substance, so in the end, misery will certainly overtake the evil doer.—Buddha.

TO BE on the "safe side" one must believe in all the gods and all the bibles, become a member of every religious sect, and keep holy every day of every week; perform all the rites of all the Churches, swallow all creeds and believe all faiths. While you are at it you had also better believe in all the old signs and omens, so that you may be certain that you are "safe" from the sin of unbelief. You will have a busy time of it but just think how nice it will be to be sure you are safe.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

WE should remember that Nature in her operations aims at the universal, and never spares individuals, but uses them for the accomplishments of her ends. It is, therefore, for us to submit to Destiny, cultivating, as the things necessary to virtue, knowledge, temperance, fortitude, justice. We must remember that everything around us is in mutation; decay follows reproduction and reproduction decay, and that it is useless to repine at death in a world where everything is dying.—Draper.

WE may be sure that the destiny of humanity is onward. The advance of each individual enters as an organic element, advancing and exalting the race. Better approximations shall be made, finer views, finer realizations, nearer and nearer approaches to the infinite goal. And in ages better than ours, generations shall be happier born, nobler bred, with more transparent flesh, purer blood, and clearer brain, to whom our words shall seem childish, coarse, our conceptions dim and crude, who shall see where we but grope, shall walk and leap where we but hobble and totter and fall. The great atonement, reconciliation prepared from the foundation of the world, shall be wrought out, and life become realization. In all the experience, not a sigh of sorrow, not a breath of unrest, never the rising of desire no night there, perfect peace and perfect day.—C. D. B. Mills.

THERE is a beautiful island in the Atlantic, long renowned for its majestic mountains, its lovely valleys, its romantic glens, its splendid lakes, its pleasant rivers, and its clear streams. A fair island, as if Nature had determined to exhibit an epitome of its richness and beauty—a green spot raised in the midst of the blue waves, with glorious scenery, fertile soil, and a healthful climate; with verdant slopes, with rocks, roses, and waterfalls, and every attraction to make it an earthly paradise; and yet this very island, richly endowed as it is by the great munificent Hand, has been made nearly desolate by man, and religious and political strife has swept through it and over it like a very besom of destruction. This island so beautiful, so blighted, and so bereft—this land such a reproach to its popes and potentates this arena of fearful plous and political discord, can, alas, be traced out on the map as Ireland!—Wm. McDonnell.

WHAT I want to impress you with is the great weight that is attached to the opinion of everything that can call itself a man. Give me anything that walks erect, and can read, and he shall count one in the millions of Humanity's sacramental host, which is yet to come up and trample all oppression in the dust. The weeds poured forth in Nature's lavish luxuriance, give them but time, and their tiny roots shall rend asunder the foundations of palaces, and crumble the Pyramids to the earth. We may be weeds in comparison with these marked men; but in the lavish luxuriance of that Nature which has at least allowed us to bethinking, reading men, there is no throne potent enough to stand against us. This heart of mine, which beats so unintermittently in the bosom, if its force could be directed against a granite pillar, would wear it to dust in the course of a man's life. Your Capitol is marble, but the pulse of every humane man is beating against it, and the pulses of men shall in time beat it down, for it is founded upon wrong and injustice. Take the mines, take the Harwich fishing skiffs, take the Lowell mills, take all the coin and the cotton, still the day must be ours, for the hearts—the hearts are on our side!—Wendell Phillips.

Odds and Ends.

MARS is the latest victim of new-moonia.

THE lecturer is now making ready to afflict the land.

LIKE a lamb the oyster is now led to the slaughter.

CAN a man be in a stew when you make his blood boil?

It will soon be time to begin republishing "Beautiful Snow."

THE early morning fly plays sad havoc with the temper of the sluggard.

THE question as to who is the Sickest Man in the East is now in much doubt.

"JOHN, you say Sally kissed you; did you kiss her back?" "No, I kissed her face."

THE Chicago Times' head-lines the death of Brigham Young "Prophet and Loss."

A SATELLITE of Mars—the small boy who follows in the wake of a military parade.

THE co-operative grief of Brigham's widows will make their affliction comparatively light.

THE secret of Gail Hamilton's sprightly utterances is her j. a. w.—judiciously-arranged words.

It takes more energy and business tact to pass a bogus five cent piece than it does to earn a good quarter.

AH GUN is married to an Irish woman in this city, and the school children call his eldest boy a young son of Ah Gun.

SOME genius proposes to introduce paper shirts. But a shirt made of a story paper would have too many tales.

WE have received an exchange called The Christian at Work. Ah, hal Gone back at the old prices, we presume?

SCARCELY a freight train runs off the track without killing a tramp or two,—and this is not a good season for tramps either.

It takes the Russian provost-marshal four minutes to convict and shoot a spy, and the Czar loudly complains of lost time.

WILLIAM PATTERSON was the first man who raised his voice against strikes, yet no encyclopædia so much as mentions him.

LET'S see. Did Rhode Island have a strike? And if she did what became of him after the military company got into the State?

THIS is the latest form of wedding invitation: "Come around and see me capture my mother-in-law at eight o'clock sharp."

"THE best way to cure a crying baby," says an advertisement, "is to buy it a baby carriage." That's right; keep the bawl rolling.

"It is not loud praying," said an Arkansas circuit rider, "which counts with the Lord, so much as giving four full quarts to the gallon."

A NEGRO insisted that his race was mentioned in the Bible. He said he heard the preacher read about "Nigger Demus wanted to be born again."

AN Iowa paper tells of a smart wife that helped her husband to raise seventy acres of wheat. The way she helped him was to stand in the door and shake a broom at him when he sat down to rest.

DISSENSIONS sore long time he bore; Expedients were in vain.

He had a score of wives or more, But he didn't die insane.

Gone to meet his mother-in-law.

AN old darkey fishing on a wharf at Galveston was heard talking to the fish he saw swimming around his line in this fashion: "Gim me a bite, honey. De children am a crying down to my house, and I tell you it's fish or nuffin' in dat 'stablishment."

THE thirsty skeeter folds his languid wings, Draws in his auger, and no longer sings; No more artesian wells he tries to sink, Or comes up to the bar to get a drink,

In sleep he waits another season's sup,— He's comatose; his pump is frizzed up.

AND Mr. Beecher turned to Ecclesiastes v. 12, and read aloud: "The sleep of a laboring man is sweet, whether he eat little or much; but the abundance of the rich will not suffer him to sleep." And then he murmured to himself, "Old Ecclesiastes said just what I meant to say."

A DANBURY man who went to a drug store to have a prescription prepared, seeing nobody but a clerk present, said: "Young man, are you keeping company with a girl?" "Yes, sir," answered the clerk with a blush. "Do you think the world of her?" "I do," said the clerk firmly, although blushing considerably. "Is she in town?" pursued the customer anxiously. "No, sir, she is away on a visit."

"That will do," said the man, decisively. "You can't fool around any prescription for me."

AND he went away.

DO YOU SEE THE JOKE.—Sitting talking to Amanda Jane, his sweetheart, they did not notice the flight of time till three o'clock in the morning, when he arose and proposed to walk to his home, two miles distant. The rain was falling fast, and that he might not get wet, Amanda prevailed on her lover to remain and sleep with her brother, a cherub of three years. In the morning, as he was departing, he reached out his hand for a farewell grasp, and in a subdued voice said: "O, Amanda, darling, I thank you for your hospitality, but I would have been dryer to have gone home in the rain."

Notes and Clippings.

THE Rev. James F. Reager, of Madison, Ind., is to be tried by a court of Methodist clergymen on a charge of immorality.

A CHINAMAN has joined a Baptist church in Massachusetts. When he was immersed he came up out of the pool, blubbering: "Whoopoe, Whoopoe! Me likee his muchee. Makee bully place washee shirtee! Me allee same shirtee."

THREE Methodist churches of Brooklyn have become so badly crippled that one meeting has been held and another appointed to devise means to give them relief. There are comparatively few churches in the country out of debt and unembarrassed.

A CHICAGO fashionable clergyman has failed. Liabilities, $15,000. Among his assets were 22 pairs of worked slippers, assorted sizes, 13 dressing-gowns, 30 pen-wipers, 24 fancy pin-cushions, 9 watch-pockets, 7 cushions for easy chairs, and one Bible.

ASHES from the present eruption of Cotopaxi in Ecuador are said to have fallen at a distance of one thousand miles from the volcano. In former outbursts there was an acid principle in the ashes which proved destructive to vegetation, but the ashes of this eruption are not so harmful.

THE Rev. Thomas H. Bott, the Philadelphia pastor whose Beecherism has attracted wide attention, has stepped down and out. At a recent meeting of his church he said he thought some of the sisters doubted him, and so he had determined that, unless he received the unqualified and unanimous endorsement of his flock, he would retire from his pulpit. He requested all those who were willing to stand by him to arise. Thirty-eight of the members stood up. "All those who do not desire me to remain, arise." Fifteen women arose. Brother Bott turned pale and bade the assemblage farewell. His hope was crushed; his after-fate we'll read some other day; he feeds his festive flock no more in Philadelphia.

CARDINAL CULLEN, of Ireland, has issued a pastoral exhorting the faithful to pray for fine weather. He attributes war, famine and pestilence to the anger of God at abounding sin and iniquity, at the preaching of Atheism, at attempts to bring up children without religion, and at the proclamation by some statesmen and politicians that Providence takes no part in the management of the world; and he fears that still more dreadful scourges will be sent to punish infidels and sinners. Of course, it was a pure accident, with which God had nothing to do, that resulted in the shocking and terrible death, a few days ago, of the Rev. Father Mooney, who, by the way, was a most estimable and admirable gentleman.

WHEN Dr. Thomas, afterward Bishop of Salisbury, was chaplain of the British factory at Hamburg, he applied to a clergyman to permit the burial of an English gentleman in the former's graveyard. The parson asked of what religion the dead man was, and on being told a Calvinist, replied that none but Lutherans were buried in his ground. Whereupon, after a little parleying, Dr. Thomas told him that his refusal had recalled to him an incident which some years before had befallen him in London. While performing a burial service a woman came and pulled him by the sleeve, saying she must speak to him immediately. "Why, what is the matter?" said he. "Why, sir, you are going to bury a man who died of small-pox near my poor husband, who never had it." The relation of this story had the desired effect.

So it seems that the man of the Clairmont Savings Bank was Deacon Broadwell—yes, brethren, he was or had been a deacon, and was famous for his religious dialogues. Then, brethren, look at Spence, the fugitive swindler of the State Savings Institution of Chicago, who was a member of the Young Men's Christian Association and paid his dues regularly, and kept his certificate of membership in the drawer that contained the other proofs of his devilry. Then cast an eye, while passing along, brethren, upon that hypocritical swindler, John S. Morton of Philadelphia, whose remarkable and gigantic operations are now recorded. Then, brethren, look at A. W. Parsons, the fraudulent banker of the Iowa town of Burlington, who has absconded. We apprehend, brethren, that, notwithstanding the professions and pretensions of these men, they were, after all, in reality, children of the devil and heirs of hell.—N. Y. Sun.

ANDREW C. FLESHER, a Methodist preacher, was arrested near Bridgeport, Illinois, on Monday, for bigamy, and, in default of $500 bail, he was confined in jail. He was stationed on the Bible Grove Circuit, in Clay county, until February last. Then he moved his wife and three children to this city, and went traveling with a magic-lantern show. He floated into Virginia, where he married his first wife, and there said that she was dead. He married a girl about nineteen years old, meantime corresponding with his wife in this city. On Sunday morning last, Flesher and wife No. 2 arrived in Olney, and put up in the Watson House, and after wife No. 2 had retired he started out to see his first wife. She confronted him with a letter from Virginia giving the facts of his second marriage, and he hurried back to the Watson House, and, with wife No. 2, fled from the city, taking the State road east, on foot. Later in the day a warrant was granted for his arrest, with the above result.

OVER in Jersey, in the town of Guttenberg, there is a Catholic church known as St. Joseph's. What Joseph is not reported. Presumably Joseph Christ, putative father of the well-known and eminently respectable Mr. J. Christ, formerly of Galilee, but now of Kingdom Come. Said church was presided over by Father Kerwin. During the absence of Bishop Carrigan in Rome, Father Kerwin suspended from their labors two Sisters who had charge of the parochial school and put a young lady from New York in their place. When Bishop Carrigan returned he promptly suspended the young lady from New York and reinstated the Sisters. This angered the priest, who made some remarks on the subject from the altar, whereupon he also was suspended by the bishop and his place filled by a French priest. The congregation, principally Irish, have struck, refuse to recognize the new priest, and threaten to nail up the door of the church and suspend worship. What the bishop will do about it is not known, and the parishioners are in great suspense as to the next move of this pious pair of suspenders.

THE MOONS OF MARS.—Mr. R. A. Proctor writes: "I am surprised that so little attention has been as yet publicly drawn to the interesting discovery just made, that Mars has two satellites. This discovery has been made with the great Washington refractor, by Prof. Asaph Hall, who recently made many valuable observations on that exceedingly difficult object, Hyperion, Saturn's seventh satellite (eighth and last in order of discovery). It might be worth while, by the way, with so powerful a telescope as this, to look for other Saturnian moons in the space between the orbits of Titan and Japetus, or even for small satellites of these satellites. Mars can no longer be called, as by the poet Laureate, 'Moonless Mars,' though his moons must be very little ones; for Jupiter's least, though so much more remote, and no larger than our own moon, is among the easiest of telescopic objects, and can even be seen in a good opera-glass. From the brief telegram sent to Leverrier from Washington, it would seem that the periods of the two moons are about thirty hours and about fifteen hours; their distances about 12,800 and 8,600 miles respectively from Mars' centre. I deduce these values from the statement that on Aug. 18 (11 Washington time), the outer attained its western elongation, distance 80 minutes; and that the distance of the inner is 50 minutes; period of outer thirty hours, whence distance of inner follows by Kepler's third law. From the period and distance of the outer satellite, the mass of Mars would appear to be only 94-thousandths of the earth's mass, instead of 118-thousandths, as heretofore estimated. The apparent diurnal motion of the outer satellite, as seen by Martians, must be from east to west and very slow, the planet itself rotating in 24 hours, 37 minutes 22.7 seconds. The inner satellite presents the unique peculiarity of gaining by its revolutionary motion on the planet's rotational motion, thus rising in the west and setting in the east. Moreover, it moves faster, in appearance, this way than the other moon moves in the usual way."

STANDING QUESTIONS.—1st. Why should not the legal tender notes issued by the Government be the only paper currency in the United States? 2d. Would not this save to the people about $28,000,000 a year now paid the National Banks as interest on the bonds deposited by them to secure the payment of the National Bank Notes, which are reissued to the customers of the banks at an interest of from seven to twelve per cent—thus causing the general public—the Government—to pay six per cent in gold, and the borrowing public to pay an average of eight per cent on every dollar of National Bank Currency in circulation? 3d. Under a load of fourteen per cent interest of every dollar used in business, is not every man, firm, corporation or the Government sure to be, sooner or later, brought to bankruptcy? 4th. Is this not the principal cause of the fact that at present all classes are in the condition of insolvency and on the verge of bankruptcy? 5th. Ought not the Government, like individuals, to receive its own notes in payment of all dues, including customs? 6th. Would not this take from the gold market the buyers of gold to pay duties, constituting the great mass of gold buyers, and so, by largely reducing the demand, greatly tend to bring gold to par, and secure specie payments? These questions embody the principles of the Greenback Theory which alone can bring relief to our distressed country.—Advocate.

DEATH OF LEVERRIER, THE ASTRONOMER.—A dispatch from Paris announces the death of Urbain Jean Joseph Leverrier, the world-renowned astronomer. Leverrier was born in St. Lo on the 11th of March, 1811, and his education was partly obtained in the college at that place. In early life he was a clerk in the Tobacco Bureau, devoting his leisure hours to the study of chemistry. As a result of his penetration into scientific mysteries, he published, in 1837, two pamphlets on the combination of phosphorus with oxygen and hydrogen. Afterward he gave up his clerkship for a minor appointment in the Polytechnic School, and there his mind was bent in the direction in which, during the remainder of his life, all his efforts were made. Speculative astronomy at this time occupied his attention, and he particularly investigated the irregularities shown in the course of the heavenly bodies. In 1844 he presented two papers to the Academy of Sciences upon the comets of 1777 and 1843, and the value of his work was so well recognized that, on the 19th of January, 1846, he was admitted to the Academy in the astronomical section. Arago, the Director of the Academy, became his friend, and cheered him in his endeavors. A year or so later, he made a special study of Uranus and revised the tables concerning that planet. Finally, on the 1st of June, 1846, he indicated to the Academy of Sciences within 2° of the place where a new planet was to appear on the 1st of January, 1847, and the success of his calculation won for him wide renown, and brought to him decorations from the courts and the praise of the whole world. Arago insisted that the planet should be called Leverrier, a chair of mathematical astronomy was created for him in the faculty of science, and his bust was erected in a public place in Paris. John Couch Adams, a young English student, disputed the honors of Leverrier, having arrived at the same conclusion at about the same time. Leverrier was, politically, a man of very liberal views, but he modified his tendency toward democracy before he was elected to the Assembly in 1849; and while there he occupied his time with laws relating to public instruction and scientific discoveries, and prepared important reports in regard to telegraphy and engineering. When Louis Napoleon came into power Leverrier became an Imperialist; after the coup d'etat he was made a Senator, and afterward was Inspector-General of Public Instruction. On the death of Arago, in 1853, Leverrier became the Director of the Observatory, from which he withdrew in 1870, and was succeeded by Delaunay. On the death of the latter, in August, 1872, Leverrier was re-appointed to the position which he had given up because serious differences had arisen between himself and other astronomers. The planet which Leverrier discovered, Neptune, was called by the discoverer's name for a short time only. Leverrier continued his study of the heavens until the last, devoting the latter years of his life principally to the theories of the four large planets.

Events of the Week.

THE yellow fever has broken out in Fernandina, Fla.

A CYCLONE has passed over parts of the South doing considerable damage in places.

THE through Western Line Railroads have somewhat increased the rates of freight.

GREENPOINT, Long Island, has had a fire. The Phoenix Print Works and several stables were burned. Loss, $100,000.

GEN. GEO. B. MCLELLAN has been nominated by the Democrats of New Jersey as their candidate for Governor of the State.

THE loss by the burning of the Boston and Albany Railroad shops at Springfield, Mass., is estimated at from $250,000 to $300,000.

THE heaviest beef-exporting house in this city, Lehman & Samuels', has failed for $500,000, and drawn with it a number of other houses.

COL. R. PETERSON's paper, Common Sense, having been burned out in a large fire in Paris, Texas, will next be issued from St. Louis, Mo.

THE President and troupe are still swinging around the circle, visiting the Southern States, being kindly received and making speeches all along the route.

A DISASTROUS conflagration occurred in Keyport, N. J., a few days ago. Nearly the entire business portion of the town was reduced to ashes. Loss, $170,000.

A MAN seventy years of age committed suicide by hanging himself to a tree in the cemetery at New Lots, L. I. Probably he did not wish to live to be old.

WE have had a week of pleasant fall weather. Though cooler than the previous week, we have had no frosts in this vicinity to do any damage. No equinoctial storm yet.

MRS. RUTH SCOTT BRIGGS, of West Winfield, N. Y., delivered a lecture at the Harvard Rooms, 5th avenue, on Sunday evening last. Subject, The People's Policy for the Pursuit of Happiness.

JOHN S. MORTON, President of the West Philadelphia Railroad, a very pious man withal, has committed a fraud of $1,000,000 by the over-issue of stock. He confessed his fault and resigned. The stock soon fell from 110 to 60.

THE editor of this paper, on Sunday evening the 23d inst., delivered a lecture in Loomis' Hall, New Haven, Conn., before the Society of Liberals and Spiritualists. A large audience was in attendance. Subject, The Great Religions of the World.

THE Freethought Journal, a new Liberal publication, of Toronto, Canada, a neat-looking sixteen-page paper, with a supplement of four pages, has just made its appearance. It is well gotten up and is filled with able articles. It will be issued weekly at $2 00 a year.

A FIRE in the Patent Office at Washington occurred on the 24th, and two wings of the structure were ruined. Sixty thousand models and valuable papers were destroyed. Back files and correspondence of the Land Office were consumed. It was thought to be a fire-proof building, but it burned like tinder.

BAPTIST clergymen held a conference this week to devise means to prevent the desecration of Sunday. Some members were greatly shocked to learn that some clergymen brush their clothes, black their boots, and shave their faces on the Holy Sabbath. Is it not a wonder how the world is allowed to exist when such fearful desecration is weekly taking place?

THE aspect of the Eastern war has not materially changed. There has been some heavy fighting, with considerable losses, but no decided advantage to either army. The Turks under Mehmet Ali attacked the Russians under the Czarewitch, but were repulsed, and retired without gaining any advantage. Osman Pasha, at Plevna, has been heavily reinforced and the place reinvaded. The heavy fighting yet to come off will doubtless take place in that locality. The Greeks occupy a menacing attitude toward the Turkish Government. Troops from that quarter may be expected.

BENNETT'S FINAL REPLY. NO. XIII.

IS THERE A STRONGER PROBABILITY THAT THE BIBLE IS DIVINE THAN THAT INFIDELITY IS TRUE?

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Dear Sir: Once more, and for the last time, at present, it devolves upon me to correct some of the errors you seem so disposed to fall into, and to set you aright where you so easily get wrong. I have hoped you would come to see the truth as it is in Nature, and cease to be led aside by the myths and fallacies that have led so many millions astray. I still indulge the hope that your native good sense, with the information you have acquired by study, will ultimately lead you to discard the errors of ecclesiasticism and superstition which still hover over you. This hope I will continue to indulge. Many men with faith in the supernatural as strong as your own, who for a large portion of their lives saw dimly and as through a heavy fog, have lived to see the mists cleared away, the clouds dispelled by the breezes of Nature, and the sun of truth and reason shine forth with permanent brightness and splendor.

It is very easy for you to say that my "disquisition on Atheism is a mixed mixture of theoretical errors and historical blunders." Instead of trying to set aside my remarks thus with a single effort, would it not have been better in you to have shown up the errors and pointed out the blunders? Probably you took the course easiest for you. How easy, indeed, it is for you to be mistaken. You say I epitomized Büchner. To show how wildly you strike I must inform you—though I do it with a degree of shame—that I have never read Büchner, but I know enough of him to be satisfied that you wrong him by denouncing him as a second-rate man. He was a profound thinker, and Germany has produced few clearer and more penetrating minds.

Your last vindictive fling at Ingersoll I will try to pardon; and while it is not an indication of greatness of mind, it is to be hoped your gratuitous aspersions of him do you a certain amount of good and afford you a degree of secret pleasure.

I will admit that Agassiz retained considerable connection with orthodox dogmas; that Prof. Dawson, of Montreal, does the same; that Mivart is a theologian, and that he would denounce you as a heretic; but most of the others you named are very far from holding the belief in a personal God, a personal Devil, or a literal hell, with the many absurdities growing out of that belief. It is much like your trying to make a Christian of Jefferson to undertake to show that Darwin, Spencer, Tyndall, John Stuart Mill, Proctor, Carpenter, Sir Wm. Thomson, etc., entertain the faintest belief in a personal God in the shape of a man with violent passions and impulses, with the ability to fly into a rage upon the most trivial provocation and to send dire judgments and fierce destruction upon his own offspring. There is a great difference between being influenced with the grandeur of the Universe and the mysteries connected with its actual existences and accepting the very imperfect and childish views of deity as the source of all things as portrayed in the Jewish Scriptures.

I am aware there are many shades of belief, and that men of learning and science do not yet all arrive at the same conclusion respecting the Infinite, the eternal source of life and being. As for myself, I comprehend that it is contained within the Universe, and it is clear to my mind that the leading scientists and thinkers of our day know nothing of, and believe nothing of, a force, a power, outside of the Universe or disconnected from it. Early teachings and early impressions are very difficult to throw off, and the theological bias we receive in our childhood remains with us, in a certain degree, through life.

I am aware, too, of the fact that certain minds, however intelligent and learned, have a strong tendency to hedge, to cater to and sustain, to a certain extent, the popular religious theories; and they feel a strong dislike to oppose the theological notions which still prevail in this country and in Europe. It is even painful to witness the incentive there is offered to some scholars to bow to the supremacy of antique faiths and mysticisms which for many centuries have dominated the world. It will require, however, a greater amount of ingenuity than even you possess to make it appear to intelligent minds that Darwin, Spencer, Huxley, Tyndall, Proctor, Helmholtz, Haeckel, Schmidt, and others of the brilliant and studious scientists of our time, have the least affiliation with the very imperfect theories founded upon the Jewish and Christian Bible.

You would have it appear that Tyndall is not an Atheist, or that he believes in some kind of a God. I certainly do not wish to formulate a belief for him, but will rather give his own words bearing upon the subject. In reply to his critics he fearlessly said: "I do not fear the charge of Atheism. Nor should I ever disavow it in reference to any definition of the Supreme which he or his order would be likely to frame." While he may not be an Atheist in the definition you give the term, he certainly recognizes no personal being or God who devised, builded, and governs the Universe. Upon this point he says: "As far as the eye of science has hitherto ranged through Nature, no intrusion of purely creative power into any series of phenomena has ever been observed. The assumption of such a power to account for special phenomena has always proved a failure. It is opposed to the very spirit of science, and I therefore assumed the responsibility of holding up in contrast with it that method of nature which it has been the vocation and triumph of science to disclose, and in the application of which he can alone hope for further light. Holding, then, that the nebular and all subsequent life stand to each other in the relation of the germ to the finished organism, I re-affirm here, not arrogantly or defiantly, but without a shade of indistinctness, the position laid down in Belfast."

The gist of that address, after reviewing the various theories and philosophies that had existed in the world, and after quoting and virtually accepting the position of Lucretius, that "Nature is seen to do all things spontaneously of herself without the assistance of the gods," and Bruno, that "Matter is not that mere empty capacity which philosophers have pictured her to be, but the Universal Mother who brings forth all things as the fruit of her own womb," Tyndall boldly asserts that "the questions here raised are inevitable. They are approaching us with accelerated speed, and it is not a matter of indifference whether they are introduced with reverence or irreverence. Abandoning all disguise, the confession I feel bound to make before you is that I prolong the vision backward across the boundary of experimental evidence, and discern in that matter which we in our ignorance, and notwithstanding our professed reverence for its Creator, have hitherto covered with opprobrium, the promise and potency of every form of life." It was this quotation, you will doubtless remember, which especially brought down upon Tyndall's head the fiery and frantic denunciations of the theologians all over Christendom.

Herbert Spencer, as I understand, is no more a believer in a personal God as described in the Bible than is Tyndall. What he calls the "Unknowable" is nothing more than the "intricate powers of the Universe, too deep, too vast for man's comprehension." He does not believe the Universe had a designer, or that it is so imperfect as to be unable to run without a superintendent. The same of Darwin. While he does not dogmatically or offensively wish to oppose the theoretical views of the majority of mankind, his entire philosophy and theories, based upon thousands of minute observations, show that he has never found a personal God, and that he sees no place for or need of one in the operations of the Universe.

You say my "notion of the Universe rests upon assumption." Indeed! What does the existence of your God rest upon but assumption? The great difference between the two is that the Universe is a reality. We constantly come in contact with it and are parts of it. We can subject it to numerous tests which convince us that it is real and palpable. We can see it, feel it, weigh it, measure it, and prove thousands of times over that not an atom of it can be forced out of existence. But your God is wholly an assumption. No one has ever seen him. No man knows aught about him, and all they have who think they know is what one has told to another, and he to another, and so on for thousands of years. There is not the first particle of proof that he has an existence save in the imaginations of men like yourself, whose position in society, whose success in life, whose standing in the estimation of Mrs. Grundy & Co., whose ability to procure fine, fashionable garments, and whose very bread and butter depend upon holding up and sustaining the God or gods which were devised thousands of years ago, when man was more ignorant than now. The system of mythology, of which theology is a branch, is in the view of its supporters and defenders a great system. It has proved a rich mine to the millions who have assiduously worked it for several millenniums. It is, perhaps, not strange that a lode which has turned out such rich nuggets of wealth, comforts, reputation, veneration, with immunity from toil and hardship, should be retained with the utmost tenacity. We could not expect that men who are fond of a distinguished position in life, who like to secure all the good things of the world without toiling to produce them, who like to be venerated as almost gods themselves, or at least the immediate agents for the gods, would voluntarily tear down the idols they have built and which support them so munificently, and willingly throw away the myths and fallacies which have served them so good a turn. No; they may be expected to cling to the gods and the myths so long as their service pays. Not until the people become better informed and are able from increased intelligence to discard all the old myths and superstitions, thus impelling them to discontinue the support of the priests who make it their business to talk about the gods and dimly reveal their hidden attributes, can they be expected to discontinue the profitable calling? There are, of course, some honorable exceptions. Considerable numbers of the clergy are coming to take an entirely different view of the theological field from that which they have hitherto held. The revelations of science are showing them the crude fallacies of the old system, and they have the honesty to follow where truth leads. May many more do likewise.

Of course there is much in the Universe that is wonderful, much that man is not fully able to comprehend. The process of reproduction in vegetable and animal life is a marvel; the intricacies of life are full of wonder. The mysteries of crystalization are not fully understood. The solution of a given substance when passing through the process of crystalization always produces precisely the same character of crystals, while the solution of another substance will form crystals of an entirely different construction—always following an unvarying law. An expert can always determine the name of a substance by examining its crystals. The formation of crystals in hundreds of forms and angles is nearly as curious as the various phases of life. Chemical affinity and the numerous chemical combinations are equally marvelous. The motions of the heavenly bodies, the rotation and revolutions of suns and worlds, the balancing and commingling of the forces of the Universe, all, all are wonderful to comprehend; but everything moves in obedience to Nature's laws, and nothing by supernatural law; and those laws were never made, and there was never a time when they did not exist. It requires no supervision of a God to cause the germination of a kernel of corn in the warm soil in the spring of the year, nor for the trees to put on their foliage, nor for the earth to perform its daily revolutions, causing day and night, nor to send it on its annual course around the sun, causing summer and winter. It is the same with the millions of operations and changes that are constantly taking place in every part of the Universe. Every effect has a natural cause sufficient to produce it, and it has ever been so. No result has ever taken place that was not the product of natural causes and forces. This being so, the supernatural is never needed and is never present. The Universe is sufficient for every emergency, and the services of a God are not required, either in the simplest operations that take place around us or in the most grand and gigantic that are constantly occurring throughout the vast expanse of the Universe, the millions of suns and worlds, countless billions of miles apart, and at distances from us too vast for the mind to comprehend. The Universe, I repeat, is sufficient for all necessities, in all localities, and at the greatest distances; while a personal or anthropomorphic or Bible God could not possibly be present in millions of spheres and constellations at the same time and at the immense distances we know they are apart.

It is only natural for the ignorant mind, in taking a dim view of the Universe—all that we can see from our planet being a mere point in the vast and boundless whole—to exclaim, "All this must have had a designer, an architect, a governor and controller," but, in my conception, the Universe is far greater and grander, more omnipresent and omniscient, than all the gods that men have ever devised. By the side of the vast Universe, Brahma, Ormuzd, Fohi, Osiris, Zeus, Jupiter, Odin, Thor, Jehovah, Allah, Mumbo-Jumbo, and the hundreds of other gods conceived by man, pale into utter insignificance. One is a vast, grand reality, and the others have no existence save in the imaginations of ignorant men.

I cannot help observing how easy it is for you and other theologians to speak slightly of "blind forces," "dead matter," "mindless matter," and of their inability to produce the million of results that every moment are taking place, when in the same breath you claim that they are the handiwork of your God, produced by him after spending countless ages in cogitating and designing how to get them all up. If you believe them to be the handiwork of your God, you should at least speak respectfully of them. If you will set aside the reality and revere a chimera in its place, if you believe the chimera devised the reality, you should at least treat the reality with proper respect.

I am struck with the facility with which you and others like you disregard and set aside the reality, build up an imaginary something or nothing in its place. It is easy for me to believe in the existence of every form of substance that can be demonstrated, whether it is in the solid, liquid, fluid or gaseous form, and in all the forces that are inseparably connected with them, whether shown as light, heat, magnetism, electricity, attraction, gravitation, or any other and all other forces the existence of which can be proven, but this unknown, unreal nondescript that you call God, which has never been seen, analyzed, tested nor demonstrated—at the same time possessing personality, form and locality—is hard for me to comprehend or believe. I have never seen a person who knows anything about this marvelous existence. All that any one knows about him is what somebody has told him. But hearsay and rumor are not satisfactory to me. When the existence of this marvelous personality can be proven to me, I will readily believe, but until that is done I must beg to be allowed to doubt.

It matters little who first used the word chance in philosophy, but it has thousands of times been thrown at unbelievers in a personal God and a special providence, and has been tauntingly applied as though we believed in a Universe which runs by chance and which has no fixed law or government. Nothing can be more untrue or unfair. As every event must necessarily have a producing cause there can be no chance in the matter.

As you make Design the great argument, and prove that the existence of a God mainly rests upon this one support, I will quote a few paragraphs from B. F. Underwood, used by him in his debate with the Rev. John Marples, at Napanee, Ont., in 1875. They embody my views and are better expressed than I could express them.

"Let us view this famous argument for a moment. God is something or nothing. To say he is nothing, is to say there is no God. If he is something, he is not merely a property or quality, but an existence per se—an entity, a substance, whether material or immaterial is unimportant. If he is a substance, a material or spiritual being, there must be order, harmony, and adaptation or fitness in his divine nature to enable him to perceive, reflect, design and execute his plans. If deity does not reason, does not cogitate, but perceives truth without the labor of investigation and contrivance, he must still possess an adaptation or fitness thus to perceive, as well as to execute his designs.

"To say God is without order, harmony, and adaptation or fitness, is to say he is a mere chaos—worse than that imaginary chaos that theologians tell us would result if divine agency were withdrawn from the Universe. If a being without order, harmony and adaptation, or a divine chaos, can create an orderly Universe, then there is no consistency in saying that unintelligent matter could not have produced the objects that we behold. If order, harmony and adaptation do exist in the divine mind (or in the substance which produces thought, power and purpose in the divine mind) they must be eternal, for that which constitutes the essential nature of a god must be the eternal basis of his being. If the order, harmony and adaptation in God are coexistent with him, are eternal, they must be independent of design; for that which never began to exist could not have been produced, and does not therefore admit of design. If order, harmony and adaptation are independent of design in the divine mind, it is certain that order, harmony and adaptation exist and are no evidence of a pre-existent, designing intelligence.

"If order, harmony and adaptation exist which were not produced by design—and which are, therefore, no evidence of design—it is unreasonable and illogical to infer designing intelligence from the fact alone that order, harmony and adaptation exist in Nature. Therefore, an intelligent deity cannot be inferred from the order, harmony and adaptation in Nature. If the order, harmony and adaptation in deity to produce his thoughts and to execute his plans are eternal, why may not the formation of matter into worlds, and the evolutions of the various forms of vegetable and animal life on this globe be the result of the ceaseless action of self-existent matter in accordance with an inherent eternal principle of adaptation? Is it more reasonable to suppose the Universe was created, or constructed, by a being in whom exists the most wonderful order and harmony, and the most admirable adaptation to construct a Universe (which order, harmony and adaptation could have had no designing cause), than to suppose that the Universe itself, in its entirety, is eternal and the self-producing cause of all the manifestations we behold?

"Is a God uncaused—and who made everything from nothing—more easy of belief than a Universe uncaused and existing according to its own inherent nature? Is it wonderful that matter should be self-existent; that it should possess the power to form suns, planets, and construct that beautiful ladder of life that reaches from the lowest forms of the vegetable kingdom up to man? How much more wonderful that a great being should exist, without any cause, who had no beginning, and who is infinitely more admirable than the Universe itself!

"Again, the plan of a work is as much evidence of intelligence and design as the work which embodies the plan. The plan of a steam-engine in the mind of Fitch, the plan of the locomotive in the mind of Stephenson, was as much evidence of design as the piece of machinery after its mechanical construction. If God be an omniscient being—a being who knows everything; to whose knowledge no addition can be made—his plans must be eternal, without beginning, and therefore uncaused. If God's plans are not eternal, if from time to time new plans originate in his mind, there must be an addition to his knowledge, and if his knowledge admits of addition, it must be finite. But if his plans had no beginning; if, like himself, they are eternal, they must, like him, be independent of design. Now, the plan of a thing, we have already seen, is as much evidence of design as the object which embodies the plan. Since the plans of deity are no proof of design that produced them (for they are supposed to be eternal), the plan of this Universe, of course, was no evidence of a designing intelligence that produced it. But, since the plan of the Universe is as much evidence of design as the Universe itself, and since the former is no evidence of design, it follows that design cannot be inferred from the existence of the Universe.

"The absurdity of the a posteriori argument for a God consists in the assumption that what we call order and adaptation in Nature are evidence of design, when it is evident that whether there be a God or not, order and adaptation must have existed from eternity, and are not therefore necessarily proof of a designing cause. The reasoning of the theologian is like that of the Hindoo in accounting for the position of the earth. "Whatever exists must have some support," said he; "the earth exists, and is therefore supported." He imagined it resting on the back of an elephant. The elephant needing some support, he supposed it rested on the back of a huge tortoise. He forgot that according to his own premise, that whatever exists must have some support, required that the tortoise should rest on something. The inconclusiveness of his reasoning is apparent to a child. Whatever exists is supported. The earth exists. Therefore, the earth is supported; it rests on an elephant; the elephant rests on a tortoise; the tortoise exists, but nothing is said about its support.

"The theologian says order, harmony, and adaptation are evidence of a designing intelligence that produced them. The earth and its productions show order, harmony, and adaptation. Therefore, the earth and its productions have been produced by an intelligent designer. Just as the Hindoo stopped reasoning when he imagined the earth on an elephant, and the elephant on a tortoise, so the theologian stops reasoning when he says, God made the world. But as surely as from the premise that whatever exists must have some support follows the conclusion that the tortoise rests on something, as it rests on the elephant, does it follow from the proposition that order, harmony and adaptation are proof of an intelligent designer, that the order, harmony, and adaptation in the Deity to produce the effects ascribed to him are evidence of an intelligent designer who made him, as the various parts of Nature, adapted to one another, are evidence of an intelligent designer that produced them. This reasoning leads to the conclusion that there has been an infinite succession of creative and created Gods, which is inconsistent with the idea of a First Cause, the creator of the Universe. Then why attempt to explain the mysteries of the Universe by imagining a God who produced everything but himself, and why argue from the order and fitness in the world the existence of a designer. It reminds me of the ostrich, that, having buried its head in the sand so as to render invisible its pursuers, fancies there is no further need of exertion to escape from the dangers and difficulties which surround it.

"Design represented as a search after final cause, until we come to a first cause, and then stop," says F. W. Newman, "is an argument, I confess, which in itself brings me no satisfaction." "The attempt," says Buckle, "which Paley and others have made to solve this mystery by rising from the laws to the cause, are evidently futile, because to the eye of reason the solution is as incomprehensible as the problem, and the arguments of the natural theologian, in so far as they are arguments, must depend on reason."

"Design implies the use of means for the attainment of ends. Man designs, plans, contrives, and uses secondary agencies to accomplish his purposes, because unable to attain his ends directly. But how absurd to speak of contrivance and design in a being of infinite power and knowledge. Man, to build a steamship, has to fell trees, and hew them into various shapes, get iron from the earth, and smelt it in furnaces, and work it into bolts, braces, nails, etc.; hundreds of workmen, carpenters, joiners, blacksmiths, cabinet-makers, painters, caulkers, riggers, etc., labor for months before the vessel can be launched. If man possessed the power to speak into existence a steamship, would he contrive, plan, and use means to construct it? On the contrary, would it not come instantly into existence as a complete, perfect whole?

"But the existence of a steamer, since it is only a means to an end, would be inconsistent with unlimited power in man. If he were able to effect his purposes, why should he construct a vessel with which to visit far-off lands? Infinite power would enable him to cross the ocean by the mere exercise of his will. It is evident at a glance that the use of means is incompatible with infinite knowledge and infinite power. This argument of my friend, in proving too much, proves nothing, and demonstrates its own worthlessness, and therefore we cast it aside. Design implies finiteness; man designs and has to calculate and use means to accomplish his end. If he were all-powerful, would he use that power to construct ships to cross the ocean, or armies to win battles, when he could accomplish his end without, and by those means demonstrate that he is infinite in power? An infinite being would not have to employ means to complete his works; he would not have to doubt and cogitate before he accomplished his design; that would be the method of man. It is absurd to suppose that a God did all those things. He supposed God infinite in everything, in his power, in his love and kindness. He has power to do everything. And yet the world is so constructed that at every step we take, we crush to death creatures as minutely and curiously formed as ourselves. They kill one another in numerous struggles, and life has been such a series of bloody battles, resulting in destruction of life, that the Waterloos and Solferinos of history are nothing in comparison. Where is the design in the volcano that belches forth its fiery billows and buries in ruins a Pompeii and a Herculaneum? Where is the design in the tornado that sends a fleet with its precious freight of humanity beneath the remorseless waves? Where is the design in the suffering and torture that thousands feel this very moment in the chambers of sickness, and in the hospitals full of diseases? Where is the evidence of a great Being who has the power to make men happy, and yet allows the world to go on in all its misery—such misery as it makes one's heart ache to see, and which we, imperfect creatures as we are, would gladly stop if we could?

"And where is the design in the thousands of facts which science has brought to light, showing that there are organs and parts that serve no purpose at all, but on the contrary, are injurious to their possessors? Why do some animals, like the dugong, have tusks that never cut through the gums? Why has the guinea-pig teeth that are shed before it is born? Science tells us these rudimentary structures are the remnants of a former state, in which these parts were of service; but theology which requires us to believe that a God made all these animals as we now see them, cannot possibly reconcile these facts with infinite wisdom and goodness.

"Adaptation in organisms instead of having been produced by a Deity, we hold is largely the result of natural selection. Adaptation must exist as the adjustment of objects to their environments. If a flock of sheep be exposed to the weather of a severe climate, those of them having the thinnest wool affording the least protection from the cold, will perish. Those with the thickest wool and hardest nature will survive every year, and by the law of heredity, transmit their favorable variations. By this process those best adapted to the climate live, and the others perish. Thus in the struggle for life we have the "survival of the fittest," without any design whatever. But the theologian comes along and looking at the sheep, says: "See how God has adapted these sheep to the climate." He forgets the thousands that have shivered and perished in winter's cold as the condition of this adaptation. So animals change the color of their coverings in accordance with their environments. The bears among the icebergs of the North are white, because in the struggle for life every light variation has been favorable to the animal—has facilitated its escape from the hunter and its preying upon the living things on which it subsists. Those with darker coverings have gradually become extinct, leaving in undisputed possession of the snow banks and icebergs this species, which in color resemble the general aspect of its surroundings. Look at the rabbits. Some change their color every year; some are brown in the summer and white like the snow in winter. Those with this tendency to change their color during the year, having the most favorable variation, have persisted, and this tendency, by heredity, has been accumulated, until it has become a part of the nature of the animal. These are but illustrations of a principle discovered by Darwin and Wallace, and which explains largely how, not only color and thickness of coverings, but speed, strength and suppleness of body, keenness of sight and hearing, and all other parts and powers of organism have been developed in adaptation to their environment, without any special design whatever.

"My friend says, we have no evidence of the eternal existence of the Universe, because we have no personal observation of it. But has he any personal observation to prove the existence of an eternal God? Yet he believes in it. We believe the Universe always has existed in the past, because we see no trace of a beginning; we believe it always will exist in the future, because we see no prospect or possibility of an end. Worlds have their formation and dissolution, but the substance is neither augmented nor diminished. Matter is indestructible and eternal. We are not therefore in need of a creator."

Thus I have quoted Mr. Underwood at considerable length, but he so effectually uses up the great "design argument" which you and your brethren insist upon is the one great proof of the existence of a God, that it seemed best to give it pretty full.

Let us recur again to the Bible. I gave you in my last what seemed to me fifty good reasons why that compilation should not be regarded as divine, and you have not refuted one of them. They stand impregnable and must so continue to stand. Your greatest effort seems to be to show that the Bible has no greater imperfections than other books; that it contains no more contradictions than the books written by men. You are constantly comparing your book with the writings of Gibbon, Shakspeare, Paine, Herodotus, Homer, etc., with a view of showing that it contains no more imperfections than they. But that will not do. I am surprised that you should use such arguments. If the Bible is not superior to all the works that men have written, we have no grounds for accepting it as divine, and it is entirely reasonable for us to decide that it was also written by men. If it is truly the work of the brain and hand of Deity, it must necessarily be greatly superior to the efforts of man; but if this is not the case your claims for its divinity fall to the ground. Its contradictions cannot be reconciled by saying that other books contain similar discrepancies. Its vulgarity cannot be atoned for by saying that other books contain vulgarity. It does not make it adapted to the needs of people in this age of the world to show that other books were also written long ago. All this falls very far short of proving that it is the work of a perfect Divine Being. If it has all the imperfections of other books, it can be from no higher source. One of two things must be true—God either wrote the book or he did not. If he is a perfect being he cannot be the author of an imperfect work; and if hundreds of thousands assert that he is the author of such a work, it does not make it true. That the Bible is teeming with imperfections I think I have abundantly shown. The only rational conclusion that can be arrived at is that it is not a perfect work and that the writer was not a perfect being; that it shows no superior ability, no greater degree of perfection than is found in hundreds of other works; that if it does not surpass all that man has written, and that it was also written by men.

You make an effort to show that the Bible is not an advocate of kingcraft, tyranny, and slavery, but I think you are unsuccessful. I am only astonished at your assurance in making denial of anything so patent. That the Jewish kings were anointed and abundantly recognized by the prophets and priests is as noticeable as any feature of the book. Ingersoll says: "The Bible teaches that God is the source of all authority, and that all kings have obtained their power from him. Every tyrant has claimed to be the agent of the most high. The Inquisition was founded not in the name of man, but in the name of God. All the governments of Europe recognize the greatness of God and the littleness of the people. In all ages hypocrites, called priests, have put crowns upon the heads of thieves, called kings." It was certainly so in Bible times; the greatest tyrants and murderers were called to the throne of God's chosen people and their rule was sanctioned by the priests. The Bible kings were certainly recognized and approved in several instances. Tyranny was the rule among those kings. They obtained their authority from God, and the poor people whom they reigned over were made to feel the iron hand of Jehovah. Nearly all kings have been tyrants and the Jews were no exception in this regard. If Moses, David, and their successors were not tyrants it is difficult to find any in history. That slavery is a Bible institution I have only to refer you to Deut. xxv, 44, 46; Ex. xxi, 20, 21; Eph. vi, 5; Col. iii, 22-24; Tit. ii, 9; 1 Peter, ii, 18, and numerous other passages. Bible rule was assuredly one of kings, tyranny and slavery.

It is the same with the degradation of woman. The Bible is full of it. The subjection of woman was common in all the Eastern nations in olden times, and the Jews were in no degree behind them in this particular. The preference for the male sex is shown in many parts of the Bible. In the Mosaic law, after the birth of a male child the mother was "unclean" seven days, but if it was a female child the term of uncleanness was extended to fourteen days. We well know that it makes a woman no more unclean to bear a female child than a male, and it was only a piece of barbaric cruelty to make this unjust distinction between the sexes. Even after the birth of the reputed Son of God, and no male had officiated, according to divine law the mother was unclean. Woman had no equality with man under the Bible régime, and the volume has only to be perused for the fact to be made strikingly apparent. It is not confined to the Old Testament alone. While in the older part the statute stands: "Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee," the newer says, "The head of woman is man," "Wives, submit yourselves to your husbands,"

"Let wives be subject to their husbands in everything," "Let your women keep silence in the churches: for it is not permitted unto them to speak," and much else in the same vein. The provisions in the Bible in many respects were especially severe and unjust toward females. On this subject Prof. Denton says: "If a man went to war, and found among the captives a beautiful woman, he was permitted to make her his wife; and if afterwards he had no delight in her, he was to let her go where she would. No help for the woman if she found no delight in him." No matter how much grounds of dissatisfaction the woman might have against her husband, there was no redress for her. In the matter of ordinary divorce the inequalities were on the woman's side. The man was permitted to get a divorce, but the woman was not (Deut. xxiv. 1).

Your manner of befouling the memory of the deceased French statesman, Thiers, seems wholly uncalled for. I know nothing of the facts of the case, but I would not base a vile slander on the testimony of one paper so notoriously untrustworthy as the New York Herald. I know this, he was a man greatly respected by his countrymen, and he rendered vast services to his native land. What he did when young I have at present no means of knowing. I cannot, however, envy you the disposition you evince in parading the faults of the dead hero.

You deny that the Bible approved of polygamy. You might as well claim that it forbids the sacrifice of bullocks, rams and he-goats. The patriarchs, Abraham, Jacob, Gideon, David, and Solomon, were certainly polygamists. They are held up as special favorites of heaven, and I ask you to point out the passages where the Bible censures them for their polygamy.

You cannot dispute that the Bible recognizes human sacrifice. Not insisting that Jephtha sacrificed his daughter according to his vow, it cannot be denied that the sons and grandsons of Saul were sacrificed to arrest a famine, and their heads hung up in the sun. You may know better than other people what the meaning of Lev. xxvii. 28, 29 is, but it certainly reads: "Notwithstanding no devoted thing that a man shall devote unto the Lord, of all that he hath, both of man and beast and of the field of his possession, shall be sold or redeemed; every devoted thing is most holy unto the Lord. None devoted, which shall be devoted of men, shall be redeemed, but shall surely be put to death." It strikes me this language is clear and direct, and need not be misunderstood. If it does not mean that every man and beast that were devoted should be put to death, it does not mean anything.

Your attempted explanation about there being light sufficient to perfect vegetation and to mature fruits and seeds, before the sun was brought into existence, is as weak as your case is generally. It may be satisfactory to yourself, but will hardly prove so to scientific persons. If there was so much light, why was the sun created? What became of that light after the sun was brought into existence? If you should claim that the herbs and trees brought forth seeds and fruit before the earth was formed, your position would be equally tenable. Well may you say the Bible was not intended for a text-book of Natural Philosophy, and I will add, of common sense either.

I shall not contend with you about the honor you claim for the Bible for introducing Monotheism, though it is not easy to see how the doctrine advanced the Jews beyond the surrounding nations. The Egyptians and other nations, as I have already shown, were far beyond them in all the arts and sciences and in the march of civilization. If it is a virtue to believe in one god, why should not a belief in several gods be a greater virtue? and would not the size of the virtue increase with the number of gods believed in? Logically, it must. As I said in a previous letter, there is as much proof of a hundred gods as there is of one. I called your attention to the fact that a plurality of gods was recognized in the first chapter of Genesis. There are also other passages which bear the construction of superior and inferior gods, as most of the pagan nations have believed. If it is wrong to believe in more than one God, it is very questionable whether the Christians did right in dividing him into three parts, or persons. They never got that idea from the Jews, but borrowed it from pagan nations, many of whom had trinities. In this regard the Mohammedans have preserved the monotheistic idea of the Bible far more closely than the Christians; and if there is any virtue in Monotheism they ought to be the most virtuous.

I think I was quite correct in saying that the books of the canon were written at a much later date than is usually claimed. I repeat it, there is no proof that, with the exception of the Gentile book of Job, either book of the Bible was in existence more than seven hundred years before the Christian era, and several of them were not written till a later date. The Jewish sacred writings were gotten up after their return from the Babylonish captivity. If there were any such writings before that the Jews themselves did not know of them. This is attested by Hittel and other writers. The Christian father Irenæus says that "they (the books of the Old Testament) were fabricated seventy years after the Babylonish captivity by Esdras;" and Dr. Adam Clarke guardedly says: "All antiquity is nearly unanimous in giving Ezra the honor of collecting the different writings of Moses and the prophets and reducing them into the form in which they are now found in the Holy Bible."

For a somewhat graphic account of the nature of that divine inspiration with which the writings were composed, the reader is referred to 2 Esdras xiv. "And the next day beheld a voice called me, saying, Esdras, open thy mouth, and drink that I give thee to drink. Then opened I my mouth, and behold! he reached me a full cup, which was full, as it were, with water, but the color of it was like fire. And I took it and drank; but when I had drunk of it, my heart uttered understanding, and wisdom grew in my breast, for my spirit strengthened my memory. And my mouth was opened, and shut no more. The highest gave understanding unto the five men, and they wrote the wonderful visions of the night that were told, which they knew not; and they sat forty days, and they wrote in the day, and at night they ate bread. As for me, I spake in the day, and I held not my tongue by night. In forty days they wrote two hundred and four books. And it came to pass, when the forty days were fulfilled, that the highest spake, saying, The first that thou hast written, publish openly, that the worthy and the unworthy may read it. But keep the seventy last that thou mayest deliver them only to such as be wise among the people."

After quoting the above, Preston, in his "The Holy Bible a Historical Humbug," p. 3, remarks: "The above sufficiently shows the manner of writing an inspired book. All that is necessary to show the matter which makes up the books of the Bible is to read them. We thus find it historically established that the Old Testament, as it is now offered to us, was a comparatively modern production, having been written by a cunning old priest named Ezra, only some five hundred years before the time of Christ, and that owing to the carelessness and profanity of the Jews themselves, who not only lost whole books of the Bible, but burnt others, the Christian world to-day is in possession of but a small portion of the 'Word of God.'"

The same writer continues his observations respecting the canon of the New Testament:

"It has never been claimed that any portion of it was written during the life of the reputed founder of Christianity. Christ himself never wrote a line of the books of which it is composed. He was put to death without having ever written one word of the books of the Bible. The Christian Church was established all over the known world before a single verse of the New Testament, which contains all the doctrines of Christianity, had been written."

"The first allusion that is made to the Gospels was by the Christian Father Irenæus in the year 182, nearly a century and a half after the time of Christ. Even then, the four Gospels were presented to the world upon no other authority than that of the Christian Father himself. At the time Irenæus first introduced the four Gospels, there were many others in circulation, some of which, we are told, had existed nearly a century before, and had actually been read and quoted by the early Christians as the word of God. Among the most important of these may be named the Gospels of St. Peter, St. Thomas, St. Matthias, St. Bartholomew, St. Philip, Judas Iscariot, Thaddeus and Barnabas; the Acts of St. Peter, St. Paul, St. Andrew, St. John, St. Philip, and St. Thomas; and the Revelations of St. Paul, St. Thomas, St. Stephen, and the Great Apostle. There were upwards of fifty of these Gospels, Acts, and Revelations, which were, at one time, considered the 'divine word.' During the first three hundred years from the era of Christ there was no collection of the writings of the New Testament. All the above-named writings were circulated and accepted by the primitive Christians as of equal authority."

"At length there arose conflicting opinions and serious contentions as to their credibility. It was finally judged necessary to settle the dispute by an authoritative selection of the true from the false books. The division of opinion regarding them and the nature of Christ resulted in such disorder that the pagans ridiculed Christianity upon the stage. For the purpose of preserving order in the empire, Constantine convoked an œcumenical council of the whole habitable earth at the town of Nicæa in Bithynia. There assembled 2,048 bishops, all of different sentiments and opinions. The records of the disputes of these fierce and bigoted bishops amounted to forty volumes. The conflict in the council arrived at such a pitch that the Emperor, as moderator, for the purpose of preserving some degree of unity and propriety, was obliged to expel 1,730 of the exasperated and contentious bishops. The remaining 318 bishops then proceeded to determine which ones of the various writings were the inspired word of God. 'This was done,' says one of the Christian Fathers, 'by placing all the books under a communion table, and, upon the prayers of the council, the inspired books jumped upon the communion table, while the false ones remained under.' But it is related that many mocked at this method, and the religious row continued as fierce as ever. Finally, most of the manuscripts submitted, after being sufficiently fought over, were rejected, whereupon Constantine affixed the seal of the empire to the remaining few, declaring such to be the 'word of God.'"

"And as such they passed until the year 363, when another council, that of Laodicea, was held, to make a more perfect selection of the holy books. Upon this occasion, the manner of choosing them was by vote. The books of the New Testament were then adopted, nearly as we now have them, except Revelations, which was excluded. We are informed by St. Chrysostom, who died in 407, that the Acts of the Apostles was scarcely known in his day. Other councils were called to settle the sacred canon. There was one in 403 which rejected some books received by the council of 363; but a later council in 680 restored them. And thus contentious priests continued tossing the 'word of God,' like a battledore, from faction to faction, changing it as the spirit of sect might dictate. As illustrating the spirit which animated the ordained arbiters of the 'sacred writings,' we give the words of the Christian writer, Tindal. In his work entitled 'Rights of the Christian Church,' page 195, he says: 'That he fled all assemblies of bishops because he never saw a good and happy end of any council, but that they did rather increase than lessen the evil; that the love of contention and ambition always overcomes their reason.' Speaking of the memorable Council of Nice, at which the Emperor himself presided, Tindal further says: 'And if these accusations and libels which the bishops gave in of one another to the Emperor were now extant, in all probability, we should have such rolls of scandal that few would have much reason to boast of the first œcumenical council, where with such heat, passion, and fury, the bishops fell foul on one another, insomuch as had not the Emperor by a trick burnt their church memorials, probably they would have broke up in confusion. After that council was over, the bishops made so great a bustle and disturbance, and were so unruly, that the good Emperor was forced to tell them that if they would not be more quiet and peaceable in the future, he would no longer continue his expedition against the Infidels, but must return to keep them in order. Indeed,' continues Tindal, 'the confusion and disorder were so great amongst them, especially in their Synods, that it sometimes came to blows; as, for instance, Dioscorus, Bishop of Alexandria, cuffed and kicked Flavianus, Patriarch of Constantinople, (at the second Synod of Ephesus,) with that fury that within three days after he died.'

"And it is upon the decisions of such fierce and fighting fanatics that the Christian world depends for its creeds and sacred scriptures! The authenticity of divine revelation rests upon the ballots of bigots who often fell foul of one another, and kicked each other to death! So that it is difficult to determine whether it was really the majority vote or the predominant kicking power that finally settled the vexed question which books were God's and which were not. The book of Luke was given to God by one single vote majority, and that may have depended more upon the muscular activity of the voter than upon his ability to discriminate between books of God and books of men."

"It is a notorious fact, and one which may well perplex the priesthood, that the books which one body of bishops would piously pronounce genuine inspiration, another council, equally as well commissioned to settle the sacred canon, would condemn and reject as profane forgeries. And it is also pertinent to inquire, in this connection, why the one thousand seven hundred and thirty bishops whom Constantine thrust out of the Council of Nice were not as well qualified to say what writings were the word of God as the three hundred and eighteen who remained? And also, why, or how, or by whose imperative command, is the Christian world justified in believing that the books which were saved and voted into the the Scriptural canon are any more sacred than those voted out, or which were lost or destroyed? Let Christians learn these facts, and consider them well. Let them realize the absurdity of believing books to be of divine origin which so long lay in obscurity, and were only saved from oblivion through the presumption of unscrupulous priests, and finally decided to be genuine by the ballots of bigoted and bullying bishops."

Let me give you these Christian authorities: The learned Dr. Lardner says: "That even so late as the middle of the sixth century, the canon of the New Testament had not been settled by any authority that was decisively and universally acknowledged; but Christian people were at liberty to judge for themselves concerning the genuineness of writings proposed to them as apostolical, and to determine according to evidence" (vol. iii, pp. 54-61).

In the second edition of his introduction to the Scriptures, the Rev. T. H. Horne says: "The account left us by ecclesiastical writers of antiquity, published, are so vague, confused and discordant, that they lead to no certain or solid determination. The eldest of the ancient fathers collected the report of their own times, and set them down as certain truths, and those who followed adopted their accounts with implicit reverence. Thus tradition, true or false, passed on from one writer to another without examination, until, at last, it became too late to examine them to any purpose."

Your supposition that the New Testament canon was collected at an early date, from the fact that it does not directly teach popery, Mariolatry, etc., is of no more force than the Protestant Sabbath (first instituted by Constantine in 321), and the personality of the Holy Ghost—which can easily be shown to have been a borrowed pagan myth—first introduced as an orthodox dogma at the Council of Constantine in 381. The fact that all the cardinal doctrines of the Church were not authoritatively settled till a late date, proves conclusively that there existed no canon by which they could be settled. The first councils in the fourth century were called for the very purpose of ferreting out or forging sufficient Scripture evidence to collect into a canon. I wish, too, to call particular attention to the fact that popery did not really begin to have an existence till 606, when the title of "Universal Bishop"—Pope—was first given to Boniface III. You will understand, too, that the Papist can point to as positive New Testament proof for transubstantiation and Mariolatry as the Protestant can for any of his particular doctrines.

You say, "the wonderful events recorded in the Bible do not necessarily make it suspicious." Do you mean that in such stories as the earth producing all the varieties of vegetation before there was either sun or rain; that man was made of clay, and woman of a rib taken from him by a surgical operation; of a snake being able to circumvent God in his long-matured plan, until he made it necessary for him to drown out the world by raising the water over the entire earth to the height of five miles; of two and seven of every variety of animals being closely compacted for thirteen months in a water-tight and air-tight vessel; of frogs, locusts, lice, etc., being produced in immense quantities by miracle; of all the water of a country hundreds of miles in length, including a large river, being turned into blood; of the waters of seas and rivers parting and piling up on either side like a wall; of a man's stopping the sun and moon in their courses; of a man's preventing rain and dew falling upon the earth for more than three years; of Jonah's being swallowed by a fish and retained in its stomach under water for three days, and then being thrown up alive and kicking upon dry ground; of three men being cast into a fiery furnace that was made seven times hotter than usual, without receiving the slightest injury; of a woman becoming a mother without the natural process; of men being raised from the dead; of the graves being opened and the dead being resuscitated and walking forth into the city among their former companions—do you mean that all these stories, and many more equally as incredible, are not enough to excite suspicion? If so, I must disagree with you. If such extravagant yarns were to be narrated now-a-days, the strongest suspicions would not only be excited, but everybody would declare them absurdly false. They would, however, be just as likely to take place to-day as two or five thousand years ago.

You say my condemnation of the Bible is an insult to the intelligence of all Christendom. Nothing of the kind was intended. I think I have made no misstatement about that volume, and while I have no desire to insult any one, I have wondered indeed how people of intelligence like yourself can so easily swallow it without examination, and accept it all as truth without a shade of error. It is easy for you to say my reply "bristles with distortions, garblings, half-truths and untruths," but I think it would have been very much better to point them out than to make such wholesale unfounded charges. It is easy to use epithets and sweeping assertions, but there is little argument in them.

It is hard for you to give up Jefferson. You fain would still claim him for a Christian, but I cannot help thinking he knew more about his views than his great-granddaughter knew. I recommend you to turn to my third reply and read the quotations I gave from his own writings. After doing so, it will not be an easy task for you to consider him a genuine Christian.

Your inclination or your prejudice leads you to give another unfriendly hit at the Liberal Clubs. Let me again assure you that the members are not all anti-Christian. Some incline one way and some the other. Those who are decided in the convictions that Christianity is re-vamped paganism and that its rule has not tended to benefit the world, claim the right in moderate language to give expression to their convictions. Those who entertain opposite views are equally free to give utterance to them and to disprove if possible the errors of their opponents. The Liberal Clubs are certainly not the pernicious organizations you seem disposed to represent them. Perhaps the worst thing you can say about them is that they maintain a free platform where a man is privileged to say just what he thinks to be true.

You allude to the comparative strength and weakness of Christianity and Infidelity, and make an effort to prove that the first is growing stronger while the latter is already on the wane. You state that certain fashionable Christian churches of this city are well attended, while the congregations of Frothingham, Alger and Adler are not immense, etc. I concede that some of the fashionable, bon ton churches and the Catholic churches are fully attended, but I fear your prejudices prevent you doing justice to the congregations of Frothingham, Alger and Adler. When I have listened to these gentlemen I have found their audiences large and the seats well occupied, and I am informed that the attendance at their meetings is uniformly good. I concede, too, that Christianity has been a power on the earth, and is to-day. Although it has never reached more than half the number of those who believe in Buddha, and only about equaled the number of adherents to Brahmanism and perhaps exceeded by a trifle the followers of the Arabian prophet, it has nevertheless been one of the great religions of the world and holds that position to-day. It has spread itself by conquest. It has grasped the sword, and in the name of its Savior and its creed it has deluged this fair earth in blood. In this sanguinary devastation it has exceeded, by far, all the religions known to man. It has shed enough of the blood of men, women and children to float all the navies and merchant-ships on the globe, while the great systems of Brahmanism and Buddhism have been peaceful and beneficent, and their numbers have not been increased by conquest and slaughter. Christianity and Mohammedanism have drawn the sword freely and caused human blood to flow in rivers. Those two religions of monotheism have slaughtered nearly 200,000,000 human beings. For centuries they have pursued the same bloody religious warfare which is to-day deluging Southern Europe with blood.

The qualities which have been most conducive to the growth and strength of Christianity are ignorance and superstition. These made the Church strong, and they have kept its power intact. So long as it could make the masses believe that there was a tyrant who ruled on a throne a little above the clouds; that he commissioned a vast brigade of priests to attend to his business and to help hold the people in subjection; that there is a fearful hell of brimstone, fire and flames ready to engulf all who will not bow and acknowledge the faith of the cross, and all who dare to think for themselves, so long has the rule of that system of religion been strong in the world. But assuredly it is weakening. During the last two or three centuries, and more particularly during the last half-century, light has been breaking in. Learning and science, and the consequent advance of civilization, have been weakening its foundations. Science has shown those who are willing to read the truths it imparts that the ground upon which Christianity stands is untenable, and that its foundation dogmas are untrue; that the great truths of the Universe are in opposition to the narrow-creed exactions which the Church enjoins upon its devotees. There is an antagonism between Christian credulity and the teachings of science. As the knowledge of the truths of Nature is improved by the masses, the grip of the Church is loosened and the power of priestcraft is weakened. A strong faith in the myths and fables of the past is incompatible with the revelations of science and truth, and in the conflict which has begun, and is sure to continue and increase, these are certain to triumph, and the old myths must retire to the rear and sink down, ultimately, into the waters of oblivion. The destiny of the human mind is to be free and untrammelled. On the pinions of truth it is destined to rise above the mists and fogs which settle over the Church, and though the machinery and organization of the same is still perfect, and the power of priestcraft is hard to be broken, it is only a matter of time. The struggle will not slacken; the contest will not cease until truth and reason shall triumph over errors and myths. The fetters and shackles that bind men shall be removed and men shall be free.

In connection with the subject of the decline in the vitality and power of Christianity in this country allow me to quote a few remarks made by your brother clergyman, Rev. Dewitt Talmage, of the Brooklyn Tabernacle: "Oh, we have magnificent church machinery in this country; we have sixty thousand American ministers; we have costly music; we have great Sunday-schools, and yet I give you the appalling statistics, that in the last twenty-five years, laying aside last year, the statistics of which I have not seen, within the last twenty-five years the churches of God have averaged less than two conversions a year each. There has been an average of four or five deaths in the churches. How soon, at that rate, will this world be brought to God? We gain two; we lose four. Eternal God, what will this come to?" You see your brother takes a discouraging view of the coming fate of the Church. The prospect is anything but cheering to him. Talmage, of course, would not utter such gloomy words did he not know them to be true.

The growth of skepticism and the increase of doubt in the dogmas of theology are apparent on every side. They are working into the churches, and the clergy themselves are badly affected with the prevailing doubt. In confidential conversation with private friends many of them admit that they have their misgivings about the truth of what they were brought up to believe. The trade of the priest is all they know, and to insure a good livelihood they continue to preach; but their confidence in ecclesiasticism is greatly shaken. Some estimate that half the members of the churches are doubting unbelievers in all that the Church enjoins.

The spirit of doubt and skepticism is apparent in many of the newly-issued books that are appearing, as well as in the journals and magazines of the day. Frequently we see the most radical articles appearing where we would hardly look for them. More and more are becoming bold enough to speak out and tell their thoughts. The priesthood will still use their best exertions to hold the masses subservient to their will and purpose, and they will doubtless continue to do this so long as the avocation is remunerative. But one after one and ten after ten they are emerging from the mists of faith and are coming out into the sunshine of truth. As a sample of the newspaper and magazine articles that are appearing from time to time, I will first give a quotation from an editorial in a recent Telegram upon "Religious Superstition." It says: "An essay entitled 'Modern Skepticism and How to Meet It,' is presently to be read by the Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott before the General Association of the Congregational Church of this State. It cannot be doubted that Dr. Abbott will address himself with enthusiasm to the task, and that his defense of Christianity will be tinged by strong personal devotion to the cause. But for a successful assault to be carried against the strong intrenchments on the side of Infidelity set up during the last few years by many members of the scientific world, a leader is required of vaster powers than those possessed by the defender in question. It must be remembered, too, that it is idle to defend the dogmas of Christianity merely because they have now survived many hundreds of years. Scientific leaders are notorious for their love of truth. They follow where she leads them, no matter where the bourne may be. This is not true of Christian leaders. They follow according to the bent of their prejudices, their self-interest, their bigotry. They desire to see only those things proved which they believe or wish to believe true. Dr. Abbott will find the task which he has set for himself one beyond his powers."

As embracing deep thought upon one of the subjects we have been discussing, I will insert the following which recently appeared in the Nineteenth Century:

"In former times, when Atheism was vague and stammering, incomplete and unorganized, it was condemned and suppressed with horror, anger and indignation. Its apostles were execrated as monsters doomed to eternal torments. The world cast them out, and the Church burned them. But now that Atheism is complete and organized, without concealment and without shame, its name is not even a term of mild reproach. On the contrary, its most notorious professors are honored and looked up to by the world in general, and listened to with a respectful patience by even their professed opponents. Deans avow friendship for men compared with whom Voltaire is orthodox, and Cardinals with such men gravely discuss beliefs which Voltaire would have thought it horrible to have questioned. The reason of this is obvious. Atheism has come forward under changed conditions. It is based upon new foundations; it is animated with a new temper. For the first time it rests itself not on the private speculations of a rebellious intellect, not on the ravings of a vile Parisian populace drunk with the wine of politics and suffering from political delirium tremens, but on the deep and broad foundations of research, experiment, and proof. It has lost all that insolence of private passion and of private judgment which used to make it as offensive to men's practical instincts as it was to their theoretical convictions. Our modern Atheists in profession, and to a great measure in fact, are entirely free of the old personal bravado; they claim to teach with authority, because they have been content to learn with humility. For they, too, have their church, their infallible teacher, to whom they profess an implicit and devout obedience. And this teacher is undoubtedly an august one. It is none other than Nature herself, as our powerful science compels her answers from her—Nature, in the widest sense of the word, including the history of the Universe and the history of the human race, and the laws in obedience to which this history has developed itself. Here, we are told, is our one source of knowledge; here we learn the truth, and the whole truth. Nature bears witness about every conceivable subject; there is no rational question which, if we do but ask it properly, she will not answer. She will require no faith from us; she will ask us to take nothing on trust. Everything that she teaches us she will prove and verify; and there is no variableness in her, nor any shadow of turning. "Come, then"—this is the appeal that our modern Atheists make to us—"and let us learn of Nature; let us listen to the voice of truth!" And what does truth tell us? Among many things truth tells us two, which are of prime importance, and which are universally intelligible to the human race—there is no God, and there is no future life. The notion of the first is unnecessary, and that of the second is ridiculous. In the name of truth, then, let us cast these lies away from us, however painfully for the moment we may feel their loss, however closely they may be bound up for us with memories of the past. But we are not left with this exhortation only. Something more is added to sustain and stimulate us. These lies, we are told, if we will but look them boldly in the face, instead of blinking at them out of deference to their supposed divinity, we shall see to be not lies only, but profoundly immoral lies. Is is, therefore, in the name not of selfish indulgence, not of license and free-living, but of sacred truth and all the severest principles, that we are invited to accept the creed of Atheism and to cast out religion. Thus the Atheism of to-day, though theoretically destructive, is practically conservative. It no longer assails society as it is, or any of those rules that sustain it, or the cherished affections that are supposed to make it worth sustaining. It is associated no longer with any dissolute wit, with any cruel and brilliant cynicism, or with the fascinations of lawless love. On the contrary, it is on the whole somewhat dull; and to say the least of it, it is eminently respectable. It is the Atheism of the vigil, not of the orgy; and its character when developed is solemn, almost puritanical. Study the language, the conduct, even the faces of its exponents, and signs will be apparent everywhere of gravity and severe earnestness. These are men, we see in a glance, who hold life a serious thing—a thing not to be trifled away in idleness, however harmless, or in licentious self-indulgence, however refined or graceful. What is really of value in life, what men should really strive for, are things to be reached only by self-denial and labor and a vigilant rigor in the guidance and control of our passions. Those who pay no heed to the better part, but who saunter, who lounge, who smile, who sneer through life, are condemned by the Atheists even more grimly than by the believers."

From one position of the above writer I shall perhaps claim to dissent. I do not limit the power of Nature to carry human existence beyond this life. I have felt compelled to acknowledge that it may be in the economy of the Universe to continue individual life into another state of existence; that this is the rudimentary, and the other the ultimate. I claim to have no special knowledge upon the subject nor of the nature and locality of that other world, but I have witnessed phenomena that I was satisfied were not fraudulent, and which led me to this conclusion. With this exception, the writer is sound; and it is possible, too, that this may not be an exception after all. Science may ultimately explain all not now well understood.

In connection with the subject of the spread of skepticism I will only remark that it is striking terror into the very heart of the Church. The great question that is now propounded with so much anxiety and mental agony is, How shall the spread of Infidelity be stayed? This momentous question troubled the Pan-Presbyterian Council recently assembled in Edinburgh more than all others, and it will take all the skill and cunning of the theologians to solve it.

I will take very little space to review the ground we have gone over, or to sum up my portion of the discussion. Allow me to say I think you have utterly failed to establish your side of the questions discussed; and I have been struck with the weakness of your arguments and with the little dodges, petty quibbles, and theological twaddle you have found it necessary to resort to. Before the discussion took place, I thought more could be said in advocacy of your views than you have said, although I am convinced that few of your brethren of the sacerdotal order possess more ability than yourself. With all due modesty, I claim that I have shown, under our first proposition, that those who did the most to aid the cause of American independence and to establish a free system of government were unbelievers in orthodox Christianity and the divinity of the Bible. Under the second proposition, I think I established the fact that unbelievers have done more to aid the advance and spread of learning and science than believers have. On this last proposition, relative to the truth and divinity of the Bible, I claim that I have shown that the Bible possesses no qualities to prove it a superhuman production, and that it is entitled to no more respect than numerous other books that men have written and printed. I think that I have made it clear to unprejudiced minds that Infidelity, or Radicalism, has more proofs of truth than the Bible has of divinity. I stated clearly, and was prepared to prove it, that Christianity is not an original system of religion; that all its dogmas were borrowed from the older systems. I have repeated this some three times, hoping you would attempt to refute it, that I might adduce the proofs. You have not disputed it, but tacitly admitted its truth, and I wish this point to be noticed and remembered. By your silence upon this charge you have confessed that Christianity is not original, but that it was borrowed almost entirely from paganism, and is no better than the obsolete systems of religion in vogue twenty-five centuries or more ago.

It is true I have covered more space than you have, but I have introduced no topic not mentioned by yourself, and have endeavored to confine myself exclusively to the subjects treated of by you. You throw out insinuations about the cuttle-fish style of conducting an argument. Your allusion is about as clear as the water may be supposed to be about your cuttle-fish when making an attack, but I cannot think it fairly applies to me. I am aware that I am somewhat verbose and that I sometimes repeat myself, but I do not think my language is ambiguous or difficult to be understood. I do not try to conceal myself or the views I entertain. Like some others of your insinuations, it seems wholly uncalled for. You have not been curtailed in anything you wished to say. I have printed every word you handed in, and I would not have denied you the same space I have occupied. Your style is brief and concise, while mine is more diffuse. I make longer quotations than you do, believing it more fair to the author quoted, and better for the reader, than to select a line or two here and there which cannot give a full exposition of the author's views.

I cheerfully concede to you greater ability than I possess. Your advantages have been superior to mine, and your reading far more extensive, but I am fully convinced that I have the truth on my side, and with my inferior abilities I think I have made this comparatively clear. I will leave it with our readers to decide which has given the best arguments, and on which side victory has perched.

Perhaps we have both shown some prejudice and partiality. Being fully impressed that Christianity is a system of shams and old fables, borrowed, as I have charged, from older pagan systems, I have lost nearly all the respect I once had for it, but I have intended to be fair and truthful in all cases. You have evinced not a little unfriendliness towards Infidels, Atheists and Liberal Clubs. I can not think strange of this, for they are working in opposition to your line of thought and your avocation, and it is only the spirit so violently exhibited by your predecessors.

I thank you for the courtesy you have shown me. I have found our personal intercourse pleasant and agreeable; and I trust a friendship has grown up between us during this discussion that will continue for years. I respect you for your excellent qualities. I have published your views with the same willingness that I have my own, and I doubt not you accord to me a due spirit of candor and liberality in laying your language and views before my numerous readers, with the same freedom that I have my own. It is more than any Christian paper in the country would do by me. I very much doubt if any orthodox periodical in the United States would publish a single Infidel letter of my writing, while I have given in full thirteen of yours, affording you access to a class of readers that you could not otherwise reach. Please give Infidelity due credit for this instance of fairness and liberality. Should you at any future time wish to engage in another discussion upon theological subjects, my columns shall be open to you, and if you can find no other opponent I will offer you my own humble services again. I would be very glad could the light of truth so shine into your mind that you could be able to see that there are greater truths in Nature and Science than is contained in the old theological ideas that have so long ruled Christendom, and that you might feel it incumbent on you to tear off the shackles of ecclesiasticism and intolerance and to come to the belief that there is a greater good in Nature and a greater truth in the realm of Science and reason than in the belief that a personal God devised the world, created man weak and fallible, placed a tempter before him, knowing that he would be led astray, and then thrusts him and his countless posterity into everlasting flames for doing what he could not help doing under the conditions that surrounded him. I shall still indulge the hope that you may yet be able to take an advanced step and leave the domain of theological myths and legends. You are a young man, I trust with a long life before you; you have a clear intellect, and there is much ground for hope.

It is a great thing to change the religion of a people. To throw off the effects of early education, and to become divested of the influence of the old traditions and legends is a herculean task, but it has got to be accomplished. The old systems that the world has thus far accepted have not benefited their devotees; the gods that have been held up for worship, and on whose account and on account of whose priests, uncounted millions of wealth have been wrung from the hard-toiling masses—have done nothing for the world, and humanity demands that they shall be dethroned and cease to be objects of reverence. All the old systems of religion have proved to be failures and only served as obstructions to mankind on the great highway of life's journey. The human race has subdued this planet so far as it has been subdued; it has made it a garden in so far as it is a garden; but there are yet many desolate wilds to be improved by the industrious hand of man. A great deal has yet to be done in learning the true science of life, in knowing how to obtain the greatest amount of happiness from our existence, and how to make happy those around us; how to live, how to produce a healthy, well-balanced, happy race upon the earth; how to secure pleasant lives, and how to make them useful, is of far more consequence to us to-day than can be the blood of a man who died nineteen hundred years ago. It is time we dropped the old religions of the gods, and adopted the better religion of man. Love of mankind is the highest elevation to which we can attain, and therein lies our whole duty. We can do good or evil to ourselves and to our fellow-beings, but we can do neither to the gods. Even if there are such beings, they are so far removed from us, and we know so little of them, and they care so little for us, that our neglect will not offend nor our oblations cajole them. The objects of our concern are around us and with us, and they claim our undivided attention.

You speak of the havoc of sin. The sins have been entirely toward the human race, and here is where the reformation should be begun and continued. Let us ourselves endeavor to live true, pure, noble lives, and help others to do the same. Let us understand that each individual must secure his own happiness and his own justification. Let us not depend for our peace and happiness upon the good deeds of any man nor lurk behind the covering of another's virtues. Let us be pure, be unselfish and be upright. Let us scorn to act from low motives. Let us cease to balance our heavenly gains by our earthly losses, and to chuckle over a credit-mark on the recording angel's book when we have performed good actions here. Let us substitute the service of man, who is ever around us, in place of the service of unknown gods whom we can never know anything about. Let us increase real knowledge and lessen superstition and faith. Let us use our entire exertions to hasten this reformation, and strive to make of this earth as perfect a paradise as is possible with the conditions which attend us.

In the bonds of humanity and fraternity, I am sincerely your friend,
D. M. BENNETT.

A Short Sermon.

BY A. B. PIERCE.

"We have a law, and by that law he ought to die" (St. John xix, 7).

These words were spoken of Christ by the Jews, who had, from time immemorial, been put under strict charge to worship no being—whatever his pretensions or demonstrations might be—but him who had brought them up out of the land of Egypt; being assured there was no other God; and he was not to be imaged by anything in heaven or on earth. "Ye shall make no idols nor graven images, neither rear up a standing image, to bow down unto it: for I alone am the Lord your God" (Lev. xxvi, 1). "I am the Lord your God who brought you out of the land of Egypt; thou shalt have no other God but me; for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God" (Ex. xx, 23). "I am the Lord thy God from the land of Egypt, thou shalt know no God but me, for beside me there is no savior" (Hos. xiii, 4).

The penalties inflicted upon the worshiper of any other God, and upon him who spoke in the name of any God, were very severe. "The prophet that shall speak in the name of any other God, even that prophet shall die" (Deut. xviii, 20). "If there be found among you a man or woman that hath gone and served other gods, and worshiped them, then thou shalt bring that man or that woman unto the gates, and thou shalt stone them with stones till they die" (Deut. xvii, 2, 5).

Not only was the worshiper of any other God to be put to death; but the person who invited another to worship any other God than that of the Hebrews was to be put to death. "If there arise among you a prophet, or a dreamer of dreams, and giveth thee a sign or a wonder (to prove his mission), and the sign or the wonder come to pass; if he shall say, Let us go after other Gods, which thou hast not known, and let us serve them: thou shalt not hearken unto the words of that prophet, or that dreamer of dreams; for the Lord your God proveth you, to know whether you love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul. Ye shall walk after the Lord your God and fear him, and keep his commandments, and obey his voice, and shall serve him and shall cleave unto him. And that prophet shall be put to death; because he hath spoken to turn you away from the Lord your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, and redeemed you out of the house of bondage, to thrust thee out of thy way which the Lord thy God commandeth thee to walk in. If thy brother, the son of thy mother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend, who is as thine own soul, shall entice thee, saying, Let us serve some other God whom we have not known: thou shalt not consent unto him nor hearken to him; neither shall thine eye pity him, neither shalt thou spare, neither shalt thou counsel him: but shalt surely kill him; thy hand shall be first upon him to put him to death: and afterward the hand of all thy people" (Deut. xiii, 1-9).

The above authorizes the text: "We have a law, and by that law he ought to die."

There had been no repeal of this law; and the Jews felt, as well they might, under a pressing religious necessity, both to keep the law themselves, and to execute it upon all offenders; as it said, "Thou shalt surely kill him."

God had never said to his chosen people, "When I shall send my son into the world, ye shall not execute this law on him; although he will answer the description given in your law. He shall show signs and wonders, and shall prophesy."

God had given no description of him, when he should come or what he should do by which they should know him. All the description they had to go by was given in their law: "If there arise a prophet among you, at any future time, and giveth thee a sign or a wonder, and the sign or the wonder come to pass, if he shall say, Worship or honor me even as you honor thy Father; or worship any being other than him who brought you up out of the land of Egypt, thou shalt surely kill him."

Throughout all Christendom it is allowed that Jesus was a prophet, and that what he prophesied came to pass; and that he showed them signs and wonders; yet for all this, their law did not authorize them to worship him; but did authorize them, yea, commanded them to kill him. He answered the description given in their law. All he did would fall within the terms, "Signs and wonders." God made no exceptions of any that should heal the sick, raise the dead, or cast out devils. These were all wonders and signs of his mighty power: his works came within the phrase, "And sheweth thee a wonder." What else could they they go by but God's own word? God virtually said, Kill any one, man or woman—whatever wonders may be shown—that shall say, Worship any being that did not bring thee out of the land of Egypt.

Had the Jews any other rule to go by than their laws?

Had they executed any number of persons for such offense between the giving of this law and the coming of Christ? Would they not have done it in obedience to the command of God? Did not Christ come within the description of their law? All the Churches understand him to be God; showing that the Jews did not misunderstand him—for they said, He being a man maketh himself a God. He said, Before Abraham was I am. I and my father are one. Ye believe in God, believe also in me. Honor me even as ye honor the Father; for he that hath seen me, hath seen the Father.

Now comes the trial. The Jews were zealous for their law and its God as people are now. They asked, Can it be that the omnipotent, omnipresent, and infinite Jehovah, whom we and our fathers were taught to worship, as the God that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, has appeared to us here in the shape of a man, weary, hungry, sleepy, and crying? Some of us remember the time and place of his birth. Born in Bethlehem of Judea, and out of wedlock; we know his mother, who is yet living, and his brothers James, Simon, Joseph, and his sisters, are they not all with us? Has the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob half-brothers and sisters besides a mother living right here among us and we never knew it before? Still more, the children of his brothers and sisters must call him uncle. How can we reconcile the idea of his Godhead with the declaration, "From everlasting to everlasting, thou art God," whom no man hath seen nor can see? Again, if the Eternal God has a mother, which is the older, himself or his mother? All the children of Christ, if he has any, must call Mary grandmother. Can we allow any such claims? Our law says, Kill every such pretender. We must do as God has commanded us and trust to consequences. If he is what he claims to be, he does not take the means of letting us know it—it is our business to obey. He is not the first one that has given out that he was some great thing. God himself has set us an example in the case of Peor, in which the people of Israel turned after the gods of Moab; for which the Lord said unto Moses, Take all the heads of the people, and hang them up before the Lord against the sun; and for this offense of the people, God himself slew twenty-four thousand Israelites; and afterward, for this same offense, Moses was commanded to slay all the men of Midian, their wives and little boys; amounting in all to as many as eighty thousand persons, besides thirty-two thousand girls made slaves to the priests; the officers, and the soldiers. To accept this man's claims is to do violence to our own understanding. How revolting to all our ideas of a God! Born among us! An infinite, eternal, Jehovah baby!

The Jews doubtless would have stoned him to death without much ceremony, had they not been under Roman law, and neither Herod nor Pilate would administer Jewish law. Pilate examined him, and said to the Jews, I find nothing in him worthy of death, according to Roman law. But they said: "We have a law, and by that law he ought to die." Pilate said to them, to take him then, and judge him according to your law. This they were afraid to do. They knew they would be themselves liable to Roman law. Pilate hesitated, but finally yielding to the importunity of God's high-priests, elders, and the counsel of all the people, delivered him into their hands, washing his own, and saying, crucify him, which they did, because stoning was not known to the Roman law. When Pilate asked him if he was the King of the Jews, why did he say, "Thou sayest that I am a king?" Had I been Pilate, I would have said, No, sir; I only asked, Are you the king of the Jews? Why did he not answer Pilate, Yes, with a flash of his eye that would have sent a ray of light through Pilate's head, instead of cringing or saying nothing. The Jews said he ought to die because he said he was the Son of God. This saying frightened Pilate, so he went again into the judgment hall, and, with more care, said unto Jesus, Whence art thou? But Jesus gave him no answer. Why did he not answer with a voice that would have shown them with whom they were dealing? Why did he not say I came down from heaven to give my life for this sin-cursed race? Then Pilate said unto Jesus, Whence art thou? but Jesus gave him no answer. Then said Pilate unto him, Speakest thou not unto me? Knowest thou not that I have power to crucify thee, and have power to release thee? Jesus answered, Thou couldst have no power against me except it were given from above. What would the world have done for a Redeemer if God had not given Pilate power to crucify him? Were Pilate and the Jews wicked for doing what God helped them to do, and had commanded them to do to every man or woman who should do what Christ did. Pilate helped the Jews do, by his power from above, what they couldn't do alone, being under the Roman government. If it was the duty of the Jews to believe on Christ, and had done so, what would have become of the world; for had they known him, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory. So had the world believed on him, they would not have had a crucified Redeemer; and without such a Redeemer they would have all gone to the Devil.

Luke says, "Him being delivered by the determined counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken and by wicked hands have crucified and slain. By this we learn that the Jews did what God himself had determined them to do. Hence it can be wicked to do what God wants done.

But Christ said, "No man taketh my life from me; I have power to lay down my life, and I have power to take it again. If, therefore, Christ's betrayal by Judas, and his execution by the Jews, was unnecessary to the salvation of man, it would have been much more effectual had he in the presence of the chief priests, the elders or the people, Pilate, Herod and all Jerusalem lifted up his hands toward heaven and proclaimed his mission about to end, and with temples sending forth great drops of blood, his eyes beaming with celestial love, his countenance glowing with the grace of forgiveness, announced, "For this world I lay down my life. It is finished. I give up the ghost."

He would have left the multitude magnetized with wonder and astonishment. What good did it do his cause to be spit upon, derided and insulted by the people—his own people at that? He wanted them to believe on him, and the truth of him. For insults and abuse added nothing to practice absurdity because popular. Thou that preachest a man should not steal, dost thou steal. Just as honorable to pay a priest five dollars for false doctrine as a teacher five dollars for false spelling. A man is not excusable for not doing some little good because he cannot do all the good he would like to. But when he can do right and will not, what then? Why then he would like the most of mankind.

By PROF. W. ROBERTSON SMITH, OF THE UNIVERSITY OF ABERDEEN.

In turning now to a literary and critical survey of the Old Testament books, we shall find it convenient to depart from the division of the Hebrew canon in favor of a classification suggested by the order of the books followed in the English version and in most other translations. The Old Testament literature is made up of historical, poetico-didactic, and prophetic writings, and under these three heads we will arrange what remains to be said on the subject.

Historical Books.—These form two parallel series of sacred history. The books from Genesis to Kings give a continuous story (with some episodic additions) from the creation to the fall of the kingdom of Judah. The book of Chronicles covers the same ground on a narrower plan, contracting the early history into genealogical lists, and occupying itself almost entirely with the kingdom of Judah, and especially with matters connected with the temple and its worship. The narrative of the chronicler is continued in the books, or, rather, book of Ezra and Nehemiah, which incorporates original memoirs of these two reformers, but otherwise is so exactly in the style of the Chronicles that critics are practically agreed in ascribing the whole to a single author, probably a Levite, who, as we have already seen, cannot have written before the close of the Persian Empire. The questions that are raised as to the work of the chronicler belong less to the general history of Biblical literature than to special introduction; we pass on, therefore, to the larger and more important series. The Pentateuch and the so-called earlier prophets form together a single continuous narrative. It is plain, however, that the whole work is not the uniform production of one pen, but that, in some way, a variety of records of different ages and styles have been combined to form a single narrative. Accordingly, Jewish tradition bears testimony that Moses wrote the Pentateuch, Joshua the book named after him, Samuel the book of Judges, and so forth. As all Hebrew history is anonymous—a sure proof that people had not yet learned to lay weight on questions of authorship—it is not probable that this tradition rests on any surer ground than conjecture; and, of course, a scribe who saw in the sacred books the whole outcome of Israel's history would naturally leap to the conclusion that the father of the Law was the author of the Pentateuch, and that the other leaders of Israel's history could not but be the writers of a great part of the Scriptures. A more careful view of the books themselves shows that the actual state of the case is not so simple. In the first place, the limits of the individual books are certainly not the limits of authorship. The Pentateuch, as a law-book, is complete without Joshua, but as a history it is so planned that the latter book is its necessary complement (cf., for example, Exodus xvi, 35; Joshua v, 12; Genesis i, 24, 25; Exodus xlii, 19; Joshua xxiv, 92). In truth, an author who wrote after the occupation of Canaan could never have designed a history which should relate all God's promises to Israel, and say nothing of their fulfillment. But, in its present shape, the Pentateuch is certainly subsequent to the occupation, for it uses geographical names which arose after that time (Hebron, Dan), refers to the conquest as already accomplished (Deuteronomy ii, 12, cf. Numbers xv, 32; Genesis xli, 6), and even presupposes the existence of a kingship in Israel (Genesis xxxvi, 31). And with this it agrees that, though there are marked differences of style and language within the book of Joshua, each style finds its counterpart in some section of the Pentateuch. In the subsequent books we find quite similar phenomena. The last chapters of Judges cannot be separated from the book of Samuel, and the earlier chapters of Kings are obviously one with the foregoing narrative; while all three books contain passages strikingly akin to parts of the Pentateuch and Joshua (cf., for example, the book of Deuteronomy with Joshua xxiii; 1 Samuel xii; 1 Kings viii). Such phenomena not only prove the futility of any attempt to base a theory of authorship on the present division into books, but suggest that the history as we have it is not one narrative carried on from age to age by successive additions, but a fusion of several narratives which partly covered the same ground and were combined into unity by an editor. This view is supported by the fact, that even as now stands the history sometimes gives more than one account of the same event, and that the Pentateuch often gives several laws on the same subject. Of the latter we have already had one example, but for our present argument the main point is not diversity of enactment, which may often be only apparent, but the existence within the Pentateuch of distinct groups of laws partly taking up the same topics. Thus the legislation of Exodus xx-xxiii, is partly repeated in chapter xxiv, and on the passover and feast of unleavened bread we have at least six laws, which, if not really discordant, are at least so divergent in form and conception that they cannot be all from the same pen (Exodus xii, 1-28; xiii, 1-10; xxiii, 18; xxiv, 18; Leviticus xxiii, 5-14; Deuteronomy xvi). Of historical duplicates the most celebrated are the twofold history of the creation and the flood, to which we must recur presently. The same kind of thing is found in the later books; for example, in the account of the way in which Saul became king, where it is scarcely possible to avoid the conclusion that 1 Samuel xi, 1-11 should attach directly to chapter x, 17 (cf. x, 7). But the extent to which the historical books are made up of parallel narratives which, though they cover the same period, do not necessarily record the same events, was first clearly seen after Astruc (1753 A. D.) observed that the respective uses of Jehovah (Lord) and Elohim (God) as the name of the Deity afford a criterion by which two documents can be dissected out of the book of Genesis. That the way in which the two names are used can only be due to difference of authorship is now generally admitted, for the alteration corresponds with such important duplications as the two accounts of creation, and is rarely accompanied through a great part of the book by unmistakable peculiarities of language and thought, so that it is still possible to reconstruct at least the Elohim document with a completeness which makes its original independence and homogeneity matter of direct observation. The character of this narrative is annalistic; and, where other material fails, blanks are supplied by genealogical lists. Great weight is laid on orderly development, and the name Jehovah is avoided in the history of the patriarchs in order to give proper contrast to the Mosaic period (cf. Genesis xvii, 1; Exodus vi, 3); and, accordingly, we find that the unmistakable secondary marks of this author run through the whole Pentateuch and Joshua, though the exclusive use of Elohim ceases at Exodus vi. Of course the disappearance of this criterion makes it less easy to carry on an exact reconstruction of the later parts of the document; but on many points there can be no uncertainty, and it is clearly made out that the author has strong priestly tendencies, and devotes a large portion of his space to the liturgical matters. The separation of this document may justly be called the point of departure of positive criticism of the sources of the Old Testament; and present controversy turns mainly on its relation to other parts of the Pentateuch. Of these the most important are—1. The Jehovistic narrative, which also begins with the creation, and treats the early history more in the spirit of prophetic theology and idealism; containing, for example, the narrative of the fall, and the parts of the history of Abraham which are most important for Old Testament theology. That this narrative is not a mere supplement to the other, but an independent whole, appears most plainly in the story of the flood, where two distinct accounts have certainly been interwoven by a third hand. 2. Many of the finest stories in Genesis, especially great part of the history of Joseph, agree with the Elohim document in the name of God, but are widely divergent in other respects. Since the researches of Hupfeld, a third author, belonging to northern Israel, and specially interested in the ancestors of the northern tribes, is generally postulated for these sections. His literary individuality is, in truth, sharply marked, though the limits of his contributions to the Pentateuch are obscure.

Proposals Withdrawn.

NORDBOFF, VENTURA CO.,
CAL., Sept. 10, 1877.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Please say to your readers that change of circumstances, want of timely action, and my increasing feebleness, with the advice of the only friend that has come to help on the undertaking of a Liberal settlement, has induced me to withdraw my proposition as expressed in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 23, 1876, and the Investigator of April 18, 1877. Indeed, there seems to be little disposition or endeavor amongst Liberals to crystallize their principles in unity of action by bringing up their sons and daughters to properly fill the places of parents dead and gone. Thus the future looks dark, but to the future it must be left. ABRAHAM BRONSON.

Mr. Babcock Adviseth Us.

ST. JOHN, MICH., Aug. 21, 1877.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have no desire that you shall go to Hell, but must say that in my opinion you are traveling in that direction at a rapid pace!

In your "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion," why do you charge so many ministers with having been too familiar with the ewe-lambs of their flocks, and in what way do you propose to remedy the evil? Surely, you would not favor making eunuchs of all the young men who engage in the ministry! God has expressly forbidden that class of persons from entering into the congregation of the Lord (Deut. xxiii, 1), besides, if the law would allow you to do so, you in correcting one evil would bring upon us a greater evil, by depriving our clergy of all spirit, which is so necessary, in order that a sermon may take hold of a wicked congregation. Our clergymen of to-day are well fed, and brimful of "spirit"; and, if I may be permitted to make use of the divine language of God's Holy Book, "They are as fed horses in the morning, every one neighing after his neighbor's wife" (Jer. v, 8). There are some good ministers, and some that are not so good, but you cannot help the matter by parading them before the people. Many of them, like old King David, are men after God's own heart. Without question, Mr. Beecher is of that kind, "except in the matter of Elizabeth."

God commands that we "shall not eat of anything that dieth of itself," but he tells us to "sell it" (Deut. xiv, 21). But our law says if we sell that which is unfit to eat, we shall go to prison, and thereby many are prevented from obeying God's law who otherwise would be glad to do so. God commands that "a witch shall be put to death" (Ex. xxii, 18; Lev. xx, 27), and it is lucky for you and I, Mr. Bennett, that our Christian ancestors obeyed God's commands with such godly zeal that to-day not a single witch can be found throughout the whole land; and it is estimated that in all not less than 100,000 witches in the form of human beings have been tortured and put to death by ministers and Christians, who pointed to the Bible as their authority. Only think how terrible it would be if we of to-day had to be pinched by some old hag of a witch! But, thank God, our fathers have obeyed God's command, and may they now rest in glory!

The Bible has cleared the country of every witch, and still you would have us think it has done no good. The fact is, you are an unbeliever, Mr. Bennett. You ought to associate more with believers. If you do not know them when you see them, Jesus tells you how they may be distinguished. He says, "And by these signs shall ye know them: in my name shall they cast out devils, they shall take up serpents, and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them, they shall lay their hands on the sick and they shall recover" (Mark xvi, 16-19). If you have any doubts as to a man's being a genuine believer in the Bible, God, Christ and the Holy Ghost, all you have to do is to try him.

Gems of Thought.

THE prison is shut night and day, yet it is always full; the temples are always open, and yet you find no one in them.

DEATH is but a valet, who, after a hard ride through bog and mud, takes off our dirty garments, and clothes us in purple and fine linen.—Anon.

PEOPLE are commonly so employed in pointing out faults in those before them as to forget that some one behind may at the same time be descanting on their own.—Anon.

LET me ask, Who died in the most fear, the man who like Jesus exclaims, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me," or Voltaire who peacefully and quietly bade his servant farewell? The question is not who died right, but who lived right. I look upon death as the most unimportant moment in life, and that not half of the responsibility is attached to dying as to living properly.—Ingersoll.

ON it rolls—not only the great globe itself, but the life which stirs and hums on its surface, enveloping it like an atmosphere; on it rolls; and the vastest tumult that may take place among its inhabitants can no more make itself seen and heard above the general stir and hum of life, than Chimborazo or the loftiest Himalaya can lift its peak into space above the atmosphere. On—on it rolls; and the strong arm of the united race could not turn from its course one planetary mote of the myriads that swim in space; no shriek of passion, nor shrill song of joy, sent up from a group of nations or a continent, could attain the ear of the eternal silence, as she sits throned among the stars. Death is less dreary than life in this view—a view which at times, perhaps, presents itself to every mind, but which speedily vanishes before the faith of those who, with the heart, believe that they are not the accidents of fate, but the children of Nature, the kind and provident mother of all.—Harriet Martineau.

THIS earth is as a table book, and men are the notes; the first are washed out that new may be written. They who fore-went us did leave a room for us; and should we grieve to do the same to those who come after us? Who, being suffered to see the exquisite rarities of an antiquary's cabinet is grieved that the curtain be drawn, and to give place to new pilgrims? And when we have been shown all the amazing wonders of our various frame should we take it to heart that the time hath come to dislodge? This is the unalterable and inevitable decree of the Universe: as we had no part of our will in our entrance into this life, we should not presume to any in our leaving it, but soberly learn to will that which of necessity is; and reverencing the Universe, not repine at its order and laws, which always were and always are so perfectly established, that who would essay to correct and amend any of them, he should either make them worse, or desire things beyond the level of possibility.—Wm. Drummond.

MEN that look no farther than their outsides, think health an appurtenance unto life, and quarrel with their constitutions for being sick; but I that have examined the parts of man, and know upon what tender filaments that fabric hangs, do wonder that we are not always so; and considering the thousand doors that lead to death, do rejoice that we can die but once. It is not only the mischief of diseases, and villainy of poisons, that make an end of us; we vainly accuse the fury of guns, and the new inventions of death; it is in the power of every hand to destroy us, and we are beholden unto every one we meet he doth not kill us. There is, therefore, but one comfort left, that though it be in the power of the weakest arm to take away life, it is not in the strongest to deprive us of death. Certainly there is no happiness within this circle of flesh, nor is it in the optics of those eyes to behold felicity; the first day of our jubilee is death. We are happier with death than we should have been without it. There is no misery but in himself, where there is no end of misery; and so, indeed, in his own sense, the stoic is in the right. He forgets that he can die who complains of misery! We are in the power of no calamity while death is in our own.—Sir Thomas Browne.

LET us affront and reprimand the smooth mediocrity and squalid contentment of the times, and hurl in the face of custom, and trade, and office, the fact which is the upshot of all history, that there is a great responsible Thinker and Actor moving wherever moves a man; that a true man belongs to no other time or place, but is the centre of things. Where he is, there is nature. He measures you, and all men, and all events. You are constrained to accept his standard. Ordinarily, everybody in society reminds us of somewhat else, or of some other person. Character, reality, reminds you of nothing else. It takes place of the whole creation. The man must be so much that he must make all circumstances indifferent—put all means into the shade. This all great men are, and do: Every true man is a cause, a country, and an age; requires infinite spaces, and numbers, and time fully to accomplish his thought; and posterity seems to follow his steps as a procession. A man like Caesar is born, and for ages after we have a Roman Empire. Christ is born, and millions of minds so grow and cleave to his genius, that he is confounded with virtue and the possible of a man. An institution is the lengthened shadow of one man; as the Reformation of Luther; Quakerism of Fox; Methodism of Wesley; Abolition of Clarkson. Scipio, Milton called "the height of Rome"; and all history resolves itself very easily into the biography of a few stout and earnest men.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

"WHAT'S the use of all this sacrifice of human life—this bloody butchery of Turks and Russians?" said a Philadelphia Quaker to a Cincinnati hog-merchant. "I don't know," replied the latter, mournfully, "pork isn't riz any that I can see."

"WHY is this called Jacob's ladder?" asked a charming woman, as he and she were going up the steepest portion of the Mount Washington railroad. "Because," she replied, with a look that emphasized his words, "there are angels ascending and descending occasionally." He squeezed her hand.

A PERSON who was recently called into court for the purpose of proving the correctness of a surgeon's bill, was asked by the lawyer whether the doctor did not make several visits after the patient was out of danger. "No," replied the witness, "I considered the patient in danger so long as the doctor continued his visits."

THE telephone may be well enough as a musical disseminator, but what the country needs is the invention of some sort of musical conductor which may be applied to hand-organs and tin-pan pianos in such a manner as to conduct the "music" noiselessly off and dump it in some out-of-the-way place, where it will not become offensive.

WE don't understand why it is that a constable with a search-warrant, looking for whiskey in a temperance town, can search for five days and never get a smell, while a dry and thirsty man in the same town steps out of his office, walks briskly away, and in three minutes is seen emerging from an adjacent alley, wiping his perspiring mouth with his cuffs.

Notes and Clippings.

THE village priests in Russia read to their flocks every Sunday official despatches from the seat of war.

ONE of the curious kinds of carnivorous plants attracts insects by its aroma, suffocates them by exhaling carbonic acid gas and then digests them.

THERE are five born sisters in a Canadian convent, all of them professed nuns, and they have contributed their combined fortunes, amounting to $500,000, to the treasury of the nunnery.

ACCORDING to the latest news from London, the Government has granted Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant the writ of error for which they applied, and it is therefore considered probable that the verdict against them will be set aside.

"This little affair places him high upon the roll as a most unmitigated, external, internal, and infernal cuss," said Deacon Brower, in a church meeting in Trigg county, Ky. The allusion was to the pastor, who had turned his wife out of doors.

A BALTIMORE lawyer sued his minister for a fee of fifty dollars for legal services, and the jury found that he was worthy of his hire. The clergyman testified that he consulted him as a friend and member of his congregation, and that he did not expect to be charged for it.

If two-thirds of the savings banks, life insurance companies, and trust fund institutions, now calling themselves by such fancy epithets as Safety, Security, Fidelity, and Hope, would change their titles to Risk, Doubt, Fraud, and Smash, the names would be more appropriate.

A MEMBER of the Methodist Church, Superintendent of the Sunday-school, member of the Temple of Honor, and Vice President of the Little Tin Cup Temperance Society, has embezzled his employer. There will soon have to be a change in the style of Sunday-school library narratives.

DESPATCHES from Lourdes are printed every day in the Paris Union with such headings as "Three more miracles before midday," "Six more cures effected," and "Four new cases," and then follow the names and addresses of those represented as cured, and descriptions of their ailments. But there is no hope for the poor Pope.

THE following epitaph is said to be on a tomb-stone in a certain English cemetery:

"Here lies the bones of Johnny Konkupod;
Deal gently with him gracious God,
He would with you if he were God
And you were Johnny Konkupod."

THE Rev. Joseph Whittemore, M.D., ex-pastor of the Free-will Baptist church of Mitchell, Iowa, was charged with making improper advances towards a Mrs. Cummings, a sister in the same church and wife of Deacon George Cummings. He was arrested, tried and fined fifty dollars and costs, but he still retains his connection with the church and counts himself one of the faithful.

THE Baptists of Boston are in a snarl over the affairs of Pastor Pentecost and the Warren Street Church. His offense and that of the church is that they have extended the hospitality of the communion table to others than Baptists. Dr. Pentecost has offered his resignation, but his people have expressed their unwillingness to accept it, and say they will stand by him and fight the thing out. The contest promises to be an extraordinary one, and will be both bitter and protracted.

THE Rev. Darling R. Philip alias the Rev. D. Rowland, as he was known in Richmond, Va., has come to grief in Hackensack, N. J. He has been compelled to step down and out after his case was looked into by the dignitaries of the church. The charges against him, are being a fraud, making false representations, assuming a false name, forging papers, preaching stolen sermons, but more especially for the grave offense of making improper advances to Mrs. A. B. Foote and other ladies, one of whom was the daughter of an old sea captain who recently died. Thus they go.

A PIOUS FORGER.—Wm. C. Gilman, a very exemplary young Christian and prominent member of Dr. Houghton's church, who was reared by a pious father under the most rigid religious influences, has proved himself a consummate scoundrel. He has been guilty of enormous forgeries, accomplished by raising certificates of stock, etc. It is thought the aggregate amount of his rascally transactions which are being brought to light will reach the appalling sum of $500,000. Many banks and brokers of the city will suffer heavily by him. He has absconded. There is nothing like a pious education to give a young man.

THE Baltimore Mirror (Catholic) says: "The (Protestant) religious press is no better than the political press. It is ten times worse. For square and persistent lying the preacher-editor distances competition." Slowly but surely Christianity is humanizing its teachers. They only call each other liars now. Two short centuries ago they would have religiously roasted each other over a slow fire. Two short centuries hence they will only make faces at each other perhaps, or politely wave their hands at each other—with their thumb on the tip of their Holy Roman nose. Oh, how these Christians do "love one another"! so to speak.

THE Roman Gazette della Capitale says the question of the marriage of priests has been under consideration at the Vatican. It further says that the party which favors the marriage of priests is by no means small, and even counts among its members very many of the upper as well as of the lower clergy. But among them there is a difference of opinion. Shall there be given permission to marry, or shall it be made obligatory to do so? Some incline to the latter, saying that a married parish priest is the strongest guarantee of morality. But there are many others who oppose such a decision. If the question is decided at all, it will be in the sense of permission to marry.

THE Sunday Democrat (Catholic) says: "The celibacy of the priest is more fruitful than the happiest unions, for it allows him to touch wounds which parsons dare not probe, and, by keeping watch and guard over the sanctity of marriage, he insures its honor and vitality." Just so. Let a word or two be changed; 'twill read as well: "The celibacy of the roue is more fruitful than the happiest unions."—his field of usefulness is larger—"for it allows him to touch wounds which parsons dare not probe,"—inflicted by an injured husband, perhaps—"and, by keeping watch and guard over the sanctity of marriage,"—keeping watch for the husband's departure and guarding against a surprise on his return—"he insures its honor and vitality"—particularly its vitality.

A WOMAN was threatened with expulsion from the Baptist church in Rutland, Vt., for immorality. She thought she had repented, and she did not see why being put on probation would not answer all the requirements of discipline. Finding that the deacons did not take this view, she threatened to make an exposure of one of the deacons. This seemed to work against her in the minds of the deacons, and they reported that she should be expelled. Thereupon, on the report having been made, one of the deacons, who was present with his wife, passed a letter to the pastor. If a lighted bomb had fallen amid the assembly, the commotion which followed the reading could not have been greater, for the letter contained a full confession of crimes. He was, on his own request, expelled. So was the woman.

ANOTHER Sunday-school has added its name to the list of those who are willing to be one of a thousand to contribute $30 apiece to pay the $30,000 debt of the American Home Missionary Society. Now only 998 more Sunday-schools remain to be heard from. A wicked and obtuse little Sunday-school boy, on being asked his views about the school to which he belonged subscribing $30 toward this fund, said: "I don't see what business those old fellows had to run in debt and then come to us young ones and try to make us pay it." Viewed from the boy's standpoint, these sentiments seem eminently correct. Probably the old gentlemen who manage our religious and soul-saving work will hardly look at it as the boy does. The boy's remark, however, suggests a query as to why the managers of any of these religious operations should allow themselves to run in debt at all.

PHILADELPHIA clergymen are exultant over the downfall of Morton, and say that it is a just judgment on the man for his audacity in opening the Exhibition on Sunday. They have as yet made no declaration as to the judgments of Divine Providence on the holders of the Market-street railroad stock, which fell from 150 to 60. As many of these holders were widows, orphans, and other folks who had nothing more to do with the street car company than to ride in the cars on Sundays and other days, just as the clergymen and all other people do, it would be interesting to have some of these learned gentlemen disentangle their providential judgments and see what sins have been visited with Divine indignation, and what have not. It is a well-known fact that the street cars of Philadelphia are crowded on Sundays with devout church goers; and it may be interesting to many people to know that a large proportion of the attendants on meetings which were held by Moody and Sankey in that city rode in Morton's cars to the doors of the building at Thirteenth and Market both on Sundays and during the week.

THE Welsh Methodists, in their annual convention in Wales, resolved on a day of intercession in all their churches "on behalf of fine weather, the cessation of the Turko-Russian war, and the alleviation of the Indian famine." God ought to be ashamed of himself to mismanage this little universe as he evidently does, judging from the prayers of his people. He appears to run the concern in the interest of the devil. What he evidently needs is a few clergymen of all creeds at his elbow to prevent his making so many blunders. A republican form of government should be tried in heaven, with all the latest improvements, including civil service reform. A first-class cabinet could be organized, say Rev. Winslow as Secretary of the Treasury, Beecher, with his "true inwardness," as Secretary of the Interior, Glendinning as Secretary of the Navy, McGhee as Secretary of the State (prison), and Comstock as Postmaster-General. Then what a harmonious Senate could be made of such material as St. Paul, Brigham Young, Luther, Torquemada, Calvin, Mohammed and a few of the popes. God should give the clergy a chance to run the government of the world, with the Bible, Koran, Vedas, etc., as law-books.

AN INTERESTING YOUNG CLERGYMAN.—The Rev. Alfred Thompson of the Free Methodist Church of Elgin, Ill., was placed in one of the cells of the Gregory street, Jersey City, police station last Monday evening. In June he was given leave of absence by his congregation to take a trip to Europe. He told his wife and family that he could not stand the expense of taking them with him, and they remained behind. On the return trip in August last he made the acquaintance on board the steamship of Mrs. Cobham, a pretty brunette. She told him she had deserted her husband, and was going back to New York to remain for a while. The young clergyman volunteered to be her companion, and on arriving in New York they registered at the West Side Hotel in West street as husband and wife. There they remained until Sunday, and then he informed his companion that he intended to start for Chicago, where his family were awaiting his arrival. Mrs. Cobham would have made no objection to his going, but on searching her trunk in the evening she missed her gold watch, chain, two sets of jewelry, several gold trinkets, and eleven English sovereigns. She suspected Thompson at once, and made every effort to have him captured. She was instructed to watch the depots of the Pennsylvania and Erie Railways in Jersey City, and Monday, with Detective Francis, she kept up a vigil at the Pennsylvania Railroad depot, and scanned the passengers for the western bound train as they walked to the cars. Meanwhile Officer Bowe saw a stranger answering the description of young Thompson walk into Lamb's exchange office in Exchange place, and offer in exchange a second class ticket for Chicago for a first-class ticket. He surmised that the stranger was Thompson, and addressing him by name, escorted him to the depot, where he was identified, and thence to the police station. Thompson did not deny taking Mrs. Cobham's valuables, but says that they were freely tendered for acts of friendship. He is a young man of pleasing address, rather good looking, and was dressed neatly in dark clothing.

Events of the Week.

WE have had another week of pleasant fall weather.

GRANT is still being lionized in England. He seems to stand it well.

A $75,000 fire visited Indianapolis, destroying a block of four-story buildings.

A LARGE fire occurred in Putnam, Conn. The better part of the village was destroyed. Loss, $200,000.

At a fire in Larabee's Point, Vt., several buildings were burnt and five tons of gunpowder exploded, creating great havoc.

THE Rev. Hubbard Minter eloped from Nelson, Ky., with a girl fourteen years of age, leaving his wife and children in want.

FRANK's celebrated chromo-lithographic establishment in Boston, filled with valuable pictures of all kinds, has been burned. Loss, $100,000.

A DISASTROUS fire visited Providence, R. I. It was near the center of the business portion of the city, and raged for two or three hours. Several large business houses were burned out. Loss estimated at $750,000.

MRS. SARAH A. MERKLE, of 46 Barrow street, came to sudden death by taking a dose of extract of belladonna, supposing it to be dandelion. It was bought for dandelion at Schiffelin's wholesale drug house. It was a mistake of one of the clerks.

INTELLIGENCE comes again that one million of poor, unfortunate people in India are dying of starvation. The famine is fearful, and before relief can reach them hundreds of thousands more must die. A terrible picture to contemplate! How can a kind Providence view it with indifference?

At the recent Republican Convention, held at Rochester, Senator Conkling and his friends took ground in opposition to the administration on the question of the Civil Service, etc., and strong speeches were made on either side. Conkling exhibited superior management and executive ability, and carried the day triumphantly by a vote of 295 to 100.

A DISASTROUS conflagration occurred in this city, corner of avenue B and Fourteenth street, early on the morning of the 3d inst. A very large building, the lower part of which was used for stables, was consumed. Eight hundred horses that were in the stables were fortunately saved, but nearly one hundred cars and a large amount of hay and feed were destroyed. The loss is very heavy.

THERE has been a lull at the seat of the Eastern war. Heavy rains have made the mud so deep that the armies move with difficulty. Both sides have been re-inforced, re-victualled, and rejuvenated, and heavy fighting may soon be expected in the vicinity of Plevna. As we go to press dispatches are received to the effect that another heavy battle has come off before Plevna, but the report is not fully credited.

A DESPATCH has been received from the Rio Grande that 600 men with two Gatling guns have crossed over into Mexican territory to extricate Lieut. Bullis from his dangerous position. 1,000 Mexicans are said to be under arms in the vicinity. It will by no means be strange, if complications arise which will lead to a war between the two Republics. The administration is accused in some quarters of wishing for this result to take place.

THE signs of returning prosperity in trade are numerous. More dry-goods, groceries, hardware, clothing, etc., were sold in this city in September than has been done before in the same month for ten years. Southern and Western merchants are here in large numbers, and their purchases have been liberal. The hotels have been full, the streets are crowded with trucks conveying goods, and the railroads are doing more than they have done for years. Western produce is pouring into the Eastern markets to the full capacity of the freight lines. It looks now as though a very large amount of business will be transacted in the next months. The country can probably a season of prosperity.

BY HUDSON TUTTLE.
CHAPTER VI.

Outside of the spurious works, further removed from the genuine, were a host of others forged by heretics to support peculiar doctrines, and so plainly indicating their origin as to cause no discussion. Cyril (three hundred and forty-eight years after Christ) endorsed fourteen Epistles of Paul, and Athanasius accepted the Wisdom of Solomon, the Wisdom of Sirach, Esther, Judith, Tobit, the Doctrines of the Apostles, and the Shepherds.

The decisions of the Councils winnowed the vast accumulation of writings. The assembled priests assumed the right of condemnation, and exercised it most unsparingly. Those writings only were accepted as divine which expressed the views of the majority of the Council; but as the Councils were composed of different members whose opinions varied, the decisions of one often reversed those of the others, and books now regarded as of vital importance, for centuries oscillated between canonical and apocryphal.

Having learned by this brief outline the origin of the Bible, the wholly human means of its inception, we ask if the transmission of this holy compilation has been through pure and uncontaminated channels. If the Scriptures are inspired, and contain knowledge man in no other manner can acquire, their value entirely depends on their absolute purity. It is not only essential that they be revealed, but also transmitted uncontaminated.

The Hebrew, in which the greater portion of the Old Testament is written, is the oldest or first developed of the Semitic languages, and its decline had set in when the later prophets wrote. After the exile it ceased to be spoken, and was familiar only to the learned, becoming virtually a dead language. Here is the cause of the veneration for the old books. They were written in a language understood only by the priests, who thus became necessary to interpret their hidden meaning to the people. Those who have studied modern languages of the same family as their own, and have attempted to perfectly translate ideas from one to the other, will appreciate the task of translating this oldest of written tongues. The spirit of the words has wings, and no power can retain it. The difficulty here is augmented by the scantiness of explanatory materials. The Rabbins were not agreed two thousand years ago on the meaning of important passages, yet their traditions are relied on by one school as of great importance, while held in contempt by another.

The old versions have been employed to gain a meaning of the original Hebrew, as well as the Alexandrian, Syriac, Arabic of Rabbi Saadia, Gaon, Vulgate, and Chaldee paraphrases. Not understanding the original Hebrew, the expounder would learn how to correctly translate from the translations made into Greek, Arabic, Syriac, Chaldee, and Latin. If these earlier translators were not inspired equally with the original penman, what surety is there of their freedom from error, or that they express the word of God?

The Alexandrian version, or Septuagint, is of unknown origin, Eichhorn and others having incontestably proved the story of the seventy-two learned Jews producing it at the instance of Demetrius Phalereus a fable. It was not only used by the Greeks, but by the Jews themselves, until in combats with the Christians they were compelled to retreat to the original Hebrew, and finding the version incorrect, began to detest it.

Aquila, in the beginning of the second century, made a literal translation into Greek, which the Jews preferred to the Septuagint. Some of the early Fathers accuse him of falsifying to overthrow the testimony respecting Christ, but others quote him without remark when his text applies to their doctrines better than the Septuagint. The dissatisfaction with the latter version appears from the numerous others constantly being made, for even then the greatest difficulty was experienced in obtaining the real significance of the Hebrew words and phrases. Origen attempted to show the errors by publishing various esteemed versions in parallel columns, to find his labor result in a most fearful corruption of the text. Careless and designing copyists misplaced the names of the versions, omitted or misplaced the critical marks, and passages from other Greek versions, written in the margin, were copied into the body of the work.

This corrupt text reacted on the Septuagint, revisions of which were made with a liberal hand by successive copyists, until it became almost equally corrupt. Lucian and Hesychius, three hundred and eleven years after Christ, wrote a corrected copy, which was considered as the best authority by Jerome, from whom we learn that among the various churches the different editions of the Septuagint were in use. He wrote: "The common edition is different in different places the world over. . . . It is corrupted everywhere to meet the views of the place and time, or the caprice of the transcribers."

Of the Latin versions from the Greek text, Augustine says they cannot be counted. These had become more corrupt than the Greek. Jerome says: "For the most part, among the Latins there are as many different Bibles as copies of the Bible; for every man has added or subtracted according to his own caprice, as he saw fit." He was so disgusted with this sacrilegious transcription that he undertook a Latin version direct from the Hebrew. It met with great opposition at first, but came into general use, and shared the fate of its predecessors in becoming corrupted by the carelessness or design of transcribers.

How easily this was accomplished cannot be comprehended in this age of printed books, when a thousand or ten thousand copies are printed exactly alike. As all the various translations were used, students would write on the margins of their copies corresponding passages and extracts from other versions, and erase and correct when they thought errors had been made. In transcribing, the zealous believer interpolated or blended passages, omitted or inserted words, often to explain or to adapt the passage to singing. Even pillars of the Church, in order to sustain their dogmas, erased or inserted passages to uphold their doctrines. Those who re-transcribed often placed the marginal notes in the body of the work, or re-corrected from other manuscripts they believed more correct.

The Vulgate having thus become exceedingly corrupt, in 803 Charlemagne appointed Alcuin to correct it, and ordered the reception of his copy.

In the eleventh century, Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, undertook a new revision; and in the twelfth, Cardinal Nicolaus applied himself to the never-accomplished task. Bacon repeatedly testifies to the failure to improve the corrupted text. The translators and expounders were all human.

With the discovery of printing and the unprecedented multiplication of copies, the necessity of a correct text became of utmost consequence. The Council of Trent at once silenced, in a manner peculiar to infallible power, all discussion by declaring that the Vulgate should be held authentic—the Church furnishing the text—and all private editions should have no authority. At that time, in this same Church-established text, Isidore Clarius pointed out eighty thousand errors. To crown this most stupendous imposition, the Pope, as infallible head of the Church, undertook to furnish the authentic edition both of the Old and New Testaments, which were published as infallible, and to add to or extract from which was pronounced a crime.

After this brief review, in the light of history, what is the evidence of the genuineness of the Bible? The Old Testament was written we know not when or by whom. It is the fragments of literature of an insignificant people, written in a dead language, the key to which is lost. Its translation two thousand years ago was extremely difficult. The New Testament was written at the close of the first and during the second century. Its authors are unknown. Its compilation was accomplished by a most singular method. The divine character of its books was determined by human reason, which rejected and destroyed all those books in any way opposed to the orthodox faith. Thus obtained, the text was corrupted by ignorance, carelessness or design, until—whether Latin, Greek, or Hebrew—it became concealed beneath the accumulated rubbish. From this source the modern translations were made.

Protestantism has worked its way back to the Jewish canon and the Greek, thus illuminating, as it asserts, the errors of translation and transcription; but this is more apparent than real, as the text was corrupted in the original beyond all critical power to renovate. This Catholicism acknowledged, and by a decision of one of its Councils (Trent) declared the Latin Vulgate the absolute Scriptures, which if any one despise, "let him be accursed." The Catholic bows in acquiescence to the Council; the Protestant points scornfully to the proven fallibility of the Councils, and is assured they have no right to issue such a decree. Yet this decree of the majority in Council is the basis on which the New Testament rests its claims to inspiration.

First there were miscellaneous writings read for instruction, but not considered divine. After a century or more they began to be in great esteem and to be slowly collected, the dominant sect holding to those which best agreed with its doctrine, and rejecting the others as spurious. This process continued until a compilation was effected, and the party receiving it had power to decree the collection the only true and inspired writings. Who dare deny that the reception or rejection of one and all of these books, now considered as divine authority, did not rest on human judgment? Is it possible that a direct revelation from God would be subject to such test or accompanied with such obscurity? If God should make a revelation, it would come indisputable as the sun of morning, and no holy father, pious priest, or bigoted Council be called on to decide which portions should be retained or rejected. This conclusion follows as a logical necessity. If the early Fathers or the Catholic Councils had power to determine the true from the erroneous, every man now has the same power and the granted right to revoke the decisions of all his predecessors. History reveals the human origin of the books themselves, and exposes the superstition and arrogance of those who collected them, and compelled the acknowledgment of the divine character of their work. They were simply men, often ignorant, always prejudiced by their religion, and the only right they had to sit in judgment was their own conceited bigotry. The whole world is open to every human soul, and none have the right to foreclose their opportunity.

J. P. Mendum "Unreliable."

"Permit me again to warn the reader that Infidel writers are not always reliable. . . . He (Mendum) also continues to circulate Macnaught on Inspiration, after the author has reconsidered and repudiated the position maintained in that book. My authority for saying Mr. Macnaught has given up those views are Dr. H. E. Thomas, Pittsburg, Pa., and Dr. Wm. M. Taylor, of New York—both formerly of Liverpool, near Everton, where Mr. Macnaught resided for many years."—G. H. HUMPHREY, in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Possibly Mr. Mendum has not incidentally met with Dr. Taylor or Dr. Thomas, and therefore could not be expected to know what they have to say about Macnaught; and it is possible under the circumstances that Mr. Mendum may nevertheless be reliable. It is worthy of note also that these reverend doctors are both retained advocates of Christianity, and therefore their testimony concerning it cannot be regarded other than as slightly "unreliable." But suppose it true that Macnaught "repudiated the position maintained in that book"—so did Galileo "repudiate the position maintained in his book," that the earth has a diurnal motion and a motion round the sun. He was earnestly persuaded to change his opinions, but it was only the fogot that led him to repudiate. There may have been some small fogots prepared for Macnaught which led him to "repudiate." But as Galileo did not change the solar system by repudiating, neither has Macnaught altered the inexorable truths of his book on Inspiration by "giving up those views." His work is unanswerable; for had it not been unanswerable he himself would have answered it. But he did not, and unless this change of mind came over him like a death-bed repentance, he must certainly have made the attempt to give his better views. It is evident, therefore, that the charge against Mr. Mendum is silly and absurd. Galileo could not repudiate the solar system; the father cannot repudiate his son and by the act change the de facto relations of parent and child; and no more can an author repudiate his works in any sense which will make it "unreliable" in those who attribute them to him. Macnaught on Inspiration is unanswered and unanswerable, and perhaps that is what is the matter with Brother Humphrey.

W. S. BELL.

New Bedford, Mass.

Colonel Ingersoll's Review of his Reviewers.

Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll delivered the following address in reply to his critics, in the Grand Opera House, San Francisco. Every portion of the house except the upper gallery was filled, fully three hundred persons being seated on the stage. At the lowest estimate there were 2,800 persons present who listened to the lecture. The Colonel made his appearance a few moments after eight o'clock, and, after introducing his subject, continued speaking uninterruptedly until twenty minutes of eleven o'clock. His eloquent remarks were listened to with the profoundest attention, which was only disturbed by frequent bursts of applause when the lecturer was particularly earnest, or by occasional hisses when he excoriated the holders of the sentiments which he condemns. He began by stating that the object of his lecture was to reply to some of the aspersions of the pulpit and press. He claimed that he represented in part the glorious and holy cause of intellectual liberty, a cause too holy to be touched or smirched and defiled by any single person. What he had said he dared say, because he believed it would make men more just, the father more tender, the mother more loving, the child more affectionate, and the rose bloom in the pathway of every human being.

"What have I said?" asked the lecturer vehemently. "What has been my offense? I have been spoken of as if I were a wolf that was endeavoring to devour the entire fold of sheep in the absence of the shepherd." He repeated his definition of human liberty as laid down in his lecture on the "Liberty of Man, Woman and Child," and asseverated that he believed in Liberty, Fraternity and Equality, and all that that glorious trinity involved and insured. He believed in the trinity of Observation, Reason and Science; the trinity of Man, Woman and Child; the trinity of Love, Joy and Hope; and thought that every man has a right to think for himself, and no other man has the right to debar him of this privilege by torture, by social ostracism, or any of the numerous other expedients resorted to by the enemies of advancement. He asked: "Does God wish the lip worship of a slave? a sneak? of the man that dares not reason? If I were the infinite God, I would rather have the worship of one good man of brains than of a world of such men. I am told that I am in danger of everlasting fire, and that I shall burn forever in hell. I tell you, my friends, if I were going to hell to-night I would take an overcoat with me. Do not tell me that the eternal future of a man may depend on his belief. I deny it. That a man should be punished for having come to an honest conclusion, the honest production of his brain; that an honest conclusion should be deemed a crime and so declared, is an infamous, monstrous assertion, and I would rather go to hell than to keep the company of a god who would damn his child for an honest belief."

"Next I 'preached' that a woman was the equal of man, entitled to everything that he is entitled to, to be his partner, and to be cherished and respected because she is the weaker, to be treated as a splendid flower. I said that man should not be cross to her, but fill the house that she is in with such joy that it would burst out at the window. I have said that matrimony is the holiest of sacraments, and I have said that the Bible took woman up thousands of years ago and handed her down to man as a slave, and I have said that the Bible is a barbarous book for teaching that she is a slave, and I repeat it, and will prove later what I have said. I have pleaded for the right of man, of wife, and of the little child; I have said we can govern children by love and affection; I have asked for tender treatment for the child of crime; I have asked mothers to cease beating their children and take them to their hearts; and for this I am denounced by the religious press and men in the pulpits as a demon and a monster of heresy, who should be driven out from among you as an unclean thing."

"But I should not complain. Only a few years ago I should have been compelled to look at my denouncers through flame and smoke; but they dare not treat me so now or they would. One hundred years ago I should have been burned for claiming the right of reason; fifty years ago I should have been imprisoned and my wife and children would have been torn away from me, and twenty-five years ago I could not have made a living in the United States in my profession—the law. But I live now and can see through it all, and all is light. I delivered another lecture, on "Ghosts," in which I sought to show that man had been controlled in the past by phantoms created by his own imagination; in which the pencil of fear had drawn pictures for him on the canvas of superstition, and tha-men had groveled in the dirt before their own superstitious creations. I endeavored to show that man had received nothing from these ghosts but hatred, blood, ignorance and unhappiness, and that they had filled our world with woe and tears. This is what I endeavored to show—no more. Now every one has as much right to differ with me as I with them, but it does not make the slightest difference for the purpose of argument whether I am a good man or a bad, whether I am ugly or handsome—although I would not object to resting my case on that issue; the only thing to be considered and discussed is, is what I have said true, or is it untrue?

"Now, I said that the Bible came from the ghosts, and that they gave us the doctrine of immortality of the soul, which I deny. Now, the immortality of the soul, if there is such a thing, is a fact, and therefore no book could make it. If I am immortal, I am; if not, no book can make me so. The doctrine of immortality is based in the hope of the human heart, and is not derived from any book or a creed. It has its origin in the ebb and flow of the human affections, and will continue as long as affection, and is the rainbow in the sky of hope. It does not depend on a book, on ghosts, or superstition of any kind; it is a flower of the human heart. I did say that these ghosts, or the book, taught that human slavery was right, that most monstrous of all crimes, that makes miserable the victim and debases the master, for a slave can have all the virtues while the master can not. I did say that it riveted the chains upon the oppressed, and that it counseled the robbing of that most precious of all boons—Liberty. I add that the book upheld all this, that it sustained and sanctified the institution of human slavery. I did also assert that this same book, which my critics claim was inspired by God, inculcated the doctrine of witchcraft, for which people, through its teachings, were hanged and burned for bringing disease upon the regal persons of kings, and for sousing beer. I did say that this book upheld that most infamous of all infamies, polygamy, and that it did not teach political liberty or religious toleration, but political slavery and the most wretched intolerance. I did try to prove that these ghosts knew less than nothing about medicine, politics, legislation, astronomy, geology and astrology, but I am also aware that in saying these things I have done what my censors think I ought not to have done. But the victor ought not to feel malice, and I shall have none. As soon as I had said all these things, some gentlemen felt called upon to answer them, which they had a right to do. Now, I like fairness, am enamored with it, probably because I get so little of it. I can say a great many mean things, for I have read all the religious papers, and I ought to be able to account for every motive in a mean manner after that, but I will not.

"The first gentleman whom I shall call your attention to is the Rev. Dr. Woodbridge. It seems that when I delivered my lectures the conclusion was come to that 'that man does not believe in anything but matter and force—that man does not believe in spirit.' Why not? If by spirit you mean that which thinks, I am one of them myself. If you mean by spirit that which hopes and reasons and loves and aspires, why, then, I am a believer in spirits; but whatever spirit there is in this Universe I will take my oath is a natural product and not super-imposed upon this world. All I will say is that whatever is, is natural, and there is as much goodness in my judgment, as much spirit here in this world as in any other, and you are just as near the heart of the Universe here as you ever can be. But, they say, 'There is matter and force, and there is force and there is spirit.' Well, what of it? There is no matter without force. What would keep it together unless there was force? Can you imagine matter without force? Honor bright, can you conceive of force without matter? And what is spirit? They say spirit is the first thing that ever was. It seems to me sometimes as though spirit was the blossom and the fruit of all, and not the commencement. But they say spirit was first. What would that spirit do? No force—no matter—a spirit living in an infinite vacuum without side, edge or bottom. This spirit created the world; and if this spirit did, there must have been a time when it commenced to create, and back of that an eternity spent in absolute idleness. Can a spirit exist without matter or without force? I honestly say I do not know what matter is, what force is, what spirit is; but if you mean by matter anything that I can touch, or by force anything that we can overcome, then I believe in them. If you mean by spirit anything that can think and love, I believe in spirits.

[CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

Extract from Victor Hugo.

You, Catholics, claim the liberty to instruct. For some centuries you have held in your hands, at your discretion, at your school, under your ferule, two great nations—Italy and Spain, illustrious among the illustrious; and what have you done with them? I am going to tell you. Thanks to you, Italy, of which no one can think nor even pronounce her name without inexpressible filial grief—Italy, that mother of genius and of nations, which has diffused over the whole world the most astonishing productions of poetry and art—Italy, which has taught our race to read, does not to-day know how to read herself! Yes, Italy has, of all the States of Europe, the smallest number of native inhabitants who are able to read! Spain, magnificently endowed Spain, which received from the Romans her first civilization, from the Arabians her second civilization, from Providence, and in spite of you, a world, America; Spain has lost, thanks to you, thanks to your brutal yoke, which is a yoke of degradation, Spain has lost the secret of her power which she received from the Romans—that genius in the arts which she received from the Arabs—that which God gave her. And in exchange for all that you have made her lose, what has she received? She has received the Inquisition! The Inquisition, which has burned upon the funeral pyre five millions of men! Read History! The Inquisition, which exhumed the dead in order to burn them as heretics. The Inquisition, which declares children heretics even to the second generation. See what you have done with that focus of light which you call Italy! You have extinguished it. That colossus which you call Spain, you have undermined. The one is in ruins, the other is in ashes. See what you have done for these two great nations?

STREATOR, ILL., Sept. 25, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT: I see that Mr. Humphrey, in his "final letter" to you, quotes the oft quoted, but mistranslated passage in Deut. vi, 4, to prove that the Jews were monotheistic in their religion. The literal translation of this famous verse is: "Hear, O Israel, the Lord (Jahveh) of our Gods (Elohim) is one Lord (Jahveh)," and this is the true rendering. The learned gentleman says Elohim is what "the grammarians call the plural of majesty," that is to say: it is singular, because it is plural. Another reason why it is singular is because "it is always used with singular verbs." This is a mistake; there are numerous instances to the contrary. In Gen. xxxv, 7 will be found one. Other instances might be named, but it is unnecessary.

More anciently than our common Hebrew text, Elohim seems to have been used with the plural verb, for Fuerst (Heb. Lex. p. 94) says "the very ancient use of the plural Elohim for God is frequent, because the ancients conceived of the Deity as an aggregate of many forces." "At a later period, however, the construction with the plural was avoided as polytheistic." Ah! here was the motive—to avoid "the polytheistic," and cheat the people, a most worthy idea, doubtless, in the estimation of the worthy Rev. G. H. Humphrey. The thief, however, seldom covers his tracks so completely as to get off undetected. With this explanation of the great Hebraist Fuerst, the learned Rev. Humphrey is welcome to the full benefit of his assertion that "Elohim is always used with singular verbs." Doubtless he will feel proud of it.

Elohim is the plural of Eloh. This latter, says Fuerst, "is synonymous with El, of which it is obviously a farther development" (ibid). He fails, however, to inform us what this "farther development" is. Education and preconceived notions prevented him from reaching the truth. "Eloh" is obviously a compound of two syllables—El and oh. "El," as stated by Gesenius (Heb. Lex. p. 49), is a participle of al—"to roll up, to twist," and "hence a ram from his twisted horns" (ibid. p. 22). Fuerst (Heb. Lex. p. 91) defines "el"—a "ram," and we actually find "elim," its plural, translated "rams" in Job xlii, 8. "Oh," by a rule in Heb., may be converted back to jah (whence it was derived that Eloh might more euphonically take on the plural termination—im), an abbreviation of Jahveh, or, as some write, Jehovah, a word the LXX render by Kurios, the adjective of Kuros, which, dropping the Greek termination "os," is the Persian "expression for the sun" (Fuerst, p. 702). Eloh, is therefore literally in English—RAM-SUN.

Thus have we arrived by a scientific process, every step of which is sanctioned by well-known and approved authorities, at the conclusion that Eloh is, when put in plain English, equivalent to Ram-sun. Let us still go on, bearing in mind with Reason, "that the great sign that we have attained the truth, is success in combining the texts so as to constitute a logical, probable, concordant narrative." As there is no Ram to join to or come in conjunction with the Sun but Aries, we must conclude that Aries is the Ram meant. His conjunction with the Sun takes place in the spring as the Earth reaches Libra. His apposition, or disjunction, happens six months later, when the positions of Earth and Sun are reversed. Instead of the Elohim of summer, the cold El parted from the Sun by the intervention of the Earth, makes his appearance. This was the God (el) poor Job said he should have denied (Job. 31, 28). But why the plural—Elohim? Because the conjunction lasting while Aries and the Sun are on the same side of the Earth, there must be as many Elohim as there are days during the "Creation"—Summer.

"The Lord" (Jehveh), Fuerst says, "was especially revealed for the older El Shaddai" (Heb. Lex. p. 550). The word "shaddai" is the plural of "shad," the "breast of a woman" (ibid. p. 1344), and is another "plural of majesty" (Ges. p. 1037). "El Shaddai, therefore, is literally the 'Ram of the breasts,' or Aries during summer. El Shaddai—Lord—Jahveh—Summer. Therefore, 'Hear, O Israel: 'The Lord (Summer) of our Gods (summer days) is one Lord (Summer),' is the correct translation.

Take another example: "The Lord God of Israel is from everlasting to everlasting" (Ps. xli, 13). This passage has been badly dealt by. "Qlam," translated "everlasting," is from a verb which signifies "to hide, to conceal." Besides, it is preceded, or rather prefixed, by the article "he"—the. The contraction, then, is "the hiding;" and as the Sun (—the Lord, as proven above), to the people of the north temperate zone, seems to hide himself south of the equator in winter, it is very likely "the hiding" referred to winter. The true rendering, therefore, would seem to be: The Lord (summer) of the Gods (Ram-suns) of Israel, is from "the hiding to the hiding," i.e., is from winter to winter—is Summer!

Again: "The Lord (Jahveh) said unto my Lord (Adoni), sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool" (Ps. cx, 1). The word here translated "sit" has no such meaning. It does not denote rest, but constant motion, or change of place, (see Parkhurst, Gesenius, and Fuerst). Nor does "neum" mean "said" as translated, but "murmuring or whispering" as the gentle zephyrs of summer. The meaning of this verse is, giving it a free translation: The Lord (Summer) whispered by its gentle breezes to Adoni (winter), "revolve" to my right hand, while in my turn, I pass away, and thus make myself, thy enemy, thy footstool.

In his recent review of The Science of the Bible, Charles Bradlaugh, of the National Reformer, London, don't exactly see that "G D in one language and God or its equivalent in another, each originally meaning something different," "precisely from evidence that the one is derived from the other." This, he thinks is too much for "one who claims to be a Hebrew scholar." The gentleman is mistaken. I affirmed, and still adhere to my opinion, that "God" is a Hebrew word—a synonym of Elohim. In "Types of Mankind, p. 561, the writer, speaking of the double account in Genesis, says: "The more salient characteristics distinguishing the two documents are, the words ELOHIM in King James' version replaced by 'God;' and JeHOuaH, for which our appellative 'Lord' is substituted; neither of these Hebrew divine names being translated." Nott and Gliddon claimed to understand Hebrew.

Perhaps Mr. H. cannot see how the "o" got between the "G D." If so, he is not an adept in Hebrew. However, if he will but correct his misstatement, I will submit to his ridicule, as, if that were argument, Charles Darwin would have died long ago. Respectfully,

M. WOOLLEY.

Book Notice.

THE MARTYRDOM OF JESUS OF NAZARETH. By Isaac M. Wise. Cincinnati, O. Price $1.00. The author of this little work, an octavo of 134 pages, is a Liberal Jew, and he criticises the New Testament, especially that portion of it relating to the trial and death of Jesus, from a Liberal standpoint. He differs somewhat from Strauss, Renan and other writers, in his opinions, but he explains those differences by the fact that all passages from the ancient rabbinical literature quoted in this work were translated from the originals by himself, and are therefore less liable to be erroneous. Dr. Wise claims to have overcome all prejudice of education and association, and to treat of his subject in a purely objective manner, but nevertheless there is a little vein of bitterness towards Christianity running through the work, which is to be expected under the circumstances.

He handles the Vicarious Atonement doctrine with much vigor. "Among all the myths and tales ever told by the Heathens, Jews or Turks, to base religious doctrines upon them, none has ever been so egregious and pregnant of horror and slaughter as the mythical base of the doctrine of vicarious atonement. . . . If the redemption and salvation of mankind depended upon the martyrdom of Jesus of Nazareth, and God at that particular time had decreed to save the family of man by that peculiar arrangement, then it was a dire necessity that somebody must kill Jesus. So one or more people had to become criminals in order to save the human family; or, in other words, God could not save his creatures otherwise except by the condemnation of some. We will not inquire into God's right or wisdom to make such an arrangement; we will merely say, that this precedent gives us the right to seduce one portion of the human family to crime in order to benefit the other. Every sound reasoner must reject this doctrine as immoral; yet it is maintained to be correct in religion; or, in other words, God may be immoral, man must be moral—i. e., man must be better than his God."

Though his English is somewhat faulty, his ideas are clearly expressed, and his points are well made. For the endeavor to reconcile Christian theology with modern science—though he does not accept Darwinism—he has the heartiest contempt. It must be one or the other, science or theology; it can never be science and theology. They can never assimilate; to mix them would be to lose both. One is pure knowledge, the other is pure nonsense, and the farther apart they are kept, the purer they will remain.

In summing up, he says: "The martyrdom of Jesus of Nazareth has been gratefully acknowledged by his disciples whose lives he saved by the sacrifice of his own, and by their friends who would have fallen by the score had he not prevented the rebellions ripe at Jerusalem. Posterity, infatuated with pagan apotheosis; made of that simple martyrdom a big bubble colored with the myths of resurrection and ascension to that very heaven the telescope has got out of man's way. The simple fact has been made the foundation of a novel myth to suit the gross conceptions of ex-heathens. Modern theology, understanding well enough that the myth cannot be saved, seeks refuge in the greatness and self-denial of the man who died for an idea. Thousands, tens of thousands, of Jews, Christians, Mohammedans, and Heathens, have died for ideas, and some of them were very foolish. But Jesus did not die for an idea. He never advanced anything new to die for. He was not accused of saying or teaching anything original. Nobody has ever been able to discover anything new and original in the gospels. He died to save the lives of his friends, and this is much more meritorious, in our estimation, than if he had died for a questionable idea. But then the whole fabric of vicarious atonement is demolished—which reason does anyhow—and modern theology can not get over the absurdity that the Almighty Lord of the Universe, the infinite and eternal Cause of all causes, had to kill some innocent fellow in order to be reconciled to the human being. However abstractly they speculate and subtilize, there is always an undigested bone of man-god, god-man, and vicarious atonement in the theological stomach. Therefore theology appears so ridiculous in the eyes of modern philosophy. The theological speculation cannot go far enough to hold pace with modern astronomy. However nicely the idea may be dressed, the great God of the immense Universe looks too small upon the cross of Calvary."

There was a time when the present race of man was without civilization, without literature, and without religion. Man, at that early period, was but a slight remove from the animal kingdom, from which, possibly, he had evolved; and he was without knowledge or skill, and almost without language and intelligence. He lived in caves or holes that he found or dug in the earth. He had not sufficient intelligence to construct dwellings for himself nor to manufacture clothing to protect him from the scorching rays of the summer sun or the biting frosts and winter's storms. He associated on terms of equality with animals both stronger and weaker than himself, and he struggled with them for the food necessary to sustain life and supply the natural wants of his system. He fled from those stronger animals that sought his life, and preyed upon those that he was able to slay or subdue.

From this primitive era of man's infancy and helplessness he emerged very slowly. His wants compelled him to seek for food and to use means to protect himself from the elements that disturbed him. Having a brain superior to the lower animals, he gradually obtained a mastery over them. He was able to fashion from stones, the limbs of trees, and the bones of animals, such crude implements as he needed to slay the beasts he used for food, and ultimately to dig a little in the ground to plant such seeds as he learned were useful for food, and that he was able to cultivate.

It is probable that the language spoken by man at that remote period was of a very crude and imperfect character, containing but few words or sounds, which served to convey his wishes to his fellows around him. As he spread over the surface of the earth, the forms of language were more or less modified, and different dialects or tongues gradually came into use.

How long ago it was that man stood no higher in the scale of existence than is here indicated, it is impossible to decide with any accuracy; but facts enough have been learned to enable us to determine with approximate correctness that man has lived on the earth more than one hundred thousand years, and probably many hundred thousand years. The science of geology has thrown much light upon this interesting subject. In the strata of rocks which form the crust of the earth, footprints of human beings have been found, and portions of human bones have been discovered, and at such a depth below the present surface of the earth as to render it certain that man lived on this globe many, many thousand years ago. Human bones have also been found imbedded under drift or accumulated earth which, by the action of rivers and streams of water, has been conveyed into caverns where human beings once were buried, and where their bones are found side by side with the bones of mammoths, woolly elephants, cave-lions, cave-bears, cave-hyenas, and other animals which have not been known on the earth for thousands of years. Caverns of this character have been found in various parts of the earth, but one specially in mind is in Brixham, on the south coast of Devonshire, England, which was discovered some twenty years ago. The floor is of stalagmite formation, that is, produced by the slow dropping of water from limestone overhead, the water evaporating, leaving the lime to harden back into stone again. This formation was a foot in thickness, and in it were found the bones of the reindeer and the cave-bear, while below it was a deposit of at least fifteen feet of a loamy mass of earth, in which were found flint flakes or knives used by primitive man, with other implements of stone, which had been shaped and fashioned by the hand of man. In that loam were also found the bones of the mammoth, all of which must have lain there many thousands of years. Below the bed of loam was a stratum of gravel more than twenty feet in thickness, in which again were found the implements of stone, arrow-heads, etc., which had been wrought to some extent by the hand of man during the Stone Age, when they knew nothing of metal, and rubbed the hardest stones into the form of knives, spears, axes, etc. In this gravel were also found the bones of animals long since extinct, as well as human bones. The flakes of flint were known to have been chipped off and finished up by the hand of man, and he had lived at the time the animals lived which many centuries ago disappeared from the earth, whose bones were found imbedded under that stratum of gravel and loam of thirty-five feet. The animals to which those bones once belonged either died in the cavern or upon the neighboring hill-sides, and the bones washed into the cavern by the action of water. This element has been an active and powerful agent in changing the surface of our globe. The gravel and loam overlying the bones and flint instruments found in Brixham cavern, I repeat, were washed in there by water, and since the era when that was accomplished, that valley has been cut down by the slow action of water one hundred feet lower than the cavern. Now the speed with which the beds of rivers are cut away by the ever-running streams can be pretty accurately calculated. The river Thames, flowing at its present rate, takes 11,470 years to scoop out its valley one foot in depth. At this rate it can easily be understood that it must have required one hundred thousand years for the river flowing through Devonshire to cut that valley down to the depth of one hundred feet.

That man lived on the earth one hundred thousand years ago is proved in various ways. Human fossils are found embedded in rocks belonging to the quarternary class or formation, which geologists prove could not have formed the surface of the earth less than a thousand centuries ago. The stone implements of the character alluded to, and which could only have been shaped by the hand of man, together with human bones, have been found in various caves and caverns, imbedded under a stalagmite formation of such thickness, that by the slow accumulation from dripping lime water must have required the great length of time named to accumulate. The time necessary to cut away miles of solid rock by the action of a river, as in the case of our own Niagara river from Lewiston to the falls, and many other similar instances afford incontestable proofs of the great antiquity of our globe, but which we have hardly time to take under consideration now.

There are very strong evidences that our own portion of the globe—the Western Continent—was a habitable land and was peopled by men long before Europe, Asia, or Africa. Sir Charles Lyell, the eminent geologist, found at the falls of the Ohio, near Louisville, at a low stage of water, a grand display of what he termed an ancient coral reef, formed by zoophytes which flourished in a sea of an earlier date than the carboniferous period, when, he says, "The Alps and their related mountains, and even the Himalayas, were not yet born, for they have on their high summits deep sea beds of the cretaceous period and even of a later date." This fact proves that the country about the falls of Ohio was an old country before Asia emerged from the vast depths of Old Ocean. The coral formations on the Ohio must have taken place in the tertiary period, while the upper crust of the tops of mountains in Asia are of the momulitic formation which accumulated during the cretaceous period, the carboniferous period and mesozoic age intervening between the Devonian and tertiary periods, giving America a much greater age than Asia. There are other strong proofs of the great age of our own Continent which there will now be no time to consider.

That America was once inhabited by a vast and prosperous people the ruins of many cities, together with the mounds found all over the Western country and other unmistakable indications give abundant proofs. Madame Mitchell in "Nature or Poetry of Earth and Sea," pp. 191-3, gives this beautiful and graphic description of the ruins of what she terms an ancient city in Nebraska: "The great image of the deserted city is to be found in the New World, in the midst of the prairies of the Far West; it is gradually disappearing with the bison, the sole relic of a powerful race which merited a better fate. Ruins with ruins; there, over an immense area of North America stretches an infinity of herbage, where the horizon is only defined by the curvature of the earth. Suddenly, without any warning, the ground sinks—descends into an immense cinque, two hundred feet in depth. All vegetation dies; the soil has the whiteness of snow, or the dull gray of feeble, ruinous stones, except where the iron lends them its rich tawny color. Such is the scene of the Manoises Terre, the deserts of Nebraska. One might rather call it a dead city, twenty leagues long by fifteen broad. From the prairie the traveler sees beneath tens of thousands of rocks like columns, capped with pyramids. These towers, two hundred feet in height, prevent him from wandering in the narrow passages of labyrinths, which resemble the irregular streets and wynds of some Medieval city. At a distance from these columns resemble massive monuments, to which neither flying buttress, nor turret, nor vaulted portico, nor facades, nor slender pinnacles are wanting. If you descend into the deserted city, whither a colonnade of two hundred feet high conducts you, the illusion gives way to the reality and the magic picture disappears. But in its place is something far more prodigious. You find yourself in a field of tombs; and what? Not of bison, wolves, bears, the present denizens of the savannah; but a sight never seen elsewhere. All the beasts belonging to the eocene formation of the tertiary period, the progenitors of the Siberian mammoth and the mighty mastodon. What a revelation! These bones are a witness that Young America, which aged Asia, from the crest of her Himalayas, looked upon as her daughter, is by many ages the elder! When this antique fauna was pasturing on the prairies, a part of the Old World was sleeping beneath the waters; when the Himalayas and the Alps arose, these guests of the Antique world were already buried, having supplied the age which could furnish them with sufficient land."

Dr. Koch found in the Osage Valley in Missouri the skeleton of the mastodon, and the same is now in the British Museum. He found near the bones flint arrow-heads, a stone spear and some stone axes. The probability is that the aborigines killed the huge beast where they found him mired in the soft earth. Similar bones of mastodons have been found in other localities in Missouri, and other States. In Benton county, Mo., in 1840, stone arrowheads were discovered together with the bones of an entire skeleton of a mastodon. They were found in a layer of vegetable mould, which was covered twenty feet in thickness with alternate layers of sandstone clay, and gravel. One of the arrowheads lay underneath the thigh-bone of the skeleton, the bone actually resting in contact with it, showing that it could not have been brought there after the deposit of the bone. On Petit Anse Island, Vermillion Bay, La., a piece of basket-work was found two feet below the remains of an elephant and fourteen feet below the surface. Numerous other instances may be cited where bones of animals have been found in this country which for thousands of years have been extinct upon this continent. The proof is also clear that a race of beings lived here when those animals were alive. In White, Warren, and Montgomery counties, Tenn., cemeteries have been discovered in which 100,000 skeletons of a pigmy race were buried, which, when living, could not have been more than three feet in height. That race must long since have passed entirely away. The Ruins in Central America afford ample proofs of the existence of an ancient people that probably many thousand years ago passed off the stage of life. They were a people skilled in sculpture, architecture, and drawing. In almost impenetrable depths of the forests in Central America are found these remarkable ruins of what were once rich and populous cities—how long ago or how they became depopulated is very difficult to decide.

Great Jehovah, while we have under consideration the book called thy "revealed word," allow us to make a few more inquiries concerning it.

Is it not quite proper that we should examine it critically and obtain all the information about it possible? If it teaches that which is not for the best good of mankind, have we not just grounds for doubting its infallibility, and its emanation from the source of all truth and excellence?

In point of literary excellence does it surpass all other books that men have written? Are its narratives any better told, is its history any more correct, is its philosophy any deeper, its poetry any finer, or its morals any more sound than are found in other books in the world?

In the sacred writings of the Hindoos, the ancient Persians, Chinese, Egyptians, and other nationalities, is there not quite as much voluminousness, quite as much spirituality, quite as much philosophy, quite as much poetical imagery, quite as much purity, and far less of obscenity, far less of vulgarity, far less of war, carnage and bloodshed, than is found in thy book?

In point of antiquity does it not fall far short of what has been achieved by men in other directions? Were not the cuneiform inscriptions of the ancient Assyrians and the inhabitants of Nineveh—brought to light and interpreted within the last few years by the two noted Englishmen, George Smith and General Rawlinson—executed long before thy book was written?

In those cuneiform inscriptions, are not the sources found from whence the Jewish writers obtained the idea of the cosmogony embraced in thy book?

Were not the legends of the creation of the world, of the formation of man and woman, of the temptation and fall, of the great flood of waters which came upon the earth, inscribed in those arrow-head shaped characters long before thy book was written? Did not thy people become familiar with those ancient Assyrian legends and fables during the time of their Babylonian captivity, and did they not carry back those same legends when they returned to their own country?

Did not other Asiatic nations have traditions about an Adam and Eve, or Adama and Hava, which were regarded by them as the parents of the human race, and of a part of it occupying a certain portion of the earth?

Do not the hieroglyphics of Egypt, which were inscribed upon their ancient temples, obelisks, and pyramids possess a far greater antiquity than does thy revealed volume?

Is it not true that the two forms of written language, the cuneiform of Assyria and the picture writing of Egypt, were used thousands of years before an alphabet was brought into use?

As the Hebrew was written with an alphabet, does it not follow that the Bible was written at a much later date than the arrow-head inscriptions of Nineveh or the hieroglyphics of Egypt?

Is there any proof that any part of the Bible—save perhaps the Gentile book of Job—was written at an earlier date than 700 B.C.?

Does it not appear from thy word that thy written law was not in the possession of thy people until the priest Hilkiah, in the reign of King Josiah, claimed to have found it in the temple?

When the same was read to the King, did it not produce consternation, showing that it had before been wholly unknown?

Was it not quite possible that the priest Hilkiah and his scribes could have gotten up certain manuscripts and called them thy law, and in that character have passed them off upon the King? Has not a similar game been played many times?

When thy people were held seventy years in captivity in Babylon, did they not lose their sacred writings, and when they returned to their own land, were they not under the necessity of getting them up again?

Is not the account of how it was done given in 2 Esdras xiv, how he drank a cupful of something of the color of fire, which made wisdom to grow in his breast and caused his heart to utter understanding, and his mouth was opened and shut no more? How five men, receiving understanding, wrote visions of the night that were told them; how for forty days they wrote in the day and at night they ate bread, and that during that time they wrote two hundred and four books? Are we to understand that such was the process by which thy book was gotten up?

Were not some of the books of the Old Testament written as late as the time of the Maccabees, 250 B. C.?

As many of the prophets are regarded as being the oldest books in the Bible is it not a little singular that neither of them mention the name of Moses? Had they known that he was for forty years in daily communication with thee talking with thee often face to face, checking thee when thou wert too inconsiderate and hasty and advising thee as to the most proper course to pursue, that he received thy holy law from Sinai and transferred it to parchment, would they not at least have mentioned his name?

Does not this fact, combined with others, go far to confirm the belief that many entertain, that Moses never had a real existence and that like Menes of Egypt, Minos of Greece he was a copy of the ancient Menu of India?

Is it not true that the greater portion of the books of the Old Testament were written after the return of the Jews from their captivity, and were not many of the historical narratives given in them new drafts upon a fertile imagination?

Did not those who returned from Babylon feel the necessity of having a national history and a national religion and having learned much of the Chaldeans, was it not easy for talented priests to get up those books and invent the details therein contained? Would it be any more remarkable than the production of the thousands of other works of fiction which men have written?

When we come down to the New Testament, is it not equally true, that neither thy son nor any of his disciples, the apostles, wrote one of the books therein contained?

Did not nearly two centuries pass away from the commencement of the present era before it was known to any of the early Christian fathers that either of the New Testament books was in existence?

Was not the Christian Father Irenæus near the close of the second century the first who mentioned the existence of either of the four gospels, and was he not fully capable of writing them?

For three or four centuries was it not a source of great contention among the dignitaries of the Church to decide which of the numerous gospels and epistles that were floating about among the believers, equally claiming to be authentic and inspired documents, were genuine, and which spurious?

Were not several councils of bishops and priests called together during the third, fourth and fifth centuries to decide which of the many books that had been written should be accepted as true and which should be discarded?

During these councils did not the most bitter contentions arise and did they not quarrel and fight in the most outrageous manner at times—even to the taking of life—disgracing themselves and the cause they attempted to serve?

When one council had decided what books should be regarded as genuine did not succeeding councils set their decision aside, expunging certain books they had admitted and accepting others which had been discarded?

Were those contentious bishops and priests really a class of men fitted to decide which writings were sent from heaven and which not?

Was there really any proof that the accepted manuscripts were of divine origin any more than those rejected?

Was there the slightest proof that either was of divine origin? Were they not all written by men; did they not all contain the imperfections common to the works of men?

Did they not contain narratives of certain events that had transpired, or was claimed to have transpired, and were they not detailed in the style that men in that age of the world gave their narratives? And were not the letters and epistles written in much the same style that others have written epistles at various periods?

Was there any thing in the style or matter of those writings beyond the power of man to perform? And is it not absurd to ascribe them to a supernatural source or causes when natural causes were at hand and sufficient to produce all that was accomplished?

Is there not enough in the uncertain authorship, the vagueness as to the time when the books were written, the mediocre character of the literary talent displayed in their production, the hundreds of positive contradictions they contain, the crudeness and vulgarity which in many parts is so conspicuous, the great want of truthful and scientific knowledge of the simplest operations of nature everywhere evinced, the unmistakeable indications of human workmanship at all times apparent, and unskilled at that, to make sensible people honestly doubt that the book is the work of an all wise God or that it is of heavenly origin? Are they not quite correct in assigning it the realm of human productions?

MR. E. H. HEYWOOD'S "Anti-Death Convention meets in Boston, Sunday and Monday, Oct. 14th and 15th and will hold three sessions per day. It is announced that good test mediums will show that the supposed dead still live and that prophets will explain how both soul and body are destroyed in the hell of established sin." Those who are curious to see how well these promises are fulfilled will of course be on hand at the time named.

Defaming a Dead Man.

That religious paper, the New York Observer, of Sept. 27th, has an article of nearly three columns and a half of slander and dirty abuse of Thomas Paine, made up of extracts from Grant Thorburn and several members of the Christian clergy, to prove that Paine led a drunken, "beastly life," and died a "beastly death." The article is filled with villainous falsehoods, and is wholly unworthy of gentlemen, whether Christians or heathens. It is a mere relash of the old lies and slanders which have been retailed by bigoted pious defamers for the past seventy years. The animus of the article may be gathered from its heading, "Tom Paine's Life and Death." Those shouters for Jesus always delight in nicknaming the object of their vindictive hatred "Tom" Paine. By doing so they seem to think they show either argument or ability. From the services Paine rendered this country in its struggle for freedom he is certainly entitled to be treated with common decency. What does it amount to if by the falsehood of a few enemies it can be proved that Paine, a few times in old age, was noticed to be under the influence of ardent spirits. Did a Christian never show a fondness for ardent spirits? If Paine did drink too much, does that prove that his reasoning or his positions were false, and that the system of Christianity in not made up of myths, legends, and fables borrowed or stolen from the older pagan systems? We pronounce the slanders in the Observer utterly and basely false, as can be easily shown from irrefutable evidence. We presume Col. Ingersoll will reply to the contemptible article alluded to, as it is published in response to his challenge to the Observer, but if he does not, we will ourselves undertake to show up its falsehoods and meanness.

How to Write a Letter.

1. If you can't write legibly, get some one who can to write for you.
 2. Write the name of your state, and then, directly underneath, the name of the post-office to which you wish reply or matter directed—but it is unnecessary to give the county unless your Post Office be some new or obscure one, and actually necessary to secure prompt carriage.
 3. Briefly and distinctly state, in the tersest business way, just what you want, then be sure and sign your name.
 4. If you have any communication or inquiries to make, use another sheet of paper.
 5. In sending in subscription money, state whether it be for renewal or for new names.
 6. In changing address, always state the post-office from which you wish it changed as well as the one to which it is to be sent.
 7. In remitting for any sum more than one dollar, send by draft, money order, or registered letter.
 8. Do not enclose the most ragged and worn out script you can pick up, and which you cannot pass at home.
- If our patrons were aware how much time and peace of mind a compliance with the above suggestions would save us they would cut them out, paste them in their memorandums, and consult them every letter they write hereafter. They will appreciate the propriety of our making them when we state that we now have on hand a box of unintelligible letters, some of them not indicating how the money enclosed is to be applied, some without any date or name of post-office, and several without any date, address, or any signature.

MR. CYRUS R. TEED, of Moravia, Cayuga Co., N. Y., from the efforts he is making appears very anxious to meet a foe man worthy of his steel, who will enter with him into a theological controversy upon the subjects of the Bible and Christianity, in a seven day's discussion to be held at the locality above named, beginning on the 12th inst. We hope he may be accommodated, and that it may please some person able to defend the truth to spend seven days in discussion with him. If, however, he should fail in his wishes, and no one offers to meet him, we freely tender him our humble services, and space in our columns to prove the divinity of the Bible and the truth of Christianity. We will grant him every alternate week three columns in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and on the intervening weeks we will use the same amount of space in replying to his arguments. We will not only continue the discussion seven days but seven months if necessary. Let the pious gentleman understand that there is one Infidel at least who will meet him in a fair discussion of his pet creeds, and who will also print and lay before an audience of 25,000 readers what he is able to say in defense of his Bible and his revered system of Christianity.

WE HAVE been sending out postal cards to those in arrears, stating the amount of indebtedness and requesting that the amount be forwarded at once. We hope our friends will not let this appeal pass unnoticed. Three fourths of the year is gone and it is certainly time every patron had renewed. We are needing the money or we would say nothing about it. We cannot help regretting that so large a number of our friends insist upon our waiting so long for our money. If prompt payments were made by all hands it would be vastly better for us. The sum we ask for the paper is not so immense as to necessitate the holding back in remitting month after month. Those who do not wish to take the paper and pay for it are requested to inform us. Of course they cannot object to paying for the time it has been sent to them.

By THE time this issue reaches our subscribers, "The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion will be ready to send out to patrons. Several have ordered a dozen copies to begin with, believing that they can sell many more. These orders will be filled at the earliest possible moment, as well orders for a single copy. It will undoubtedly be a good work to sell, and ought to be a splendid campaign document to do effective mission work. As it is a faithful exposition of both sides of the questions of Christianity and Infidelity, it ought to sell well both to those who believe and those who disbelieve. Its low price is also greatly in its favor. Those who wish to buy to sell again will be allowed a liberal discount. Every good salesman or saleswoman can easily sell a dozen volumes. Let the orders roll in.

DR. SARA B. CHASE AT SCIENCE HALL.—This accomplished lady delivered a lecture before the Manhattan Liberal Club, on Friday evening 28th ult. Her reputation as a lecturer and medical practitioner secured a large and appreciative audience. Her subject was Homeopathy, and was treated in such a thoroughly scientific and masterly manner as served to make the usual attempted criticisms, at the close nearly a failure. The Dr. has given particular attention to elocutionary training, and her style as a speaker is seldom excelled. Her course of physiological lectures to gentlemen commenced, in Cooper Institute, on Wednesday evening 26th ult., and will be continued every week during the winter.

It is with deep regret that we announce the death, by pneumonia, of Dr. R. T. Trall, Florence Heights, N. J., Sept. 23d, at the age of about sixty-five years. He had been for many years the champion of the Hydropathic school, and wrote many works on Hygiene and relative subjects, by which his race has been greatly benefited. He was a Radical and advanced thinker in various directions, and did not believe in myths and superstitions. He was a friend to his race, and "the world is better for his having lived."

ATTENTION is directed to the Call for the First Annual Congress of the National League to be held at Rochester, N. Y., on the 26, 27, and 28 inst. It is believed that the attendance will be large, and that it will be a very important convention to the Liberal cause. It is time that the Radicals of the country join together in taking such action in the moral, political and social arenas as will enable them to become a power in the land, effective for good and for the welfare of the entire country.

WE WOULD again announce to our readers that to new subscribers we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Spiritual Offering for the term of one year for the sum of $2.50. The Spiritual Offering is a sprightly, able, neatly-executed monthly Magazine of forty-eight pages, edited by Nettie Pease Fox, of St. Louis. The two are very cheap at $2.50. How many are there who, for this trifling sum, wish to avail themselves of a good weekly and a good monthly publication? Send in your names.

WANTED, a copy of a work entitled "Mysteries of Man, or Esoteric Anthropology." Those who have a copy to spare will please inform us of the price, etc.

JAMES S. BEDEL, of Hudson, Mich., is duly authorized to act as agent for us in taking subscriptions for the paper as well as in selling our publications.

Obituary.

Departed this life at one o'clock A. M. of Saturday, Sept. 15, 1877, at the residence of Mr. J. M. Kitchin, in North Vassalborough, Maine, Mrs. CAROLINE P. ROBERTS, wife of Charles L. Roberts, Esq., Yates City, Ill.

She left Yates City for the East in June last, partly to visit her mother, Mrs. Kitchin, and other friends, and partly for the benefit of her health, her lungs having become affected during the past winter. But it was of no avail. Fell disease (pulmonary consumption) had too firm a hold. She was taken down suddenly the last of August, and was not able to return to her home. Deceased had a numerous acquaintance, who were all her friends (to be acquainted with her was to be her friend). She had no creed. To do good was her religion. She believed in a reunion with friends in the spirit land. She was born in Worcester, Mass., on May 4, 1837. She was married November, 1857. She leaves a family of five children to mourn her loss, the youngest of whom is four years of age.

The editor would add to the above a very sincere tribute to the worth of the deceased lady. Her modest, quiet, unassuming manners,—her unselfish devotion to the duties of a wife, a mother, and a member of society, endeared her to all who knew her. It is one of the consolations of life to feel that such a sweet nature is not lost to us. It has blest us here, and lives to bless us in "the sweet by and by." Let the sorrowing ones hope on, and imitate her virtues.—The Elmwood (Ill.) Messenger, Sept. 12, 1877.

THE practice of Religion is just like the process followed in an iron foundry. The metal, being melted, is gradually separated from the dross and drops down; so that the vessel made from the metal must needs be good. The way of wisdom is likewise a gradual process, consisting in the separation of all heart pollution, and so by perseverance reason is accomplished.—Buddha.

Boston, Sept. 25, 1877.

In obedience to the Constitution of the National Liberal League, organized at the Centennial Congress of Liberals at Philadelphia, July First to July Fourth, 1876, the Directors hereby issue a call for the FIRST ANNUAL CONGRESS of the League, to be held at Rochester, N. Y., October 26, 27, and 28, 1877. The best Hall in the city is engaged for those days. Further particulars, including list of speakers, etc., will be announced hereafter. For information respecting cheap hotel accommodation, reduced fares, etc., apply without delay to Mr. H. L. Green, Salamanca, N. Y.

After the hearing of reports and election of officers for the ensuing year, the most important business of the convention will be to decide whether the National Liberal League shall adopt a political platform and nominate candidates for the Presidential election of 1880; and, if so, whether this platform shall advocate the following principles and measures, to wit:

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, etc.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION ON THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

In order to give to this First Annual Congress of the National Liberal League the representative character befitting the gravity of the questions which will come before it for decision, the Directors suggest and earnestly recommend to the Liberals of the United States that they immediately organize themselves throughout the country in Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, each of which, on receipt of a charter, will be entitled to send its President, Secretary, and three other members as DELEGATES. A large delegate convention will certainly exert a powerful influence for good. Applications for charters, each signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, will secure them without delay. Charters are indispensable to secure the unity of organization without which efficient co-operation is impossible; but Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues remain absolutely independent, and recognize no authority in the National League to control their action in any particular. The small fee of ten dollars (which will surely be grudged by no one) is only desired in order to help defray the necessary expenses involved in the conventions and other public work of the National League, which has no salaried officers. Life-memberships of twenty-five dollars, annual memberships of one dollar, and voluntary donations, will also be gladly received for these public purposes. Time presses; and it is hoped that hundreds of new Local Liberal Leagues will be organized forthwith. Any existing Liberal society can be represented in the convention by applying for and receiving a charter in the usual way, and transmitting to the Secretary a certified copy of the following vote:

"Voted, That this society, desiring to co-operate with the National Liberal League in the furtherance of its general and specific objects, hereby declares itself a Local Auxiliary Liberal League, according to the true intent of the Constitution of said National Liberal League, and has duly elected the following persons to represent it at the next Annual Congress of the same; to wit, ————"

Persons desiring full information respecting the history, principles, and objects of the National Liberal League, in the shape of a closely printed book of 190 octavo pages, can obtain it by sending for "Equal Rights in Religion: Report of the Centennial Congress of Liberals." Price (reduced), in advance, paper covers, 75 cents; handsomely bound in cloth, $1.00.

Address the NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, 231 Washington street, Boston.

By order of the Directors of the National Liberal League.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, President.
WILLIAM H. HAMLEN, Secretary.

Organization.

LOCAL LIBERAL LEAGUES—HOW TO ORGANIZE THEM.—COUNTY FREETHOUGHT AND LIBERAL LEAGUE COMMITTEES.

MR. EDITOR: Many local Liberal Leagues are being organized these days in Central and Western New York preparatory to sending delegates to the Rochester Congress, which meets Oct. 26th, 27th and 28th. Some of them are being organized in this way: Ten, fifteen or more Liberals are invited to some private house, and there, without trouble or expense, an organization is perfected, a charter ordered, delegates elected, and as the saying is, "the child is born" with very little "labor." Any earnest Freethinker in any town where there are a few Liberals can organize a League in this manner. If some one of your readers in every town will try this experiment immediately after reading this notice, we can have three thousand delegates at the Rochester Congress. Reader, will you try it?

"FREETHOUGHT AND LIBERAL LEAGUE COMMITTEES."

In accordance with the requirements of the Freethinker's "Article of Associations" the following County Committees have been perfected; the other counties will be organized soon. These are names to be proud of.

Allegany Co.—Samuel Latta, Friendship; J. H. Clark, Selo; M. M. Tousey, Cuba.
Broome Co.—E. E. Guild, Binghamton; Jos. P. Brown, Binghamton; Abraham Van Cleave, Binghamton.

Cattaraugus Co.—A. L. Brainard, Salamanca; Frederick Larkin, Randolph; J. M. Mathewson, Perryburgh.

Errie Co.—George W. Taylor, Lawton Station; Edwin H. Stickney, Sardinia; Samuel C. Dailley, Marilla.

Genesee Co.—J. D. Richards, Batavia; A. A. Waldo, Alexander; J. W. Seaver, South Byron.
Herkimer Co.—W. J. Lewis, Ilion; George A. Kenyon, Frankfort; Benjamin Haviland, Ilion.

Orleans Co.—Henry Reynolds, Albion; Dr. Thos. Cushing, Barre Centre; C. E. Colburn, Albion.

Schuyler Co.—Capt. D. P. Day, G. C. Hubbard, John Niverson, Watkins.

Tioga Co.—O. H. P. Kinney, Waverly; Gilbert Newell, Owego; Amasa S. Mott, Waverly.

Wayne Co.—Samuel Cosad, Wolcott; Chauncey Misseiman, Lyons; Joseph Fritts, Macedon.
Yates Co.—S. S. Ball, Penn Yan; A. R. Cowing, Italy Hill; O. B. Shaw, Penn Yan.

By PROF. W. ROBERTSON SMITH, OF THE UNIVERSITY OF ABERDEEN.

It will be remembered that we have already seen that three currents of influence run through the Old Testament development—the traditional lore of the priests, the teaching of the prophets, and the religious life of the more enlightened of the people. Now, in the three main sections of the early history just enumerated we find the counterpart of each of these. The priestly narrative of the Elohist, the prophetic delineation of the Jehovist, the more picturesque and popular story of the third author, embody three tendencies, which are not merely personal but national, and which constantly reappear in other parts of Hebrew literature. Up to the book of Joshua all three run side by side. But the priestly interest found little scope in the subsequent history; and from the time of the Judges we can generally distinguish only sections marked by prophetic pragmatism, and others which, though distinctly religious and even theocratic, are, so to speak, written from a layman's standpoint. The latter comprise a large part of Judges, and by far the greatest part of Samuel, as well as the beginning of Kings. To the modern mind this part of the narrative, which is rich in color and detail, is by far the most interesting, and it is with sincere regret that we pass at 1 Kings xi to a division of the history for which the chief sources—cited as the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel and Judah respectively—treat almost exclusively of the outer political life of the nation. In striking contrast to the uniformity of this narrative are the interspersed histories of Elijah and other northern prophets. These histories are very remarkable in style and even in language; and, containing some of the noblest passages of the Old Testament, form one of many proofs of the unusual literary genius of the kingdom of Ephraim. But how are these various narratives related to each other? This question is not easy to answer. In general, the third or lay element of the history seems to stand nearest to the events recorded, and even, perhaps, to form the direct basis of the prophetic matter; while, occasionally, old lists of names and places, poetico-historical pieces and the like, form a still deeper stratum in the story (poetical pieces in the book of the wars of Jehoshaphat, Numbers xxi, 14; book of Jasher [the upright], Joshua x, 13; 2 Samuel i. Lists like 2 Samuel xxiii). Whether the same hands or only the same tendencies as appear in the non-Levitical parts of Genesis run on as far as the book of Kings, is a question which, though answered in the affirmative by Schrader and others, cannot be viewed as decided. Even the date of these elements of the Pentateuch is obscure; but, in the eighth century Hosea refers quite clearly to passages of both. Thus far there is tolerable agreement among critics; but the Levitical or Elohist history is the subject of violent controversy, which, however, turns mainly on the analysis of the Pentateuch. These contain other elements besides those already enumerated, of which we need only mention the brief code which follows the Decalogue in Exodus xx-xxiii, and the great repetition of the law in a prophetic spirit which occupies the major part of Deuteronomy. Both these codes may be called popular in tone. They are precepts not for the priests, but for the whole people; and the former is the fundamental sketch of the whole theocratic constitution, which the latter develops and to some extent alters. Now, the book of Deuteronomy presents a quite distinct type of style, which, as has been already mentioned, recurs from time to time in passages of the later books, and that in such a connection as to suggest to many critics since Graf the idea that the Deuteronomic hand is the hand of the last editor of the whole history from Genesis to Kings, or, at least, of the non-Levitical parts thereof. This conclusion is not stringent, for a good deal may be said in favor of the view that the Deuteronomic style, which is very capable of imitation, was adopted by writers of different periods. But even so it is difficult to suppose that the legislative part of Deuteronomy is as old as Moses. If the law of the kingdom in Deuteronomy xvii was known in the time of the Judges, it is impossible to comprehend Judges viii, 23, and, above all, 1 Samuel viii, 7. That the law of the high places given in this part of the Pentateuch was not acknowledged till the time of Josiah, and was not dreamed of by Samuel and Elijah, we have already seen. The Deuteronomic law is familiar to Jeremiah, the younger contemporary of Joshiah, but is referred to by no prophet of earlier date. And the whole theological standpoint of the book agrees exactly with the period of prophetic literature, and gives the highest and most spiritual view of the law, to which our Lord himself directly attaches his teaching, and which cannot be placed at the beginning of the theocratic development without making the whole history unintelligible. Beyond doubt the book is, as already hinted, a prophetic legislative programme; and if the author put his work in the mouth of Moses instead of giving it, with Ezekiel, a directly prophetic form, he did so, not in pious fraud, but simply because his object was not to give a new law, but to expound and develop Mosaic principles in relation to new needs. And as ancient writers are not accustomed to distinguish historical data from historical deductions, he naturally presents his views in dramatic form in the mouth of Moses. If, then, the Deuteronomic legislation is not earlier than the prophetic period of the eighth and seventh centuries, and, accordingly, is subsequent to the elements of the Pentateuchal history which we have seen to be known to Hosea, it is plain that the chronology of the composition of the Pentateuch may be said to centre in the question whether the Levitical-Elohist document, which embraces most of the laws in Leviticus, with large parts of Exodus and Numbers, is earlier or later than Deuteronomy. The answer to this question turns almost wholly on archaeological inquiries, for there is, perhaps, no quite conclusive reference to the Elohist record in the prophets before the Exile, or in Deuteronomy itself. And here arises the great dispute which divides critics, and makes our whole construction of the origin of the historical books uncertain. The Levitical laws give a graduated hierarchy of priests and Levites; Deuteronomy regards all Levites as at least possible priests. Round this difference, and points allied to it, the whole discussion turns. We know, mainly from Ezekiel xlii, that before the Exile the strict hierarchical law was not in force, apparently never had been in force. But can we suppose that the very idea of such a hierarchy is the latest point of liturgical development? If so, the Levitical element is the latest thing in the Pentateuch, or, in truth, in the historical series to which the Pentateuch belongs; or, on the opposite view, the hierarchic theory existed as a legal programme long before the Exile, though it was fully carried out only after Ezra. As all the more elaborate symbolic observances of the ritual law are bound up with the hierarchic ordinances, the solution of this problem has issues of the greatest importance for the theology as well as for the literary history of the Old Testament.

Ode to Death.

BY G. A. BROWN.

O Death! thou art an endless sleep.
A friendly, welcome guest;
A balm for those who hopeless weep,
A goal where all is rest.

No musty creeds beyond thy bar
Disturb our calm repose;
Thy silent realms a refuge are,
Safe refuge from our woes.

No canting priests can there intrude
And raise up bitter strife;
They cannot break thy solitude;
Their discord ends with life.

Then, unto thee, O Death, we bow,
Where thy decree shall sever
Our thread of life, and on our brow
Affix thy seal—forever.

The Dawn.

BY LUCY BRENNAN.

Arise! thou sluggard; rise with me,
To see the misty morn.
The world is wrapped in mystery,
The day is newly born.

The sky has on her pearly robe,
With vestal, bride-like hue;
O come and see her vaulted globe,
Above the glittering dew.

The air is filled with spiced incense
That quivers on my cheek;
I hold my breath, in vague suspense,
So rapt I cannot speak.

The stars go out like angel hosts
That quickly disappear—
That reveled in their nightly jousts
Until the day appears.

I rush to meet the dawn's first kiss,
As a lover does his bride;
With rapture and with speechless bliss
I greet on every side
The breathless wind the placid wave,
The glittering drops of dew—
Insatiable my soul doth crave
Each day caresses new.

O haste to hear the first glad note
That's warbled in the sky.
The strange, sweet harmony remote
Is welcomed now on high.
Come greet with joy each burst of song
That swells upon the air,
A tribute to the happy throng
In that bright, heavenly sphere.

Come from your matchless domes of art,
To greet the rose-leaf hue,
Whose blended shades will thrill your heart,
And warm upon your view.
The breeze is hushed in marble calm,
And steals the rooseate beam,
A strain from the Æolian psalm
Floats o'er you like a dream.

O come and view the magic scene,
Ye, in your attics high;
The wreathing threads of golden sheen
Are gathering in the sky.
The vapors, like a fancied dream,
Have vanished all away—
O come and see the rosy beam
That flushes the young day.

Liberal Meeting at Freeport, L. I.

An address was delivered at the above place on Sunday 30th ult., by Mr. Rawlings, who pointed out the discrepancies that existed in the four Gospels. He deprecated the idea of a personal God, or that the Bible had any supernatural origin, and while admitting that there was much beautiful reading to be found in the latter, he contended that there was also much that was contrary to reason, common sense, and even decency.

Mr. Hyatt opened with appropriate remarks. The latter as well as Mr. F. H. Molineaux, who are chiefly instrumental in getting up these meetings, deserve great credit for their exertions in the cause of Freethought. Thanks are also due to others in the neighborhood who assist; and it is to be hoped that the work will be successfully continued.

John Chinaman's Religion.

THE DECORATIONS OF A TEMPLE THE CHINESE HAVE ERECTED IN NEVADA.

The Virginia City Chronicle gives the following description of how the heathen Chinese conducts his little matters of worship:

During the past forty-eight hours the Chinese have been industriously celebrating one of their numerous heathen festivals. They have erected a building in a vacant lot in H street, and upholstered it in a most astonishing style. On both sides of the door are gigantic figures, about ten feet high, made entirely of colored paper. Each has one leg lifted in air, and they look like two Chinese gods dancing a double clog. Banners and lanterns are displayed on the walls outside, and a lot of burning punk outside suggests the conflagration of a tanyard, or a burnt offering of horse-hoof parings.

Within the temple is an altar covered with burning punk, fruit, varnished hog, incense, and little metallic gods surrounded by feathers and paper ornaments.

The walls are hung with pictures, portraying the terrors of a future punishment and the rewards of a prospective paradise. The Chinese hell was depicted by a sort of brick oven, with big folding doors, at the side of which sat the devil. Subordinate devils were driving the sinner toward the spot, and the big devil, viewing the procession with a look of satisfaction, was just reaching for his forked spear with one hand and taking the keys out of his vest pocket with the other.

Another picture represented the judgment. An immense figure sat at a big desk judging the sinners at his left, and a man in red cast them into a furnace of fire below, as a clerk at the right of the desk checked off their names in a big invoice book.

One picture represented a woman beating the devil over the head with a club, the heathen gods applauding. The joys of paradise were depicted by the Chinese artist by a number of persons sitting on clouds of glory, and gormandizing over roast pig, angels hovering above and fanning off the flies.

A number of Chinese women were in the temple with their children, showing them pictures of sinners being raked into the pits of fire, and the sawing in two of the goddess by the devils. Thus does the orthodox Chinese mother lead her offspring along the paths of righteousness, and warn the heathen kid of the wrath to come.

Is Life a Mode Of Motion?

It can be demonstrated that motion is all-pervading; that absolute rest is inconceivable, and that in whatever form motion may appear, whether as motion or as light, heat, chemical affinity, magnetism, or electricity, all are but phases of one and the same great force, Science, however, does not stop with the enunciation of this truth, but following the same pathway onward is now brought face to face with the greatest problem within the ken of human conception, the question of the nature of life itself. There is something startling and overwhelming in the recognition of the fact that perhaps the greatest scientific minds on earth are keenly pressing forward toward the resolution of this mystery, not as speculators or dogmatists, nor as metaphysical advancers of abstract hypotheses; but progressing step by step, proving and reproving, leaving no by-path unexplored, nor thread loose or weak in the wonderful fabric of facts which are slowly being interwoven. If Bastian and the believers in spontaneous generation are right, then life is the legitimate consequence of chemical affinity, for they claim to have substantiated by the clearest experimental proof that organisms in certain solutions previously free from life are due wholly to the proper chemical composition of such solutions. It is true, then life itself must stand in the same category as light and heat and other sequences of chemical affinity—it is a mode of motion into which other modes of motion are convertible, and reciprocally it would follow that life itself is transformable into other phases of the all-pervading force.—Scientific American.

OCTOBER! 'tis a doleful sound,
That smites the sinner's ear;
'Twill bring the wayward parson home,
And raise the price of beer.

"Angels."

Bob Ingersoll says: "Where there is one man living with one woman, and that man loves that woman, and that woman loves that man, there is where the angels love to sit and sing."

What angels? Surely the little curly-haired offspring of a happy union! Perhaps he does not mean that class of angels that spake to Balaam's ass. Such angels don't "sit and sing." They appear only to asses.

Col. Robert, "the angels sit and sing."
We please to praise it up and make it ring.
In all the world it is the greatest thing.
And if we do it right it is no sin.
Des Moines, Iowa, DAVID WRIGHT.

Friendly Correspondence.

M. B. LAWRENCE, Dycusburg, Ky., writes: I am delighted with the debate between you and the Rev. Humphrey. Your opponent deserves great praise for "standing up for Jesus" so manfully, while the majority of his brethren that concede castle, and pulpit. You, he and I will continue to honor our respective causes, as you have done, by treating the subjects of controversy with dignity and sincerity. The debate will make a valuable book when published.

M. B. ORANDALL, St. Catherine, Mo., writes: I have been a steady patron of your paper from its first issue at Paris, and feel like letting you know that I appreciate and fully endorse the religion taught by it. I am a young man twenty years old, striving to secure an education. And when I find that the great Ingersoll, as well as some of the most brilliant lights of the past, graduated from the log school-house, I feel encouraged in my efforts to educate myself. But there is one thing I can be, and am determined to be—and that is, a perfectly free man. I begin life hedged in by no dogmas or creeds, free to question all religions and to fight every error, and believing that persistent and long-continued labor will conquer without the help of any God or Holy Ghost.

WM. F. PORTER, Philadelphia, Pa., writes: I am highly pleased with my copy of the "Collection," and for "the life of me" cannot conceive how you can afford it so cheap. Forward me the "Champions" soon as out. I find Amberley's "Analysis" a book of rare merit, and one deserving of an immense circulation. You must be the most indefatigable worker of all our Liberal publishers. You are earning a name that will shine for generations. But few realize the good you are doing through your paper and other publications; and as knowledge becomes disseminated they will be sought after more than now. Old Theology, with the other humbugs, is fast losing ground with this generation, and must finally die out of the beliefs of men.

ROBERT FURLONG, Tomales, Cal., writes: Having read one or two copies of your paper, I am fully convinced of its merits as an advocate of Free thought and Liberalism. Believing that such a journal is worthy the support of all who entertain Liberal views, I am anxious to read more of the truths it expounds, and to see its circulation extended. Viewing it the light of progress it is gratifying to know that we have such an able champion of intellectual freedom in general circulation in the United States. It will serve greatly to enlighten the people by teaching them to think for themselves, and to more carefully examine the basis upon which rests the tottering structure of theology. Enclosed find one dollar for which please send me half a dozen copies, different numbers, of THE TRUTH SEEKER for distribution among my friends. The balance in Tracts and Leaflets, all assorted.

JOSEPH LE CLERO, Noble, Kan., writes: Paine said that tyranny, like hell, was hard to conquer; and I would add that selfishness is harder to conquer than tyranny and hell combined. Christianity to-day is dead. It is only the cement of selfishness which keeps it united as an organization. The preacher preaches for pay. His sermons are adapted to the pockets of his flock. He preaches to please his hearers, well knowing that should he attack any popular fallacy he would have but few hearers and dimes. He appeals directly to the most selfish feelings of the human heart by promises of a blissful immortality which he offers for a little faith. Faith is so cheap, and the reward so great, that it is no marvel that all the ignorantly selfish become good Christians. But it does not tend to prevent their being good rascals at the same time. Those Christians, like Rev. Humphrey, who claim their system of faith has done so much for civilization and science, puts me in mind of an old fable. It was about a fly and a span of horses drawing a heavy coach up a steep hill. The fly would light now on one and then on the other of the horses, and when they would stop it would take a drop of blood out of their flanks. After hard work the coach was drawn up the hill, the driver stopped the horses, and immediately the fly began to say, "Now let us rest! See what I have done! The coach is up the hill!"

Humphrey-Bennett Discussion.

BY G. W. HALL.

Dear Brother Bennett, I pray you be still, Good Brother Humphrey can't swallow the pill; Too much for a dose; it needs a great while To swallow this monster with such a long tail. If he were impressed with truth's shining rays, He could not contain so much even three days; Truth or a falsehood, 'twould be all the same, If doubting the source from whence the truth came.

If none are so blind as those that won't see; The labor is lost, for you will not agree; It is lost upon him if not upon others, And doubtless on all of theology's brothers. He's "joined to his idol," then why try to part Superstitious bigotry without a heart, That cares not for truth and reason or sense, From which they receive a poor recompense.

Though you have piled up a mountain of truth, Dating from present to "creation's" youth, Gathered from bibles and histories of men; Still he will doubt, contradict you, and then Doubt all the sages, even Mahomet, Turn to his idols, as dogs to their vomit, Gulping down errors, love nothing so well As the God of the Hebrews that sends men to Hell.

Keep neither lance nor sword nor any deadly weapon.

THE OUTCAST.

By WINWOOD READE, author of "Martyrdom of Man."

This is his last work. Mr. Reade was unquestionably one of the ablest writers of the present century. His "Martyrdom of Man" attracted extraordinary attention in Europe and in this country, for its ability, brilliancy and boldness. This last work is regarded with equal favor. The English edition was published at two dollars. We give it entire for THIRTY CENTS IN PAPER.

Christianity and Infidelity;

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n. Clergyman, OF NEW YORK, AND
D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers; and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on the themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion.

OPINIONS.

Quite a handsome periodical of 24 pages.—Boston Investigator.

Its views on all subjects are of the ultra-radical style, and in science and religion it veers towards the Materialistic views of Huxley and other pitiable wretches. If brains and money can make it a success, it will be successful.—Catholic Mirror, Balt.

It is the ablest organ that Radicalism ever had in this country.—Jewish Messenger.

A distinct advance on all previous skeptical papers published in America.—Secular Review, London.

I wish your journal every possible success.—Charles Darwin.

The handsomest periodical ever published in America.—A. Williams & Co., Boston, Mass.

I admire it; I esteem it; I love it; and I will help to sustain it.—Martin Hartman.

The Evolution is the best paper ever published.—Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson.

There is need of just such a paper.—Mrs. Sara A. Underwood.

PAYNE'S AGE OF REASON.

SETH WILBUR PAYNE, Editor.

The attention of the Independent Reasoners of America is called to a candidate for their favors. The first number of

PAYNE'S AGE OF REASON

will be issued on or about the

and regularly on the 15th of each month thereafter.

This much is promised, but should the support permit, it will be issued semi-monthly or even weekly, the latter being the intention of the proprietor. In either case the subscription price will remain the same.

IN QUANTITY, THE AGE OF REASON will contain sixteen pages of four wide columns each, or sixty-four columns of closely-printed matter, thus making it the largest by nearly one-half any known liberal publication.

While ITS MISSION will be to unfetter the minds of men from the dismal superstitions of the past, it will be a first-class family journal as well. It will have a variety of departments and the steady effort of its proprietor will be to make a paper that every independent reasoner and the members of his household will delight to read, pass among their friends, and loan to their church-riden and ministerially befogged neighbors. In the ORTHODOX SENSE, THE AGE OF REASON will be intensely infidel, but in the purpose of its editor it will be a fearless, fair-dealing, first-class Liberal family journal.

It is believed that every liberal-minded, truth-seeking reader can but be pleased with it, and such are respectfully solicited to give it their support.

HISTORY OF THE CONFLICT BETWEEN RELIGION AND SCIENCE. Truly one of the most valuable works that have appeared within the last ten years. By PROF. DRAPE. Price, $1.75.

Prospectus—Beyond the Veil.

POSTHUMOUS WORK OF PASCHAL BEVERLY RANDOLPH.

Through the minds and agency of Fanny H. M'Dougall and Luna Hutchinson, they having been brought together by a series of singular circumstances. Together they wrote by spirit dictation and impression, most faithfully and sincerely trying to give the true meaning of whatever was revealed, either through clairvoyant vision or otherwise, as unfolded to them by different ones in spirit life, of whom Emanuel Swedenborg was the controlling spirit of the band. Several new and beautiful revelations are given of the life beyond, embracing many subjects of deep interest, besides descriptions of the formation of Spirit Spheres, Death or Spirit Birth, the Transit, also Food, Clothing, Habitations, Employments, Amusements, Travels, Education, Oral Instruction, Asylums for the Care and Cure of the Insane and Idiotic, and much more which the table of contents will show of the twenty-two chapters the book contains.

It is believed that it will be found an entertaining and profitable book, affording pleasant thoughts and cheerful contemplations for the minds of those on this side the Veil, lessening the shadows that have so long darkly hung between this and the after-life.

Gems of Thought.

THE evil man is to be avoided, though he be arrayed in the robe of all the sciences, as we flee from the serpent, though it be adorned with the Kantha jewel.—Wasana.

ARTIFICIAL virtues that are no virtues, that make no soul wiser or better, purer or happier, take the place of manliness, intelligence, and use. Human beings meet by thousands, and cry out to deaf gods; they build sumptuous temples, and employ men to retail to them ancient fables, while they sternly reject living and important facts.—Wm. Denton.

OH, the grave! the grave! It buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment. From its peaceful bosom spring naught but fond regrets and tender recollections. Who can look down upon the grave, even of an enemy, without feeling a compunctious throb that he should ever have warred with the poor handful of dust that lies mouldering beneath him?—Washington Irving.

ALL the religions of the world forbid examination, and are not disposed that man should reason upon them; it is authority that wills they should believe in God; this God is himself founded solely upon the authority of some men, who pretend to have a knowledge of him, and to be sent to announce him to the earth. A God made by men, has, without doubt, occasion for men to make him known to men.—D'Holbach.

Do no work but the work of charity and truth.

Contract no friendship with the hope of gain. Judge not thy neighbor. Love all men equally. Perform not thy meditations in public places. Make no idols of any kind. Lend not unto usury.—Siamese Sayings.

THE worshiper never rises beyond that which he adores. His gods are his highest conception of wisdom, goodness, and power. Like a young and ardent lover, he invests his beloved deities with every adorable attribute, every desirable quality, and every admirable charm that his mind can invent or his fancy imagine. And this perfect embodiment of his highest ideal, he worships, and cannot, as a matter of course, rise higher than that ideal.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

OUT of mud springs the lotus flower; out of clay come gold and many precious things; out of oysters the pearls; the brightest silks to robe fairest forms are spun by a worm; bezoar from the bull, musk from the deer are produced; from a stick is born flame; from the jungle comes sweetest honey. As from sources of little worth come the precious things of earth, so is it with hearts that hold their fortune within. They need not lofty birth nor noble kin. Their victory is recorded.—Buddha.

BARBARITY, caprice; these qualities, however nominally disguised, we may universally observe, form the ruling character of the deity in all regular religions. Even priests, instead of correcting these depraved ideas of mankind, have often been found ready to foster and encourage them. The more tremendous the divinity is represented, the more tame and submissive do men become to his ministers; and the more unaccountable the measures of acceptance required by him, the more necessary does it become to abandon our natural reason, and yield to their ghostly guidance and direction. Thus it may be allowed, that the artifices of men aggravate our natural infirmities and follies of this kind, but never originally beget them. Their root strikes deeper into the mind, and springs from the essential and universal properties of human nature.—David Hume.

THE human mind, blinded by theology, has scarcely advanced a single step. Man's religious systems have rendered him dubious of the most demonstrable truths. Superstition influenced everything, and served to corrupt all. Philosophy, guided by it, was no longer anything more than imaginary science; it quit the real world to plunge into the ideal world of metaphysics; it neglected nature to occupy itself with gods, with spirits, and with invisible powers, which only seemed to render all questions more obscure and more complicated. In all difficulties they brought in the Divinity, and from thence things only became more and more perplexed, until nothing could be explained. Theological notions appear to have been invented only to put man's reason to flight, to confound his judgment, to deceive his mind, and overturn his clearest ideas of every science.—D'Holbach.

BLESSED is he who has found his work; let him ask no other blessedness. He has a work, a life-purpose; he has found it, and will follow it! How, as a free flowing channel, dug and torn by noble force through the sour mud-swamp of one's existence, like an ever-deepening river there, it runs and flows; draining off the sour, festering water gradually from the root of the remotest grass blade; making, instead of the pestilential swamp, a great fruitful meadow with its clear flowing stream. How blessed for the meadow itself, let the stream and its value be great or small! Labor is life; from the inmost heart of the worker rises his God-given force, the sacred celestial life-essence; from his inmost heart awakens him to all nobleness, to all knowledge, self-knowledge, and much else, so soon as work fitly begins. Knowledge! the knowledge that will hold good in working, cleave thou to that; for Nature accredits that, says yea to that. Properly thou hast no other knowledge but what thou hast got by working; the rest is yet all an hypothesis of knowledge; a thing to be argued of in schools, a thing floating in the clouds, in endless logic vortices, till we try it and fix it. Doubt, of whatever kind, can be ended by action alone.—Thomas Carlyle.

Odds and Ends.

A COLORED preacher in Chicago says of Solomon: "King Solomon he had three hundred wives and seven hundred other lady friends."

SOME rash fellow says that giving the ballot to women wouldn't amount to much, for none of them would admit that they were old enough to vote until they were too old to take any interest in politics.

A LITTLE boy having stolen a can of milk, his mother took him to task about it and inquired, "What were you going to do with the milk, any way?" "Steal a dorg to drink it," replied the depraved urchin.

A BURLINGTON preacher discoursing about Peter and Paul, a few days ago, remarked that they were a "good pair." Without opening his eyes the deacon in the first pew said: "Take the pot; ace high's all I've got."

SAID a young lady to an admirer: "Hush! beware of the torpedo." And when he asked her for an explanation, with filial unkindness she replied that it was a name she had applied to her mother because she blew people up so.

"IS HE a good doctor?" asked one gentleman of another, speaking of an acquaintance. "Well," replied the other, "people call him so; but as far as my experience goes, if I was a patriotic man, and there was going to be a long war, I should like him to have charge of the enemy's wounded."

I TALKED with a minion from Her Majesty's dominion, Says I, "Where are you going?" "To Hide a hoe," says he. Says I, "What are you going to hide a hoe for?" "I didn't say hide a hoe; I said Hide a hoe," says he. Says I, "Spell it." "I-d-a-h-o," says he. "Oh," said I "Idaho." "Yes," said he, "Hide a hoe."

"WHAT would be your notion of absent-mindedness?" asked Rufus Choate of a witness whom he was examining. "Well," said the witness, with a strong New England accent, "I should say that a man who thought he had left his watch at home, and took it out of his pocket to see if he'd got time to go back and get it, was a little absent-minded."

AN Irishman called at a printing-office one day with an advertisement and, with commendable foresight, inquired what it would cost. He was informed that for one insertion the price would be two dollars, and subsequent insertions seventy-five cents each. "Well, sur," said he, "you may give me two subsequent insertions, if you please."

A RELIGIOUS body having resolved to build a church, the pastor went about begging zealously for funds wherewith to erect it, and he accepted not only the widow's mite but the child's mite also. In the school one Sabbath, while instructing the children, he compared himself to a shepherd, and then inquired what the latter did with his flock. One literal minded little chap promptly replied, "He shears 'em!"

INTERRUPTED TABLE TALK.—The other evening the Rev. Mr. Philacter sat down at the tea table with a very thoughtful air and attended to the wants of his brood in a very abstracted manner. Presently he looked up at his wife and said:

"The Apostle Paul—"
"Got a' nawful lump on the head 'satternoon," broke in the pastor's son, "playin' base ball. Bat flew out of player's hand when I was umpire and cracked me right above the ear an' dropped me. Hurt? Golly!" and the lad shook his head in dismal but expressive pantomime as he tenderly rubbed a lump that looked like a billiard ball with hair on it. The pastor gravely paused for the interruption and then resumed:

"The Apostle Paul—"
"Saw Mrs. O'Ghemine down at Greebaum's this afternoon," said the eldest daughter, addressing her mother. "She had on that same old everlasting black silk, made over with a vest of lilac green silk, coat-tail-basque pattern, overskirt made with diagonal folds in front, edged with deep fringe; yellow straw hat, with black velvet facing inside the brim, and pale blue flowers. She's going to Chicago."

The good minister waited patiently, and then, in tones just a shade louder than before, said:

"The Apostle Paul—"
"Went in swimmin' last night with Harry and Ben, pop, and stepped on a clam-shell," exclaimed the youngest son; "cut my foot so I can't wear my shoe; and please can't I stay ter home to-morrow?"

The pastor informed his son that he might stay away from the river, and then resumed his topic. He said:

"The Apostle Paul says—"
"My teacher is an awful liar," shouted the second son; "he says the world is as round as an orange, and that it goes round faster than a circus man can ride. I guess he hain't got much sense."

The mother lifted a warning finger toward the boy, and said "sh." Then the father resumed:

"The Apostle Paul says—"
"Don't bite off twice as much as you can chew!" broke out the eldest son, reproving the assault of his little brother on a piece of cake. The pastor's face showed just a trifle of annoyance as he said, in very firm, decided tones:

"The Apostle Paul says—"
"There's a fly in the butter!" yelled the youngest hopeful of the family, and a general laugh followed. When silence was restored the eldest daughter, with an air of curiosity, said:

"Well, but pa, I really would like to know what the Apostle Paul said."

"Pass the mustard," said the pastor absently. Then the committee rose and the Senate went into executive session and soon after adjourned.—Burlington Hawkeye.

Notes and Clippings.

E. P. WHIPPLE says, "To many of our present young students exegesis means practically exit-Jesus."

BABYLON, L. I., is the only place on the globe of that name—the ancient city of Assyria having long since "fallen."

THE Imperial Princess of Japan, who was aunt of the sun, related to the moon, and mother-in-law to a few stars, is dead.

COLONEL ROBERT G. INGERSOLL promises if possible to attend the Congress of Liberal Leagues, to be held in Rochester the 26th, 27th, and 28th of this month.

WHEN the death of Thiers was announced to the Pope, he simply remarked "Good Riddance." We will have the privilege of saying that in connection with him ere long.

WITHIN a few weeks many Indian relics have been taken from a mound on the farm of Richard Lawrence, near Seneca Falls. They comprise the skeleton of an Indian, a rifle, tomahawk, copper kettle, knife, a long metal pipe, beads, flint-lock, etc.

IT is said a couple of poor people in Europe are soon to join in matrimony, to wit, Baron Edmond Rothschild of Paris, to Adele Rothschild, of the Frankfurt branch of the family. They will have to start in housekeeping with the paltry sum of $100,000,000.

THE father of a tall Howard family, living somewhere in Kentucky, is six feet four inches in height; the mother is six feet one inch, the sixteen sons range from six feet three to six feet eleven, and the ten daughters average six feet two. They are long for this world.

A LETTER from Rome states that the Pope eats and digests well, but has a constant tendency to sleep, through weakness. He has running sores on his legs, and a painful tumor. He no longer walks, and says mass seated. He is evidently near his end. His physicians doubt his living two months.

THE strongest inducement ever offered to a congregation was held out by a Pennsylvania parson. "We have a collection this morning," said he, "and for the glory of heaven, whichever of you stole Mr. Reed's sheep, don't put anything in the plate." There was an unusually large contribution that day.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Montreal Witness, who has visited Guibord's grave, writes: "The marble tablet inserted in the large stone has been hammered at with stones and totally spoiled. In a short time the inscription will be totally illegible, and when I saw it it could not be read, being covered with filth."

"SUFFER LITTLE CHILDREN TO COME UNTO ME."—All last winter Moody and Sankey sang, at their Boston revival, "Sowing the Seed," and "What Shall the Harvest Be?" The census takers have been around, and report 461 illegitimate births in Boston this year, and "Still there's More to Follow." The Bostonians are wondering whether this harvest is a legitimate or an illegitimate result of the revival.

COL. ROBERT INGERSOLL holds strong opinions concerning cookery. He says that cooking is one of the fine arts; that it takes far more sense to be an excellent cook than a tolerable lawyer; and that he is a good cook himself and has no other accomplishment of which he is so proud. And he adds, with what may be called emphasis: "There ought to be a law passed making it a crime punishable with imprisonment in the penitentiary to fry beef-steak." He evidently prefers his broiled.

THE New York Ledger says: "If there be a public speaker in this country who needs the advantage of study, it is Mr. Moody. We are, however, afraid that, when in Chicago, he studied with too much intensity peculiar ways of collecting debts, at the expense of other and more important studies. Some people may, perhaps, think that 'these be harsh words.' But we never publish anything in the Ledger that we have not good reasons to believe to be true. Moody was unquestionably an uncommon shoe dealer when he was in Chicago. However, a punster might say, in his favor, that even then he was collecting the payment for soles."

THE Rev. Willis N. Bowman, pastor of the Morrisana M. E. church, was recently arranged in the Harlem police court on a charge of Beecherism. Since then the church has been divided on the question of dismissing the pastor; but he has won many of the flock to his side, and has begun a weeding-out process. Among those who have taken an active part against the pastor is John T. Cooper, a steward in the church, who went to law after charging that the pastor had made improper advances to his daughter. Pastor Bowman then preferred a charge against Cooper for not appealing to the presiding elder. A council tried Cooper recently. Cooper tried to appear before the body with his lawyer, but both were excluded. Cooper and his wife and daughter were dismissed from the society. Pastor Bowman is said to have remarked that he is no worse than his Brooklyn fellow preacher.

A WESTERN correspondent writes thus of the Rev. Mr. Loring, of Osage, Iowa. He had been the habit of calling often upon one of the Sisters, Mrs. Hawley, and the frequency of his visits aroused the suspicions of her husband, and he decided to watch a little for the clerical gentleman, and one day on going suddenly into the house he found Loring and his wife (Mrs. Hawley) in the bedroom together, when he told them in a positive manner that if they did not own up he would kill them on the spot. They then confessed to holding improper connection together. Loring was pastor of the Congregational church, and Mr. Hawley was deacon in the same church. In excusing her criminality she stated that Loring had assured her that there was no sin in the matter so long as they were not found out, and that Christ had said that his lambs shall lie down together. He was fond of obeying that injunction.

THE COLORADO CARDIFF GIANT.—A telegram from Denver, Col., dated Sept. 27, contains the following: "Mr. Conant's discovery of the petrified missing link or statue of ancient man was yesterday exhibited for several hours. Crowds poured in and gazed with varied emotions upon the giant as he lay on his back on boards, encircled by a sound, temporary fence, to keep hands from injuring him. Prof. Semper, of Wurtemberg, Germany, says he does not believe the figure to be of paleontological origin, nor a petrification, and says in fossiliferous remains generally it is easy to trace the outline between the bone and the flesh, the substance connecting the joints being different from the substance on the body, and there is more difference between the substance on the body and limbs and that connecting them than is found in the substance connecting the legs, for instance. The remains should be more shrunken, and, if a petrification, should have hair. Dr. Dennison says one arm from the elbow to the wrist is longer by an inch than the other. The arm is out of proportion to the legs; also the neck, hips and head are not proportioned. The abdomen, high in dead persons, falls to a level with the hips. The substance is said to dissolve in nitric acid. The majority think it is a piece of statuary or clay image of very ancient origin. Semper says the head is similar to the heads of the ancient Aztecs. It is certainly a great curiosity, and, if not a fraud, a most wonderful, awe-inspiring figure. If it is a petrified human body, the four inches of tail will go far to sustain Darwin's theory and supply the 'missing link.'"

HAPPY LAND CHAPEL is in the parish of Worsley, England, and the happy family of saints, instead of reigning in glory, fight like cats and dogs. Its worshippers have been attached to the Methodist Free Church until recently, when, by a majority of two, the trustees resolved to transfer the chapel to the Wesleyan body. Three weeks ago the two factions came to blows during the afternoon service. The appearance of the minister appointed to conduct the service by the Wesleyan body was the signal for the uprising of one of the recalcitrant trustees, who demanded his authority for being present. An attempt to pull the minister down led to a free fight. There was hooting, shouting, whistling, and screaming for five hours. Every time the minister attempted to conduct the service, he was interrupted with cries of, "Pull him out of the pulpit," and "Start up! There is a Happy Land." At five o'clock there was a truce, each party agreeing not to take advantage of the other's absence until the hour for evening service. The minister remained at his post and took tea in the pulpit. At six o'clock the chapel was crammed, and hostilities were resumed with redoubled violence until dark, when the gas was cut off and the congregation dispersed in confusion.

THE Paris correspondent of the New York Times writes as follows concerning the Freemasons in Europe: "Lately some of the militant members of the Grand Orient have been attacking religion, or rather Christianity, and many have been trying to abolish God and the idea of the immortality of the soul. At the last meeting of the Grand Orient they took a long step in advance in this direction. They put on record a declaration that Freemasonry acknowledged no creed or sect, and that henceforth its device would be 'Liberty, Equality, Fraternity.' This seems very simple, but in reality it is the negative of all religious ideas, and the triumph of the Freethinkers. One who is not a Mason may be permitted to ask what the Prince of Wales will do when one step more—already meditated let me say—has been taken. At no distant period he must become the 'Defender of the Faith,' the head of a sect, and how can he remain at the head of the Masons and of the Church at the same time?"

THE wife of Rev. William P. Brooks, of St. Louis, while fumbling among the Bibles, tracts and hymn-books that he had packed in a bag in readiness for a tour as an evangelist, found a bundle of letters addressed to him. She observed that the language was affectionate, and that the handwriting was that of Sister McDonald, an active member of her husband's church. A few hours later Sister McDonald called. Sister Brooks, with the fury of a tigress, shook the intercepted letters in her face, and accused her of trying to alienate the affections of her husband. Sister McDonald denied the authorship of the letters, but the wife seized a cow-hide which she had procured for the purpose, and laid it on the shoulders and arms of Sister McDonald with all the force she could command. The assailed sister was not disposed to take her punishment with patience, and she fought back with fists and finger-nails. It was a desperate combat, ending in a victory for the wife.

THE lecture season is well under way. Beecher is making from $200 to $500 a night in the West. Wendell Phillips has hitherto confined his lectures almost entirely to New England, but this year he will make a Western trip. Mrs. Livermore has two new lectures this season—one on "Harriet Martineau," and the other on "The Coming Man." Among the candidates for lyceum honors is Collector Simmons of Boston. He will talk about "Reforms." Burdette, of the Burlington Hawkeye, will probably come East in December. James T. Fields has numerous engagements in New England. This will be Jouquin Miller's last season on the platform. Gough's popularity holds out wonderfully, and he has far more engagements than he can fill. His new lecture will be on the reform movements of the day. Josh Billings will give his lectures as usual, going as far as Texas. The Rev. Robert Collyer has obtained two Sunday's leave of absence from his church, and will spend the time in lecturing in New England. Will Cariton will probably come East in November.

SOME of the ministers in this city are still crying against the people whom they call "Sabbath breakers." The ministers ought by this time to have reached the point of knowing that there is only one thing for them to do; namely, to keep the Sabbath themselves if they think it ought to be kept, irrespective of what other people may say or do. If it is the solemn belief of the ministers that on Saturday cooking enough should be done to last over Sunday, that no riding, driving, or pleasuring of any kind should be indulged in on that day, then adhere strictly to their doctrine. No one will molest them or make them afraid. But let them not seek to enforce these narrow and Puritanic restrictions upon more sensible people. The world is advancing. Old institutions become modified. They fade away and others more suited to the time we live in take their place. Whether a man shall walk or ride on Sunday, or whether he shall eat a hot dinner or a cold one, is a small matter compared with whether he tells the truth, defrauds no man, is a good husband, father, son, and citizen, and loves to do good rather than evil.—Telegram.

Events of the Week.

A $50,000 fire occurred at Gouverneur, N. Y. A large number of buildings destroyed.

BISHOP COXE is again trying to destroy Turkey with a poem filled with holy dynamite.

THE election returns show that Ohio has gone Democratic by about 15,000 majority, and Iowa has gone Republican by 30,000.

THE large steamship England of the National Company's line was seized by the U. S. revenue officers for smuggling goods into this port, to the detriment of our revenue.

THE special session of Congress has convened. The contest for Speaker has been active. Randall is ahead, but his opponents are working hard for his defeat.

SENATOR MORTON's health is declining and indications point towards his early death. It is not at all probable that he will ever again occupy his seat in the United States Senate.

AN old man about seventy years of age who had escaped from the Bloomingdale insane asylum jumped off High Bridge, a distance of 132 feet, and died immediately upon striking the water.

JOHN LUAY, a tramp, wishing to be sent to the work house for the winter, threw a paving stone through a $200 window at 61 East Twelfth street. He told Justice Morgan that he was starving.

JOHN JACKSON MOONEY, of Williamsburg, 36 years of age, shot his brother-in-law John Mooney. The ball hit the head and fractured the skull. It grew out of an old family quarrel. The shooter was arrested.

GAMBETTA has been prosecuted the second time by the French government. This time it is for causing the streets to be placarded with his manifesto. The government seems to take great pleasure in annoying him.

COOLER weather is upon us. A few frosts have taken place in the past week, and one severe storm, which stirred up things and made them lively both on land and water. Several shipwrecks were caused and a few lives lost. A part of Brooklyn was flooded with water.

ANOTHER heavy battle has been fought by the Russians and Turks. This time it was in the vicinity of Kars. The Russian loss is reported at 15,000 and the Turkish at 2,000, though the Russian account says 6,000. By the preparations being made on both sides it is surmised that heavy fighting will soon come off in the vicinity of Plevna.

A STONE weighing forty tons fell from a cliff at Carr's Rock, near Port Jervis, N. Y., and struck a freight train of forty-five cars, dividing the train near the centre. One car struck, loaded with grain, was completely demolished. Thirteen cars left the track but were not badly injured. Had they gone a few feet further they would have gone down a precipice of one hundred feet.

THE PIOUS GILMAN'S FORGERIES.—Gilman's second safe has not yet been opened, and the secrets it is expected to reveal are still matters for conjecture. The delay is caused by the difficulty of gathering all the creditors at the opening. The forger is still believed to be in the city, and one of the persons interested in his apprehension said yesterday, "I could put my hand on his shoulder at any moment." It is given out that the compromise overtures have fallen through by reason of the inability of the criminal's relatives to pay the par value of the forged scrip. Gilman will soon come out of his hiding-place, and give himself up to justice. It is by this time out of the power of the New Yorkers who have been victimized by Gilman to condone his offense. The country as well as the town is represented in his forgeries. It is now known that he defrauded a Connecticut woman to the extent of $12,000. Another fair customer intrusted him with United States bonds for registration, and is mulcted accordingly. As her property is not large, the loss is severe. It is believed that these are only representatives of a number of sufferers through Gilman's frauds.

BY HUDSON TUTTLE.

CHAPTER VII.

MAN'S MORAL PROGRESS DEPENDENT ON HIS INTELLECTUAL GROWTH.

If the Jews had not made a beginning, some other nation would have offered the requisite organs, and those organs would have guided the advance in precisely the same manner, only transferring to some books, now probably lost, the sacred character which is still attributed to others.—Comte.

ALL civilized races of men have books which they regard as sacred, and to which they refer their knowledge of moral law and the foundation of religion. Such books are accepted as direct revelations from their God. They all—Vedas, Shaster, Koran, Testament (Old and New)—make one claim of divine origin, its consequent infallibility, and that they are absolutely essential for man's understanding of the will of his Maker.

As the Bible is more intimately related to us, and as we regard no other volume as sacred, it may be regarded as a type of all others. We shall reach the conclusion, if we investigate this realm over which superstition has spread for immemorial time her forbidding pinions, that mankind have derived little benefit from their moral codes except as they have comprehended them by their intellect. Man's moral progress has been and is equivalent to intellectual growth. Until moral truths become the property of the intellect they remain barren beliefs, or united with superstition are productive of great evil.

In the vast volume of universal history not one page can be pointed out wherein Christianity contributed to social or intellectual advancement. On the contrary, it has invariably arrayed itself with the Old, and by every possible means sought to retard humanity's growth. This is its necessary position; it is a part of the Old, and must battle for it. Claiming the infallibility conferred by direct inspiration, it cannot retract. Its creed renders growth impossible. A perfect God writes word by word a perfect infallible revelation for infinite time and generations. Such a revelation cannot expand—it is complete and finished. To add thereto is to blemish. Thus presented, the Church divides on the method of its interpretation. The Protestant gives to each man the right to interpret for himself. In this it is most illogical; for how is a finite, imperfect, fallible being to interpret and comprehend an infinite, infallible revelation? When the right of reason is granted, the finite and fallible status of the Bible is acknowledged. The right to reason presupposes the right to receive or reject; for of what use is reason unless this right is granted? Protestantism founders in this absurdity. Really occupying the identical grounds of Catholicism, it grants the right to reason, but refuses the right of rejection; it says: "Believe, or be damned." Reason may exercise itself on the Bible, but in such a manner as to receive it. If infallible, reason is needless—if infinite, it is impossible. Protestantism denies both these qualities when it assumes the right of private judgment and breaks the path for radical infidelity. If Luther, Calvin, or Melancthon has the right to protest against Rome, Beecher, Murray, or Parker may protest against them, and the end is a universal individual protest, there being as many sects as persons, and thorough and complete individualization.

Catholicism maintains the severest logic. It stifles reason at the beginning. It truly says finite man cannot comprehend an infinite revelation; hence God has chosen teachers to interpret his revelation; the priesthood is as necessary as the Bible itself; to ordinary men it is a book written in a foreign tongue, and the inspired priest only can translate and apply it to mortal wants.

How far has the intellectual life of the race been benefited by the Bible? It cannot claim scientific accuracy or knowledge, for it accepts the views of Nature received by the rude and savage Semitic people. They believed the world to be a perfectly square and flat island floating on the water beneath the firmament. It was stationary, and the sun, moon, and stars revolved around it. This is the accepted theory of the Bible, and so understood by its believers, and scarcely three centuries have passed since the man would have been burned who dared to assert otherwise. Its cosmogony is that of conjecturing ignorance. Did not God know that his world was a ball, and the sun—not the earth—was the central body? Knowing these facts, he writes the very reverse in his revelation, leaving those whom he seeks to enlighten by his revelation to discover the truth by painful research.

It is urged that this is a wrong view of the intentions of the Deity. He adapted his words to the comprehension of the savage Hebrew. He would not have been understood had he spoken in the phrase of modern science. He adapted his words to their comprehension. This revelation, then, becomes a special affair for the exclusive benefit of a small tribe, and cannot be urged on the present; for if intended for infinite generations it must have infinite extension and application.

It is interesting to trace the progress of ideas and the slow yielding of the interpretation of the Bible. From the dawn of Science to the present a constant battle has been waged. Every new truth is fought to the death, and after the Church finds it cannot withstand it, it turns and claims it for its own. Geology dealt the death-blow to the Mosaic cosmogony. The earth created in six days? Turn over the leaves of the great rock-volume, stratum reposing upon stratum for fifteen miles of crust, replete with vestiges of organic beings, once swimming, flying, creeping, or walking, successively evolved while millions of millions of ages rolled away. A billion years is but a single swing of the pendulum which marks the progressive evolution of worlds. Geology and Genesis can never be reconciled. The story is not an allegory, but an attempt of the ignorant savage mind to account for phenomena it did not comprehend. It is the same with all its pretended explanations, as witness that of the rainbow. It is not the sunbeam painting itself on the descending drops of the shower, but a sign set by God after the Flood for the comfort and assurance of Noah, and for a thousand years this interpretation prevailed. Now we know that a thousand of ages before Noah's time, on the wild and desolate shores of the new red sandstone the winds blew the raindrops, and can we suppose that when those dark showers rolled away, and the low sun shone on their pearly drops, no rainbow gorgeously decorated their dark garments?

After the great battle waged on the intellectual field, it is again urged that it is not to teach science, not for intellectual progress, but as a revelation of morals, the Bible was given to man. It was taken as a standard for the intellect as long as the claim could be maintained, and only by compulsion did it relinquish its blighting grasp. Is there better foundation for its claims as the sole teacher of moral truth? Does it teach any truths man would not have arrived at without its aid? It is claimed that it does, and the same claims are made for all sacred books. Against this assertion, so arrogantly maintained, a volume of extracts, wise sayings, and proverbs might easily be compiled from classic writers and the records of remote and even barbarous peoples, which would be in every respect equal or superior to the Bible. What is there in the famous Sermon on the Mount not well known before the first century? Confucius, more than five hundred years previously, taught a code equally pure. The vaunted Golden Rule was expressed by the Chinese sage, and about the same time by Pythagoras in Greece. Were not the ancients moral? Witness their laws and customs. Do they not present lives favorably comparable with the most shining examples of Christian virtue? Plato and Socrates were equal in forgiveness of enemies, in patient endurance of suffering, in all the virtues bestowed by religion on any Christian saint.

But it is said, although the ancient sages wrote wisely and spoke truthfully, though their lives put to blush those of a vast majority of Christians, they could not agree respecting the foundation of virtue, the ultimate object towards which it should be directed, or in what man's happiness consisted. This is a singular objection from the Christian world, who never could agree, with all the light of their revelation, on these same questions, who from the apostles' time have disputed with word and sword, and are now divided into more than a thousand contending sects.

Nothing is more obvious than the independence of ethics of revelation. Revelation is only its accidental expression. This is proven by the fact that all moral truths expressed in the Bible were clearly recognized for indefinite time before its presentation. It abounds in precepts good of themselves, though not original with it, but as a moral code it is exceedingly imperfect. So far from pointing man to the eternally true and right, in the hands of its interpreters it has taught the opposite of truth and blinded those who would see. It advocates slavery. The chosen men of God are slaveholders. He urges them to battle, assists them to gain the day, and directs them how to divide the spoil of captive wives, mothers, and maidens. If in the terrible ordeal of slavery through which we have passed, the slaveholder found consolation anywhere, it was in the Bible. He fought under the direct command of God, who cursed Ham, and his posterity, and declared it just that they should be bondsmen and bondswomen for all time. So directly did the Bible oppose anti-slavery that its only agitators threw it down and trampled it in the dust.

It upholds capital punishment. Its code is a code of vengeance, and although the great thinkers of the day, one and all, oppose the death penalty, and the refined sense of the age revolts at it as a relic of barbarism, the prejudice created and sustained by religious education founded on the Bible preserves it as a black and dismal blot on our civilization. It holds woman in her present unequal position with man, and sets itself directly in the way of her advancement. One of the most startling miracles recorded in the Old Testament is the standing still of the sun and moon to enable the Israelites, pushed on by God, to slaughter their enemies. A religion of peace? The millions that have perished in its wars are a minority of those who have fallen victims to the stake, the gibbet, and nameless instruments of torture, or suffered a thousand deaths in reeking dungeons, with iron links festering their flesh, without appeal and without hope. The Church has arrogated to itself the authority to do for the living as it believes their God does for nine-tenths of the dead—created a hell, and carried out his commands by commencing those tortures which he will intensify and continue forever.

SALT LAKE CITY, Sept. 25, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Friend: You will excuse me for not writing before and I will make amends for the future.

Since leaving my home in San Jose, about the tenth of July, I have kept my face steadily to the East, giving from four to ten lectures at various points on my line of travel.

I have had uniform success in reaching the ear of the people, and trust I have added my mite to the great force which is beating against the walls of superstition.

I reached Salt Lake the 18th, and have given my fifth lecture to large and intelligent audiences. The Liberals here are men of influence and moral courage, and are deserving of great credit for the gallant fight they have made against the pollution which has cursed body and soul of this people.

Mrs. Hardinge Britten, on her way to California gave one lecture here the Sunday preceding my arrival. With general acceptance I close my course of lectures here to-morrow night, and hope to be in Cheyenne next Sunday, and in Omaha the Sunday following, reaching Chicago about the 15th of October.

Hoping to report again soon, I remain,

Col. Ingersoll's Review of his Reviewers.

CONCLUDED.

"The next critic who assailed me was the Rev. Mr. Kalloch. I am going to show you what I can withstand. I am not going to say a word about the reputation of this man, although he took some liberties with mine. [Prolonged and thrice-repeated applause.] This gentleman says negation is a poor thing to die by. I would just as lief die by that as the opposite. He spoke of the last hours of Paine and Voltaire and the terrors of their death-beds; but the question arises, Is there a word of truth in all he said? I have observed that the murderer dies with courage and firmness in many instances, but that does not make me think that it sanctified his crime; in fact, it makes no impression upon me one way or the other. When a man through old age or infirmity approaches death the intellectual faculties are dimmed, his senses become less and less, and as he loses these he goes back to his old superstition. Old age brings back the memories of childhood. And the great bard gave even in the corrupt and besotted Falstaff—who prattled of babbling brooks and green fields—an instance of the retracing steps taken by the memory at the last gasp. It has been said that the Bible was sanctified by our mothers. Every superstition in the world, from the beginning of all time, has had such a sanctification. The Turk dying on the Russian battle-field, pressing the Koran to his bosom, breathes his last thinking of the loving adjuration of his mother to guard it. Every superstition has been rendered sacred by the love of a mother. I know what it has cost the noble and the brave to throw to the winds these superstitions. Since the death of Voltaire, who was innocent of all else than a desire to shake off the superstitions of the past, the curse of Rome has pursued him, and ignorant Protestants have echoed that curse. I like Voltaire. Whenever I think of him it is as a plumed knight coming from the fray with victory shining upon his brow. He was once in the Bastille, and while there he changed his name from Francis Marie Aloysius to Voltaire; and when the Bastille was torn down "Voltaire" was the battle-cry of those who did it. He did more to bring about religious toleration than any man in the galaxy of those who strove for the privilege of freethought. He was always on the side of justice. He was full of faults, and had many virtues. His doctrines have never brought unhappiness to any country. He died as serenely as any one could. Speaking to his servant, he said, "Farewell, my faithful friend." Could he have done a more noble act than to recognize him who had served him faithfully as a man? What more could be wished? And now let me say here, I will give $1,000 in gold to any clergyman who can substantiate that the death of Voltaire was not as peaceful as the dawn. And of Thomas Paine, whom they assert died in fear and agony, frightened by the clanking chains of devils, in fact, frightened to death by God—I will give $1,000 likewise to any one who can substantiate this absurd story—a story without a word of truth in it. And let me ask, Who dies in the most fear, the man who, like the saint, exclaims: "My God, my God! why hast thou forsaken me?" or Voltaire, who peacefully and quietly bade his servant farewell? The question is not who died right, but who lived right. I look upon death as the most unimportant moment of life, and believe that not half the responsibility is attached to dying that is to living properly. This Rev. Mr. Kalloch is a Baptist. He has a right to be a Baptist. The first Baptist, though, was a heretic; but it is among the wonders that when a heretic gets fifteen or twenty to join him he suddenly begins to be orthodox. Roger Williams was a Baptist, but how he, or any one not destitute of good sense, could be one, passes my comprehension. Let me illustrate:

"Suppose it was the Day of Judgment to-night and we were all assembled, as the ghosts say we will be, to be judged, and God should ask a man:

"Have you been a good man?"

"Yes."

"Have you loved your wife and children?"

"Yes."

"Have you taken good care of them and made them happy?"

"Yes."

"Have you tried to do right by your neighbors?"

"Yes."

"Paid all your debts?"

"Yes."

"And then cap the climax by asking:

"Were you ever baptized?"

"Could a solitary being hear that question without laughing? I think not. I once happened to be in the company of six or seven Baptist elders (I never have been able to understand since how I got into such bad company), and they wanted to know what I thought of baptism. I answered that I had not given the matter any attention, in fact I had no special opinion upon the subject. But they pressed me and finally I told them that I thought, with soap baptism was a good thing.

"The Rev. Mr. Guard has attacked me, and has described me, among other things, as a dog barking at a train. Of course he was the train. He said, first, the Bible is not an immoral book, because I swore upon it when I joined the Free and Accepted Masons. That settles the question. Secondly, he says that Solomon had softening of the brain and fatty degeneration of the heart; thirdly, that the Hebrews had the right to slay all the inhabitants of Canaan according to the doctrine of the survival of the fittest. He says that the destruction of these Canaanites; the ripping open by the bloody sword of women with child was an act of sublime mercy. Think of that! He says that the Canaanites should have been driven from their homes, and not only driven, but that the men who simply were guilty of the crime of fighting for their native land—the old men with gray hairs; the old mothers, the young mothers, the little dimpled, prattling child—that it was an act of sublime mercy to plunge the sword of religious persecution into old and young. If that is mercy, let us have injustice. If there is that kind of a God I am sorry that I exist. Fourthly, Mr. Guard said God has the right to do as he pleases with the beings he has created; and, fifthly, that God, by choosing the Jews and governing them personally, spoils them to that degree that they crucified him the first opportunity they had. That shows what a good administration will do. Sixthly, he says polygamy is not a bad thing when compared with the picture of Antony and Cleopatra, now on exhibition in this city. I will just say one word about art. I think this is one of the most beautiful words in our language, and do you know, it never seemed to me necessary for art to go into partnership with a rag? I like the paintings of Angelo, of Raphael—I like those splendid souls that are put upon canvas—all there is of human beauty. There are brave souls in every land who worship nature grand and nude, and who, with swift, indignant hand, tear off the fig leaves of the prude. Seventhly, it may be said that the Bible sanctions slavery, but that it is not an immoral book if it does. Mr. Guard playfully says that he is a puppy nine days old; that he was only eight days old when I came here. I'm inclined to think he has overstated his age. I account for his argument precisely as he did for the sin of Solomon, softening of the brain, or fatty degeneration of the heart. It does seem to me that if I were a good Christian and knew that another man was going down to the Bottomless Pit to be miserable and in agony forever I would try to stop him, and instead of filling my mouth with epithet and invective and drawing the lips of malice back from the teeth of hatred, my eyes would be filled with tears, and I would do what I could to reclaim him and take him up in the arms of my affection.

"The next gentleman is the Rev. Mr. Robinson, who delivered a sermon entitled 'Ghost against God, or Ingersoll against Honesty.' Of course he was honest. He apologized for attending an Infidel lecture upon the ground that he hated to contribute to the support of a materialistic showman. I am willing to trade fagots for epithets and the rack for anything that may be said in his sermon. I am willing to trade the instrument of torture with which they could pull the nails from my fingers for anything which the ingenuity of orthodoxy can invent. When I saw that report—although I do not know that I ought to tell it—I felt bad. I knew that man's conscience must be rankling like a snake in his bosom that he had contributed a dollar to the support of a man as bad as I. I wrote him a letter, in which I said: 'The Rev. Samuel Robinson, My Dear Sir: In order to relieve your conscience of the stigma of having contributed to the support of an unbeliever in Ghosts, I herewith enclose the dollar you paid to attend my lecture.' I then gave him a little good advice to be charitable, and regretted exceedingly that any man could listen to me for an hour and a half and not go away satisfied that other men had the same right to think that he had."

The speaker went on to answer the argument of Mr. Robinson with regard to persecution, contending that Protestants had been guilty of it no less than Catholics; and showing that the first people to pass an act of toleration in the New World were the Catholics in Maryland. The reverend gentleman has stated also that Infidelity had done nothing for the world in the development of art and science. Has he ever heard of Darwin, of Tyndall, of Huxley, of John W. Draper, of August Comte, of Descartes, Laplace, Spinoza, or of any man who has taken a step in advance of his time? Orthodoxy never advances; when it does advance, it ceases to be orthodoxy.

A reply to certain strictures in the Occident led the lecturer up to another ministerial critic, namely, the Rev. W. E. Ijams.

"I want to say that, so far as I can see, in his argument this gentleman has treated me in a kind and considerate spirit. He makes two or three mistakes, but I suppose they are the fault of the report from which he quoted. I am made to say in his sermon that there is no sacred place in the Universe. What I did say was: 'There is no sacred place in all the universe of thought; there is nothing too holy to be investigated, nothing too sacred to be understood, and I said that the fields of thought were fenceless, that they should be without a wall.' I say so to-night. He further said that I said that a man had not only the right to do right, but to do wrong. What I did say was: 'Liberty is the right to do right, and the right to think right, and the right to think wrong,' not the right to do wrong. That is all I have to say in regard to that gentleman, except that, so far as I could see, he was perfectly fair and treated me as though I was a human being as well as he."

The speaker sarcastically referred to the slurs thrown upon him by his reviewers, who have claimed that his theories have no foundation, his arguments no reason, and that his utterances are vapid, blasphemous, and unworthy a reply. He said that their statements and their actions were sadly at variance, for, while declaring him a senseless idiot, they spent hours in striving to prove themselves not idiots; in other words, in one breath they declared that his views were absolutely without point, and needed no explaining away; while in direct rebuttal of this declaration, they devoted time and labor in attempts to disprove the very things they called self-evident absurdities.

Turning from this subject, Mr. Ingersoll read numerous extracts from the Bible, with interpolated comments. He claimed that the Bible authorized slavery, and that many devoted believers in that book had turned the cross of Christ into a whipping-post. He did not wish it understood that he could find no good in believers in creeds; far from it, for some of his dearest friends were most orthodox in their religious ideas, and there had been hundreds of thousands of good men among both clergy and laymen. History has shown no people more nobly self-sacrificing than the Jesuit Fathers who first visited this country to proselyte among the Indians. But these men and their like were better than their creeds; better than the book in which their faith was centered. The Bible tells us distinctly that the world was made in six days—not periods, but actual, bona fide days—a statement which it iterates and reiterates. It also tells us that God lengthened the day for the benefit of a gentleman named Joshua, in other words, that he stopped the rotary motion of the earth. Motion is changed into heat by stoppage, and the world turns with such velocity that its sudden stoppage would create a heat of intensity beyond the wildest flight of our imagination, and yet this impossible feat was performed that Joshua might have longer time to expend in slaying a handful of Amorites. The Bible also upholds the doctrines of witchcraft and of spiritualism, for Saul visited the witch of Endor, and she, after preparing the cabinet, trotted out the spirit of Samuel, said spirit kindly joining in conversation with Saul without requiring the aid of a trance medium. The speaker then quoted at length from Leviticus concerning wizards and evil spirits, described the temptation of Christ by Satan, and the driving of devils from man into swine. He sneered at the rights of children as biblically described, citing the law which sentenced them to be stoned to death for disobedience to parents; the almost sacrifice of Isaac by his father, and the actual murder of Jephthah's daughter, asking if a God who could demand such worship was worthy the love of man. He next referred to the conversation between God and Satan concerning the man Job, and of the reward given to the latter for his long continued patience. His three daughters and his seven sons had been taken from him merely to test his patience, and the merciful God gave him in exchange three other daughters and seven sons, but they were not the children whom he had loved and lost. The Bible represents woman as vastly inferior to man, while he believed, with Robbie Burns, that God made man with a prentice hand, and women after he had learned the trade. Polygamy, also, was a doctrine supported by this pure and pious work; a doctrine so foul that language is not strong enough to express its infamy. The Bible taught, as a religious creed, that if your wife, your sister, your brother, your dearest friend, tempted you to change from the religion of your fathers, your duty to God demanded that you should at once strike a blow at the life of your tempter. Let us suppose, then, that in truth God went to Palestine and selected the scanty tribes of Israel as his chosen people, and supposing that he afterward came to Jerusalem in the shape of a man and taught a different doctrine from the one prescribed by their book and their clergy, and that the chosen people, in obedience to the education he had prepared for them, struck at the life of him who tempted them. Were they to be cursed by God and man because the former had reaped the harvest of his own sowing?

At a few minutes before eleven o'clock the speaker brought his address to a close, with a happy compliment to San Francisco and her people. He spoke about two hours and a half.

Wanted—A New Conscience-Party.

AN APPEAL TO ALL PATRIOTS AND LIBERALS.

FELLOW-CITIZENS: The time has arrived for holding the First Congress of the National Liberal League; and the Directors, in fulfillment of the duty imposed upon them by the Constitution, have issued a public call for the assembling of this convention at Rochester, N. Y., Oct. 26, 27, and 28, 1877. Questions of the gravest import, both to the Liberal League and to the nation, will be submitted to the members of this convention for free discussion and equally free decision.

The first of these questions is this: Shall the consistent advocates of secular government, as represented by the National Liberal League, now boldly take the necessary initial steps towards the formation of a great national party, by adopting an independent political platform and nominating candidates for the Presidential election of 1880?

The second question—provided the first question is answered by the convention in the affirmative—is this: Shall the platform adopted present the following principles and measures?—

"I. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, etc.

"II. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

"III. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education."

These questions must be answered by the convention itself, to which they are simply submitted by the Directors; and it is greatly to be desired that the Liberals of the country may send a sufficiently large delegation of their best and wisest representatives to insure a deliberate, intelligent, and patriotic answer. Convinced as I am of the paramount importance to the future welfare of my country of the three great principles above stated, and equally convinced that they can be practically established by nothing short of a further and higher development of the National Constitution, I am urged by a sense of duty to plead their cause at once in these columns—not at all as President of the National Liberal League (for I have no right to speak officially in this matter), but simply as an American citizen whose whole mind and heart and soul are enlisted on their behalf. Bear with me then, fellow-liberals, while I address myself directly to your consciences and your intellects, and set forth as best I can the reasons why you are called upon by true patriotism to take a new, bold, and seemingly audacious step.

Last year, at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, I opposed in advance the idea of the new League's going into politics as a distinct party, with platform and candidates. A few weeks were enough to teach me better. In the Senate of the United States, an amendment to the Constitution was proposed which, if it had passed both houses, would have covertly but effectually recognized the Divine Authority of the Bible as the Word of God in the Constitution itself, and destroyed its secular character as completely, though not as ostentatiously, as if the "God-in-the-Constitution" party had carried out their whole programme. This insidious and infamous measure received in the Senate a vote of 28 in its favor to only 16 against it, and thus barely failed to get the requisite two-thirds majority. Often had I heard it confidently boasted, by Liberals who derisively or pityingly smiled at all warnings of danger from the Christian Amendment movement, that the whole country would rise in indignation, if that bigoted scheme were ever seriously broached in Congress; and, not unnaturally, I looked to see some signs of this promised popular rebuke, now that the bigots had almost succeeded in carrying this very scheme through the Senate. But I looked in vain. Nobody seemed to understand what had happened, or what a fatal disaster the cause of religious liberty had so narrowly escaped. Here and there a solitary journal, wiser than the rest, pointed out the rock on which the precious secularity of the Constitution had been so nearly wrecked; but (what filled me with amazement) most Liberals themselves appeared just as blind to this threatened shipwreck of their cause as others were indifferent to it, and were unable to see "what harm the amendment would have done." From that time the immediate necessity of a new conscience-party in politics—one that should make it a sacred duty to educate their fellow-voters in the alphabet of religious freedom and equal rights—became evident. There is no way to do this, no way to get the attention of the giddy and thoughtless public, except the resolute way of putting the truth into a political platform, nominating worthy candidates to represent it, and refusing to vote for any others. It is not with any expectation of carrying the next Presidential election that I have come now to favor such a course; to success of that sort I confess I am indifferent. But I see the terrible ignorance which pervades this nation respecting equal rights in religion and the only permanent safeguards of religious liberty; I see the terrible peril to which this ignorance exposes us, as revealed with startling plainness in the nation's narrow escape last year from an orthodox amendment of the Constitution. All possible objections to the contrary, notwithstanding, it is in my opinion a solemn duty for the resolute friends of secular government to form now a new conscience-party, invincible by the truth of its ideas and the justice of its measures, willing to risk defeat at the poles rather than to be longer silent or unheard, and inspired by omnipotent moral enthusiasm to raise a standard of principles which shall at last compel the homage of mankind.

So much for the general movement proposed: now for the principles which constitute its life. The first and central of these is the total separation of Church and State, which implies that the State exists for itself, and not for the Church, and has its foundation in the right of every national community to administer their secular affairs by exclusively secular methods. The second is national protection for national citizens, and necessarily follows from the acknowledgment of the reciprocal secular obligations of the nation and the citizen—the nation claiming supreme allegiance from the latter, and being bound in return to afford that personal protection which is the only just warrant for the claim. The third is universal education the basis of universal suffrage in this secular republic, and affirms the impossibility of sustaining secular republican government without virtue and intelligence in the people. These three principles are really one and the same; each implies the other two; and no clear or logical mind, having affirmed the first, will long hesitate to affirm the rest.

Now the Constitution of the United States is wholly built on the first of these three principles, that Church and State ought to be totally separated; it totally separates them so far as the government is theoretically concerned, though it fails to give explicit and adequate guarantees for this separation in practice. To seek such guarantees, therefore, and to claim the faithful application of this underlying principle of the entire Constitution, is the high duty of every patriot who understands the true spirit of secular popular government. Surely I need not dwell long on a point so plain and elementary.

But the second principle of the three—that the national citizen is entitled to national protection is not yet fully recognized in the Constitution. Abroad, in foreign lands, the United States government acknowledges the obligation to protect its own citizens by the whole power of the nation, if necessary; but at home it does nothing of the sort. Here at home it turns over to the separate State governments all responsibility for protecting United States citizens in their fundamental personal rights; and if any State refuses or neglects to afford such protection, the oppressed citizen can get no redress from the national government. Yet the national government claims from every citizen his supreme allegiance—taxes him, conscripts him in war, demands of him the last great sacrifice of life in its own defense! There is a fatal defect in our political system. If the nation as such claims supreme allegiance from the individual citizen, and forbids him to yield his supreme allegiance to his own particular State, then it is bound, as a nation, to protect him in return, and not to evade this sacred duty by turning him over to his State without appeal. We are no nation at all, if this reciprocal obligation of supreme allegiance, on the one hand, and personal protection, on the other, is not acknowledged and discharged. That the American people are inflexibly resolved to be a nation in the true sense of the word was settled forever by the great civil war; and it is only a question of time how soon they will acknowledge the obligation they have thus assumed toward the individual citizen. Local self-government for local purposes, and national government for national purposes—that is the true and accepted theory of free institutions; but the personal protection of the citizens, in their fundamental individual rights, is to-day erroneously classed among the local purposes of State government. This is a great and perilous mistake. The towns and counties of each State to-day enjoy local self-government; but it is the State itself, not the towns or counties, that is responsible for the personal protection of the citizen, and that discharges the obligation through its own State courts. All that is needed is to carry out more thoroughly this same system, and, without violating in the least the principle of local self-government, extend the arm of national protection over the individual citizen. Not until this is done shall we become a true nation; not until this is done has the national government any right to demand from its citizens their supreme allegiance. But this will be done, and every far-seeing national patriot will seek to hasten the day.

The great principle of national protection for national citizens has immediate and momentous applications to the living questions of the day. Let me point out a few of them.

1. Every friend of EQUAL RIGHTS IN RELIGION should be heartily in favor of this principle; for it will protect him, as he is not now protected, in the enjoyment of these rights. The National Constitution is strictly secular, and gives no shadow of excuse for the violation of equal rights in religion; whereas almost all the State Constitutions, in some of their provisions, more or less deny them. The rights of free conscience and free thought are the most precious of all rights, dearer than life or property to all who cherish a noble self-respect; and for the protection of these rights, above all others, the individual citizen must look at last to the power which claims his supreme allegiance—that is, the nation, and not the State.

2. Every friend of the FREEDMEN should be heartily in favor of this principle. The Southern question is not yet settled. Thoughtful men have no quarrel with the policy of "pacification and reconciliation" of President Hayes; but this policy does not settle the grave questions involved. From the day when the slaves of the South were emancipated by the national government, the people of the North have recognized and felt the obligation thereby imposed on the nation to protect these poor creatures in their fundamental rights. President Grant tried to discharge this obligation by bolstering up Republican State governments at the South by means of the army. This experiment failed, naturally enough; that is not the way by which a republican nation must protect its citizens. President Hayes has withdrawn the troops, as was right under the circumstances; no other course was, in fact, open to him. But how is the question left? The nation is utterly unable now to protect the freedmen in their individual rights; yet millions of citizens are vaguely and uneasily conscious of their obligation to do so as a nation. Universal handshaking is a very good thing; every true patriot rejoices in the prospect of restored good-feeling between the South and the North. But all this effusive demonstration of amity leaves unanswered the grave question which lurks in the background: how is the nation to protect the freedmen whom it has emancipated? For this question President Hayes has no answer. He can only point to the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments of the Constitution, which do not protect the freedmen as individuals, but only forbids certain kinds of State legislation. He can only hope that the separate States, to which this duty is now solely entrusted, will faithfully protect the freedmen in their individual rights. In case of any failure, however, to protect these rights, the nation cannot interfere at all, unless the oppression takes the shape of formal State laws. Is this enough? Are the American people willing to leave a question of such magnitude, involving their own moral obligations to the poor and feeble, in such a state as this? They cannot protect the freedmen by the United States army, nor is that the way desired by any large-minded patriot. But they can do it, and ought to do it, by the United States courts; and therefore every friend of the freedmen ought to favor this great principle of national protection for national citizens through the national courts.

3. Every friend of WOMAN SUFFRAGE ought to favor heartily the same great principle; for women have been already recognized by the Supreme Court as citizens of the United States, and, if all such citizens are equally protected by the nation in their equal political rights, women-citizens will enjoy all the political rights of men-citizens, including that of suffrage. Moreover, this platform of the National Liberal League, if successful in the appeal to the people, will secularize the State at the same time that it enfranchises women, and thereby remove the greatest objection felt by so many Liberals to this latter step—the objection that woman suffrage would tend to favor the designs of those who aim to Christianize the State. Is it not a great gain to put the woman suffrage movement into such a shape that it shall command the hearty support of all who believe in secular government? If the friends of the woman suffrage movement comprehend the principles and truly practical interests of their own cause, they will be ready, and more than ready, to give their heartiest support to the political platform now proposed, and sustain the movement on its behalf to the utmost extent of their power.

These and other practical consequences which would follow the success of the platform to be submitted to the National Liberal League ought to insure a vast vote in its favor at the polls; and this will be the ultimate result, if the League should now take the field on its behalf. I have not touched on the third principle—that which would make the nation require every State to sustain good public schools, just as some of the States to-day require the towns to do so. This is the only way to solve the educational question at the South efficiently, yet without military force. The nation has the highest right—that of self-preservation—to require that all its own citizens shall be decently educated; and the day is approaching when this abstract right will be intelligently and effectively asserted.

Fellow-Liberals, I have briefly and inadequately pointed out the chief bearings of the principles advocated in the platform which is, I hope, to be the subject of your own grave deliberation and action at Rochester. I appeal to you, with a strength of earnestness which I am powerless to express, to step forward bravely and assert these great principles in the hearing of the whole American people. I appeal to you to form a new conscience-party for the maintenance of those ideas and noble measures which are now indispensable to the national welfare. This is no narrow or crack-brained enterprise; it is nothing but the sober dictate of the purest and most enlightened patriotism. Think for yourselves on the subject here so imperfectly presented; follow no man's whims or dreams, but rather the noblest promptings of your own highest nature; and be sure that, however misjudged or abused, you will enjoy the proud consciousness of having labored unselfishly in your generation for the welfare of your country and your race.

Great Jehovah, are there not many characteristics appertaining to thy revealed word, not yet alluded to, which are well calculated to shake the confidence of thinking people in its divinity?

While it narrates the occurrence of many events impossible to have taken place in unison with the laws of the Universe, which are never superseded, does it not omit to state important eras and events which have had a certain existence?

Does not the Bible fail to say anything about the upheaval of mountains and continents which is now well-known to have occurred from time to time since the earth existed?

By the marine deposits, sea-shells, etc., which have been found on the summits of the highest mountains in the world, like the Himalayas in Asia and the Alps in Europe, and many of the mountains and hills on this continent, have we not conclusive proof that they once emerged from the bed of the ocean?

Were they not by the forces in the interior of the earth projected, rapidly or slowly, from beneath the waters of the ocean to the altitude they now occupy?

Have not these mighty upheavals occurred at various times over the entire surface of the globe? Do not all the mountains and hills over the earth, in the strata of rocks, gravel, clay, etc., afford the clearest proofs that upheavals have taken place?

While islands and continents have sunk beneath the waters of the oceans, have not others arisen in other localities? Have not these changes taken place on the earth for thousands of years?

Does the Bible contain any allusion to these momentous events, or does it intimate that anything of the kind has ever occurred?

Does it make the slightest allusion to the Glacial Period, when, in the long ago, from about the 40th degree of north latitude to the pole, both on the Eastern and Western Hemisphere, immense masses of ice, rocks, gravel and clay, moved by the action of water, were carried to great distances, to be finally melted by the action of the sun's rays, depositing the rocks and earths thus removed, to be left as "drift," by which term such deposits are now known?

Are there not abundant proofs in the rubbed, worn, scratched and polished surfaces of rocks where such drift is found that those immense bodies of ice, rocks and earth did move from place to place in the manner described?

Does not the silence of the Bible upon this important subject show conclusively that the writers of the book had no knowledge that there ever was such an era in the history of the globe? If the writers knew aught of it, should they not have said something about it, even though it preceded by thousands of years the advent of man upon the earth?

Is it not a little singular that the great Continent of America, extending nearly ten thousand miles, embracing all varieties of climate, and destined to be the home of millions of the human race, was wholly unknown to the writers of thy book?

If they drew their inspiration from the source of all knowledge and truth, how is it that so important a matter, so connected with the life of man on the earth, was never alluded to?

Is not this silence respecting America more noticeable when the fact is taken into consideration that there are very strong proofs that America is the oldest part of the globe, and that it existed as a continent long before the Himalayas or the Alps had been raised from the depths of the ocean, and when we have the clearest reasons for thinking that it was populated by civilized and cultured people who built cities and executed works of art at a time earlier than when the Bible was written?

Are not the errors and inaccuracies of the Bible sufficient to cause thinking people to doubt its divine origin? Is it possible that with thee there is a possibility of making mistakes and committing errors?

Were not all the books of the Bible copied and re-copied many times? and is it not true that they were mere transcripts of transcripts, with errors and changes creeping in with every new copy made?

After what is called King James' translation was published, in 1611, was it not found by Bishops Tenison and Lloyd that thousands of errors had crept in?

In 1689 did not Dr. Blayney correct a multitude of errors that had not before been discovered? and did he not reform the text in many places and correct the defective chronology in many instances?

In view of the great numbers of errors the book contained, did not the British and Foreign Bible Society, after issuing and circulating millions of copies, declare that a faithful examination of it gave rise to serious doubts as to whether it can truthfully be called the Word of God?

Did not the American Bible Society, in 1847, appoint a committee of its members to prepare a standard edition of King James' version free from errors, and did they not prepare such an edition, correcting, as they confessed, twenty-four thousand errors? and did not the fear of the consequences of making so many changes alarm them so greatly that they decided to defer making the corrections? and are they not to this day continuing to circulate in vast numbers a book which, by their own acknowledgement, contains twenty-four thousand errors?

Is it not true that the Bible Revision Committee in England, which for nearly ten years has been industriously engaged in making changes and improvements in thy revealed word, given out the information that the present version contains some one hundred and fifty thousand errors of one kind and another?

When they shall have completed their work, and the changes are all made, when they shall have the improved Word of God all completed, is there not danger that it will be so changed from the Bible we knew in our childhood that we can scarcely recognize it as the same production?

If the book is right now as it has been accepted for two hundred and fifty years, will it still continue to be right when such a great number of changes shall have been made in it? If it is a divine and perfect production, can it possibly be right to tamper with it so extensively?

Let us ask, again, when the fact is brought to our minds that so many errors exist in thy book, is it not enough to destroy all belief in its being directly from thy brain and thy hand?

Can it be possible that the highest confidence and veneration can always be cherished for a book that requires such extensive doctoring, tinkering, and remodeling?

Is not the influence which the Bible has exerted on woman a great argument against its divinity? Has it not placed her in subjection to the opposite sex and persistently held her in that degraded position?

With a few exceptions, were not the women of the Bible mere slaves to the male sex? and were they not regarded as ministers to the sensual passions of men? Was the disposition anywhere shown to accord to woman the position in society and in the affairs of life that justly belongs to her?

In view of the fact that the Bible has recognized polygamy, which at best is a relic of barbarism, is not that quite enough to shake one's belief in its divinity? Can it be possible that the great father of all goodness connives and co-operates with that vile institution?

Did not many of thy most marked favorites, among whom may be named Abraham, Jacob, Gideon, David, Solomon, and others, openly practice polygamy? and is there an instance where thy word ever discountenanced them on account of their indulgence in the degrading practice of having a plurality of wives?

Could men be really first-class patriarchs and saints who were so sensual that their passions could not be gratified short of from five to one thousand different women?

Has not the Bible damaged its claim to divinity by its advocacy of human slavery? Does it not recognize in numerous instances that unrighteous institution?

Can it be possible that a being who is equally the kind parent of all races and peoples should lavish all his favors on one special race, and willingly see others subjected to slavery and oppression without lifting a finger or saying a word to prevent it?

Is not slavery wholly incompatible with divinity, as it is with true humanity, and is it not an axiomatic truth that a book which recognizes and authorizes the slavery of one human being to another, or of one race to another, cannot come from a divine source?

Is not the partiality and favoritism for particular individuals and a special race of men that is all through to be seen in the Bible, a strong proof that it is not of divine origin? Can the kind providence, who is as much the parent of one as of another indulge in partiality and unjust preferences? Should not his love and kindness be bestowed upon all his children alike? Is not the very fact that the claim for this kind of favoritism is set up strong presumptive proof that it is all the invention of the people thus supposed to be favored?

Is not the sanction which the Bible gives to murder, war, and bloodshed, another strong proof that it is not the out-breathing of divinity? Are we for a moment to believe that the Divine Being could take pleasure in cruelty, the taking of life, the shedding of blood, the extermination of whole races of men, and the devastation of whole countries by war and desolation?

Must it not be obvious to every person who has a clear conception of Deity that narratives that teem with the details of carnage, pillage, massacres, bloodshed, wars, and wholesale murders, are the work of a semi-barbarous, unprogressed people, rather than an emanation of the divine Mind?

Has it not been the effect of the Bible to retard science, and hold its devotees in the belief of crude errors—or rather to prevent their knowing the truth—about the age and form of the earth, the magnitudes and distances of the heavenly bodies, the nature and chemical qualities of the primates or simple forms of matter, of the eternal union between matter and force, of the laws of chemical affinity in the formation of all components forms of substance, and much else in that direction? Is it not opposed to the nature of divinity to purposely keep men in ignorance and darkness?

When we find in that book the strongest proofs of ignorance about the substance of which the earth is composed, about the stratified formation of its crust, about its great age, its connection with the planetary system, including the sun; about the vast number, vast size, and vast distance of the fixed stars or suns, are we not fully justified in concluding that the creator of all, who must necessarily know all about it, had nothing to do with the getting up of the book?

Is it not a proof that Divinity had little to do in writing that book when the fact is borne in mind that it recognizes and approves of human sacrifices, as in the case of the sons and grandsons of Saul, and "those devoted to the Lord," as described in Leviticus xxxii, 28, 29? Is not the great severity evinced toward witches or those supposed to be bewitched, saying they should not be suffered to live, etc., a clear proof that there was no divinity in the injunction, very little humanity, and a great deal of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty?

An Evening With the Ghosts.

By special invitation we passed the evening of the 8th inst. at a Spiritual seance presided over by Mrs. Maud E. Lord, medium, at the residence of Mr. Phillips, 222 W. 37th st. It is possible that a portion of our readers may think we were in poor business, and that those two hours were worse than thrown away. Others, again, may be interested in a description of the seance and of our experience there. For the benefit of the latter class we will narrate what occurred, and trust all will accord us the credit of giving a candid statement.

The circle consisted of sixteen persons, all of whom, with the exception of one individual, were strangers to us. Chairs were placed in a circle some ten feet in diameter. It brought the chairs so close together that they nearly touched each other. In these the visitors were seated, male and female alternately, so far as practicable, though the males were in a majority. We clasped hands all round. Mrs. Lord sat in a chair in the centre of the circle, and she was so near those in the circle that by putting forward our feet we could touch hers. A portion of the time we guarded her feet with our own to be assured that she remained seated in her chair. When we were not thus acting as sentinel, another performed the same service. The gas was extinguished, and the room was as dark as midnight.

There were no persons in the room save those in the circle and Mrs. Lord. The doors had been locked so none could enter, and it was nearly impossible for any one to enter the circle, even were they in the room. Mrs. Lord, to give assurance that she took no part in any manifestations that might be made, kept constantly striking the back of her right hand into the palm of the left. This could be plainly heard by all present, and gave them assurance that her hands were so occupied that she could not lend them to other business.

In a very few moments after the room was darkened, a guitar, which had been placed against our knee, was taken and played upon. After tuning it for a few minutes, it floated over our heads near the ceiling and in various parts of the room. It was also placed in the laps and on the heads of several in the circle. A bouquet of flowers which a gentleman had brought with him was several times carried round and held to the nose of each individual, allowing him to inhale its odors. We were also fanned vigorously with a large palm-leaf fan.

Numerous moving lights were seen, of different sizes, from the size of a pea to that of a person's head, and from one foot to eight feet from the floor. Some of these were quite brilliant and others were dim. Voices were heard all around the circle, which were believed to be the voices of spirits. These varied in distinctness; some were faint and hard to be distinguished, others distinct and easily understood.

Hands touched us repeatedly, sometimes patting the knees, sometimes grasping the hand. Our own hand was touched repeatedly, sometimes very gently with soft, warm, velvety fingers which seemed hardly like human fingers, and once our hand was grasped firmly and shaken with vigor. Our beard was pulled and stroked caressingly. By our knee we heard a voice speaking these words: "My own papa." We know not who uttered the words, but we lost a little daughter who died in early infancy. The touches in this connection were very gentle. A plainer and louder voice clearly spoke this name, "Mary Jane Bennett." We will remark we had a lovely sister by that name who died in childhood, forty years ago.

Several songs were sung, among others "The Sweet By and By." We remarked that it was popular music here and perhaps the spirits were equally well pleased with it. In a moment we distinctly heard a voice very near us say, in what appeared to be a man's voice, "There is a sweet by and by in the future."

A Mr. Cottrell from Boston received numerous attentions from what purported to be little children of his who had died. They spoke to him several times, sat in his lap, took a pencil from his pocket and handed it to a man on the opposite side of the circle; took his watch from his pocket and wound it up with the key and returned it to his pocket. Those present could hear the winding.

One feature of the demonstrations was that two or more of what were claimed to be spirits seemed to be operating in different parts of the circle at the same time, and the voices alluded to were heard at the same instant when Mrs. Lord was speaking or when she was engaged in conversation with some one. It appeared to be impossible that she could have produced the voices, the lights, the repeated sharp rappings, that were heard on the guitar as it remained stationary or floated in the air, or touched and shook hands with persons in different parts of the circle at the same moment. We are positive that she did not move from her seat during the sitting. What produced the phenomena that occurred we will not presume to say. It may not have been the spirits of departed friends, but still that theory would seem as probable as any other. It is very easy to cry out "fraud," but that does not explain it to our satisfaction. We feel convinced that Mrs. Lord did not practice fraud that evening, and that she had no accomplice there who did. Let those who have curiosity in the matter test it for themselves when opportunity serves.

"Common Sense."

Col. Peterson, having had the misfortune to be burned out in Paris, Texas, and to lose all his type, etc., has moved Common Sense to St. Louis. The number for Oct. 1 has been issued from that city, and in it we are sorry to notice a not very friendly allusion to ourselves. Mr. Peterson blames us for publishing a brief letter from a personal friend, noticing the death of Charles Stephenson, another friend. We had not the slightest intention of stirring up the ire of a Common Sense man, or the faintest desire to say aught to his injury. The obituary notice alluded to merely said that Stephenson contracted the disease that caused his death while traveling North from Texas, and incidentally stated where the details of the journey could be found. For printing this letter Col. Peterson charges us with seeking to "advertise Stephenson's filthy pamphlet." We sought to do nothing of the kind. The obituary notice was read over hurriedly and given place in our columns like any other similar communication. We had no more intention of hurting Peterson than of hurting the Sultan of Turkey. He speaks of the short communication as having been "written ostensibly by an irresponsible renegade named Morgan R. Nichols." We cannot envy a man his disposition who can speak in that manner of a worthy young man, or who will speak of another young man, who is dead and unable to defend himself, as "the lying dog that Bennett got to write verses for his hybrid song book, and of whom he is now trying to make a dead lion." This sentence teems with venom and injustice. We have not attempted to lionize our deceased young friend Stephenson. We simply announced his death—that is all. We never met him, but corresponded with him frequently, and came to regard him as a friend. He was a talented young man and a clear-headed Freethinker. From those who knew him best we learn that he was a young man of good character and principles. When we were soliciting contributions for the "Truth Seeker Collection," Stephenson, though far gone with consumption, generously responded and sent us several excellent pieces. He was a good poet, and we will submit it to those of our readers who have the Collection whether his contributions are not worthy a place in that volume. We entertain much respect for the memory of this young Liberal who laid down his life in early manhood, and we can see no justice, no honor, in polluting that memory by calling him "a dog."

Neither can we see why the editor of Common Sense should say of the obituary referred to that it was ostensibly written by Nichols. Is there any doubt about his having written it? Does the gentleman think we wrote it? If so, he is greatly mistaken. We did not write a word of it, and barely read it before it was in type. It was written by young Nichols, ostensibly or not ostensibly. We have a personal acquaintance with Morgan R. Nichols. We regard him as an intelligent, industrious, worthy young man, and are confident that we can produce the affidavits of one hundred men of good character, who have known him from boyhood, who will testify to the same effect, and that he is not an "irresponsible renegade."

If to be compelled to leave his bigoted father's roof rather than yield his honest convictions in the principles of Freethought; if to thus go out at an early age into the world to buffet life's vicissitudes by himself; if to make a long, wearisome journey to Texas by the advice of an editor of a Liberal paper, only to have his young hopes blasted, constitutes a "renegade," then Nichols is a renegade. But Webster defines renegade to be "a common vagabond, a worthless or wicked fellow." In this sense Nichols is certainly not a renegade. We cannot see the propriety or justice of applying epithets to young men of good reputation, especially after they are dead and unable to speak in their own defense.

"Beyond the Veil."

We have now in process of preparation, and to be completed in the course of a month, a beautiful volume bearing the above title, which we are bringing out for two friends in California—namely, Mrs. Luna Hutchinson, of Bishop Creek, and Mrs. Francis H. McDougall, of Merced. It is decidedly a Spiritualistic work, and purports to be written through inspiration by the two ladies above named and dictated by the spirit of Percy Beverly Randolph. It treats elaborately and beautifully of the spirit homes "beyond the veil," and of the subtle forces which permeate both the sub-lunary and the spirit worlds. Much of it is written in poetical, flowery language, and will be read with peculiar interest by all believers in a life beyond the grave. It will contain a steel engraving of P. B. Randolph. It will be printed on fine paper, with beautiful type and neat binding. It will be such a book as many will be glad to read. A 12mo volume. Price, $1.50 by mail. Orders may be addressed to either of the ladies named or to D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth st., New York, and they will be promptly filled when the book is out.

ON SUNDAY last J. W. Stillman, of this city, delivered a Liberal lecture at Wright's Hall, at Freeport, on Long Island. His subject was from the text in Job, "Canst thou by searching find out God? canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?" His discourse was an able examination into the arguments, pro and con, of the existence of God, and he came to the conclusion that there is no valid proof of the existence of any God outside of the Universe.

THE first of a series of three meetings in the interest of labor, is to be held at Science Hall on the Eve. of Thursday, the 18th, and will be continued on Thursday evenings. The main discourse, is on "The Labor Revolt," by Miss C. A. Blodgett, followed by ten-minute speeches by others.

Science and Religion.

FROM A LECTURE BY PROF. FELIX ADLER AT FLORENCE, MS.

A great conflict is raging. The battle between science and the old religious beliefs has been waged now for years and years, and is not by any means over yet. We are entering a new age, with new conceptions and new ideas. These conceptions, called the new ideal, offer a rich mine of generous motives and make us stronger and greater men. The old ideal, especially that of the Middle Ages, is passing away steadily from among us. It was a supernatural, transcendental idea, which regarded man as an exile from the kingdom on high, hoping continually to return there, if he only passed his life here in prayer and devotion, and dismissed from his mind all earthly cares and troubles. Slowly and by degrees have we learned to appreciate Nature in its true light. We have found that the human body is not alien to the mind within it. The new ideas makes us regard ourselves as the sovereigns and creators of the world, and presses us onward to new and better thoughts, while the old ideal emphasizes prayer and supplication. In these supplications a request was often made to the Deity as if he were a man. There were also prayers for rain, for good crops, and plenty of children, that the villages might be populated. In many American churches to-day prayers are offered on certain occasions that must be considered not only an insult to our intelligence but also a direct contradiction of the belief in an all-wise Providence. When people pray in time of drouth for a moderate rain, or at any time pray for seasonable weather, the modern view of the new ideal enters its emphatic protest against these prayers. The laws of Nature are never broken. The rains and winds follow their bidden course, regardless of prayers. The world is a cosmos, and to pray for its disarrangement is simply monstrous. It is to pray for its destruction. The very men who profess to believe in an all-wise, great Ruler, are the very first to belie their professions by indulging in such prayers. The disarrangement of a single part of the machinery would destroy the harmonious working of the whole. The new ideal teaches that as time proceeds all will be better. Mankind will submit with better grace and dignity and greater fortitude to the inevitable. It teaches us to look forward in ages yet to come to a race of men bright and stronger than those ever seen. In the remote future these men will reap what we have sown, and they will gather the fruition of our labors. The old ideal professed to see in the past ages the very best that was ever given to man. The oracles then spoke, and whatever they uttered was regarded as imperishable truth. Not so says the new ideal. It does not throw its contempt upon the entire past, but while gauging it at its true value, it nevertheless looks to the future with great hope.

By PROF. W. ROBERTSON SMITH, OF THE UNIVERSITY OF ABERDEEN.

And now a single word on the way in which these various elements, mirroring so many sides of the national life, and dating from so various ages, came to be fused into a single history, and yet retained so much of their own identity. The Semitic genius does not at all lie in the direction of organic structure. In architecture, in poetry, in history, the Hebrew adds part to part instead of developing a single notion. The temple was an aggregation of small cells, the longest Psalm is an acrostic, and so the longest Biblical history is a stratification and not an organism. This process was facilitated by the habit of anonymous writing, and the accompanying lack of all notion of anything like copyright. If a man copied a book it was his to add and modify as he pleased, and he was not in the least bound to distinguish the old from the new. If he had two books before him to which he attached equal worth, he took large extracts from both, and harmonized them by such additions or modifications as he felt to be necessary. But in default of a keen sense for organic unity very little harmony was sought in points of internal structure, though great skill was often shown, as in the book of Genesis, in throwing the whole material into a balanced scheme of external arrangement. On such principles minor narratives were fused together one after the other, and at length in exile a final redactor completed the great work on the first part of which Ezra based his reformation, while the latter part was thrown into the second canon. The curious combination of the functions of copyist and author which is here presupposed did not wholly disappear till a pretty late date; and where, as in the books of Samuel, we have two recensions of the text, one in the Hebrew and one in the Septuagint translation, the discrepancies are of such a kind that criticism of the text and analysis of its sources are separated by a scarcely perceptible line.

Poetical Books.—The origin of some leading peculiarities of Hebrew poetry has been recently referred to by Assyriologists to Accadian models; but, however this may be, the key to the whole development of the poetical literature of Israel is found in the same psychological characteristics of the race which are impressed on the vocabulary and grammatical structure of the language. The Hebrew tongue is sensuous, mobile, passionate, almost incapable of expressing an abstract idea, or depicting a complex whole with repose and symmetry of parts, but fit to set forth with great subtilty individual phases of Nature or feeling. It is the speech of a nation whose naturally quick perceptions minister to an emotional temperament and an imperious will, which subordinates knowledge to action and desire, and habitually contemplates the Universe through the medium of personal feeling or practical purpose. To speak with the philosophers, the Hebrew character is one of predominant subjectivity, eager to reduce everything to a personal standard, swift to seize on all that touches the feelings or bears directly on practical wants, capable of intense effort and stubborn persistence where the motive to action is personal affection or desire, but indisposed to theoretical views, unfit for contemplation of things as they are in themselves apart from relation to thinker. In the poetry of such a nation the leading current must necessarily be lyrical, for the lyric is the natural vehicle of intense and immediate personal feeling. The earliest Hebrew poems are brief, pregnant expressions of a single idea, full of the fire of passion, full, too, of keen insight into Nature, in her power to awake or sustain human emotion; but recording this insight not with the pictorial fullness of Western art, but in swift, half-formed outlines, in metaphor piled on metaphor, without regard to any other principle of proportion or verisimilitude than the emotional harmony of each broken figure with the dominant feeling. Such a poetry could not but find its highest scope in the service of spiritual religion. The songs in Exodus xv and Judges v prove the early origin of a theocratic poetry; but the proper period of Hebrew psalmody begins with David, and its history is practically the history of the Psalter. Here, as in the case of historical books, we have to begin by questioning the tradition contained in the titles, which ascribe seventy-three Psalms to David, and, besides him, name as authors Asaph, the sons of Korah, Solomon, Moses, Heman, Ethan. Again the tendency is to refer as much as possible to familiar names. There is no reason to believe that any title is as old as the Psalm to which it is prefixed, and some titles are certainly wrong; for example, the author of the elegy on Saul and Jonathan could not possibly have written Psalm lxxxvi, which is a mere cento of reminiscences from other poems. On the other hand, the titles are not purely arbitrary. They seem to supply useful hints as to the earlier collections from which our present Psalter was made up. The Korahite and Asaphite Psalms may probably have been derived from collections in the hands of these families of singers; and the so-called "Psalms of David" were very likely from collections which really contained poems by David and other early singers. The assertion that no Psalm is certainly David's is hyper-skeptical, and few remains of ancient literature have an authorship so well attested as the eighteenth or even as the seventh Psalm. These, along with the indubitably Davidic poems in the book of Samuel, give a sufficiently clear image of a very unique genius, and make the ascription of several other poems to David extremely probable. So, too, a very strong argument claims Psalm ii for Solomon, and in later times we have sure landmarks in the Psalms of Habakkuk (Habakkuk iii) and Hezekiah (Isaiah xxxviii). But the greater part of the lyrics of the Old Testament remain anonymous, and we can only group the Psalms in broad masses, distinguished by diversity of historical situation and by varying degrees of freshness and personality. As a rule the older Psalms are most personal, and are not written for the congregation, but flow from a present necessity of individual (though not individualistic) spiritual life. This current of productive psalmody runs apparently from David down to the Exile, losing in the course of centuries something of its original freshness and fire, but gaining a more chastened pathos and a wider range of spiritual sympathy. Psalm li, obviously composed during the desolation of the temple, marks, perhaps, the last phase of this development. The epoch of the return was still not without poetic freshness, as some of the so-called "Songs of Degrees" (Pilgrim Songs?) prove. But on the whole the Psalms of the second temple are only reflections of old ideas, cast mainly in directly liturgical form, or at least embodying the experience of the nation rather than of the individual. The date of the latest Psalms is much disputed. Most lines of evidence suggest that the collection was complete before the latest books of the canon were written, but many expositors find in individual Psalms (xlii, lxxiv, lxxix, lxxxiii, etc.) clear traces of the Maccabee age. Letter from Colorado.

DENVER, COL., Sept. 12, 1877.

MR. EDITOR: I have recently had the pleasure of reading your edition of 1877, of the "Age of Reason," price 75 cents. It is in a very convenient size and form for a missionary work, and if circulated largely is calculated to liberalize the people and to emancipate them from their abject vassalage to ignorant church rule. I greatly revere the memory of Thomas Paine, and regard him as an honor to the human family. History does not furnish his parallel in those leading qualities of mind and heart that go so far to make the truly great man. Nor are the fruits of his untiring efforts for the welfare of his fellow-men less remarkable or less to be cherished—especially by the the American people—than the spotless memory of the man himself. More than any other man he might be called the founder of our system of government. It originated in his genius, and his counsels and courage through the revolution were never wanting in the grand struggle to carry the idea of perfect self-government to its full function. And today, while the church befools the memory of the man whose genius conceived and whose courage greatly aided to give them a government so liberal that it even allows them to slander the founders of that government, we behold the sad spectacle of a class of men pretending to be God's elect, divinely appointed, to declare his will to man, and yet who do not hesitate to belie their mission by slandering the man who said—and meant it too—"The world is my country and to do good my religion."

Mr. Paine struck a blow at superstition it will never recover from. Well might he have said that, "Where opinions are free, either in matters of government or religion, truth will finally and powerfully prevail." Every day the Church is becoming more liberal. One by one their absurd dogmas are being renounced by the more intelligent of its followers, and day by day we can note the fast-increasing speed of freethought ideas. The freethinkers of the world may therefore take courage. The ball of universal emancipation is rolling onward at an ever-increasing momentum. The progress of liberal ideas has been greater in the last decade than it was the twenty-five years preceding. In some of the mountain towns of Colorado the freethinkers outnumber five or ten to one the diminished following who are led by faith. It must be that the liberal strongholds are in the West and East. The time is fast approaching when old fogys must take a back seat or none at all; the latter more probably.

Catholic Doctrine.

Our Roman Catholic friends object to the public schools as "godless;" theirs were left to infer are godly. In their schools the young are nourished with pure doctrine, are guarded from error, and taught the lessons of duty and charity. So confident are American Catholics of the superiority of their educational system that they have made every possible effort to secure for it the aid of the public funds. Here and there, as in Minnesota, they have obtained the control of district schools, and have supplied them with their own text-books. Fortunately a text-book is occasionally issued which discloses the spirit of their teaching without disguise. Such a one has lately come under our notice, which has appeared, not in far-off Minnesota, but of all States in the Union, in Maryland, where it is claimed the Church illustrated its tolerant spirit in the early legislation of the colony. The volume is one of a series entitled, "Familiar Explanation of Christian Doctrine, adapted for the Family and more advanced Students in Catholic Schools and Colleges," published in 1875 by Kreuzer Brothers, Baltimore, and sanctioned by Archbishop Bayley. Lesson XII, is called, "No Salvation Outside of the Roman Catholic Church." The questions and answers run thus:

Q.—Since the Roman Catholic Church alone is the true Church of Jesus Christ, can any one who dies outside of the Church be saved? A.—He can not.

Q.—Did Jesus Christ Himself assure us most solemnly, and in plain words, that no one can be saved out of the Roman Catholic Church? A.—He did when He said to His Apostles, Go and teach all nations, etc.

Q.—What do the fathers of the Church say about the salvation of those who die out of the Roman Catholic Church? A.—They all, without exception, pronounce them infallibly lost forever.

A little further on may be found the following:

Q.—Are there any other reasons to show that heretics or Protestants who die out of the Roman Catholic Church are not saved? A.—There are several. They can not be saved, because—1. They have no divine faith. 2. They make a liar of Jesus Christ, of the Holy Ghost, and of the Apostles. 3. They have no faith in Christ. 4. They fall away from the true Church of Christ. 5. They are too proud to submit to the Pope, the vicar of Christ. 6. They can not perform any good works whereby they can obtain heaven. 7. They do not receive the body and blood of Christ. 8. They die in their sins. 9. They ridicule and blaspheme the mother of God and His saints. 10. They slander the spouse of Jesus Christ—the Catholic Church.

Again, page 97:

Q.—Now, do you think God the Father will admit into heaven those who thus make liars of His son Jesus Christ, of the Holy Ghost, and the Apostles? A.—No; He will let them have their portion with Lucifer in hell, who first rebelled against Christ, and who is the father of liars.

Q.—Have Protestants any faith in Christ? A.—They never had.

Q.—Why not? A.—Because there never lived such a Christ as they imagine and believe in.

Q.—In what kind of a Christ do they believe? A.—In such a one of whom they can make a liar, etc.

Q.—Will such a faith in such a Christ save Protestants? A.—No sensible man will assert such an absurdity.

Q.—What will Christ say to them on the day of judgment? A.—"I know you not, because you never knew me."

Again, page 104:

Q.—Are Protestants willing to confess their sins to a Catholic bishop or priest, who alone has power from Christ to forgive sins? "Whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them." A.—No, for they generally have an utter aversion to confession, and therefore their sins will not be forgiven throughout all eternity.

Q.—What follows from this? A.—That they die in their sins, and are damned.

These are the lessons instilled by Catholic teachers in the minds of American youth. . . This is not the teaching of an obscure priest, but of Archbishop Bayley, who is next to the American cardinal in churchly dignity. A Catholic school worms out of the public treasury an appropriation, and this is the faith to the building up of which the money is applied.—Harper's Weekly.

Sunday.

The following, from the editorial columns of the Telegram, is an indication of the attitude of the daily press towards Christian encroachments upon the rights of the people:

There are certain religious people in this city who are anxious to have the old-fashioned Puritan Sunday restored. They insist that on Saturday cooking shall be done for two days instead of for one; that the baker and the milkman shall be prohibited from vending their wares upon the Lord's Day, and that all men who profess to reverence the Sabbath shall shave themselves and black their boots before midnight of the last day of the week. Of course we suppose they would extend these principles into all the departments of life. They would suspend all Sunday traffic. They would stop the steamboat, the locomotive, and the street car. They would keep at home or in church the thousands of people who evidently enjoy themselves at Coney Island and the score of other lovely places near New York every fine Sunday in summer and autumn.

Well, gentlemen, after you had made all these changes and plumped the old Puritan Sunday down upon us, what would you have gained? You may, by such tyrannous measures, stop people from enjoying themselves on Sunday, but you cannot make them go to church. And who would want to go to church to listen to such sermons as you would preach to them—sermons made up of a howl and a snuff, addressed to sinners whom you divinely damn? Remember that the world moves, society progresses. We have improved upon the sort of Sabbath which our forefathers brought over in the Mayflower and planted upon the rocks of Massachusetts. Then we went to church three times a day and ever so many times a week. Now most of us find it quite enough to do to digest one good sermon on the Sabbath. In fact, one very good sermon is quite as much as any minister ought to be required to prepare during each week. If more is demanded of him, you force him into perfunctory work, and extract from him merely a string of homilies without heart, originality, intellect, or common sense.

We have advanced immensely upon the Sabbaths of our forefathers, and the sooner they understand it who are clamoring for a return of the old Puritan Sabbath the better. Our children, instead of being reared to hate Sunday, often look forward to it as a day of rest and innocent pleasure. We go even further, and claim that what is spitefully called the "Continental Sunday" is a much more reasonable way of satisfying the needs of a cultured and intelligent man than was the old Puritan Sabbath. The world of New York contains too many pious fossils, who forget that this is the nineteenth century, when common sense has ousted sanctimony.

In an account of a camp-meeting of Spiritualists at Cassadaga Lake, Chautauqua county, Sunday, Sept. 16th, the Chautauqua Farmer has the following. We have ourselves had the pleasure of listening to Bro. Harter, and were greatly pleased with his eloquence, genial spirit and hearty earnestness. But hear the Farmer: "The Rev. J. H. Harter of Auburn, N. Y., was introduced, and although the audience was apparently becoming weary, they all seemed compelled to stay, even after the train which was to carry them home had arrived and its departure expected at any time, still the crowd lingered, and his burning words of eloquence stirred the hearts of all. Mr. Harter seems to have great control over his audiences, and when he closed moved them to tears. Again, with his sparkling wit the words echoed and re-echoed with applause. The speaker was often interrupted during his address with applause, which sometimes seemed to be nearly deafening, but with a gesture of the hand he commanded quiet, and in a moment they were lost in admiration of his eloquence. We hope Harter will visit this vicinity, and if he speaks within a hundred miles of Willow Dale grove, we will venture the assertion that there will not be a dozen who heard him Sunday and who can get there, but what will hear him. Come again, Harter, and speak to us once more."

Mrs. Woodhull Vindicated.

Mrs. Woodhull and her sister having been harshly attacked in two of our city papers, we deem it only fair to give place to the following:

NEW YORK CITY, Oct. 3, 1877.

To the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER:

MY DEAR SIR: I have made a few remarks here, which I hope will find a place in your most valuable paper. I am a constant reader of the morning and evening papers of this city, and on looking over the Evening Telegram of September 10th past I saw an article in it headed, "Mrs. Woodhull in England," which attracted my attention. I read it all through, and must say I was astonished to see the language made use of in it about two innocent young ladies, Mrs. Woodhull and Miss Claflin, her sister, who, I presume, never did any harm to the editor of that paper or any one else. In order to vent his spleen and gratify his wicked disposition, he said they were now in London preparing to announce doctrines they had before advocated here, and which had given them such great notoriety throughout America. That statement he knew was false when he wrote it; and why he wanted to spit out his spite upon those ladies is what I cannot understand, unless it was because they had exposed, through the columns of their paper, his beloved friend, Henry Ward Beecher, in his wicked free love and adulterous conduct and principles that had so disgraced him and all his friends. I think now he would be glad to have the people think that those ladies once advocated the same principles and doctrines; but in that he will be most woefully mistaken. They are high-toned young ladies, of rare attainments, talent, and ability, and move in the best class of society here and elsewhere. They denounce with scorn and contempt free love and all its doctrines and principles and those who advocate it, Henry Ward Beecher included, and the editor, if you please. He speaks of them again as being in a new field in which to vent their opinions, of which, he says, the world is ignorant. What he could mean by such insinuations and language is what I cannot understand. They are not Mormons nor advocates of free love doctrines and principles; but true Americans, and they live uprightly and deal honorably with all people.

In the same article he speaks of marriages in England, and says that the people there think the marriage of one man to one woman is sufficient. That is just what I believe in, and so do those ladies; but his devoted friend, Henry Ward Beecher, does not believe in it; and if all is true I hear of him, he is following his footsteps, doctrines, and principles, to the very letter. Not wishing to go into a further detail of his motives and principles, that are so fully and clearly understood by the people here, I will just say I do hope he will mend his ways and become a better man.

An article similar to his about those ladies appeared in the New York Herald on the 28th day of June 1876, the next morning after their lecture in the Academy of Music in the city of Brooklyn, couched in language that I was astonished to see. For why the editor of that paper should have gone there and made such a report and then published it was a wonderment among the people who read it, and was truly astonishing to all those who were there and saw and heard the lecture; for they all knew it was false and libelous in every sense of the word. The Brooklyn papers, however, spoke very proper and honorably of them and their lecture, and from the tenor of the papers I think they denounced the article with scorn and contempt. Since then I have seen a number of articles in the Herald that I think would never have appeared had James Gordon Bennett, Sr., been living. The last one that attracted my attention was headed, "The Death of the Democratic Party; killed by Samuel J. Tilden." Who ever heard of such a falsehood and folly? I now think the editor of the Herald will soon become as notorious throughout the United States and elsewhere for his free-love and Mormon principles as ever Henry Ward Beecher or Brigham Young did. What will appear next let us wait and see.

B. CLAFLIN.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, Sept. 30, 1877.

MR. EDITOR: Dr. J. L. York of San Jose, California, has delivered a course of lectures in this city, and at the close of the course to-night before a crowded house in the Liberal Institute it was unanimously resolved,

"That Dr. J. L. York, by his eloquent, forceful and uncompromising lectures, has won the esteem and secured the thanks of all liberals in this community."

"That the resolution be forwarded to THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, Banner of Light and Religio Philosophical Journal, for publication."

Will you be good enough to publish the resolution. Dr. York is unique as a speaker, full of fire, without any cant, gesture and voice full of expression, tearing down all shams and building up again with morality, virtue and and progressiveness.

He is on his way to the East and you may be certain in all the large centres will do excellent work before very large audiences. We want such men. Good, eloquent, earnest, powerful men, will be to the front nowadays, and this man is all this. Yours very truly,
WM. H. HOLMES.

Friendly Correspondence.

"P. H. S." South Pueblo, Col., writes: I have just noticed Bro. Humphrey's advice to you to read Hugh Miller's "Testimony of the Rocks" to learn the whole truth about the Deluge. This reminds me of what happened to me when a teacher of a large Bible-class in a Baptist Sunday-school. The subject of our lesson was the Deluge. In preparing for the expected expounding I studied Hugh Miller's explanation that the Deluge was confined to a comparatively small part of Southern Asia, as mankind had not yet become widely dispersed. One bright young girl listened attentively to my wise explanation until I had finished, when she asked, "So the Deluge only extended to the mountains in the Southern part of Asia?" "That is all," I replied. Then she asked, "How long was Noah building the ark?" "One hundred and twenty years," I answered. "Well," she rejoined, "I don't know, but doesn't it look to you as though, if you had been Noah, about the time the flood was to commence you would have taken your animals and driven them just over the ridge where there wasn't any flood?" Can Bro. Humphrey get around this obvious, common-sense upsetting of Mr. Miller?

JAMES S. BEDEL, Hudson, Mich., writes: If there is one thing that pleases me above all others and truly interests me, it is the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion." Every one who reads my paper says that you have driven Mr. Humphrey to the wall. His case is lost beyond a doubt. This discussion has been of immense value to our cause and has materially strengthened the admiration of our readers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, which is bound to succeed because its matter is adapted to the wants of the people. To a person unaccustomed to reading it, it may seem rather harsh, but when one begins to compare it with facts, and finds that every sentence is full of truth and will bear a careful investigation, that feeling lessens at once and respect takes its place. I am on the watch-tower and am doing all I can for you and for the cause. THE TRUTH SEEKER is bound to succeed because it has science and truth for its companions. Wherever it is read it is tearing up the old landmarks of superstition, breaking down the barriers to progress, and paving the way for our fellow-beings to follow; and if its teaching are faithfully carried out, it will lead up through wisdom's paths, where superstition, bigotry and intolerance can never come.

Special Notices.

Spermatorrhoea.

Dr. R. P. Fellows' warranted cure should be in the hands of those suffering from this LIFE-WASTING disease. It is an external application and has made one thousand permanent cures, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition: had been in insane asylums, many had falling-sickness fits; others on the verge of consumption, while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

THE OUTCAST.

By WINWOOD READE author of "Martyrdom of Man."

This is his last work. Mr. Reade was unquestionably one of the ablest writers of the present century. His "Martyrdom of Man" attracted extraordinary attention in Europe and in this country, for its ability, brilliancy and boldness. This last work is regarded with equal favor. The English edition was published at two dollars. We give it entire for Christianity and Infidelity.

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN
REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n. Clergyman,
OF NEW YORK, AND
D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers; and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion.

PAYNE'S AGE OF REASON.

SETH WILBUR PAYNE, Editor.

The attention of the Independent Reasoners of America is called to a candidate for their favors. The first number of

PAYNE'S AGE OF REASON

will be issued on or about the

and regularly on the 15th of each month thereafter.

This much is promised, but should the support permit, it will be issued semi-monthly or even weekly, the latter being the intention of the proprietor. In either case the subscription price will remain the same.

IN QUANTITY, THE AGE OF REASON will contain sixteen pages of four wide columns each, or sixty-four columns of closely-printed matter, thus making it the largest by nearly one-half any known liberal publication.

While ITS MISSION will be to unfetter the minds of men from the dismal superstitions of the past, it will be a first-class family journal as well. It will have a variety of departments and the steady effort of its proprietor will be to make a paper that every independent reasoner and the members of his household will delight to read, pass among their friends, and loan to their church-riden and ministerially befooled neighbors. In the ORTHODOX SENSE, the AGE OF REASON will be intensely infidel, but in the purpose of its editor it will be a fearless, fair-dealing, first-class Liberal family journal.

It is believed that every liberal-minded, truth-seeking reader can but be pleased with it, and such are respectfully solicited to give it their support.

Heathens of the Heath;

A ROMANCE, BY WM. McDONNELL,

AUTHOR OF "EXETER HALL," ETC.

This work is rich in romantic and pathetic incidents, and exhibits with an overwhelming array of facts the atrocities committed by the Church. It shows that the purest morality exists without the Bible, and that many of the heathen philosophers were lovers of virtue. The folly of Christian ministers is fully portrayed. Hypocrisy and bigotry are clearly exposed, and the road to virtue and true happiness plainly marked out. A most pleasing romance is woven into the work, in which much opportunity is afforded the author for fine descriptions and beautiful sentiments which he so well knows how to give utterance to. The characters in the tale are invested with much interest; the hero and heroine gain the love of every reader. "On the whole, it is the work of a master hand—a work of unaffected beauty and the deepest interest." "One of the most valuable features of the work is, its positions are all proven. . . . Every thinking, enquiring mind should peruse it." 500 pp., 12mo. Price, in paper, $1.00; cloth, 1.50.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Author of "The Biography of Satan," and "The Bible of Bibles" (comprising a description of twenty bibles).

This wonderful and exhaustive volume by Mr. Graves will, we are certain, take high rank as a book of reference in the field which he has chosen for it. The amount of mental labor necessary to collate and compile the varied information contained in it must have been severe and arduous indeed, and now that it is in such convenient shape the student of freethought will not willingly allow it to go out of print. But the book is by no means a mere collation of views or statistics; throughout its entire course the author—as will be seen by his title-page and chapter-heads—follows a definite line of research and argument to the close, and his conclusions go, like sure arrows, to the mark.

Gems of Thought.

As for truth, it endureth, and is always strong; it liveth and conquereth forevermore. —Esdra.

NEVER do I fully realize how little and mean I am, nor how good and noble I long to become, excepting when I see myself in the light of some great, bright love. —Isaac T. Lloyd.

HEAR the verbal protestations of all men: nothing so certain as their religious tenets. Examine their lives; you will scarcely think they repose the smallest confidence in them. —David Hume.

As the sun of science lifts the curtain of the Dark Ages, the ghosts which credulity paints upon the background of the night disappear; and the superstitious tremble for the fate of their gods. —Isaac T. Lloyd.

Who is blind? He who is bent on doing what he should not. Who is deaf? He who does not listen to what is beneficial. Who is dumb? He who does not know how to say kind things at the proper time. —From the Hindoo.

The creed which accepts as the foundation of morals, utility or the greatest happiness principle, holds that actions are right in proportion as they tend to promote happiness, wrong as they tend to produce the reverse of happiness. —Mill.

OUR moral sentiments do not proceed from, but long precede our ethical systems; and it is usually after our characters have been formed that we begin to reason about them. It is both possible and very common for the reasoning to be very defective, without any corresponding imperfection in the disposition of the man. —Locky.

THE realm of death seems an enemy's country to most men, on whose shores they are loathly driven by stress of weather; to the wise man it is the desired port where he moors his bark gladly, as in some haven of the Fortunate Isles; it is the golden west into which his sun sinks, and sinking casts back a glory upon the leaden cloud track which has darkly besieged his day. —Lowell.

THINKING people look back with horror upon the blood tracks left in history by all creased religions, most especially by that one of them called Christianity. The very name of it is a falsehood. Christ is a Hindoo god, grafted on the Nazarene, Jesus. Really, the whole of this world's faiths are but modifications of the star worship of the Chaldeans. To all thinking minds all the deities and their families, all the celestial courts and their angels and demons, are absurd follies. —Anon.

I REGARD the dignities of kings and princes as the motes in a sunbeam; the value of gold and jewels, as that of a broken platter; dresses of the finest silks I regard as the scraps of silk given as presents. I regard the collective chiloecism as the letter "A." The different expedients in religious practice I regard as a mere raft to carry over the treasure. I regard the state of perfect mental equilibrium as the true standing ground, and all the various forms of apparitional existence as the changes of vegetation during the four seasons. —Buddha.

THERE is not a truth taught in the Bible that was not taught by pagans and heathens thousands of years before that book ever had an existence. They had the truth, but failed, even as we now do, to live wholly up to its teachings. There are great and good men all over the world, and always have been. Among the noblest and best men we have to-day are our scientists and philosophers. They give their whole lives to the search after facts and truths, but believe in nothing beyond or outside of matter, motion, and force. —Mrs. E. D. Stenker.

It is necessary that woman as well as man should come up to the scientific needs of the age, and she can never do that until she learns, as man has done, to subjugate sentiment to sound sense and make reason the master of her emotions. That will seem to many a hard and unwomanly doctrine to promulgate—the de-thronement of love, the subjugation of that which has hitherto been thought the thoroughly feminine element, sentiment and tenderness. But remember, I do not say or mean the destruction of them, only the relegating of them to their now proper secondary position. —Sara A. Underwood.

THE statesman is the leader of a nation, the warrior is the grace of an age, the philosopher is the birth of a thousand years; but the lover, where is he not? Wherever parents look around upon their children, there he has been; wherever children are at play together, there he will soon be; wherever there are roofs under which men can dwell, wherever there is an atmosphere vibrating with human voices, there is the lover, and there is his lofty worship going on, unspeakable, but revealed in the brightness of the eye, the majesty of the presence, and the high temper of the discourse. —Harriet Martineau.

THE whole scene of objects which we now behold will very shortly be replaced by others of similar mode. Let us reflect with what celerity the scenes of life are shifted; things glide along unceasingly like a rapid stream; the natural action is producing continual change; causes and effects are infinite in variety, and nothing is in a fixed and permanent state. Matter is transformed from one form or substance to another, in an infinite operation. He who contemplates these perpetual changes and vicissitudes, thus rapidly rolling on, like one wave upon another, will entertain but an humble opinion of mortal affairs. In short, the universal movement sweeps everything before it into the ocean of eternity and oblivion; the mutability of forms, but permanency of mode, is the attribute of the Universe. —Marcus Antoninus.

To make a girl love you, coax her to love somebody else. If there is anything that a woman relishes it is to be contrary.

WHEN a new minister, and unmarried at that, comes into the parish, it is remarkable what an interest all the young ladies take in the parsonage.

A CONNECTICUT woman who has lost five husbands in powder-mill explosions is about to marry a sixth, who is also a powder-mill operative.

A GEORGIA paper says: "The water-courses in this county are so low that the fish are obliged to stand on their heads in order to sustain life."

A SPINSTER lady of fifty remarked that she could go alone at six months. And her hateful brother had to remark that she'd been going alone ever since.

"DON'T show my letters," wrote a Rockland young man to the young lady whom he adored. "Don't be afraid," she replied, "I'm just as much ashamed of them as you are."

THE man who at a meeting recently so vociferously sang, "I would not live always," was afterwards seen sauntering down a lane at the top of his speed pursued by a spitz dog.

SOME one said to Victor Hugo once upon a time: "It must be very difficult to write good poetry." "No, sir," replied the poet, "it is either very easy or utterly impossible."

IRISH boatman (to timid Teuton):—"Och, niver mind what they're bin tellin' ye about the boat. She do capsize aisy, it's true, but that's nothing; she rights herself again in a jiffy."

WHEN an acquaintance says, "How are you?" and rushes by without waiting for a reply, it isn't worth your time to follow him more than half a mile to let him know that you are well.

A GROCER being solicited to contribute to the building of a church, promptly subscribed his name to the paper in the following manner: "John Jones (the only place in town where you can get eleven pounds of sugar for a dollar) 25 cents."

A KANSAS man purchased a revolver for his wife, and insisted on target practice so that she could defend her house in his absence. After the bullet was dug out of his leg and the cow buried he said he guessed she'd better shoot with an axe.

A YOUNG damsel of Lichfield, Ill., sent seventy-five cents and a postage-stamp in reply to an advertisement which appeared in an Eastern paper of "How to make an impression," and received for an answer, "Sit down in a pan of dough."

"DOCTOR, my daughter seems to be growing blind, and she's just getting ready for her wedding, too. O dear me! what is to be done?" "Let her go right on with the wedding, by all means. If anything can open her eyes, marriage will."

AN old citizen in a country village, on having a subscription list handed him toward purchasing a new hearse for the place, thus excused himself: "I paid $5 for a new hearse near forty years ago, and me and my folks hain't had the benefit of it yet."

AN honest yeoman of very correct habits who was told that if he smoked one cigar less a day for two years he could save money enough, principal and interest, to buy a good farm, has made himself sick as death every day for the past two weeks trying to learn to smoke. Thus is the path to honest industry beset with difficulties.

KEEN and cutting words, or even trifling incivilities, indulged in at the expense of counsels, have sometimes met with swift retribution. Plunkett was once engaged in a case, when, toward the end of the afternoon, it became a question whether the court should proceed or adjourn till the next day. Plunkett expressed his willingness to go on if the jury would "set." "Sit, sir, sit," said the presiding judge, "not 'set'—hens set." "I thank you, my Lord," said Plunkett. The case proceeded, and presently the Judge had occasion to observe that if such were the case, he feared the action would not "lay." "Lie, my Lord, lie," exclaimed the barrister: "not 'lay'—hens lay."

"If you don't stop your coughing, sir," said a testy and irritable judge, "I'll fine you $100." "I'll give you two hundred if you can stop it for me," was the ready reply.

CURRAN was one day addressing a jury, when the judge, who was thought to be antagonistic to his client, intimated his dissent from the arguments advanced by a shake of his head. "I see, gentlemen," said Curran, "I see the motion of his Lordship's head. Persons unacquainted with his Lordship would be apt to think this implied a difference of opinion, but be assured, gentlemen, that this is not the case. When you know his Lordship as well as I do, it will be unnecessary to tell you that when he shakes his head there is really nothing in it."

TRUTH SEEKER

DEVOTED TO SCIENCE AND MORALS.

FREETHOUGHT AND HUMAN HAPPINESS

Vol. 4. No. 42. { PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. } New York, Saturday, October 20, 1877. { SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. } $2 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

SEVERAL greenback men were elected to the Legislature in Maine.

THE great political parties of the near future will be the working people and the capitalists.

IN Rome there are 355 Catholic churches, 14 Protestant churches, and 4 Jewish Synagogues.

MRS. HEN appears among the members of the Minnesota Methodist Convention. She's a lay delegate.

TAX-PAYERS, workmen and greenbackers' parties are rapidly organizing and combining all over the country.

OSTRICH raising is lucrative in South Africa. They easily tame, and yield their crops of feathers in fourteen months.

THE United States has more miles of railroad than Germany, Russia, Turkey, Great Britain, France and Italy combined.

ALTHOUGH the Brazilian law recognizes the death penalty, the present Emperor has never yet consented to sign a death-warrant.

IN eleven and three-quarter years we have fattened the purses of bond-holders in gold interest, $1,422,057,577, or $121,000,000 per year.

THE Chinese language is spoken by about 350,000,000 people. The English language is spoken by from eighty to eighty-five millions.

THANKS to Mr. Beecher, whose nephew Gilman is, we learn what kind of a sin raising insurance stock certificates is. It is a "generic sin."

THE Terre Haute Express calls the greenback dollar "the people's dollar, the fighting dollar, that saved the country, while gold and silver sneaked away."

"GYPSY CHRISTIANS" is the well-chosen name given by a prominent religious paper to those people who wander from one church to another without any settled habits of permanence.

A DISPATCH from Calcutta says the cost to the government of India in consequence of the famine is $15,000,000, or $15,000,000. How immense must have been the suffering by the starving millions!

SOMEBODY has published anonymously at Leibnitz a book showing that the Colorado beetle, the phylloxera, the locust, and the cattle plague are the apocalyptic horsemen mentioned in Revelations vi, 2-8.

IT is positively becoming dangerous for pillars of the church and ornaments of society to be caught with stolen money in their pockets. Even the putting of a part into the collection plate on Sunday seems to have lost its efficacy. N. Y. Sun.

THE Rev. Brooke Herford, of Chicago, has been preaching on "Broken Banks and Mortgaged Churches." The subject is an appropriate one for the times, especially in view of the fact that so many deacons and elders of mortgaged churches are cashiers and defrauders of broken banks.

THE asinine clergy of Philadelphia are still hammering away at the management of the Permanent Exhibition for keeping the display open on Sundays. Poor devils of sinners are left to shift for themselves while the turrets of the building are bombarded with special sermons. —Telegram.

A NEW sect called "the Purifiers," belonging to the Greek Church, has sprung up in Russia. Their leading doctrines are that all persons must marry on coming of age; that the husband must be subordinate to the wife, and recognize her as the head of the family; and that once a week he must confess his sins to his wife.

THE Methodist speaks of a minister who thought that his whiskers stood in the way of his obtaining the blessing of perfect holiness. So he shaved them off one Saturday night, and on Sunday told, with smoothly-shaven cheeks, of what a blessing he had received. It adds, however, that in a few months afterwards this brother appeared with a fuller crop of beard and whiskers than he had ever before worn. He had learned that holiness and hair had but little to do with each other.

MISS MINNIE E. HODGES, who has just resigned the position of cashier and money order clerk in the Des Moines, Iowa, Post-Office, handled and paid out during six years $4,000,000, and never made a mistake of a cent. At times she had charge of the whole office, with twenty-five and thirty clerks under her direction.

PROF. GORINI of Milan has just invented a new and very cheap apparatus for cremating, which was recently tried on an old man of sixty-three, and worked admirably. In less than three hours there was nothing left of him—not even the slightest odor. The Professor has received many urgent requests for his services. The fuel used cost only sixty cents.

DURING the last nine months the United States exported to England 86,132,730 pounds of fresh beef, and 1,833,850 pounds of mutton. The total exports of meats to the Old World for the period mentioned amounted in value to $11,226,560. There were also exported 12,328,630 pounds of butter and 75,917,443 pounds of cheese, an increase in these lines of 33 per cent. over 1876.

At a recent lecture in this city, the lecturer in speaking of Beecher's "bread and water" sermon, related the following incident: "Mr. Beecher gets from $50,000 to $80,000 per year for his sermons and lectures. On one occasion he was drinking wine with Mrs. Victoria Woodhull. He was to deliver a temperance lecture the next evening. Victoria asked him how he could drink so much wine and then talk temperance. He replied that he took wine for the inner man; that it was the outer man that was going to lecture to the people.

BROTHER BOTT, the Baptist pastor in Philadelphia who was disfellowshipped by the association for unbecoming conduct with a young lady, has not been disciplined by his church. He is no longer pastor, yet he retains his membership in the church. The association now disfellowships the church on account of its refusal to investigate the charges against Bott. The difficulty is that some of the brethren and sisters have an unwholesome fear of Bott, and dread the consequences of a thorough investigation of his irregularities. Strangely enough, too, a large number of the sisters have unflinchingly espoused his cause.

THE site of the petrified forest of California is about one thousand feet above the sea level, and lies in the same trend with the Geysers, Mount St. Helena and the thermal springs of Calistoga. A recent visitor says that, geologically, it is one vast lava bed, in which the trees lie as they were thrown, probably thousands of years ago, by some convulsion of nature. The trees are in fragments, many of which have been converted into charcoal, others into lignite, and others into beautiful specimens of jet. Where the heart of the tree had decayed, the cavity is filled with opal, a form of lustrous uncrystallized silica, containing water. Chalcedony, another form of the silica, but clear and limpid, is found in other cavities. No top has been petrified, and only here and there a root.

BROTHER MOODY's town of Northfield provides a scoff at his work in the person of Mrs. Annie A. Preston, who writes to the Congregationalist that his revivals there have had no lasting good. In his first season he was aided by Sankey, Bliss, and Whittle; yet, she says, there were only forty ostensible conversions. Last summer he labored there again, but not a single sinner repented. But here is the worst of it: "People in Northfield nowadays have more to say about Mr. Moody's new residence, servants, visitors, games, music, dinners, toilets, horses, carriages, sheep, and other stock than about his religion. It is devoutly desired, however, that Mr. Moody's home influence will yet end in great good. He quite impressively stated in the pulpit on the Sunday above mentioned, while expressing his disappointment at the meagre results of his last two summers' stay, that it was like pounding on a rock here in Northfield; but," said he, "I mean to keep pounding, pounding, pounding."

A STATEMENT is going the rounds of the press about an up-town church which needed repairs, whose trustees, finding the amount subscribed was short of what was needed, made up the requisite sum by betting on St. Paul and Milwaukee railroad stock. This may have been a little irregular, but was no worse than holding a church fair with the attendant side shows of raffles, grab-bags and other petty swindles. But another and sadly different case of church repair has recently come to light. A well-to-do church needed enlargement and refurbishing, at an expense of several thousand dollars. Part of the needed money was raised in cash, and for the rest notes were given by the trustees. The repairs were finished about a year ago, and the notes are now falling due. Instead of having made other provisions to meet these notes, the trustees are meeting them out of the regular income of the church, and so completely using it up that the pastor has had to go without his salary. Probably that course is better than repudiation or gambling to raise the money.

SUNDAY IN SCOTLAND.

The face of kind Nature is fair;
But our system obscures its effulgence:
How sweet is a breath of fresh air!
But our rules don't allow the indulgence.
These gardens, their walks and green bowers,
Might be free to the poor man for one day;
But no, the glad plants and gay flowers
Mustn't bloom or smell sweetly on Sunday.

What though a good precept we strain,
Till hateful and hurtful we make it!
What though, in thus pulling the rein,
We may draw it so tight as to break it!
Abroad we forbid folk to roam,
For fear they get social or frisky;
But of course they can sit still at home
And get dismally drunk upon whiskey.

Then, though we can't certainly tell
What mirth may molest us on Monday,
At least, to begin the week well,
Let us all be unhappy on Sunday.

—Lord Neaves.

THE Methodists are trying to find out what becomes of all the probationers who are partially converted at camp-meetings and elsewhere, and taken into the church on trial. It seems that about half of them drop out, and can no more be found than stray pins and needles. With many of them the case is the same as that of the colored brother who, on being asked if he belonged to the church, said: "Well, I did kind o' belong; for I joined for six months on approbation, but dey said dey didn't like my behavior, so dey let me off in two weeks." A great many of the probationers who slip out after a brief trial are converted again at the next camp-meeting or revival exercises which they attend, only to fall from grace again after another short experience. This operation is repeated from year to year, as all outsiders are supposed to be proper subjects of converting grace. Thus there are some unsteady and gushing brethren, or rather half-brethren, who have been converted a dozen times or more, each time with more fervent protestations that they never will backslide any more. As church members these folks do not amount to much.

A CLERICAL VILLAIN.—The reverend Alfred Thompson, pastor of the Primitive Methodist church of Elgin, Ill., was, on the 16th inst., in General Sessions, sentenced by Recorder Hackett to five years' imprisonment in the State Prison at Sing Sing for stealing. Last spring his church granted him leave of absence to go to Europe for his health. On the return voyage he became acquainted with a fascinating lady, a Mrs. Cobham, the wife of another clergyman. Upon landing they stopped at the West Side Hotel, and she claims that he went to her trunk and robbed her of her money and jewelry. He claimed that she presented it to him, and asserted that the relations between them had been very intimate. "Do you mean to say," inquired Recorder Hackett, "that your relations with her were improper?" "Well replied the clergyman, with a leer, 'we all do such things more or less.' 'And are you a minister of the Gospel?' 'Yes,' Mrs. Cobham, upon being recalled, denied the improper relations. When sentence was pronounced, the Recorder said, 'Stand up and beset me! Well, sir; a more filthy beast I never met with, and a more depraved clergyman I never saw. I am sorry I cannot give you a severer sentence than five years in the State Prison at hard labor.' The Rev. Alfred Thompson smiled grimly as he retired between two officers.

Events of the Week.

ANOTHER week of charming Autumn weather.

THE yellow fever is rapidly spreading in South Carolina and Florida.

A $100,000 fire occurred at Whitby, Ont., which originated in the upsetting of a lamp.

SENATOR MORTON is said to be improving, and has been removed to Indianapolis.

ONE hundred and ninety Apaches surrendered to Gen. Pope at Wingate, Arizona.

THE centennial of Burgoyne's surrender was celebrated at Saratoga on Thursday, the 17th.

WAR appears to be imminent between the British government and the Afghans of Asia.

IT is reported that Theodore Tilton recently called upon Elizabeth and remained several hours.

ANOTHER planet, of the eleventh magnitude, has been discovered by Prof. Peters, of Clinton, N. Y.

CHIEF JOSEPH has at length surrendered to Gen. Miles. It cost our government many thousand dollars to get him.

THE Triennial Congregational Council met in Detroit on the 17th but Henry Ward Beecher was left out. He was not a member of it.

THE cigar makers are on a big strike. If they do not make another cigar in twenty years it will not discommode us in the least.

THE railroad magnates, Vanderbilt, Scott, Garrett, and Jewett, have decided to advance the rates of transporting grain from the West to the East.

THE elections in France on Sunday resulted in the choosing of 314 Republicans and 201 Conservatives. Gambetta was elected by an overwhelming vote.

ANOTHER defalcation. George T. Plume, a highly respectable and somewhat pious Wall street broker, has proved a defaulter to the tune of from $150,000 to $300,000, which creates a commotion in financial circles. Many parties lose heavily.

THE statement in this column last week that Congress had assembled was premature. It is true now, however. Congress has assembled, Randall has been elected Speaker, and the President has sent in his message, which, by the by, is brief.

A GREAT battle between the Russians and Turks has been fought in Armenia. The key to the Turkish positions was taken by storm. Mukhtar Pasha's army was routed and they retreated in disorder. After two hours engagement the Turks gave way and the Russians captured some thousands of prisoners and many cannon. It was the most important victory the Russians have gained and looks as though the Turks were placed at great disadvantage. Kars will soon be besieged.

THE extra pious and religious scoundrel Wm. C. Gilman, saw fit to give himself up and to confess himself guilty when arraigned before Recorder Hackett for forgery in the third degree, and was sentenced to five years hard labor at Sing Sing. It was an affecting time. His lawyer wept, the prosecuting attorney wept, and even Recorder Hackett wept when he sentenced the religious and unscrupulous villain. Such tender sympathy is not evinced when a poor devil is tried for stealing a coat to keep him from freezing, or a ham to keep his family from starvation.

ANNIE LOWMY, aged 14, and Jennie Golden, aged 13, of Chicago, tired of being confined in that small city, thought they would like to see more of this wide world; and, having heard much of Brooklyn, they fancied if they could once get there they would find excellent situations, and everything would be lovely. They accordingly left their homes clandestinely and by one way and another made their way to Brooklyn, but found that city far inferior to the one they had anticipated finding. After wandering about day after day, wearied and homesick, they were glad to avail themselves of the offers of the police to send them back to their homes.

BY HUDSON TUTTLE.

CHAPTER VII.

For the Bible, it is claimed that the human mind could not unaided have arrived at its moral code. Surely the mind of man could not have obtained a just conception of the angry, jealous Jehovah, whose garments were dyed red with the blood of the slain; his creation of the world in six days and then resting; his creation of life and light before he created the sun; his creating man perfect, and man's becoming a most pitifully imperfect work; his drowning all the world except eight souls, who became worse than those destroyed; his self-sacrifice on the cross as the only means of reclaiming a moiety of mankind from the innate and all-powerful principle of evil. This only can be learned by such a revelation. After its acquisition, it requires thousands of years to rid mankind of its incubus. At this stage of the discussion we ask, can a book bring new moral truth to man? Can he be taught that which is not inherent in his constitution? The horse cannot comprehend mathematics because the mental qualities necessary are dormant or absent, nor can it understand moral relations for the same reason. The same is true of man. Unless he has the moral qualities, moral truths would fall as unappreciated before him as the animal. He must first possess these moral qualities in order to receive a revelation, and possessing them, they evolve moral truths, and a revelation is not required.

Do not understand that I cast reproach on the Bible. I place it with the sacred books of other races—the Avesta, the Shaster, the Vedas, the Koran—and consider them all as equally creditable records of the strivings and spiritual experiences of childish and savage men to fathom and comprehend the mysteries of the spiritual universe within and the illimitable universe without. One has no more right to command belief than another. Truths are beautifully expressed by all, but no new ones are revealed. They repeat what is inherent in the constitution of man. If all sacred books were blotted from the world this day, not a single truth would be lost. The reception of or acquiescence in an ethical system, in order to work a lasting benefit, must not be by belief, but by knowledge. The system must meet an intellectual development competent to understand and make it its own. It is asserted that the simple belief has power to elevate. Most mischievously false is the assertion. Belief is a dead dogma, and if the believer advances, it is not from the power of his belief, but by intellectual progress. This is demonstrated by the results of missionary labors. Glowing narrations are published of conversions of the natives of the farthest islands of the sea, and the glorious results wrought by the Bible amongst the savages of the frozen north or the burning equator. The zealous missionaries appear to think baptism of the natives indicative of their reception of Christianity. "Blessed be!" say they, "wherever thou goest, civilization and innumerable blessings follow." Oh, missionary! it is not with the Bible that civilization goeth forth, but with the self-reliant Anglo-Saxon. Are savage men changed to Christians? Nay; they vanish like frost before the sun of intelligence. It is not conversion, but the terrible, inevitable law of extinction which is brought into operation. The Red Indian, from a race holding a vast continent, has become a remnant fast expiring—not driven westward, as is poetically said, but dying out, as the wolf and deer, on the place of their birth.

The Missionary Herald says that "only seven per cent of the population of Ceylon (2,000,000) should profess Christianity, and that only two per cent should be Protestant Christians, will be melancholy facts pregnant with solemn reflections to many of our readers."

Again: "If ours is the day of small things, what can we say to India with her 200,000,000 against our 2,000,000 and her less than half a million Christians, say one fourth of one per cent, against our seven per cent."

"The account Mr. Munger (missionary) gives of the present state and prospects of the Mahratta mission is not encouraging. Less than a dozen persons constitute his Sabbath audience, and these are from his own family, and the Christian household connected with the mission."

Of the Chinese missions the Herald says, "The pig-tail celestials of the flowery kingdom do not take very kindly to Christianity. With twenty-four missionaries and fifteen native helpers in China, the American Foreign Mission organization reports the baptism of the first convert."

The Daily Witness, Montreal, 1866, says: "There are now twenty-five Protestant missionary societies laboring in India. These societies maintain about five hundred and fifty missionaries, and expend annually in that country not far from $1,550,000.

The Spaniards converted the swarming population of Mexico and Peru; where now are their converts? A charming story, highly suggestive, is related of an Aztec tribe. They were readily persuaded to demolish their idols and set up the cross in their places, and Cortez left them, fully persuaded that they were true believers. It so happened that one of his horses was disabled and left with them. Alas for the worship of the true God! The superstitious natives, connecting the unknown animal with the power of the white man, worshiped it as a deity, gave it flowers and savory viands; and when it pined and died on such inappropriate diet, its afflicted worshippers reared its effigy in stone, and a century later, when the Franciscans came to preach the Gospel, they were astonished to find this image of a horse occupying the highest place in the temple, and devoutly adored as the god of thunder and lightning. The native mind found its level in worship, despite the efforts of the conqueror to force the mystification of the Trinity on the untutored intellect. Were the Aztecs converted? They are gone, and not one remains to read the hieroglyphic tablets of their ancestors. Is the Bible more deadly than the rifle?

One of the most active and zealous missionaries on the African coast confessed that he never converted a single African. Once he thought he had succeeded, but his new convert, on being informed that he must deny himself a plurality of wives, at once denied his religion. Dr. Livingston says that forty missionaries were sacrificed to the deadly climate of Africa before a single convert was made. After the vast outlay of missionary labor, there is not an important Christian community of their founding constructed of heathen elements. The churches of China and Japan are founded on sand, and despite the intellectual culture and resources of the Jesuits, crumbled. The battle between Christianity and the great Asiatic religions—Buddhism, Brahminism, and Islamism—has not been more fortunate. Islamism has gained the ascendancy in Africa, and is fast conquering that continent.

Mr. Hutchins gives the results of ten years' attendance at a mission school on the west coast of Africa in the answer of his servant when asked what he knew of God: "God be very good; he made two things—one, sleep; and the other, Sunday, when no one has to work." He says that after scores of years of intercourse with European traders and missionaries, the Africans still cling "to their gis-gis, jujus, and Fetishism with as much pertinacity as they did many hundred years ago. . . . Here we have all the appliances of our arts, our sciences, and our Christianity, doing no more good than did the wheat in the parable, that was sown among briars and thorns. To attempt civilizing such a race before they are humanized appears to me beginning at the wrong end." Hamilton Smith remarks, "Even Christianity of more than three centuries' duration in Congo has scarcely excited a progressive civilization." No people have more direct communication with Europe than the Africans, amongst whom Christian bishops achieved renown in the times of the primitive fathers, and in modern times numerous missionary stations have been maintained at great sacrifice of money and of life, yet no visible effect has been produced towards civilizing the black race. The people of the torrid zone find in the picturesque and passionless teachings of Moslemism greater satisfaction than in the colder and more intellectual forms of Christianity. Where Christianity is apparently received, it proves in the end only a form, and its transcendent doctrines are changed into crudest Paganism. Humboldt saw in the Cordilleras a savage crowd dancing and brandishing their war-hatchets around an altar where a monk was elevating the Host. They simply transferred their war-dance around a fire to an altar. Savary states that no Indian has ever become a true Christian. Mr. Kenyon, in one of his popular lectures on Northeastern Asia, said the missionaries found it impossible to convey any idea of God or of the atonement to the Yakuts, because their language had no words for any of the high moral conceptions of Europeans. The want of such words indicates the want of the ideas they express—a deficiency supplied only by ages of growth. The Greek priest hangs a cross on the neck of the low-browed, skin-clad Yakut, and reports to St. Petersburg another remarkable conversion to Christianity. The Pagan rites and frantic ceremonies of the Egyptians are now enacted before the churches of the Copts, as described by Herodotus, earliest of historians.

The Greeks still preserve their "Phyrric" dance; the celebrated chorographic dance of the ancient Romans is yet preserved by the Wallachian peasantry, showing how much stronger are customs wrought by indigenous religious faiths than foreign systems, even if they be apparently successful. Wm. H. Seward, in his "Travels Around the World," p. 456, agrees with this universal testimony of unprejudiced observers. His opinion has vastly more weight than those of ordinary travelers, for he possessed superior advantages, and he certainly will not be accused of granting more than it was impossible to avoid against the benefits of missionary labor. "It was not for St. Xavier nor the Catholic Church of the 16th century to bring India and the East into Christian civilization. It must be sadly admitted that this remains yet to be done. It is to be hoped that the great work has been begun in the humble schools for the native men and women which have been opened under missionary auspices in various parts of the country." This is virtually yielding the whole question. It is not religion taught by the missionary, it is knowledge taught in the schools which is expected to elevate Hindoo civilization.

Who can dissent from Renan, when he says: "As to the savage races, those sad survivors of an infant world, for whom nothing better can be wished than a quiet death, it is almost derision to apply our dogmatic formulas to them. Before making Christians of them, we should first have to make them men, and it is doubtful if we should succeed in doing that. The poor Otahaitan is trained to attend mass or sermon, but the incurable softness of his brain is not remedied: he is only made to die of melancholy or ennui. Oh! leave these children of nature to fade away on their mother's bosom. Let us not with our stern dogmas, the fruit of twenty centuries of reflection, disturb their childish play, their dances by moonlight, their hour of sweet intoxication." The mistake of devotees is in the belief that morals or religion can be manufactured and forced on the mind. They create their formulas, which they call religion, and regard the observation of these as conversion. This process may be very well here where educational prejudice is in their favor, when they cannot depart very far from the generally received ideas, but when they attempt by such means to storm the religion of other races, they without exception utterly fail. True conversion to our transcendental morality is as possible as the domestication of the tiger or lion; they cannot comprehend our lofty Idealism. This is a question of anatomy and physiology. Its solution depends on the structure and resulting functions of the brain. When the savage is able to grasp the sciences with the acumen of the European, then and not till then can he be truly converted to the European's religion. His thoughts, desires, emotions, character, are what his organization compels; consequently his organization must be changed before any change of character can be expected. Christianity, born from the débris of immemorial ages, has grown with the growth of the people who accept it, and is the representative of their theological ideas. Now go to the wilds, and, meeting a savage trained in another school in all respects different, thrust this system upon his attention. He is utterly incapable of its comprehension. There is a wide interval between the savage and the philosopher. We have passed over by slow and painful progress through millions of ages. The savage may receive aid from our acquirements, but we cannot bridge the interval, nor construct a shorter road for his progress.

A Reply to a Few Points in a Letter.

BY MRS. E. D. SLENNER.

FRIEND E.: In the first place you say you find it difficult to answer my letter because I change my ground—that in my first one I said I believed in the human soul, but in the last I say I have no more soul than a horse has.

Now, in the first letter by the word soul I meant the mind, and not an immaterial spirit that is separate from the living human identity and continues to exist after that is no more. It was of this intangible nothing that I spoke in my last when I said I had no more soul than a horse has, and I still insist that I have not. It has never been proven that either men or horses have anything of the sort. Humanity embraces the very highest form of intelligence, of mind, of reasoning faculty, that we have knowledge of, and horses, as well as all other animals, possess the very same faculties, but in a lower state of development. It matters not if "all the world" have hitherto believed in God, sin, and immortality. It matters not if there never was a nation nor even an individual who did not believe in them; for all the belief in the Universe cannot alter one fact. All the world once believed in a flat earth whose sun was a satellite that rose and set; but did this universal belief make the false to become the true? 'Tis true that scientists and philosophers often imbibe erroneous opinions, but this should only be a lesson to us to ever keep ourselves open to conviction—to be always ready to reject present opinions for better ones if the amount of evidence be in favor of the latter.

You say, "No one with reason will say, 'There is no God.'"

I say every one who reasons from fact must say so. I myself claim to have reason—at least, a share of it, and I emphatically say there is not in all the Universe, and never was, a single god or goddess. Nor is there any necessity for one. As to my observation that "Nature never punishes," I still insist upon it that she never does. You claim that because I suffer pain in consequence of a fall, or some violated natural law, I am punished; but I say the assertion is untenable. If I happen to let a child fall or accidentally knock it down, do I punish it? Not at all. I may be a cause of its suffering, but as I do not purposely inflict the pain, it is not punishment, but the natural effect of accidental cause or causes, just as are the deaths which are caused by fire, flood, famine or pestilence. None of these are punishments. No one who pretends to be an intelligent thinker now supposes that sickness or other misfortunes are sent upon humanity as punishments or chastisements, but they know them to be simply natural effects of natural causes, and many times they might with proper care and knowledge be avoided.

You ask where the suffering goes to after it leaves us, if nothing can be destroyed. Suffering is not a thing. It is a result of causes, and in itself is intangible, and a non-entity if considered as separate and distinct from matter; therefore, it cannot "go" anywhere, as it is nothing and has no abiding-place.

These queries if never punishing would make bad men better.

My opinion is that it would. Children, horses, and all animate nature thus experimented upon, are generally acknowledged to be more mild, kind, gentle, tractable, and loving the less they are punished or abused. Like begets like, and mild, kind treatment engenders loveliness of temper and disposition in the recipient thereof; therefore, all punishments are slowly but surely being evolved out of existence. Whippings and other brutal acts of tyranny are now seldom resorted to in our public schools or other institutions; hanging and all kinds of capital punishment are gradually going out of use. The parent is beginning to learn that he has no right to whip or inflict pain upon a child simply because it is his own and he is too ignorant or careless to understand better modes of government. In fine, the laws against cruelty to animals are straws that show which way the wind blows; and whoever would be in advance must heed the signs.

To your assertion that "if there is no revealed will, stealing is not wrong," I answer that "revealed will" has nothing at all to do with right and wrong. These are relative terms and depend upon conditions of society. What is wrong for one is right for another. Whoever acts against his conscience, against his educated and organic ideas of right does wrong. It is wrong to do anything to another that we would not be willing to have him do to us; and it is right to do as we would wish to be done by, and no revelation can alter or change these two simple facts which are so often quoted as a sure rule of action, and have been acknowledged to be so for so many long ages that we have no record of the time when they were not so accepted. If we but live in accordance with them, we shall need no bibles, no laws, no law-makers; but every one would be kind, moral and righteous.

You say if you should pray to an idol it would grieve your best and truest friend—your heavenly father—while if I should pray to God it would not grieve or offend any one, and you wonder how I could refuse to do so small a thing. But I would ask how it is possible to offend nothing! Your God is only an imaginary creation of your fancy, and therefore it would be only your mind that would be grieved and offended; and it would insult and offend my mind just as much were I to pray or attempt to pray to your god, as it would yours to pray to idols. I should be acting the hypocrite and grieving my reason and judgment, which would be no "small thing" to me.

And, in closing, these say: "I will candidly own that I cannot read an Infidel book without prejudice. If one were to write an awful lot of lies, or what you thought were lies, about the one you love best in the world, could you calmly and coolly read and think of it? Would it not rouse your indignation towards the writer and strengthen your love and pity for the injured one?"

If a slander be worth noticing, if it be enough to arouse "love and pity," I should all the more eagerly read it, listen to it, and ferret it out, so that I might refute it and hurl back the accusations into the face of the slanderer. "Truth is mighty and will prevail."

"They may curse it and call it a crime;
Pervert and betray and slander and slay
Its teachings for a time;
But as round and round we run,
Ever the wrong is proved to be wrong,
And ever is justice done."

Paine Vindicated.

INGERSOLL REPLIES TO THE NEW YORK OBSERVER.

"To argue with a man who has renounced the use and authority of reason is like administering medicine to the dead."
—THOMAS PAINE.

PEORIA, October 8, 1877.

To the Editor of the N. Y. Observer:

SIR: Last June in San Francisco, I offered a thousand dollars in gold—not as a wager, but as a gift—to any one who would substantiate the absurd story that Thomas Paine died in agony and fear, frightened by the clanking chains of devils. I also offered the same amount to any minister who would prove that Voltaire did not pass away as serenely as the coming of the dawn. Afterwards I was informed that you had accepted the offer, and had called upon me to deposit the money. Acting upon this information, I sent you the following letter:

[This letter was published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 22.]

In your paper of September 27, 1877, you acknowledge the receipt of the foregoing letter, and after giving an outline of its contents, say: "As not one of the affirmations, in the form stated in this letter, was contained in the offer we made, we have no occasion to substantiate them. But we are prepared to produce the evidence of the truth of our own statement, and even to go further: to show not only that Tom Paine 'died a drunken, cowardly, and beastly death,' but that for many years previous, and up to that event he lived a drunken and beastly life."

In order to refresh your memory as to what you had published, I call your attention to the following, which appeared in the New York Observer the 19th of July 1877:

"PUT DOWN THE MONEY.

"Col. Bob Ingersoll, in a speech full of ribaldry and blasphemy, made in San Francisco recently, said:

"I will give $1,000 in gold coin to any clergyman who can substantiate that the death of Voltaire was not as peaceful as the dawn; and of Tom Paine whom they assert died in fear and agony, frightened by the clanking chains of devils—in fact frightened to death by God. I will give $1,000 likewise to any one who can substantiate this 'absurd story'—a story without a word of truth in it."

"We have published the testimony, and the witnesses are on hand to prove that Tom Paine died a drunken, cowardly and beastly death. Let the Colonel deposit the money with any honest man, and the absurd story, as he terms it, shall be shown to be an over true tale. But he won't do it. His talk is Infidel 'buncombe' and nothing more."

On the 31st of August I sent you my letter, and on the 27th of September you say in your paper: "As not one of the affirmations in the form stated in this letter was contained in the offer we made, we have no occasion to substantiate them."

What were the affirmations contained in the offer you made? I had offered a thousand dollars in gold to any one who would substantiate "the absurd story" that Thomas Paine died in fear and agony, frightened by the clanking chains of devils—in fact frightened to death by God.

In response to this offer you said: "Let the Colonel deposit the money with an honest man and the 'absurd story,' as he terms it, shall be shown to be an 'over true tale.' But he won't do it. His talk is infidel 'buncombe' and nothing more."

Did you not offer to prove that Paine died in fear and agony, frightened by the clanking chains of devils? Did you not ask me to deposit the money that you might prove the "absurd story" to be an "over true tale" and obtain the money? Did you not in your paper of the 27th of September in effect deny that you had offered to prove this "absurd story"? As soon as I offered to deposit the gold and give bonds besides to cover costs, did you not publish a falsehood?

You have eaten your own words, and, for my part, I would rather have dined with Ezekiel than with you.

You have not met the issue. You have knowingly avoided it. The question was not as to the personal habits of Paine. The real question was and is, whether Paine was filled with fear and horror at the time of his death on account of his religious opinions. That is the question. You avoid this. In effect, you abandon that charge and make others.

To you belongs the honor of having made the most cruel and infamous charges against Thomas Paine that have ever been made. Of what you have said you cannot prove the truth of one word.

You say that Thomas Paine died a drunken, cowardly and beastly death.

I pronounce this charge to be a cowardly and beastly falsehood.

Have you any evidence that he was in a drunken condition when he died?

What did he say or do of a cowardly character just before, or at about the time of his death?

In what way was his death cowardly? You must answer these questions, and give your proof, or all honest men will hold you in abhorrence. You have made these charges. The man against whom you make them is dead. He cannot answer you. I can. He cannot compel you to produce your testimony, or admit by your silence that you have cruelly slandered the defenseless dead. I can and I will. You say that his death was cowardly. In what respect? Was it cowardly in him to hold the Thirty-Nine Articles in contempt? Was it cowardly not to call on your Lord? Was it cowardly not to be afraid? You say that his death was beastly. Again I ask, in what respect? Was it beastly to submit to the inevitable with tranquillity? Was it beastly to look with composure upon the approach of death? Was it beastly to die without a complaint, without a murmur—to pass from life without a fear?

DID THOMAS PAINE RECENT?

Mr. Paine had prophesied that fanatics would crawl and cringe around him during his last moments. He believed that they would put a lie in the mouth of Death.

When the shadow of the coming dissolution was upon him, two clergymen, Messrs. Milledollar and Cunningham, called to annoy the dying man. Mr. Cunningham had the politeness to say, "You have now a full view of death—you cannot live long, and whosoever does not believe in the Lord Jesus Christ will assuredly be damned." Mr. Paine replied, "Let me have none of your popish stuff. Get away with you. Good morning."

On another occasion a Methodist minister obtruded himself when Willet Hicks was present. This minister declared to Mr. Paine "that unless he repented of his unbelief he would be damned." Paine, although at the door of death, rose in his bed and indignantly requested the clergyman to leave his room. On another occasion, two brothers by the name of Pigott, sought to convert him. He was displeased and requested their departure. Afterwards Thomas Nixon and Captain Daniel Pelton visited him for the express purpose of ascertaining whether he had, in any manner, changed his religious opinions. They were assured by the dying man that he still held the principles he had expressed in his writings.

Afterwards, these gentlemen hearing that William Cobbett was about to write a life of Paine sent him the following note:

NEW YORK, April 24, 1818.

SIR: We have been informed that you have a design to write a history of the life and writings of Thomas Paine. If you have been furnished with materials in respect to his religious opinions, or rather of his recantation of his former opinions before his death, all you have heard of his recanting is false. Being aware that such reports would be raised after his death by fanatics which infested his house at the time it was expected he would die, we, the subscribers, intimate acquaintances of Thomas Paine since the year 1776, went to his house. He was sitting up in a chair, and apparently in full vigor and use of all his mental faculties. We interrogated him upon his religious opinions, and if he had changed his mind, or repented of anything he had said or wrote on that subject. He answered, "Not at all," and appeared rather offended at our supposition that any change should take place in his mind. We took down in writing the questions put to him and his answers thereto before a number of persons then in his room, among whom were his doctor, Mrs. Bonneville, &c. This paper is mislaid and cannot be found at present, but the above is the substance which can be attested by many living witnesses.

THOMAS NIXON.

DANIEL PELTON.

Mr. Jarvis, the artist, saw Mr. Paine one or two days before his death. To Mr. Jarvis he expressed his belief in his written opinions upon the subject of religion. B. F. Haskin, an attorney of the city of New York, also visited him and inquired as to his religious opinions. Paine was then upon the threshold of death, but he did not tremble. He was not a coward. He expressed his firm and unshaken belief in the religious ideas he had given to the world.

Dr. Manley was with him when he spoke his last words. Dr. Manley asked the dying man if he did not wish to believe that Jesus was the Son of God, and the dying philosopher answered: "I have no wish to believe on that subject." Amasa Woodsworth sat up with Thomas Paine the night before his death. In 1839 Gilbert Vale hearing that Mr. Woodsworth was living in or near Boston, visited him for the purpose of getting his statement. The statement was published in the Beacon of June 5, 1839, while thousands who had been acquainted with Mr. Paine were living.

The following is the article referred to:

"We have just returned from Boston. One object of our visit to that city, was to see a Mr. Amasa Woodsworth, an engineer, now retired in a handsome cottage and garden at East Cambridge, Boston. This gentleman owned the house occupied by Paine at his death—while he lived next door. As an act of kindness Mr. Woodsworth visited Mr. Paine every day for six weeks before his death. He frequently sat up with him, and did so on the last two nights of his life. He was always there with Dr. Manley, the physician, and assisted in removing Mr. Paine while his bed was prepared. He was present when Dr. Manley asked Mr. Paine "if he wished to believe that Jesus Christ was the son of God," and he describes Mr. Paine's answer as animated. He says that lying on his back he used some action and with much emphasis, replied, "I have no wish to believe on that subject." He lived some time after this, but was not known to speak, for he died tranquilly. He accounts for the insinuating style of Dr. Manley's letter, by stating that that gentleman just after its publication joined a church. He informs us that he has openly reproved the doctor for the falsity contained in the spirit of that letter, boldly declaring before Dr. Manley, who is yet living, that nothing which he saw justified the insinuations. Mr. Woodsworth assures us that he neither heard nor saw anything to justify the belief of any mental change in the opinions of Mr. Paine previous to his death; but that being very ill and in pain chiefly arising from the skin being removed in some parts by long lying, he was generally too uneasy to enjoy conversation on abstract subjects. This, then, is the best evidence that can be procured on this subject and we publish it while the contravening parties are yet alive, and with the authority of Mr. Woodsworth."

GILBERT VALE.

A few weeks ago I received the following letter which confirms the statement of Mr. Vale:

NEAR STOCKTON, CAL., GREENWOOD COTTAGE, July 9, 1877. }

Col. Ingersoll: In 1842 I talked with a gentleman in Boston. I have forgotten his name; but he was then an engineer of the Charlestown navy yard. I am thus particular so that you can find his name on the books. He told me that he nursed Thomas Paine in his last illness, and closed his eyes when dead. I asked him if he recanted and called upon God to save him. He replied, "No. He died as he had taught. He had a sore upon his side and when we turned him it was very painful and he would cry out 'O, God,' or something like that." "But," said the narrator, "that was nothing, for he believed in a God." I told him that I had often heard it asserted from the pulpit that Mr. Paine had recanted in his last moments. The gentleman said that it was not true, and he appeared to be an intelligent, truthful man. With respect I remain, &c.,

PHILIP GRAVES, M. D.

The next witness is Willet Hicks, a Quaker preacher. He says that during the last illness of Mr. Paine he visited him almost daily, and that Paine died firmly convinced of the truth of the religious opinions he had given to his fellow men. It was to this same Willet Hicks that Paine applied for permission to be buried in the cemetery of the Quakers. Permission was refused. This refusal settles the question of recantation. If he had recanted, of course there could have been no objection to his body being buried by the side of the best hypocrites on the earth. If Paine recanted why should he be denied "a little earth for charity?" Had he recanted, it would have been regarded as a vast and splendid triumph for the gospel. It would with much noise and pomp and ostentation have been heralded about the world.

I received the following letter to-day. The writer is well known in this city, and is a man of high character:

PEORIA, Oct. 8th, 1877.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL, Esteemed Friend: My parents were Friends (Quakers). My father died when I was very young. The elderly and middle-aged Friends visited at my mother's house. We lived in the city of New York. Among the number I distinctly remember Elias Hicks, Willet Hicks, and a Mr. — Day who was a book-seller in Pearl street. There were many others, whose names I do not now remember. The subject of the recantation by Thomas Paine of his views about the Bible in his last illness, or at any other time, was discussed by them in my presence at different times. I learned from them that some of them had attended upon Thomas Paine in his last sickness and ministered to his wants up to the time of his death. And upon the question of whether he did recant there was but one expression. They all said that he did not recant in any manner. I often heard them say they wished he had recanted. In fact, according to them, the nearer he approached death the more positive he appeared to be in his convictions.

These conversations were from 1820 to 1822. I was at that time from ten to twelve years old, but these conversations impressed themselves upon me because many thoughtless people then blamed the Society of Friends for their kindness to that "arch Infidel," Thomas Paine.

Truly yours, A. C. HANCKINSON.

A few days ago I received the following letter:

ALBANY, NEW YORK, Sept. 27, 1877.

Dear Sir: It is over twenty years ago that professionally I made the acquaintance of John Hogeboom, a Justice of the Peace of the county of Rensselaer, New York. He was then over seventy years of age and had the reputation of being a man of candor and integrity. He was a great admirer of Paine. He told me that he was personally acquainted with him, and used to see him frequently during the last years of his life in the city of New York, where Hogeboom then resided. I asked him if there was any truth in the charge that Paine was in the habit of getting drunk. He said that it was utterly false; that he never heard of such a thing during the life-time of Mr. Paine, and did not believe any one else did. I asked him about the recantation of his religious opinions on his death-bed, and the revolting death-bed scenes that the world had heard so much about. He said there was no truth in them, that he had received his information from persons who attended Paine in his last illness, "and that he passed peacefully away as we may say in the sunshine of a great soul."

Yours truly, W. J. HILTON.

The witnesses by whom I substantiate the fact that Thomas Paine did not recant, and that he died holding the religious opinions he had published, are

First—Thomas Nixon, Captain Daniel Pelton, B. F. Haskin. These gentlemen visited him during his last illness for the purpose of ascertaining whether he had in any respect changed his views upon religion. He told them that he had not.

Second—James Cheetham. This man was the most malicious enemy Mr. Paine had, and yet he admits that "Thomas Paine died placidly, and almost without a struggle" (See Life of Thomas Paine, by James Cheetham).

Third—The ministers, Milledollar and Cunningham. These gentlemen told Mr. Paine that if he died without believing in the Lord Jesus Christ he would be damned, and Paine replied, "Let me have none of your popish stuff. Good morning" (See Sherwin's Life of Paine, p. 220).

Fourth—Mrs. Hedden. She told these same preachers when they attempted to obtrude themselves upon Mr. Paine again, that the attempt to convert Mr. Paine was useless—"that if God did not change his mind no human power could."

Fifth—Andrew A. Dean. This man lived upon Paine's farm at New Rochelle, and corresponded with him upon religious subjects (See Paine's Theological Works, p. 308).

Sixth—Mr. Jarvis, the artist with whom Paine lived. He gives an account of an old lady coming to Paine and telling him that God Almighty had sent her to tell him that unless he repented and believed in the blessed Savior, he would be damned. Paine replied that God would not send such a foolish old woman with such an impertinent message (See Clio Rickman's Life of Paine).

Seventh—Wm. Carver, with whom Paine boarded. Mr. Carver said again and again that Paine did not recant. He knew him well, and had every opportunity of knowing (See Life of Paine by Vale).

Eighth—Dr. Manley, who attended him in his last sickness, and to whom Paine spoke his last words. Dr. Manley asked him if he did not wish to believe in Jesus Christ, and he replied, "I have no wish to believe on that subject."

Ninth—Willet Hicks and Elias Hicks, who were with him frequently during his last sickness, and both of whom tried to persuade him to recant. According to their testimony, Mr. Paine died as he had lived—a believer in God, and a friend of man. Willet Hicks was offered money to say something false against Thomas Paine. He was even offered money to remain silent and allow others to slander the dead. Mr. Hicks, speaking of Thomas Paine, said: "He was a good man—an honest man" (See Vale's Life of Paine).

Tenth—Amasa Woodsworth, who was with him every day for some six weeks immediately preceding his death, and sat up with him the last two nights of his life. This man declares that Paine did not recant and that he died tranquilly. The evidence of Mr. Woodsworth is conclusive.

Eleventh—Thomas Paine himself. The will of Thomas Paine, written by himself, commences as follows:

"The last will and testament of me, the subscriber, Thomas Paine, reposing confidence in my creator God, and in no other being, for I know of no other, nor believe in any other;" and closes in these words: "I have lived an honest and useful life to mankind; my time has been spent in doing good, and I die in perfect composure and resignation to the will of my creator God."

Twelfth—If Thomas Paine recanted, why do you pursue him? If he recanted, he died substantially in your belief, for what reason then do you denounce his death as cowardly? If upon his death-bed he renounced the opinions he had published, the business of defaming him should be done by Infidels, not by Christians.

I ask you if it is honest to throw away the testimony of his friends—the evidence of fair and honorable men—and take the putrid words of avowed and malignant enemies?

When Thomas Paine was dying, he was infested by fanatics—by the snaky spies of bigotry. In the shadows of death were the unclean birds of prey waiting to tear with beak and claw the corpse of him who wrote the "Rights of Man." And there lurking and crouching in the darkness were the jackals and hyenas of superstition ready to violate his grave.

These birds of prey—these unclean beasts are the witnesses produced and relied upon by you.

One by one the instruments of torture have been wrenched from the cruel clutch of the Church, until within the armory of orthodoxy there remains but one weapon—Slander.

Against the witnesses that I have produced you can bring just two—Mary Roscoe and Mary Hinsdale. The first is referred to in the memoir of Stephen Grellet. She had once been a servant in his house. Grellet tells what happened between this girl and Paine. According to this account Paine asked her if she had ever read any of his writings, and on being told that she had read very little of them, he inquired what she thought of them, adding that from such an one as she he expected a correct answer.

Let us examine this falsehood. Why would Paine expect a correct answer about his writings from one who had read very little of them? Does not such a statement devour itself? This young lady further said that the "Age of Reason" was put in her hands, and that the more she read in it the more dark and distressed she felt, and that she threw the book into the fire. Whereupon Mr. Paine remarked, "I wish all had done as you did, for if the devil ever had any agency in any work, he had it in my writing that book."

The next is Mary Hinsdale. She was a servant in the family of Willet Hicks. She, like Mary Roscoe, was sent to carry some delicacy to Mr. Paine. To this young lady Paine, according to her account, said precisely the same that he did to Mary Roscoe, and she said the same thing to Mr. Paine.

My own opinion is that Mary Roscoe and Mary Hinsdale are one and the same person, or the same story has been by mistake put in the mouth of both.

It is not possible that the same conversation should have taken place between Paine and Mary Roscoe, and between him and Mary Hinsdale.

Mary Hinsdale lived with Willet Hicks and he pronounced her story a pious fraud and fabrication. He said that Thomas Paine never said any such thing to Mary Hinsdale (See Vale's Life of Paine).

Another thing about this witness. A woman by the name of Mary Lockwood, a Hicksite Quaker, died. Mary Hinsdale met her brother about that time and told him that his sister had recanted, and wanted her to say so at her funeral. This turned out to be false.

It has been claimed that Mary Hinsdale made her statement to Charles Collins. Long after the alleged occurrence Gilbert Vale, one of the biographers of Paine had a conversation with Collins concerning Mary Hinsdale. Vale asked him what he thought of her. He replied that some of the Friends believed that she used opiates, and that they did not give credit to her statements. He also said that he believed what the Friends said, but thought that when a young woman, she might have told the truth.

In 1818 William Cobbett came to New York. He began collecting materials for a life of Thomas Paine. In this he became acquainted with Mary Hinsdale and Charles Collins. Mr. Cobbett gave a full account of what happened in a letter addressed to the Norwich Mercury in 1819. From this account it seems that Charles Collins told Cobbett that Paine had recanted. Cobbett called for the testimony, and told Mr. Collins that he must give time, place, and the circumstances. He finally brought a statement that he stated had been made by Mary Hinsdale. Armed with this document Cobbett, in October of that year, called upon the said Mary Hinsdale, at No. 10 Anthony street, New York, and showed her the statement. Upon being questioned by Mr. Cobbett she said, "That it was so long ago that she could not speak positively to any part of the matter—that she would not say that any part of the paper was true—that she had never seen the paper—and that she had never given Charles Collins authority to say anything about the matter in her name." And so in the month of October, in the year of grace 1818, in the mist and fog of forgetfulness disappeared forever one Mary Hinsdale the last and only witness against the intellectual honesty of Thomas Paine.

Notwithstanding the great antiquity of this Western Continent and the people who once inhabited it, the principal races which now people the earth are undoubtedly of Asiatic or African origin. From Central Asia especially came the races which have made up the civilized nations of the earth. India very properly has been termed the "cradle of the world's literature, civilization, and religion." The history and literature of India are probably older than those of any other nation. Egypt, Persia, and China date very far back, but India seems entitled to the palm for great antiquity. While that country has been the birthplace of literature, science and civilization, it has also been the source of nearly all the mythology, theology and superstitions that have cursed the world. From that sunny land came the belief in demons, gods, hell, heaven, and all the nameless vagaries that have composed the religions of mankind. The source of religious fervor in man was fear. In his ignorant state, with his deficient knowledge of the forces Nature he imagined that enemies resided in everything that caused him discomfort. He thought the storm, the lightning, the tornado, the biting frosts, were impelled by evil beings that entertained malice towards him. Thus the conception of demons and devils entered the human mind. As man progressed in intelligence he believed that these friendly and unfriendly powers greatly affected his existence. He regarded the sun as the source of light, heat, life and motion, while cold and darkness were the sources of death and unhappiness, and it was an easy step for "sun-worship" to be adopted by the more advanced among the early races on the earth. To this day it is questionable—if worship must be directed to an object that has a real existence—whether there is anything more worthy of adoration and worship than the glorious orb which lights and warms the entire solar system. It was the grand central idea or model after which were patterned nearly all the gods of olden time. The sun-worship was the foundation of all the more intelligent kinds of worship which man has engaged in. To induce him to be gracious and send good seasons, bountiful crops, and good health, he was prayed to and reverently worshiped. Sacrifices were made to him, and offerings of all kinds of animals, and even of human beings, were made to him. Man had progressed to such a limited extent that he still believed that all Nature's forces were actuated, as observed, by good or bad beings, and to keep all those gods and devils placated and appeased kept poor superstitions man extremely busy. The worship which he offered to his gods, good or bad, and the offerings which he made to them, I said, were prompted by fear. Fear, in fact was the incentive of all the worship that early man was capable of. He stationed a god or a devil in every whirlwind, at every waterfall, every cascade, in every forest, in every stream, in every dell, in morning and night, summer and winter, and in almost every conceivable position in the whole realm of Nature. He lived in constant dread of the evils that might befall him, and imagined that at every turn and at every hour of the day and night some invisible enemy was about to pounce upon him and do him a serious injury. How to secure the good will and friendship of all these gods and devils was his greatest concern. To facilitate this business and to save every man the necessity of constantly offering up prayers and sacrifices to these imaginary gods and devils, the labor was delegated to a special class who were believed to have a special influence with the gods and were able to exercise more control over them than could the common people. This class were the priests, and they soon became a privileged aristocracy, and represented their services as of such great importance, and their power to influence the gods so great that they were enabled to lay very heavy exactions upon the people. They assumed arrogant airs and pretended to know far more about the will of the gods than all the world besides. They spoke with great authority in the name of the gods and enforced their injunctions with all the priestly importance they were able to command. The belief that this class of men had great influence at the courts of the gods gave them great advantage over their fellows, and their rule was imperative and oppressive. They came to be regarded almost as gods themselves. As it was thought they could control the gods, they were considered equal to them. Their favor and influence were courted and the greatest deference was paid to them. They acquired a control over the more ignorant classes that has continued for thousands of years. They have so played upon the fears and ignorance of the masses that they have managed to live upon the best the earth has afforded, to dress in the best fabrics, to enjoy immunity from toil, and to be venerated as really superior beings. This rule of priestcraft has cost mankind innumerable sums of wealth and incalculable days and years of toil, but men have been so ignorant and superstitious, they have been so willing to believe that priests had secret access to the throne of the gods, and wielded so great an influence over the invisible powers that they have cheerfully paid the price which this privileged class has exacted of them; and this state of things has continued for at least fifty centuries.

Nearly every faith, every form of religion, from the crudest fetishism to that system which for eighteen hundred years has vaunted itself as being the divinest and best, have all abounded in priests. Their numbers have been beyond the power of computation, and the cost they have been to mankind no one can estimate. Some of the systems of religion have accorded one-tenth of all the products of the soil, of the animals slain during the hunt, and of all the wealth in whatever way produced, to the priests; and perhaps that is a fair estimate of the average cost of the priesthood of all religions. The gods have truly been an expensive luxury in the world, and their agents and vicegerents have been most exacting taskmasters and tax-collectors. If the tithes or the dues belonging to the priests were not forthcoming when due, summary measures were resorted to. The property of the delinquent would be taken from him by force, and he, perhaps, be thrown into a dungeon or be subjected to punishment the same as though he had committed a crime. The rule of kingcraft has been expensive and cruel in the world, but it has not been so exacting and so constant as priestcraft. The two together, with the degradation they have engendered, have been the heaviest burdens man has been compelled to carry; they have retarded his physical and mental advancement more than all other causes combined.

It is this class of self-constituted agents and advisers of the supernal powers that have invented the almost countless numbers of creeds and religions which man has been compelled to sustain. This class have, to a great extent, too, been the authors of the myths, fables, superstitions, and monstrosities that have made up the various systems of religion that have been recognized in the world. If they have not toiled with their hands, their inventive powers have not been idle. If they have produced no crops from the soil, if they have manufactured nothing by mechanical arts they have been busy in growing superstitions and mysticisms and in forging chains and fetters with which to bind the human mind.

The crudest and lowest system of religion which man in his feeble and infantile state gave homage to was Fetichism. He saw in the clouds, in the invisible winds, the tempest, the lightnings, in the ever-moving waters, the oceans and rivers, and in everything that moved or was capable of being moved, evidences of invisible deities and demons, as has been observed. In fact, everything visible, whether animate or inanimate, was invested by him with divine qualities. The fetish worshiper had innumerable gods and demons. Every animal, every plant and tree, everything he could fashion and form, he regarded as gods, and to these he gave adoration and worship. He regarded them not as symbols or representatives of invisible powers merely, but crudely imagined them to be absolute gods. Thus his gods were almost without number, and they were so portable that he carried them around with him and always had them or some of them close at hand. Dogs, cats, horses, cattle, sheep, crocodiles, snakes, lizards, toads, birds, fishes, trees, plants, crudely shaped pieces of wood, and stone, served him as gods. To accept such a class of deities, man's mind was necessarily weak and ignorant. When he advanced so far as to take the grander objects in nature—the heavenly bodies—the sun, moon and stars, he indeed made great progress. His ideas became more elevated, his mind more expanded, and his views much more comprehensive.

Among the most ancient forms of worship known to man was the worship of the sexual organs. Here was found the source of life, and here it was deemed by primitive man that his worship and adoration should be directed. This was not done in a spirit of sensuality, as may be supposed, but with a considerable degree of religious fervor. Phallic worship was practiced by different races or nationalities, and was the basis for subsequent systems of worship. Here is found the origin of the symbol of the cross, which so many millions have profoundly venerated; here was found the model for the steeple, the round towers found in different countries, spires, towers, needles, monuments, etc.

As before remarked, the worship of the heavenly bodies is one of the most exalted systems of religion that man has given allegiance to; and the moral effects produced by it upon its devotees were as grand as any system man has ever accepted. It can readily be understood it was a long step from fetish worship to the worship of the heavenly bodies, and it took centuries to make the evolution. It was, too, the more intelligent races that were, in those early times, far enough progressed to adopt the sun and star worship.

The ancient Chaldeans or Persians were devoted worshippers of the starry hosts, at the head of which was the glorious orb of day. They erected altars on the tops of mountains, to which the pious devotees often betook themselves to make sacrifices and offer up oblations, praise, and prayer. The hymns and invocations which they addressed to the sun were sublime and eloquent. These sun and star gods required a priesthood, called magi, and they acted as mediators between the worshippers and the starry bodies worshiped. They were not a vicious, indolent class, as the priests of many systems of religion have been, but they were required to lead upright lives and to set a good example for the masses who looked to them for direction and knowledge.

Zoroaster was an eminent sun-worshiper, and was a reformer, leader, and lawgiver of remarkable purity and excellence. The moral instructions which he inculcated in lessons to his disciples and followers have rarely been excelled even down to the present time. He was recognized by his admirers as a prophet of great purity and holiness. His precepts and injunctions were accepted as laws from heaven, and his lessons and instructions when compiled in a book were regarded as sacred scriptures, or words from the gods. His lessons and morals were compiled in one volume and were called the Zend Avesta. For this sacred volume the Persians, for thousands of years, entertained as great a veneration as the Jews and Christians ever cherished for their sacred writings.

Besides the heavenly bodies which the Persians worshiped, they had Ormuzd, their principal deity, or god of light; Ahrimanes, his brother, the god of darkness or evil, who was ever contending with his brother, the good deity. Their contests were severe and protracted, and each had a large concourse of good and bad spirits, or angels and devils, who took part, respectively, under the powers which they served. The warfare thus kept up between these contending forces was continuous and irreconcilable. In their system of theology they recognized the existence of heaven and hell, which were respectively the dwelling-places of Ormuzd and Ahrimanes, the azeds, or good angels serving under the first and the devils and arch-devils under the last. In this system was one of the great prototypes or models from which more modern systems of religion have been fashioned. Authorities disagree as to the time Zoroaster lived on the earth; some claiming that he lived at about the time Moses is said to have flourished, while others place him earlier in the world's history, and others, again, later. Some claimed in olden times that he lived five thousand years before the time of Plato. That is probably an error; but that his era was far, far back in the ages of the past there can be no question.

"The Fruits of Philosophy."

We have received a limited number of this little work by Dr. Charles Knowlton, for the publication of which Mr. Charles Bradlaugh and Mrs. Annie Besant were prosecuted, in London, and sentenced to be imprisoned six months, and fined two hundred pounds each. Large numbers of our friends have expressed a desire to see the book which created so great an excitement in the largest city of the world. Such can now be accommodated. The price of the work is Fifty cents, sent by express. The intriguing, tricky Anthony Comstock, chief detective of the Young Men's Christian Association and who is granted by the government a certain supervision over the mail matter which leaves the post-office in this city, is said to entertain no very friendly feeling towards us, and would be glad to pounce down upon us and throw us into prison upon the first opportunity that presents itself. For this reason we deem it hardly prudent to send Dr. Knowlton's book through the mail. But Comstock has nothing to do with matter that goes by express, and books can be sent that way without any thanks to him. Those wishing a copy can easily have it; and to lighten the expense we would advise ordering a few other books to be sent with it. Lists of our books will be sent to all applicants. Who wants "The Fruits of Philosophy"?

The Ghosts Again!

At the request of a party of friends who proposed, last Tuesday evening, to visit Mrs. Maud Lord at the residence of Mr. Phillips, No. 222 West Thirty-seventh street, we consented to join them, and despite the danger of giving offense to some of our incredulous readers, or that they may think we are going crazy, we will state some of the manifestations which took place there. In many respects it was much the same as what occurred at our visit a week ago. About the same number were present, and the circle was formed in the same way, some seventeen of us sitting in a compact circle, the left hand of each sitter grasping the right wrist of his or her neighbor, leaving the right hand partially disengaged. We were acquainted with about half of those present, consisting of about equal numbers of both ladies and gentlemen, and in point of intelligence and integrity they have few superiors.

It devolved upon us to see that the windows and doors were secured. We bolted and locked the door, and were sure no person could enter from without until the bolt was withdrawn. At our request, a friend in whom we all had confidence, sat by the side of Mrs. Lord within the circle, and held her hands so that every person present felt assured that Mrs. Lord could not herself possibly perform what took place.

We will not detail all that occurred, but we had sat a few minutes only when the demonstration commenced. Every one in the circle felt their hands touched with gentle fingers. The guitar was curiously played upon while floating in the air, while resting upon our heads and in our laps. By request, it touched the chandelier overhead, and the ceiling above, twelve feet or more from the floor; we could distinctly hear it striking both, it being played upon at the same time. It was utterly impossible for Mrs. Lord to have done this while thus held by the hands, and her feet also being guarded by the feet of one in the circle. We were also vigorously fanned and the palm-leaf fan was literally torn into shreds. A small music-box was taken from one to another and deposited in the right hand of each, sometimes being played upon by turning the little crank. A bouquet of odorous flowers was also carried around, visiting each one.

We received considerable attention. Our fingers were gently touched scores of times, and caressing demonstrations made; our face was patted, our beard stroked, etc. The first voice we heard was close to our knee, and it said, "Dear papa," and our chin and beard at the same time were gently caressed with what seemed delicate fingers. Another voice very near us said, "Dear brother, it is beautiful to meet here together." At the same time we were caressed, and our right hand touched, and the name, "Mary Jane" distinctly spoken. The voices were in loud whispers, but which in most cases were distinct. The name "John Bennett" was loudly whispered close in front of us. This was our father's name, but we think no one knew it save ourselves. We said, "Father, are you here?" We were immediately grasped by the hand, and three sharp raps were quickly made upon the guitar which was then near us. We asked mentally, "Father, are you happy?" Immediately three raps. "Do you approve of the work we are doing?" Again three loud, distinct raps were given with emphasis. Later, the same voice that whispered our father's name said clearly, "May God be with you always." As we are not much of a believer in God, we interpreted this to be merely a friendly congratulation.

Mrs. Lord said a fleshy old lady stood by us. Our grandmother, who died in our childhood came immediately to our mind, and we said, "Is it grandmother?" A voice close in front of us whispered, "Yes; tell them I am here." The voice sounded like an aged person's voice, as was remarked by those who sat near us. Mrs. Lord said one stood near us by the name of Harriet. We asked, "Is it aunt Harriet?" A voice whispered to us, "Yes; we are all here." Mrs. Lord said some fifteen spirits were close around us. She stated that one said his name was Percy. We asked, "Is it John M. Percy?" (a brother-in-law who died nearly three years ago.) We were immediately firmly grasped by the right hand, and a voice whispered distinctly, "Yes, Bennett; I am here." Once we were firmly taken by the coat-collar, and a voice whispered loudly to us, "Bennett, old fellow, this is the way to become convinced of the immortality of the soul." The words, "There is no death," we heard distinctly spoken. Mrs. Lord said there was standing near us a man who had died in consequence of hard drinking, and who had had delirium tremens. We enquired is it Samuel Wilson? Our hand was immediately touched, and what appeared to be a hand was placed on the top of our head, and which pressed down with a weight of several pounds. Mrs. Lord said a large spirit was present whose hand was very large. We said we would like to feel it. What appeared like a hand twice the size of an ordinary man's hand was placed upon our head, and the left side of our head was boxed with such vigor that our ear rang for several minutes. The blow certainly seemed like a reality. It was not imagination. Most of the hands which had previously touched us seemed delicate, and some of them like children's hands. When something was said about going home, a voice close to our knee whispered, "Papa, don't go."

Curious lights appeared several times but not in such numbers as on the former evening. Some of them were nearly as large as a person's face, we sometimes thought we could almost discern features. Once when our father purported to be near us, one of these large lights appeared and we whispered, "Come near," and it came within twenty inches of our face and we were positive Mrs. Lord was sitting in her chair with her back towards us.

We will not detain our readers with farther details. Much was said and done we cannot describe. Voices of the character alluded to were heard in various parts of the circle at the same time and one could not hear all, nor understand all, especially when those present were conversing. Whisperings several times occurred which we could not distinguish and much that was said to others we have not mentioned. We heard several times whisperings to a lady sitting at our right, like this, "Dear mother, Willie and I are here." To a gentleman sitting next, a voice said, "George, why do you not speak to me?" and thus it was around the entire circle. All had more or less notice and the friends of each seemed to be present.

We cannot say that any of this was done by spirits; but there was certainly something curious about it. We are firmly convinced that Mrs. Lord did not do it, for much of it occurred when she was conversing. We are satisfied, too, that she had no accomplice present who did it, and in this opinion all present heartily concurred. We assuredly have not overstated anything and have narrated but a small part that really occurred. We state it for what it is worth, and those not interested in such recitals will probably give this article little attention.

THE TRUTH SEEKER will be sent to Trial Subscribers from Nov. 1 to Jan. 1 for the nominal sum of TWENTY CENTS. The object of this is to give those who are not acquainted with the paper an opportunity of becoming so, with the view of their being permanent readers. There are many hundreds of thousands over the country who either never heard of THE TRUTH SEEKER or know very little of it. To such we will send the paper for the remainder of the year for the small sum of two dimes.

Will not all friends of the sheet interest themselves to see how many names of trial subscribers they can thus send in? With a little effort in this direction on the part of those who think the paper ought to have a wider circulation much can be accomplished. Who among our friends will send in the most names? To those who excel in this service to us we will send an appropriate present. Let the list of trial subscribers be large.

J. W. STILLMAN repeated in Science Hall, last Sunday, P. M., to a very intelligent audience his lecture upon the "Existence of God," which was succeeded by a somewhat animated discussion. Most of the speakers who followed participated in the same line of thought with the speaker, whose position was that there exists no proof of a personal God outside of the Universe.

B. F. UNDERWOOD spoke at Florence, Mass., Oct. 7, at Napanee, Ont., October 12; Toronto, 14; Cincinnati, 16 and 17; LaRue, O., 19, 20, 21. Will be at the Annual Congress National Lib. League, Rochester, N. Y., Oct. 26, 27, 28.

WE are glad to say the calls for "The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion" are numerous, and so far as we have heard, all who have bought the work are highly pleased. Let those wanting it send along their orders.

WE give in another place about half of Col. Ingersoll's scathing reply to the New York Observer, taken from the Peoria Saturday Evening Call. The balance will appear next week, after which it will be issued in tract form.

"CHRISTIANITY AND INFIDELITY" is a work issued by D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth street, New York, containing a discussion of the above theme by the publisher and the Rev. G. H. Humphrey, a Presbyterian clergyman of New York City. The facts and arguments embodied in this work will, of course, be variously estimated, and will be accepted or rejected in proportion as personal bias exists in the minds of those who read them. The most interesting and prominent feature of the book is the courtesy and fairness with which the disputants treat each other, and the kindly spirit and earnest regard they manifest for each other's convictions. It is evident that a more tolerant and humane spirit is abroad, and this disposition to regard opposing religious convictions as entitled to respect and consideration will doubtless exert a beneficial influence. It compels the secularist to refrain from an indiscriminate condemnation of the theologians, and the theologian to disabuse his mind of the erroneous notion that he who rejects his dogmas must of necessity be a dangerous and irresponsible member of society. Those who desire to learn how persons holding the most opposite opinions on the great problem of religion can at the same time entertain the most cordial social relations, would do well to read this book and profit by its example in this respect.—N. Y. Graphic.

By PROF. W. ROBERTSON SMITH, OF THE UNIVERSITY OF ABERDEEN.

Through the whole period of Hebrew lyric poetry, represented not only by the Psalter, but by the Lamentations, traditionally ascribed to Jeremiah, and by various scattered pieces in Prophets, (e.g., Isaiah xli) and in historical books (e.g., Numbers xx i, 17; 1 Samuel ii) there is little change in form and poetic structure. From first to last the rhythm consists not in a rise and fall of accent or quantity of syllables, but in a pulsation of sense, rising and falling through the parallel, antithetic, or otherwise balanced members of each verse (so-called Hebrew parallelism; better, sense-rhythm). Beyond this one law of rhythm, which is itself less an artificial rule than a natural expression of the principle, that all poetic utterance must proceed in harmonious undulation, and not in the spasms of unmodulated passion, the Hebrew poet was subject to no code of art, though strophical arrangements, sometimes marked by a refrain, are not uncommon; while poems of acrostic structure (alphabetic Psalms) are found not exclusively in the most recent literature (Ps. ix, x, form a single undoubtedly old acrostic). The latter are on the whole longer than the earlier poems. But this is due not to increased constructive power, but to a diffuser style, a less vigorous unity of feeling and thought, and a tendency to ring many variations on one key. A wider range of artistic power appears in the Song of Solomon, a lyrical drama, in which, according to most critics, the pure love of the Shulamite for her betrothed is exhibited as victorious over the seductions of Solomon and his harem. As the motive of the piece is political as well as ethical, it is most naturally assigned to the early period of the northern kingdom.

The remaining poetical books of the Old Testament belong to a different category. Unfit for abstract speculation, valuing no wisdom that is not practical, and treasuring up such wisdom in sententious rhythmical form—enforced by symbol and metaphor, and warm with the breath of human interest—the Hebrew is a poet even in his philosophy. Side by side with the ode the earliest Hebrew literature shows us the Mashal, or similitude, sometimes in the form of biting epigram (Numbers xxi, 27, f.) or sarcastic parable (Judges ix, 8; 2 Kings xiv, 8), sometimes as the natural vehicle of general moral teaching. The greatest name in the early proverbial wisdom of Israel is that of Solomon (1 Kings iv, 32), and, beyond doubt, many of his aphorisms are to be found in the book of Proverbs. Yet this book is not all Solomonic. The last two chapters are ascribed to other names, and part of the collection was not put in shape till the time of Hezekiah (xxv, 1), who can have had no infallible criterion of authorship by Solomon, and must not be credited with critical intentions. In truth, the several sections of the book are varied enough in color to make it plain that we have before us the essence of the wisdom of centuries, while the introductory address in chapters i-ix shows how a later age learned to develop the gnomic style, so as to fit it for longer compositions. The fundamental type of Hebrew philosophy remains, however, unchanged, even in the book of Ecclesiastes, which bears every mark of a very late date, long after the Exile. On the other hand a fresh and creative development, alike in point of form or thought, is found in the book of Job, which, in grandly dramatic construction, and with wonderful discrimination of character in the several speakers, sums up the whole range of Hebrew speculation on the burning question of Old Testament religion, the relation of affliction to the justice and goodness of God and to the personal merit and demerit of the sufferer. Like the other noblest parts of the Old Testament, the book of Job has a comparatively early date. It was known to Jeremiah, and may be plausibly referred to the seventh century B.C.

In the book of Job we find poetical invention of incidents, attached for didactic purposes to a name apparently derived from old tradition. There is no valid a priori reason for denying that the Old Testament may contain other examples of the same art. The book of Jonah is generally viewed as a case in point. Esther, too, has been viewed as a fiction by many who are not over-skeptical critics; but, on this view, a book which finds no recognition in the New Testament, and whose canonicity was long suspected by the Christian, as well as by the Jewish Church, must sink to the rank of an apocryphal production.

In the poetical, as in the historical books, anonymous writing is the rule; and, along with this, we observe great freedom on the part of readers and copyists, who not only made verbal changes (cf. Psalm xlv with Psalm lili), but composed new poems out of fragments of others (Psalm cviii with lvi and lx). In a large part of the Psalter a later hand has systematically substituted Elohim for Jehovah, and an imperfect acrostic, like Psalms ix, x, cannot have proceeded in its present form from the first author. Still more remarkable is the case of the book of Job, in which the speeches of Elihu quite break the connection, and are almost universally assigned to a later hand.

Prophetical Books.—We have already seen that the earliest prophecies of certain date are of the eighth century, though there is a probability that Joel flourished in the ninth century, in the reign of Joash of Judah, and that the opening verses of Amos are cited from his book. On the other hand, the old school of prophecy, whose members, from Samuel to Elisha, were men of action rather than of letters, was not likely to leave behind it any written oracles. The prophets generally spoke under the immediate influence of the spirit or "hand of Jehovah." What they wrote was secondary, and was, no doubt, greatly abridged. The most instructive account of the literary activity of a prophet is given in Jeremiah xxxvi. Jeremiah did not begin to write till he had been more than twenty years a prophet. Some prophetic books, like that of Amos, seem to have been composed at one time and with unity of plan. Other prophets, like Isaiah, published several books summing up portions of their ministry. In one or two cases, especially in that of Ezekiel, the prophet writes oracles which were apparently never spoken. Before the Exile there was circulation of individual prophetic books, and earlier prophets quote from their predecessors. But the task of collecting and editing the remains of the prophets was hardly undertaken till the commencement of the second canon; and by this time, no doubt, many writings had been lost, others were more or less fragmentary, and the tradition of authorship was not always complete. It was, indeed, more important to have an oracle authenticated by the name of its author than to know the writer of a history or a psalm, and many prophets seem to have prefixed their names to their works. But other prophecies are quite anonymous, and prophets who quote earlier oracles never give the author's name. (A famous case occurs, Isaiah xvi, xvi, where in xvi, 13, for since that time, read long ago). Now, all the remains of prophecy, whether provided with titles or not, were ultimately arranged in four books, the fourth of which names, in separate titles, twelve authors; while the first three books are named after Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and actually mention no other names in the titles of the several prophecies of which they are made up. But is it safe to assume that every anonymous prophecy in these books must be by the author of the next preceding prophecy which has a title? Certainly any such assumption can only be provisional, and may be overthrown by internal evidence. But internal evidence of date, it is said, cannot apply to prophetic books in which the author looks in a supernatural way into the future. The value of this argument must be tested by looking more closely at the actual contents of the prophetic books.

Paine and Parsons Compared.

MR. EDITOR: I see that the N. Y. Observer still persists in calling Thomas Paine a beastly drunkard. Paine was cotemporary in New York with Rev. Dr. Rogers, Rev. Dr. Mason, and Rev. Dr. McCloud, all of whom were quite as much addicted to drink as Paine was. But being the "Lord's anointed" and pastors respectively of three Presbyterian churches, their memories were not blackened. Ask any man who has lived in New York during the last fifty years and is familiar with the church, whether the three preachers above named were not as weak brethren in regard to whiskey drinking as so many of the clergy nowadays are in regard to women. Admitting that Thomas Paine did drink immoderately (which is not proven) is it not as bad in clergymen to do the same. Ought the pot which is black with soot to call the kettle hard names? I hope you will make Mr. Prime's brazen face blush at his venomous slander of Paine. FAIR PLAY.

Freethought Notes.

ORGANIZATION OF STATE COMMITTEES, COUNTY COMMITTEES—THE LIBERAL CONGRESS—RAILROAD REDUCTIONS, ETC.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Will you allow me space to communicate to the Liberal public some Freethought notes? Your correspondent has recently been appointed Executive Committee-man for the National Liberal League, and, in accordance with the requirements of the N. L. L. constitution, has appointed his associates; so that the following named persons are the N. L. L. STATE COMMITTEE FOR N. Y. S.

H. L. Green, Salamanca, N. Y., D. M. Bennett, New York City, Dr. L. Crittenden, Rochester, N. Y., John W. Truesdell, Syracuse, N. Y., Edgar M. Sellon, Castile, N. Y.

The committee are requested to meet for organization and consultation at the Bracket House in Rochester on the evening of Oct. 25th. Since I reported in THE TRUTH SEEKER, the following county FREETHOUGHT and LIBERAL LEAGUE COMMITTEES have been perfected:

CHAUTAUQUA COUNTY—E. Mitchell, Jamestown; O. G. Chase, Jamestown; Alexander C. Douthitt, Jamestown, N. Y.

LIVINGSTON COUNTY—H. B. McNair, Dansville; Horner Archibald, Fowlersville; Homer McVean, Avon.

ST. LAWRENCE COUNTY—J. B. Armstrong, Ogdensburg; S. C. Crane, Potsdam; Joseph Studholm, Ogdensburg.

SCHUYLER COUNTY—Cap. D. C. Day, Watkins; G. C. Hibbard, Watkins; John Neuseron, Watkins.

SENECA COUNTY—Edmund W. Mitchell, West Junius; Henry Bonnell, Waterloo; Joseph Barnes, Waterloo.

STEBEN COUNTY—Dr. N. N. St. John, Wayland; Wm. H. Smith, Wayland; James S. Bronson, Haskinsville.

I have as yet been able to make but few arrangements with railroads for reduced fare. Those going to Rochester from east and south of Corning, N. Y., can get excursion tickets at Corning to Rochester and return for $3.65. Those coming from the west, over the Atlantic and Great Western R. R., can get excursion tickets at Salamanca for Rochester and return for $5.00. If other arrangements are made, I will announce them.

From communications I am receiving from various quarters, I am confident we shall have a large, interesting gathering at Rochester. The speakers already engaged I learn are Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Illinois, Hon. Judge McCormick, Pennsylvania, Horace Seaver, editor Investigator, F. E. Abbot, editor Index, D. M. Bennett, editor TRUTH SEEKER, Dr. T. L. Brown, President Freethinker's Association, Dr. Rabbi M. Landsburg of Rochester and Mrs.

Elizabeth Cady Stanton have been invited, and will probably attend. In addition to the above, many others will doubtless be present. There will be delegates from most of the Northern States.

Many Liberals in Rochester will keep people free of charge, and liberal arrangements are being made for Hotel accommodations. Every Liberal who desires to see our noble cause advance should attend this congress if it is possible for him to do so.

Wherever ten Liberal persons can be got together, a local Liberal League should be organized and regular delegates elected. Where that can not be done, interested individuals should go themselves.

Ethics of Spiritualism.

We clip the following from the Religio-Philosophical Journal of the 13th inst:

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.—It affords us extreme felicity to be able to announce to our readers the deeply important fact that we have perfected an arrangement whereby we are to receive from the inspired pen of the man whom of all men in the ranks of Spiritualism will be acknowledged as best able to handle the subject, a series of articles treating of the Ethics of Spiritualism. The writer is Hudson Tuttle, author of "Physical Man," "Arcana of Nature," "God Idea in History," "Christ Idea in History," "Career of Religious Ideas," and other works, as well as an industrious and careful writer for the current spiritualistic press. Mr. Tuttle brings to this task a long and varied experience made under circumstances and surroundings calculated to develop his wisdom to a high degree. In the quiet of his country home aided by every needed accessory, his mind has become illuminated upon this subject by the direct interposition of some of the ablest men who have lived on earth, and now from the Spirit-world are working for the uplifting of the human race.

Spiritualism has been charged with immoral tendencies. It is proposed to show that it is the foundation of all systems of religion and the source of the purest morals. Ethics studied by the light of evolution and the immortality of the human spirit become a theme wide as the Universe, as deep as its foundations, as lofty as the throne of infinite force. The field is unexplored, and the methods of study original. The design is to furnish a code of morals flowing out of man's spiritual nature, and the continuous development of his physical life.

It will emphatically answer the question: "What do the spirits teach concerning the conduct of life?"

Comments on Spiritualism.

BY AN OUTSIDER.

This modern doctrine has startling facts to back it up. What if spirits of the departed are met and spoken to face to face? The skeptic will naturally suggest legerdemain, trick, hallucination, craziness, falsehood—anything, rather than admit so improbable a statement. Yet, lately, at some spiritual doings at Memphis, Mo., I met those who died years ago and spoke to them face to face.

From the substance of the conversation, the features of the face, etc., all chance of trick is precluded.

With business promptness, almost amounting to levity, in a little house at Memphis, Mo., these likenesses of the dead, in full size, can be called to view at any time and in any number, that will converse as living persons will converse (in whispers).

It has been customary when anything extraordinary occurs that we do not understand to attribute it to Julius Caesar or the Devil, and so dismiss the matter. That time is past.

The scriptural Job said, "If a man die, shall he live again?" The question has come down through the centuries unanswered until this, our day. As to an after existence for man, the Materialist denies it, the Religionist believes it, the Spiritualist proves it.

I will venture an opinion that crime and misdeeds will in the near future be brought home to the perpetrators by means of the spiritual doings—nay, I am well informed that numerous visits of detective police have already been made there with good effect.

I am not a Spiritualist—do not see and hear with spiritualistic eyes and ears, but try to keep clear from prejudice. I know that my only worship is at the shrine of truth, at all times, under all circumstances, so far as I can perceive it.

F. J. EMERY.

The Rochester Platform.

NEW YORK, Oct. 2, 1877.

MR. EDITOR: I am very glad to see the call for the First Annual Congress of the National Liberal League. I am also glad of the proposition to adopt a political platform and enter upon a course of political action. It is high time the Liberal forces were organized and resolved to make their power felt in some demonstrative, efficient way.

The three "principles and measures," as published, are all to the point and admirable. For the work that the Index and the League have taken in hand to do, these principles are all-sufficient. But when we come to organize a political party, I would like to suggest something more. Such an organization should be a widely-extended, all-embracing affair, and we should make friends and allies of as many correlated parties as possible. A "conscience-party" is good, provided we enlist about all the conscience there is going; then the party, while it is growing and not yet electing its candidates, will, at least, make itself respected. But a conscience vote of only those who convene and resolve and nominate, will be too much like descending into one's own inner consciousness and hoping thence to evolve a political party.

A little log-rolling will be but the part of strategy, diplomacy, and fairness in war, in any political action the League may take. I should say, then, add at least a Labor plank and a Woman's Rights plank, and perhaps a radical expression of some kind about money. This would inevitably multiply adherents; and, if ably advocated and judiciously managed, might capture and absorb those parties altogether. They all sadly need organization; and one might almost say that the party that is best organized is best, and would gather in all other radical movements.

At all events, vastly important as are the three planks which you propose, and politically good as they are as far as they go, yet I fear they would be generally deemed, even by Liberal voters, as touching only religious questions, and not urgent enough to detach them from the more concrete, pressing, and immediate questions of the ordinary political parties. But, with five loaves and two small fiscal planks, I think we could feed the whole Liberal multitude and have some baskets full left over for the scarred and wounded of the defeated party. Men of ever so much conscience like to vote where there is a fair prospect that some time or other the vote will tell. The laws of gravitation apply to political as well as to planetary bodies. The larger they are, the more they attract the aerolite meteors, free particles, and whatever is afloat; and, unless a body is large enough to properly apply the word magnitude to it, it might turn out a mere wandering comet, with net tail enough to wag anything, certainly not the star. The ballot-box will all the more attract votes if, like Pandora's, it has hope in the bottom of it. So let us go in for a conscience party, indeed; but whatever happens, let us go in for success. The wisdom of the serpent is never so important as when you are dealing with snakes.

Very sincerely yours,

THEOBALD C. LELAND.

Obituary.

Thomas Barnard, of the celebrated jewelry firm of Ball & Barnard, of New York, died at his residence in Newark, N. J., Oct. 7th, aged 69 years. Mr. Barnard descended from a long line of jewellers; his grandfather being Sir Thomas Barnard, who made the crown jewels of William IV. Mr. Barnard was a Freethinker of the strongest type. Brought up religiously in the Church of England, he early renounced that faith, and was what is called an Infidel in its strongest sense. He investigated Spiritualism, but always had some doubts as to its genuineness, and of late years had devoted his attention purely to science and the scientific solution of the problem. Upon this his mind became entirely at rest, and he died at last in that peace and comfort which only knowledge (not faith) can give.

As a business man he was honest to a fault, and had that opinion of a man that failed which forbade him to recognize him except as a robber or thief, and particularly when they paid twenty-five cents on the dollar and afterwards became richer than before.

His death was deeply mourned by all his business friends, and his loss creates a vacancy hard to fill. His peaceful death was in strange contrast with that of most Christians, and was in full accordance with his pure life and habits. If there is a heaven, he is there; and if there is not, he is as well off as the best.

The New Inquisition.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: However they differ in methods and objects, reformers agree in truth-seeking and readiness to become wiser in finding it. But, preferring darkness to light, established error would strangle growing thought, conscientiously ignorant people often being bitter opponents of progress. Though nothing is safe but truth, nothing is thought to be so dangerous as truth. The career of Anthony Comstock in the United States and the persecution of Bradlaugh-Besant in England reveal stubborn resistance to the diffusion of knowledge on subjects of the gravest importance. Effort to determine what books people shall read is by no means confined to Roman Catholic inquisitors and the political usurpers of the Old World. An agent of the Labor and Love reform associations, Josephine S. Tilton, was recently "banished" from Newburyport, Mass., by the City Marshal, while innocently and lawfully pursuing her work; later, her books were confiscated in Halifax, N. S., again in Moncton, N. B., while in Charlottetown, Prince Edward's Island, the Mayor and Marshal seized "Yours or Mine," "Cupid's Yokes," "Uncivil Liberty," J. H. Noyes' "Male Continence" and "Scientific Propagation," "The Miller-Strickland Defense," the Radical Review, the Crucible, and the Word, with other publications, and gravely burned them in the public square! All this without any formal charge or legal conviction of wrong doing, though Miss Tilton in each case asked wherein her books were "incendiary" and "immoral," and was ready to vindicate in any court the legality of her work. Since last June she has lost in this way one hundred and fifty dollars' worth of books, taken by "authorities" who do not even condescend to try her for alleged offense!

It is a well settled principle of American and English law that one should not be deprived of liberty or property without legal process; also that the people have a natural right to peaceably assemble and deliberate concerning the public welfare, or to print and diffuse their ideas relative thereto, unmolested by any authority whatsoever. The object of the Labor Reform League and the Free-Love League, with both of which Miss Tilton serves, is to abolish poverty and prostitution by the repeal of certain laws. Whoever before supposed that it is not as lawful to ask the repeal as for the enactment of laws? Yet these "authorities" have gratuitously assumed that publications which criticize rent, usury, marriage, and seek to repeal laws which sustain poverty and prostitution are "incendiary" and "immoral"! Since the days of Erskine the invasive doctrine of "constructive treason" has had no standing in English courts; yet these presuming officials construe an act to be seditious and immoral, sentencing an American citizen for alleged crime, without trial or even prosecution!

Able lawyers tell Miss Tilton, what is apparent to all unbiased observers, that the treatment she has suffered is opposed to all generally recognized law; and she desires to invite some of these inquisitors to explain their conduct in court; but the cost of doing so, and her already heavy losses, in books and traveling expenses, make it impossible to follow up the case unless friends of free thought will help her to funds. Presuming that many will be glad to do so, I venture to ask contributions to aid in resisting this New Inquisition. Money sent to Dr. Edward Newberry, 201 East 34 st., N. Y.; to O. T. Parks, 69 Beach st., Boston, or to the Word, Princeton, Mass., will be duly acknowledged and faithfully applied. In behalf of the right to mind our own business,

Truly yours, E. H. HEYWOOD.

A Conversion.

A TORONTO PRESBYTERIAN MINISTER CONVERTED TO SPIRITUALISM.

The Rev. John Marples, the well-known Presbyterian minister of this city, and lately a missionary down in the Muskoko district, has just sent in his resignation to the Presbytery, and for the future will have no connection with the Presbyterian body as a clergyman. His reason for taking this step is his firm conviction that Spiritualism is a reality—an opinion which he would not be allowed to hold or preach if he continued in the ministry of the Presbyterian Church in Canada. Mr. Marples will, in the course of next week, deliver a public lecture on the subject, in which he will state the process of his conversion to Spiritualism. He has arrived at this decision after long, anxious and patient investigation of the whole matter, and is now so convinced of its truth as to give up all his prospects of advancement in his Church in consequence of his convictions. Mr. Marples, however, totally disavows all belief in many things which some Spiritualists claim to be a necessary part of their seances. He simply maintains that between the world of spirits and that on which we live there exists an intimate connection, and that this intimacy if kept up, as it can be by mediums, tends to make a man a better Christian and more sympathetic with his fellows. He holds that there is a spirit of God, a spirit of angels, a spirit of man, and a spirit permeating nature—one of magnetism, or electricity, to speak materially. Mr. Marples had the matter finally tested a few evenings ago before an assembly from whom a committee was formed. The medium, a lady well known in Toronto, satisfactorily answered various enquiries—in particular she appeared to satisfy one gentleman, an unbeliever, as to the spirit of a deceased friend of his of whom she could not possibly have heard. Putting himself en rapport with her, he merely mentioned the initial letters of the name of the dead. She at once mentioned the full name, and on being asked how he died, she took her hand out of that of the inquirer, and holding both hers above her head, made a plunge forward to show that he met his death by drowning. It is not, however, fair either to anticipate Mr. Marples' disclosures or to criticize him or his opinions now. The world will be better able to judge of everything after he has placed himself at the bar of public opinion.

—Leader.

574 KING ST., TORONTO, ONT., CAN.
Oct. 10, 1877.

MR. EDITOR: I have been requested to form the Spiritualists in Toronto into an association. We are now engaged in that work. The number of Spiritualists is but small. This is a most exclusive city; still it is likely the work will go on. Subscriptions have already been promised. One of $50.00, one $25.00, one $20.00, one $12.00—other gentlemen have promised, and the canvass has not gone far yet.

This movement was inaugurated by a public lecture; a report of which is enclosed along with another slip; both of which I should be glad if you have room for in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Should any gentleman in your city or other part of the States be disposed to assist in this movement, he might send to F. P. G. Taylor, Esq., Wellington Place, Toronto, Ontario, Canada. He is one of the oldest Spiritualists in this city. I remain, dear sir,

Yours truly, JOHN MARPLES, M. D.
Late Presbyterian minister.

Friendly Correspondence.

T. A. CAPEHART, Polk Patch, Ind., writes: I see by the last TRUTH SEEKER that the Liberals are to have a Convention for the purpose of determining whether to put a Presidential ticket in the field in 1880. I speak for myself only, but think I utter the sentiment of several Liberals of my acquaintance, when I say that nothing would please me better than to get a chance to vote for straight-out Infidels for President and Vice-President in 1880. By all means give us a ticket.

S. I. DAVIS, Davis, Ill., writes: The Liberal meeting held this fall in the State of New York was very satisfactory in every sense, and the call for the Liberal League at Rochester is evidence that some of the people are waking up. What we want now is a convention, to be held at Chicago or Dubuque, Iowa, calling the Western Liberals together and having a thorough Western organization, so that we shall know who and where we are. I think we can get up a very large and enthusiastic meeting. I think it would be a source of pleasure and profit to us all. I enclose a little slip which, if you will publish, will call the attention of your Western readers to the subject of a Western Convention, and see what they think about it. I hope Paine Hall is in a more satisfactory shape to the subscribers and that it will be paid for in time. But I think the Liberals of the East will have to do it and let the West have a hall of their own in Chicago, St. Louis or Dubuque within the next five years. Give us your opinion of a Western Convention this winter, in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

[We think very favorably indeed of holding a Western Liberal Convention. There are thousands of excellent Liberals in the West, and they ought by all means to get up a rousing Convention. Let the ball be set a going, and, if properly conducted, it will be a success.—Ed. T. S.]

A. S. WALTER, Rock Springs, W. Ter., writes: With unfeigned pleasure I embrace the opportunity of informing you and your many readers that the lovers of truth and their fellow-men have fully awakened to the necessity of action, and on Sunday evening the 7th inst. the champions of Freethought in our little town assembled at Jarvie's Hall and organized, under the name of "The Society of Freethought and Social Culture," and adopted the motto, "Think for yourself, and express that thought; Freethought will give us truth." A library will be added as soon as we get fully into the traces (I say traces for we have cast aside the yoke). Our membership list is as yet small, though we have no fear but that it will grow, for, "Tall oaks from little acorns grow," and all seem to be fully awake and determined to gain the day. The officers for the ensuing year are Z. B. Meridith, President; Wm. Musgrove, Vice-President; W. S. Walker, Secretary; John Jarvie, Treasurer; Wm. Dale, D. Llewellyn, and Thos. Sutton, Trustees; W. S. Walter, E. Llewellyn, and A. Challier, Library Committee.

NELSON BEALE, Frostburg, Md., writes: Please find enclosed one dollar, for which you will please forward me by mail one copy of the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion." I have read the debate regularly as it came out, and would now like to have it in book form, so that I may loan it to some of my orthodox friends. I am well acquainted with the Rev. Mr. Humphrey and his estimable lady. They lived a while in our village, and I have heard him preach, and have held arguments with him. He is a smart, able theologian, well read and posted, but on the great and vital questions I think you had decidedly the better of him. You proposed so much that was unanswerable, that he was obliged to evade many of your propositions. Only one copy of your paper is taken here, by M. Stern, and is read by three persons only, myself included. Stern keeps it under cover. Science travels slowly in the rural districts, but, like truth, following along in the rear, in time it will come to the front. You must not conclude that we three are the only Liberals here. There are many more; but they are only partially opened to truth, only enough to know that all is not sacred that claims to be. Please excuse this long letter. You are too much occupied to read it I know.

H. J. R. Dunleith, Ill., writes: I am going to write you a letter, and indeed, if it amounts to naught blame me. There is nothing like trying, and the best of people sometimes make the worst mistakes, I fully believe. In the first place I extend an imaginary hand and congratulate you upon your complete overthrow of the divinity of the Bible. The Bible is not divine, so of course Infidelity is true. Now that the truthfulness of Infidelity is established (in our estimation), let us add grain upon grain to its veracity until there can be found no errors or flaws in it; and the way to do this is to live so honorable and upright ourselves that there can be no errors or flaws in us. Let us try to remove all errors and post truth in its place. To admit that we have erred or made mistakes is no disgrace, but rather a proof of progress, or an advancement in ideas and knowledge. So if we find defects or faults in Infidelity, let us not uphold them, but censure and condemn them as deserved; we are then therefore truly advancing our cause and approaching nearer truth. Now, dear TRUTH SEEKER, we are all becoming so familiar with the "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," the absurdity of its teachings, etc., that we are sighing for something higher, for a deeper, wider range of thought, and indeed what shall it be, as all truth is old? The mission of THE TRUTH SEEKER is as its name indicates, and we all should endeavor to help it. It has pointed out thousands of errors to us; let us help it to remove all errors by removing our own. We are imperfect beings, and our cause is not advanced by seeking flaws and mistakes in others. We are free thinkers, but we are not free talkers; there are restraints, and we are bound to a certain degree. Every person's opinion should be respected if it is an honest opinion, as you have fully shown.

Special Notices.

Spermatorrhœa.

Dr. R. P. Fellows' warranted cure should be in the hands of those suffering from this LIFE-WASTING disease. It is an external application and has made one thousand permanent cures, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition: had been in insane asylums, many had falling-sickness fits; others on the verge of consumption, while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS,

The discoverer of this valuable remedy, and who uses it exclusively in his practice, is acknowledged to be the most skillful physician in all Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases living. Terms extremely moderate in all cases. Address, with stamp, Vineland, N. J., where he is permanently located.

Dr. J. S. Lyon's Hygeian Home is in Springfield, Mo. Box 247. Send for circular.

Christianity and Infidelity

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n. Clergyman, OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers; and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion.

A thick 12mo volume of 550 pages, well bound sent, post-paid, to any address, for the low price of one dollar.

PAYNE'S AGE OF REASON.

SETH WILBUR PAYNE, EDITOR.

The attention of the Independent Reasoners of America is called to a candidate for their favors. The first number of

PAYNE'S AGE OF REASON

will be issued on or about the 15th of October, 1877,

and regularly on the 15th of each month thereafter.

This much is promised, but should the support permit, it will be issued semi-monthly or even weekly, the latter being the intention of the proprietor. In either case the subscription price will remain the same.

IN QUANTITY, THE AGE OF REASON will contain sixteen pages of four wide columns each, or sixty-four columns of closely-printed matter, thus making it the largest by nearly one-half any known liberal publication.

While ITS MISSION will be to unfetter the minds of men from the dismal superstitions of the past, it will be a first-class family journal as well. It will have a variety of departments and the steady effort of its proprietor will be to make a paper that every independent reasoner and the members of his household will delight to read, pass among their friends, and loan to their church-riden and ministerially befogged neighbors. In the ORTHODOX SENSE, the AGE OF REASON will be intensely infidel, but in the purpose of its editor it will be a fearless, fair-dealing, first-class Liberal family journal.

It is believed that every liberal-minded, truth-seeking reader can but be pleased with it, and such are respectfully solicited to give it their support.

Subscription Price.

Heathens of the Heath;

A ROMANCE, BY WM. McDONNELL,

AUTHOR OF "EXETER HALL," ETC.

This work is rich in romantic and pathetic incidents, and exhibits with an overwhelming array of facts the atrocities committed by the Church. It shows that the purest morality exists without the Bible, and that many of the heathen philosophers were lovers of virtue. The folly of Christian ministers is fully portrayed. Hypocrisy and bigotry are clearly exposed, and the road to virtue and true happiness plainly marked out. A most pleasing romance is woven into the work, in which much opportunity is afforded the author for fine descriptions and beautiful sentiments which he so well knows how to give utterance to. The characters in the tale are invested with much interest; the hero and heroine gain the love of every reader. "On the whole, it is the work of a master hand—a work of unaffected beauty and the deepest interest." "One of the most valuable features of the work is, its positions are all proven. . . . Every thinking, enquiring mind should peruse it." 500 pp., 12mo. Price, in paper, $1.00; cloth, 1.50.

Gems of Thought.

UNTIL genius and labor formed a partnership, there was no such thing as prosperity among men.—Ingersoll.

EVERY man is dishonest who lives upon the unpaid labor of others, no matter whether he occupies a throne or lives in a poor-house.—Ingersoll.

GOVERNMENT began in tyranny, and force began in the feudalism of the soldier and the bigotry of the priest, and the ideas of justice and humanity have been fighting their way like a thunder-storm against the organized selfishness of human nature.—Anon.

ON a farm man goes in partnership with Nature. He lives with flowers and trees; there is no frightful strain upon his mind; the nights are filled with sleep and rest; he watches his flocks and herds on the green slopes; he hears the pleasant rain falling upon his corn, and the trees he planted in youth rustle above, while he plants others for the children yet to be.—Ingersoll.

CLIMB if you would see the sun over the eternal hills. Let the stones pierce your feet if you would know what it is to have won the victory of life. Do not push aside the thorns if you want to know what it is to have vanquished them. Mariners plow the seas; philosophers probe the earth and dwell lifelong over one secret that they may find out the mystery thereof. Hairs turn gray, faces are wrinkled, forms become decrepit over one truth that the soul is in search of.—Mrs. Cora L. V. Tappan.

To condemn all mankind for the sin of Adam and Eve; to let the innocent suffer for the guilty; to keep any one alive in torture for ever and ever; these actions are magnified copies of what bad men can do. No juggling with "divine justice" can make them anything else. This must be said to all kinds and conditions of men: that if God holds all mankind guilty for the sin of Adam, if he has visited upon the innocent the punishment of the guilty, if he is to torture any single soul forever, then it is wrong to worship him.—Prof. Clifford.

MANY a man has died unhonored and unsung who left in every footprint, from childhood to the tomb, a rich and brilliant legacy to the world; and no legacy worth commemorating was ever left the world which was not baptized in the sweat of honest toil. From mental and physical exertion the earth has been made to blossom, the seas have been covered with life, civilization has shot its sunshine into the gloom of rudeness, and science has raised its softness on the world. On every field that bears a tempting harvest on its breast, on every brick in every building that was ever reared, on every book of value that was ever written, on every thought that burns to light the world, in every workshop and mine and furnace and factory—wherever labor sweats, are written the credentials of nobility.—Anon.

A BLESSING on the cheerful people—man, woman or child, old or young, illiterate or educated, handsome or homely. Over and above every other social trait stands cheerfulness. What the sun is to Nature—what joy is to the stricken heart—are cheerful persons in the houses and by the wayside. They go unobtrusively and unconsciously about their silent and useful mission, brightening up society round about them with happiness always beaming from their faces. We love to sit near them; we love the expression of their eye, the tone of their voice. Little children find them out, oh! so quickly, amidst the dense crowd, and passing by the scowling brows and lips drawn at their corners, glide near, and laying a confiding little hand on their knee, lift their clear young eyes to those loving faces.—Anon.

PERFECTION is impossible. Gods, angels, Christs, are all imperfect creations of the imperfect minds of imperfect men. No one can by any possibility conceive of perfection, because there is not, and cannot be, any such thing in all the broad Universe. A blade of grass to the naked eye seems perfect, and so does the lily or the rose; but put them under a powerful microscope and they will be seen to be full of flaws and blemishes. All that exists is capable of improvement. Even gods improve as nations improve. The Jews improved upon the gods of the heathen; and the New Testament writers improved upon the old, warlike, vengeful, jealous, Mosaic God; while our best speakers and writers of to-day have vastly improved upon the God of Jesus and Paul, and will still continue to improve upon him till they have finally improved the last attenuated shadow of his existence into nothingness, nonentity, and annihilation.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

THE civilization of man has increased to the same extent that religious power has decreased. The intellectual advancement of man depends upon how often he can exchange an old superstition for a new truth. The Church never enabled a human being to make even one of these exchanges; on the contrary, all her power has been used to prevent them. In spite, however, of the Church, man found that some of his religious conceptions were wrong. By reading his Bible, he found that the ideas of his God were more cruel and brutal than those of the most depraved savage. In every age some thinker, some doubter, some investigator, some hater of hypocrisy, some despiser of sham, some brave lover of the right, has gladly, proudly and heroically braved the ignorant fury of superstition for the sake of man and truth. These divine men were generally torn in pieces by the worshippers of the gods. Religious persecution springs from a due admixture of love toward God and hatred toward man.—Ingersoll.

Quads and Quads.

WHY have short men no right to marry? Because marriage is a rite of Hymen.

AN old Paris paper has the following remarkable remark: "The American and English educate their children in the fear of God and the love of money."

"You're a smart fellow," sneered a lawyer to a witness in Goyanus court one day. "I'd return the compliment," replied the witness, "if I wasn't under oath."

MISS MARY J. HAPPY, of Cortland, has been made sad by marrying a man by that name. But then, when she gets over her first little sadness, she may be happy again.

A GERMAN who had just landed was before the city court last week. He spoke seven words, all the English he had learned coming over, and was fined seven dollars for profanity.

"No, Pa," she said, tearfully, "I must renounce Theodore forever. I saw him in the regatta when he had no shirt on, and I can never, never marry a man with a wart on his back."

TO WIVES.—Don't you ever believe that your husband gets drunk of his own accord. It is his intimate friend who pries his mouth open with a crowbar and pours the champagne into him by the basketful.

THE Princess of Wales has grown deaf as a post, and her delighted husband now kisses the hired girl behind the hall door, with resounding smacks that shake the pendants on the chandelier, with perfect impunity.

THERE is an undertaker in Chicago named Sinn. This is a very appropriate name, when it is taken into consideration by the thoughtful reader that "the wages of sin is death," and if it wasn't for death Sin would get no wages of any kind.

WHEN a small boy with a prejudice against yellow dogs observes an oyster can in a condition of inactivity, he at once begins debating the question whether it was created to point a moral or adorn a dog's tail. The dog gets the first news of the decision.

IT's well enough to be fashionable, and all that sort of thing," reflects a Western editor, "but aristocracy may grind us to oblivious dust and shroud us in solitary darkness, before we'll ever try to eat custard pie with a fork again, unless we have a bib."

MOTHER, mother, here's Freddy teasing the baby! Make him cry again, Freddy, and then mother will give him some sugar, and I'll take it away from him; then he'll squall, and mother will give him some more, and you can take that, and then we'll both have some."

A ST. LOUIS paper tells a story of a disconsolate widower who, on seeing all that was mortal of his late wife lowered into the grave, exclaimed, with tears in his eyes, "Well, I've lost gloves, I've lost umbrellas—yes, even cows and horses; but I never—no, never—had anything cut me up like this."

JULIUS CESAR got a divorce from Portia just because he wanted her to be above suspicion. And many an American husband, as he watches his wife reveling in a strictly private investigation of his ulster pockets, has wished that in this benighted country you could get rid of a woman for being on a dead-level with that degrading weakness.

PADDY'S VERSION OF "EXCELSIOR."
'Twas growing dark so terrible fast,
When through a town up the mountain passed
A broth of a boy, to his neck in the snow;
As he walked his shillalah he swung to and fro,
Saying, it's till the top I'm bound for to go,
Be jabbers.

He looked mortal sad, and his eyes were as bright
As a fire of turf on a cold winter's night,
And divil a word what he said could ye tell
As he opened his mouth and let out a yell;
It's up to the top of the mountain I'll go,
Unless covered up in this bothersome snow,
Be jabbers!

Through the windows he saw, as he traveled along,
The light of the candles and fires so warm;
But a big chunk of ice fell over his head;
Wid a snivel and groan, By St. Patrick, he said,
It's up till the very tip-top I will rush,
And then if it falls 'tis not meself it'll crush,
Be jabbers!

Whist a bit, said an old man whose head was as white
As the snow that fell down on that miserable night;
Shure ye'll fall in the wather, me bit of a lad,
For the night is so dark and the walkin' so bad,
Bedad! he'd not list to a word that was said,
But he'd go to the top if he wint on his head,
Be jabbers!

A bright, buxom young girl, such as like to be kissed,
Axed him wadn't he shtop, and how could he resist?
So, snapping his fingers and winking his eye,
While he smiled upon her, he made his reply,
Faith, I meant to kape on till I got to the top,
But as yer swate self has axed me, I may as well shtop,
Be jabbers!

He shtopped all night and he shtopped all day,
And ye wadn't be askin' when he did go away;
For wouldn't he be a bastely goosoon
To be lavin' his darlint in the shwate honey-moon,
When the old man has pratles enough and to spare—
Shure he might as well stay if he's comfortable there,
Be jabbers!

Notes and Clippings.

It is estimated that the drouth of 1877 cost California $20,000,000.

THE Belgians have hit upon a new species of amusement—cat racing.

FIVE clergymen are convicts in the Kentucky Penitentiary. No Infidels.

POOR people who go on getting poorer every year have babies all the same.

THE Astronomer-Royal for Scotland predicts a severe winter in Great Britain.

A wag suggests that a suitable opening for many choirs would be: Lord! have mercy on us miserable sinners.

THE Roman Catholic congregation at Rome has pronounced against the canonization of Christopher Columbus.

REV. MR. TALMAGE'S new book is entitled, "Old Wells Pumped Out." Why didn't he call it "Dead Cats" at once?

A NEW religious sect holds that a husband must confess his sins to his wife once a week. Rough on other men's wives.

It has been discovered that all tramps have dyspepsia, and somebody is sorry that it is not a more fatal disease.

It is stated in the London Court Journal that Professors Darwin, Huxley and Tyndall are to spend their Autumn holiday at Trenton Falls, in this state.

BOSTON lovers of eloquence are trying to induce Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, of Illinois, to speak at a republican ratification meeting in Faneuil Hall.

GRASSHOPPERS are considered good barometers in the West. After the sudden descent of a swarm to the earth, rain invariably falls within half an hour.

TWENTY years ago it required over five tons of coal to make a ton of iron rails; now a ton of steel rails may be produced from the ore with half that quantity of coal.

TOADS are getting a commercial value in Europe, some one probably in the toad trade having successfully promulgated the theory that if a toad has a weakness it is for Colorado beetles.

MR. RICHARD HANKE, a coal miner, living near Galesburg, Ill., is reported to have dug out of the earth, fifty feet below the surface, the entire carcass of a petrified mastodon, sixteen feet long and nine feet high, in almost perfect shape.

THE correspondent of the Times at Rome says: "The Vatican is reported to be plotting a proclamation of the temporal power of the Church." The correspondent adds that this is incredible, but with the Vatican nothing is impossible.

SUICIDE is alarmingly on the increase. Between Aug. 24th and Oct. 16th there were twenty-two cases of self-destruction in this city and fourteen attempts at suicide, the largest number in the same period of time in our municipal history.

SINCE the recent great earthquakes on the Pacific coast of South America the province of Catamarca, in the western part of the Argentine Republic, has become gradually submerged, and the great lake formed there is continually enlarging.

HERE is a criticism on a sermon, which, like sentences of the Delphic oracle, may be read in two different ways. When asked how she liked the morning discourse, she replied, "It was good enough, what there was of it; and there was enough of it, such as it was."

THE Hungarian Minister of Worship has just announced his decision that henceforward the marriage, with a Jewess, of a Christian converted to the Jewish persuasion will be held null and void. This declaration has caused universal discontent in the Jewish community.

AN Arkansas man who has had an invalid wife concluded to get rid of her. He loaded both barrels of a shot-gun and attempted to shoot her in bed, but the caps only snapped. Then he reversed the weapon and attempted to dash out the sufferer's brains. The stock struck the bedpost, the loads were discharged, and the two charges of shot entered his lungs. There were few mourners.

PROF. TYNDALL at Birmingham, quoting the song of the herald angels "Glory to God in the Highest," etc., said: "Look to the East at the present moment as a comment on the promise of peace on earth, good will toward men. That promise is a dream dissolved by the experience of eighteen centuries."

SOME of our church folks imagine that Col. Bob Ingersoll has a long tail, a cloven hoof at the end of one leg, and a pair of horns on his head, but we beg to assure them that they are entirely mistaken. He is in fact a good-looking fellow. He laughs heartily when he is pleased, but when downright angry he has been known to swear a little.

A FANCY preacher in Louisville was discoursing on the fall of man, and thus pictured the scene which took place in the Garden of Eden: "And they recognized the fact of their nakedness, and went and made themselves aprons of fig leaves—miserable shift!" Being guiltless of any intention to make a pun, he was astonished to see how the congregation smiled.

A MAINE man went out the other morning and cut down his apple-trees, and the Lewiston Journal asserts that when his friends expostulated he said that he had indulged in so much profanity at seeing his apples stolen from time to time, that he found every Sunday morning that he was unfit to go to church. If Eve could not withstand a single apple, perhaps even a Maine man ought not to be expected to withstand the loss of a whole orchardful.

It would seem that not only is the climate of Iceland growing so cold that grain cannot ripen there, but that of Scandinavia and Western Europe is becoming more severe. This is due, it is supposed, to the steady descent of the ice of the far North upon the shores of Iceland. It has been ascertained that the temperature of Greenland was once much more mild than at present. Plants have been discovered in a fossil state there which cannot now present a sign of life. In the Atlantic, also, ice has been found much further south than formerly. Is another ice age slowly making its approach?

ONCE Tom Paine's grave was found by Cobbett Who of its bones contrived to rob it; But now, with passion, Prime heaps his dying bed with shame, While Ingersoll defends the same In savage fashion.

"As gun, well aimed at duck or plover, Recoils and kicks the owner over," As Trumbull rhymed it, So the Observer's blunderbuss Proved deadly at the breech when thus Irenæus Primed it.—Graphic.

THE London Spectator says: "Archdeacon Denison, on the occasion of his twenty-first harvest-home, made the other day a speech on the food and drink question. He fiercely fell foul of the potato, and rated it as if it were no better than a Low Church bishop. He had made up his mind not to plant another potato as long as he lived. 'To do so was simply to waste the seed and poison the ground, and the more they planted that tuber the more would they poison the ground, until it stank in their nostrils.' It is a little too bad in the Archdeacon, in responding to the clergy, to go over, horse and foot, to the side of the Colorado beetle."

A THEORY OF THE DELUGE.—One of the wildest of theories is the Astronomer-Royal's, that the deluge was simply a great rising of the Nile. Sir G. Airy is so confident respecting this that he says: "I cannot entertain the smallest doubt that the flood of Noah was a flood of the Nile," precisely as he might say, "I cannot entertain the smallest doubt that the earth moves round the sun." On one point we can entertain very little doubt, indeed. If it ever rained before the flood, which seems probable, and if the sun ever shone on falling rain, which again seems likely, nothing short of a miracle could have prevented the rainbow from making its appearance before the flood. The wildest theory that can be invented to explain the story of the deluge cannot be wilder than the supposition that the rays of sunlight shining on falling raindrops could have ever failed to show the prismatic colors.—Belgravia.

THE theology of childhood is sometimes very suggestive. A little five-year old could not quite understand why the stars did not shine one night when the rain was pouring down in torrents. She stood at the window pondering on the subject with as much gravity as Galileo when he looked at the swinging lamp in the Cathedral of Pisa, and with equal success, for all at once her countenance lighted up, and she said, "Mother, I know why the stars don't shine. God has pulled them all up so as to let the water come through the holes."

RECENTLY during a pilgrimage of the faithful to Marpingen, Germany, a place where many miracles are performed, the train stopped at Trier station, where several got out for refreshments. Among them was a cripple who had new crutches, and who appeared to move with difficulty. The train started sooner than was expected, and the cripple hurried to catch it, but finding he could not do so with his crutches, he gathered them up in his hands and ran the whole length of the platform, springing lightly on the footboard and into the carriage, and went on to Marpingen to be miraculously cured. This story is vouched for by the German correspondent of the London Guardian.

WHAT the Sun calls a "peculiar meeting to support a dangerous scheme" was held at Steinway Hall last Monday night, for the purpose of supporting a scheme to elect a Board of Finance to control the expenditures of this city. While some cheek upon the Tammany politicians who "run" the government of this much-robbed city is undoubtedly desirable, it would seem that some method other than practical disfranchising, by a rent or property qualification, some fifty thousand voters might be found. The thieves are not found among the poor but among the rich and pious hypocrites. The scheme, under the guise of a constitutional amendment, allows no one who does not pay a rent of $240 or own real estate in the city to vote for the "Board of Finance." Although the "call" for the meeting had the signatures of many respectable and prominent citizens, it was engineered in the last legislature by one Woodin, who, the Sun says, has $40,000 of Tweed's plunder in his pocket. The support of such a man is, to draw it mildly, not desirable, and anything which would commend itself to him would not be apt to attract the honest men of the country. It might be well to try the plan of putting a few honest men in office before proceeding to disfranchise 50,000 of our poor but not unpatriotic fellow-citizens.

THE LIST OF SPEAKERS at the Rochester Congress, so far as completed at present, is as follows: Col. R. G. Ingersoll, of Peoria, Ill.; Mr. B. F. Underwood, of Thorndike, Mass.; Dr. T. L. Brown, of Binghamton, N. Y.; President of the Freethinkers' Association of Central and Western New York; Mr. Horace Seaver, editor of the Boston Investigator; Mr. F. E. Abbot, editor of the Boston Index; Mr. D. M. Bennett, editor of the New York Truth Seeker; Prof. A. L. Rawson, of New York; Rabbi Max Landsberg, of Rochester, N. Y.; Ex-Rev. W. S. Bell, of N. Bedford, Mass.; Mr. Theron C. Leland, of New York city. There is also some reason to expect Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, of Tenafly, N. J.; Mr. Wm. J. Potter, Secretary of the Free Religious Association; Hon. George W. Julian, of Irvington, Ind.; Hon. Ingersoll Lockwood, of New York city; E. W. Meddaugh, Esq., of Detroit, Mich., and many others. The list of subjects, so far as known, is as follows: opening address on "A New Conscience Party," by F. E. Abbot; "Total Separation of Church and State," by Mr. Underwood; "Total Separation of Church and State, as practically demonstrated in the history of the Jews," by Rabbi Landsberg; "The Ethics of Secular Education," by Dr. Brown; "The Bible in the Common Schools," by Mr. Bennett; "Organization," by Mr. Leland; "Compulsory Education," by Prof. A. L. Rawson; a contributed paper on "Republican Taxation," by Hon. Eliza Wright, of Boston. The day sessions of Friday and Saturday, Oct. 26th and 27th will be devoted to business and free debate on the political platform submitted to the Congress in the "Call" of the Directors; the evenings of these two days, and the whole of Sunday, will be devoted to addresses, short speeches, etc. The Congress will convene at Corinthian Hall, at 10 A. M., Friday, Oct. 26th.

Events of the Week.

THE small-pox is raging in parts of Clinton county, N. Y.

RATES of freight have been advanced on all the main lines of railroads running East and West.

In some parts of the country hereabouts rain fell to the depth of four inches during the late storm.

THEODORE TILTON has so many lecture engagements to fill that he speaks every evening except Sunday.

ROBERT SHEA, a tramp, fell in a fit on Mott St. His head struck the curb stone and he died from the effects.

THE opinions of Republican members of Congress are greatly divided in regard to Pres. Hayes' "Southern Policy."

A LITTLE three year old daughter of Martin Filon, of Union Hill, N. J., fell into a tub of hot water and died from the effects of the scalding.

THE benefit and presents given to Edwin Adams, the invalid actor, aggregated $20,000. That sum ought to keep him comfortable all winter.

MR. AND MRS. J. B. CARLEY and three children, of Port Jervis, O., were poisoned, accidentally or purposely, with arsenic, and some of them must die.

COOL Fall weather is already with us, and fires have become necessary to comfort. We have also had a cold easterly storm of two days' duration.

SENATOR BLAINE was taken suddenly ill as he was about to leave for Maine on account of an injury his daughter sustained by the bursting of a toy pistol.

THE strike of the cigar makers still continues, 6,000 or more holding out in this city. We wish they would all resolve to never make another cigar.

AN extensive fire occurred in Jermyn's coal mine, near Scranton, Pa., which burned with great violence, and did a great amount of damage. It is still burning.

FOUR steamships laden with 182,000 bushels of grain left this port for Europe one week ago. If such shipments as these continue, the financial condition of this country ought to improve.

A MALIGNANT cattle disease has broken out in the southern part of Russia of which hundreds of thousands of cattle have died. It has been so malignant that in many villages not a cow nor an ox is left.

GILMAN, the pious forger, has been removed from Sing Sing to Auburn. His wife, rendered insane by the disgrace of her husband's crime, has been placed in a lunatic asylum; and their children are in the care of their relatives.

ANOTHER sad fire has occurred in St. Johns, N. B. Several blocks were burned over, a large number of dwellings were destroyed and hundreds of families burned out of house and home. It was supposed to have been started by an incendiary.

AN explosion took place in a colliery at High Blantyre, Scotland, near Glasgow. Two hundred and thirty-three men were in the mine and up to this writing not one had been rescued, and the poisonous gases were so abundant, it is probable that every man suffered death.

THE recent victory of the Russians over the Turks near Kars was a decided one. The Turks lost 18,000 men and forty cannon. The Russian loss was less than 2,000. The Turks are strengthening their defenses at Plevna which the Russians are bombarding with great severity. Many a poor fellow is destined to lay down his life there.

MRS. EMMA MARTINOT, wife of an ex-detective in this city, visited the residence of Dr. James Hedden on Eleventh street. She had an altercation with him, during which she became very angry. She seized a chair and broke a bookcase, a looking glass and ornaments. When the doctor tried to eject her she stoutly resisted and he kicked her in the abdomen. He was locked up in the police station and the mad woman was sent to the Hospital.

BY HUDSON TUTTLE.

CHAPTER VII.

Religion is organically opposed to progress. The formulas of religion must of necessity be sacred and inviolable; they cannot yield, and soon are left behind. Then commences the great struggle, not to cease until the reign of perfect knowledge. On one side will be constant effort to extend the domain of knowledge—on the other, persecution; for with the belief in infallibility comes the right of enforcing that belief, and faith and bigotry always are in exact ratio to ignorance. There is no limit to the illustrations history furnishes of this subject. Faith in a religion not understood always results in bigotry, superstition, intolerance, and persecution. It might as well be said that a man's coat influenced his mind as that he is organically changed by an exotic system of religion. A church member, a bigot, a fanatic are easily made, but an organically good and upright man is good and upright from development, and cannot be made to order.

In Robespierre and Condorcet, history has furnished examples of the conduct of life of a man biased in early life by his religious instruction, and of the self-sustaining manhood, developed by intellectual and moral culture. The picture is drawn in strongest colors, and the nobility in life, and philosophical calmness at the approach of death manifested by the latter, is presented in strong contrast with the pitiless cruelty in life, and shrinking from death of the former.

Robespierre was educated a protégé of the Church, and was deeply imbued with the dogmas of religion. A scholar of the Jesuits, his morality was such as the Church bestows. That he was not an inquisitor was determined by his circumstances. He pledged himself to certain political distractions, and in their defense and extension, as remorselessly shed the blood of hecatombs of victims as the priest sacrifices to convictions.

By nature of tender feeling; resigning his office on being compelled to pass sentence of death; trembling even at the sight of blood, he became the most loathsome monster on whom the light of day ever shone. Having inflamed the populace, until, in obedience to his will, they sacrificed on the guillotine, amid shouts of joy, their king, their queen, their nobility, and decimated even the ranks of the people, he with priestly audacity pronounced an oration on the value of morality, religion, and a belief in a Supreme Being, and organized a festival to the latter, in which he officiated as high priest. The most sacred and holy of all missions to him was a revival of the religious sentiment of the French people. Only two days after this extraordinary display of folly, he prepared to change the revolutionary tribunal, so that he might be able to destroy his opponents, not by the slow process of single condemnation, but by scores and hundreds, thus wielding absolutely a dictatorship of the scaffold. By this last terrible engine he himself was crushed, and when his head fell beneath the same axe to which he had so remorselessly consigned such multitudes of true and noble men and women, in allusion to the worship of the Supreme, of which he would be high priest, a spectator said, "Yes, Robespierre, there is a God!"

Condorcet, cast on these same troublous times, made no pretense to religion. His intellect was keen and cultivated. Thrown into a dungeon, and hourly awaiting the execution, he called for a pen, thinking to leave a defense. "A defense of his personal actions and opinions! Should he, when so little time was spared, waste it in such idle manner?" No, he reproved himself, and casting aside such vanities, he sat down, amid the roar of conflicting factions; the din of revolution already saturated with blood; in his cell, hearing the wails of ten thousand broken hearts, and the famishing cries of a whole nation, and with a sublime faith sought to prove human progress and the ultimate perfectability of man! With far-reaching sight he looked beyond the petty accidents of his time, to the magnificent result of future ages. He reposed perfect trust in the wisdom of the order of nature, and in life or death submitted himself to her hands. Seeing in himself only an atom of the immeasurable whole; one individual in a countless swarm, he would not thrust forward his personality, but would employ his last short hour in presenting a great principle, which he hoped would prove beneficial to the coming time.

Thus what passes under the name of religious instruction is narrow and selfish to the last degree. It has of itself no broad and expanding principles, and if the devotee becomes ennobled and enlarged, the power either comes from himself or some other source. By aiming one fatal blow at reason, it would transform the man into a blind slave, quaking with servile fear of the gory hag Superstition, and a ready tool of bigotry.

Religious instruction is characterized by this singular quality, the more one is instructed the less one knows. Intellectual and moral culture are alone able to elevate the soul to the grand highlands of philosophy where, wholly above the accidents of the hour, it calmly contemplates the eternal relations of things.

Infinitely better than this puling cant and unmanly sneaking from obligations taken and faults committed, the stoicism of a pagan Rome, an Horatius offering himself for his country, a Regulus returning to torture because he had pledged his word, a magnanimity which sank self entirely out of sight, as in the consul Lucius Æmilius, who desperately wounded, after the battle of Cannæ, cried, "Waste not your commiseration on me, but fly to Rome, and garrison her walls. . . . Let me die in the midst of my slaughtered soldiers!"

It is claimed by the leaders of Christianity that to it we owe our civilization. Without it we should still roam the forests of Europe, skin-clad savages, without the the least conception of right or wrong. To the general views expressed in the preceding pages we specialize to show the real influence Christianity exercised on the progress of European civilization.

Although it may not be said that Christianity is responsible for the night of ignorance in which Europe wandered for over a thousand years, yet, if not the sole cause, it was the chief and most active agent in the production of that awful catastrophe; and the prejudice then instilled against learning by ecclesiasticism has not yet wholly disappeared. Even in the Reformation which originated in the increase of intelligence, a fanatical crusade against learning was undertaken. Sage professors sent their pupils home with the assurance that the Spirit of God would inspire the true believer.

The first century was the flood-tide of Roman intellectual greatness—the age of inimitable poetry, perfected history, and diligent love of philosophy. Probably at no period in the history of the ancient world did the masses enjoy in a higher degree the comforts of life. The refinement of the few reached to the many, and the love of knowledge was not a monopoly of a select circle. The age immediately following yielded historians, lawyers, and philosophers, who would have been illustrious in any period, and learning became so generally diffused that there were a greater number of cultivated minds than even in the Golden Era.

The third century presents a different picture. Learning everywhere despised, history degraded to lying chronicles, poetry and philosophy contemptible, and the Latin tongue corrupted into a barbarous jargon. The laws of Constantine and succeeding emperors in the next century could not stay the tide of ignorance. Great men are evolved by the progress of events, not created by laws.

Why this rapid decline from the pinnacle of greatness, in two centuries, to the abyss of ignorance? Not the inundation of Northern hordes so much as the religion introduced into the Roman world during those centuries. The early Christians stigmatized learning as profane, and so identified was ancient literature with the old form of worship that it was held in abhorrence by the fanatical devotees of the Nazarene. In 398 the Council of Carthage forbade its being read by bishops, and the ignorant masses were prevented from incurring the sin by inability. All physical sciences were held as impious and inconsistent with revelation.

So long as the Christians were an insignificant sect, the influence of their contempt for literature and learning had little effect; but when they gained power and controlled the Government, their influence was exceedingly great. The offices of instructors of the Imperial family and of the sons of distinguished men in the nation, previously held by noble philosophers, were consigned to ignorant and superstitious priests. The knowledge of the Pagan world was discarded, and the dogmas of theology supplied their place. The Church absorbed all the mental activity of the times. Philosophy, poetry, and profane history were discarded as unworthy the attention of regenerated mortals. A new arena was opened for intellectual contest—one which engaged the thought of the centuries. This was polemics; the solution of incomprehensible dogmas by never-ending verbal warfare.

As science expands the faculties and ennobles the life, so such disputations narrow the mind, dwarf its powers, and make it imbecile. These studies of questions which are merely artificial formulas having no existence except in imagination, corrupt irretrievably the fountains of knowledge. While the supporters of conflicting creeds, dogmas, and vagaries disputed, the Latin tongue became so corrupted that the record of ancient knowledge was sealed except to the learned. With the temples ruthlessly destroyed by those who considered them profane, perished the Old Empire of Thought. The heated disputants over vacuities furnished instead their interminable discussions, which, by preoccupying the attention of those who cared to think, excluded the old literature; ignorance became canonized. No adequate conception can be formed of the darkness of the human intellect at this period. Superstition grew like a rank and pestilent weed, and asceticism depressed the understanding to still lower depths. The Old was cast aside, and the literature given instead was valueless. Even the minds of thinkers were led astray along paths beginning in ignorance and ending nowhere. Worthless, except as a curiosity, is the literature succeeding the age of inspiration, when bishops sat in solemn council over such vast problems as the immaculate conception, the manner of the operation of Christ's will, the digestion of communion bread and wine, and the possession of property by Christ.

When the Barbarians overspread the empire, they were plastic as children in the hands of the priests, and were easily persuaded to substitute the Mother of God and Christ for their peculiar deities. The New Religion held high carnival. Ignorance is the primeval slime out of which infallible authority grows sleek and powerful. The Christian hierarchy grew from century to century, grasping power by every possible means, staying its hand at no crime, pausing at no cruelty, until it seemed that Europe must inevitably become a theocracy like that of ancient Egypt, or of the Druids. From commutation, or payment for pardons, from tithes, from share of intestate estates, from legacies, the Church at one time owned the title-deeds of a greater portion of the lands of Europe; kings and emperors bowed unclad in the porch of the palace of the Pope's who ruled with undisputed despotism over the spiritual domain, and sought in the same manner to seize temporal affairs.

Out of this night Europe emerged. How? By the influence of Christianity? Who, after reviewing this dismal record of crime against humanity, dare assert that the knowledge by which Europe is blessed to-day, and by which she is superior to the hordes of her ancient forests, flowed from Christianity? If the Christian religion is so productive of advancement, why did it not put forth its fruits during the thousand years it held mankind in implicit obedience, and its nod was more potent than the laws of emperors?

Did it foster learning? Countless martyrs at the stake and on the rack, whose only crime was extending human knowledge beyond prescribed limits, cry to the pitying Heavens. For a thousand years it sat on the prostrate form of a great civilization, and attempted to guide the course of events. What were the results? Read the chronicles of the Dark Ages. With blanched face and trembling nerves call up its scenes of fiendishness, where the representatives of this religion, clad with their power by God, wrought the work of fiends incarnate. The morality of Europe sank below that of the Empire even under Nero and Caligula. Morality, manly self-reliance, and nobility of character disappeared as the new religion gained ascendancy. We now witness its blasting effects on Spain, a fossil of the Dark Ages, where the priest is more powerful than the king he faithfully supports. The poison of unquestioning faith entered deep into the vital current of Spanish life and paralyzed the intellect. It is the same faith that supports the Hapsburgs, like evil birds preying on the people, who detest, but dare not move for fear of the terrible power unscrupulously exercised by the priesthood. Napoleon held his throne, and Louis—his villainous shadow—kept his position on the slack rope of French politics by the same aid. Italy—fairest land on which the sun ever shone—became the stronghold of the hydra—a nation of brigands and beggars. The cowed monk and drivelling priest are the types of Church perfection.

Who wishes the hierarchy could have succeeded as they hoped, and made the holy faith, descended from the Apostles, and sealed by the blood of martyrs, the triumphant ruler of Europe? When we read the history of its usurpations, its unspeakable crimes, its love of torture, its fiendish cruelty, are we not unspeakably thankful it did not succeed?

The hierarchy fought against a self-reliant people, and the fortune of events was against them. The Crusades not only exposed the fallibility and duplicity of the Church, but foreign contact enlarged the intellectual horizon of Europe. The introduction of the long-buried classics through Arabic channels stimulated the ever-present desire for knowledge. Aristotle, a thousand years forgotten, became the leader in science, and the new civilization began at the identical point where research in accurate knowledge closed with the ancient philosophers. Humanity had passed a long night of pain, to find its efforts the incubus of nightmare, and to resume where, thirty generations before, it surrendered the burden.

Paine Vindicated.

INGERSOLL REPLIES TO THE NEW YORK OBSERVER.

DID THOMAS PAINE LIVE THE LIFE OF A DRUNKEN BEAST, AND DID HE DIE A DRUNKEN, COWARDLY AND BEASTLY DEATH?

Upon you rests the burden of substantiating these infamous charges.

You have, I suppose, produced the best evidence in your possession, and that evidence I will now proceed to examine. Your first witness is Grant Thorburn. He makes three charges against Thomas Paine. 1st. That his wife obtained a divorce from him in England for cruelty and neglect. 2d. That he was a defaulter and fled from England to America. 3d. That he was a drunkard. These three charges stand upon the same evidence—the word of Grant Thorburn. If they are not all true Mr. Thorburn stands impeached.

The charge that Mrs. Paine obtained a divorce on account of the cruelty and neglect of her husband is utterly false. There is no such record in the world, and never was. Paine and his wife separated by mutual consent. Each respected the other. They remained friends. This charge is without any foundation in fact. I challenge the Christian world to produce the record of this decree of divorce. According to Mr. Thorburn it was granted in England. In that country public records are kept of all such decrees. Have the kindness to produce this decree showing that it was given on account of cruelty or admit that Mr. Thorburn was mistaken.

Thomas Paine was a just man. Although separated from his wife, he always spoke of her with tenderness and respect, and frequently sent her money without letting her know the source from whence it came. Was this the conduct of a drunken beast?

The second charge, that Paine was a defaulter in England and fled to America, is equally false. He did not flee from England. He came to America, not as a fugitive, but as a free man. He came with a letter of introduction signed by another Infidel, Benjamin Franklin. He came as a soldier of Freedom—an apostle of Liberty.

In this second charge there is not one word of truth.

He held a small office in England. If he was a defaulter the records of that country will show that fact.

Mr. Thorburn, unless the record can be produced to substantiate him, stands convicted of at least two mistakes.

Now as to the third: He says that in 1802 Paine was an "old remnant of mortality, drunk, bloated and half asleep."

Can any one believe this to be a true account of the personal appearance of Mr. Paine in 1802? He had just returned from France. He had been welcomed home by Thomas Jefferson, who had said that he was entitled to the hospitality of every American.

In 1802 Mr. Paine was honored with a public dinner in the city of New York. He was called upon and treated with kindness and respect by such men as DeWitt Clinton,

In 1806 Mr. Paine wrote a letter to Andrew A. Dean upon the subject of religion. Read that letter and then say that the writer of it was an "old remnant of mortality, drunk, bloated and half asleep." Search the files of the New York Observer from the first issue to the last, and you will find nothing superior to this letter. In 1803 Mr. Paine wrote a letter of considerable length, and of great force, to his friend Samuel Adams. Such letters are not written by drunken beasts, nor by remnants of old mortality, nor by drunkards. It was about the same time that he wrote his "Remarks on Robert Hall's Sermon's." These "Remarks" were not written by a drunken beast, but by a clear-headed and thoughtful man.

In 1804 he published an essay on the invasion of England, and a treatise on gun-boats, full of valuable maritime information—in 1805, a treatise on yellow fever, suggesting modes of prevention. In short, he was an industrious and thoughtful man. He sympathized with the poor and oppressed of all lands. He looked upon monarchy as a species of physical slavery. He had the goodness to attack that form of government. He regarded the religion of his day as a kind of mental slavery. He had the courage to give his reasons for his opinion. His reasons filled the churches with hatred. Instead of answering his arguments they attacked him. Men who were not fit to blacken his shoes, blackened his character.

There is too much religious cant in the statement of Mr. Thorburn. He exhibited too much anxiety to tell what Grant Thorburn said to Thomas Paine. He names Thomas Jefferson as one of the disreputable men who welcomed Paine with open arms. The testimony of a man who regarded Thomas Jefferson as a disreputable person, as to the character of anybody, is utterly without value. In my judgment, the testimony of Mr. Thorburn should be thrown aside as wholly unworthy of belief.

Your next witness is the Rev. J. D. Wickham, D.D., who tells what an elder in his church said. This elder said that Paine passed his last days on his farm at New Rochelle with a solitary female attendant. This is not true. He did not pass his last days at New Rochelle. Consequently this pious elder did not see him during his last days at that place. Upon this elder we prove an alibi. Mr. Paine passed his last days in the city of New York, in a house upon Columbia street. The story of the Rev. J. D. Wickham, D.D., is simply false.

The next competent false witness is the Rev. Charles Hawley, D.D., who proceeds to state that the story of the Rev. J. D. Wickham, D.D., is corroborated by older citizens of New Rochelle. The names of these ancient residents are withheld. According to these unknown witnesses, the account given by the deceased elder was entirely correct. But as the particulars of Mr. Paine's conduct "were too loathsome to be described in print," we are left entirely in the dark as to what he really did.

While at New Rochelle Mr. Paine lived with Mr. Purdy—with Mr. Dean—with Captain Pelton, and with Mr. Staple. It is worthy of note that all of these gentlemen give the lie direct to the statements of "older residents" and ancient citizens spoken of by the Rev. Charles Hawley, D.D., and leave him with his "loathsome particulars" existing only in his own mind.

The next gentleman you bring upon the stand is W. H. Ladd, who quotes from the memoirs of Stephen Grellet. This gentleman also has the misfortune to be dead. According to his account, Mr. Paine made his recantation to a servant girl of his by the name of Mary Roscoe. To this girl, according to the account, Mr. Paine uttered the wish that all who read his book had burned it. I believe there is a mistake in the name of this girl. Her name was probably Mary Hinsdale, as it was once claimed that Paine made the same remark to her, but this point I shall notice hereafter. These are your witnesses, and the only ones you bring forward, to support your charge that Thomas Paine lived a drunken and beastly life and died a drunken, cowardly and beastly death. All these calumnies are found in a life of Paine by a Mr. Cheetham, the convicted libeler already referred to. Mr. Cheetham was an enemy of the man whose life he pretended to write.

In order to show you the estimation in which Mr. Cheetham was held by Mr. Paine, I will give you a copy of a letter that throws light upon this point:

October 28, 1807.

MR. CHEETHAM: Unless you make a public apology for the abuse and falsehood in your paper of Tuesday, October 27th, respecting me, I will prosecute you for lying.

THOMAS PAINE.

In another letter, speaking of this same man, Mr. Paine says: "If an unprincipled bully cannot be reformed, he can be punished." "Cheetham has been so long in the habit of giving false information, that truth is to him like a foreign language."

Mr. Cheetham wrote the life of Paine to gratify his malice and to support religion. He was prosecuted for libel—was convicted and fined.

Yet the life of Paine written by this man is referred to by the Christian world as the highest authority.

As to the personal habits of Mr. Paine, we have the testimony of William Carver, with whom he lived; of Mr. Jarvis, the artist, with whom he lived; of Mr. Staple, with whom he lived; of Mr. Purdy, who was a tenant of Paine's; of Mr. Burger, with whom he was intimate; of Thomas Nixon and Captain Daniel Pelton, both of whom knew him well; of Amasa Woodsworth, who was with him when he died; of John Fellows, who boarded at the same house; of James Wilburn, with whom he boarded; of B. F. Haskin, a lawyer, who was well acquainted with him and called upon him during his last illness; of Walter Morton, a friend; of Clio Rickman, who had known him for many years; of Willet and Elias Hicks, Quakers, who knew him intimately and well; of Judge Hertell, H. Margary, Elihu Palmer, and many others. All these testified to the fact that Mr. Paine was a temperate man. In those days nearly everybody used spirituous liquors. Paine was not an exception: but he did not drink to excess. Mr. Lovett, who kept the City Hotel where Paine stopped, in a note to Caleb Bingham, declared that Paine drank less than any boarder he had.

Against all this evidence you produce the story of Grant Thorburn—the story of the Rev. J. D. Wickham that an elder in his church told him that Paine was a drunkard, corroborated by the Rev. Charles Hawley, and an extract from Lossing's history to the same effect. The evidence is overwhelmingly against you. Will you have the fairness to admit it? Your witnesses are merely the repeaters of the falsehoods of James Cheetham, the convicted libeler.

After all, drinking is not as bad as lying. An honest drunkard is better than a calumniator of the dead. "A remnant of old mortality, drunk, bloated and half asleep" is better than a perfectly sober defender of human slavery.

To become drunk is a virtue compared with stealing a babe from the breast of its mother.

Drunkenness is one of the beatitudes, compared with editing a religious paper devoted to the defense of slavery upon the ground that it is a divine institution.

Do you really think that Paine was a drunken beast when he wrote "Common Sense"—a pamphlet that aroused three millions of people, as people were never aroused by a pamphlet before? Was he a drunken beast when he wrote the "Crisis"? Was it to a drunken beast that the following letter was addressed:

Rocky Hill, September 10, 1783.

I have learned since I have been at this place, that you are at Bordentown.—Whether for the sake of retirement or economy I know not. Be it for either or both, or whatever it may, if you will come to this place and partake with me I shall be exceedingly happy to see you at it. Your presence may remind Congress of your past services to this country; and if it is in my power to impress them, command my best exertions with freedom, as they will be rendered cheerfully by one who entertains a lively sense of the importance of your works, and who with much pleasure subscribes himself Your Sincere Friend,

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

Did any of your ancestors ever receive a letter like that? Do you think that Paine was a drunken beast when the following letter was received by him?—

You express a wish in your letter to return to America in a national ship; Mr. Dawson, who brings over the treaty, and who will present you with this letter, is charged with orders to the captain of the Maryland to receive and accommodate you back, if you can be ready to depart at such a short warning. You will in general find us returned to sentiments worthy of former times; in these it will be your glory to have steadily labored and with as much effect as any man living. That you may live long to continue your useful labors, and reap the reward in the thankfulness of nations, is my sincere prayer. Accept the assurances of my high esteem and affectionate attachment.

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

Did any of your ancestors ever receive a letter like that. "It has been very generally propagated through the continent that I wrote the pamphlet 'Common Sense.' I could not have written anything in so manly and striking a style."—JOHN ADAMS.

"A few more such flaming arguments as were exhibited at Falmouth and Norfolk, added to the sound doctrine and unanswerable reasoning contained in the pamphlet 'Common Sense,' will not leave numbers at a loss to decide on the propriety of a separation."—GEORGE WASHINGTON.

"It is not necessary for me to tell you how much all your countrymen—I speak of the great mass of the people—are interested in your welfare. They have not forgotten the history of their own revolution and the difficult scenes through which they passed; nor do they review its several stages without reviving in their bosoms a due sensibility of the merits of those who served them in that great and arduous conflict. The crime of ingratitude has not yet stained, and I trust never will stain, our national character. You are considered by them as not only having rendered important services in our own revolution, but as being on a more extensive scale the friend of human rights, and a distinguished and able defender of public liberty. To the welfare of Thomas Paine the Americans are not, nor can they be indifferent." JAMES MONROE.

Did any of your ancestors ever receive a letter like that?

"No writer has exceeded Paine in ease and familiarity of style, in perspicuity of expression, happiness of elucidation, and in simple and unassuming language."—THOMAS JEFFERSON.

Was ever a letter like that written about an editor of the New York Observer?

Was it in consideration of the services of a drunken beast that the legislature of Pennsylvania presented Thomas Paine with five hundred pounds sterling?

Did the State of New York feel indebted to a drunken beast, and confer upon Thomas Paine an estate of several hundred acres?

Did the congress of the United States thank him for his services because he had lived a drunken and beastly life?

Was he elected a member of the French convention because he was a drunken beast? Was it the act of a drunken beast to put his own life in jeopardy by voting against the death of the king? Was it because he was a drunken beast that he opposed the "Reign of Terror"—that he endeavored to stop the shedding of blood, and did all in his power to protect even his own enemies?

Do the following extracts sound like the words of a drunken beast?

"I believe in the equality of man, and I believe that religious duties consist in doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make our fellow creatures happy."

"My own mind is my own church."

"It is necessary to the happiness of man that he be mentally faithful to himself."

"Any system of religion that shocks the mind of a child cannot be a true system."

"The Word of God is the creation which we behold."

"The age of ignorance commenced with the Christian system."

"It is with a pious fraud as with a bad action—it begets a calamitous necessity of going on."

"To read the Bible without horror, we must undo everything that is tender, sympathizing and benevolent in the heart of man."

"The man does not exist who can say I have persecuted him, or that I have in any case returned evil for evil."

"Of all tyrannies that afflict mankind, tyranny in religion is the worst."

"The belief in a cruel god makes a cruel man."

"My own opinion is, that those whose lives have been spent in doing good and endeavoring to make their fellow-mortals happy, will be happy hereafter."

"The intellectual part of religion is a private affair between every man and his maker, and in which no third party has any right to interfere. The practical part consists in our doing good to each other."

"No man ought to make a living by religion. One person cannot act religion for another—every person must perform it for himself."

"One good schoolmaster is of more use than a hundred priests."

"Let us propagate morality unfettered by superstition."

"God is the power, or first cause, Nature is the law, and matter is the subject acted upon."

"I believe in one God and no more, and I hope for happiness beyond this life."

"The key of the heaven is not in the keeping of any sect, nor ought the road to it to be obstructed by any."

"My religion, and the whole of it, is the fear and love of the Deity and universal philanthropy."

"I have yet, I believe, some years in store, for I have a good state of health and a happy mind. I take care of both, by nourishing the first with temperance and the latter with abundance."

"He lives immured within the Bastille of a word."

How perfectly that sentence describes you! The Bastille in which you are immured is the word "Calvinism."

"Man has no property in man."

What a splendid motto that would have made for the New York Observer in the olden time!

"The world is my country; to do good, my religion."

I ask you again whether these splendid utterances came from the lips of a drunken beast?

DID THOMAS PAINE DIE IN DESTITUTION AND WANT?

The charge has been made, over and over again, that Thomas Paine died in want and destitution—that he was an abandoned pauper—an outcast without friends and without money. This charge is just as false as the rest.

Upon his return to this country in 1802, he was worth $30,000, according to his own statement made at that time in the following letter addressed to Clio Rickman:

MY DEAR FRIEND: Mr. Monroe, who is appointed minister extraordinary to France, takes charge of this, to be delivered to Mr. Este, banker in Paris, to be forwarded to you.

I arrived at Baltimore the 30th of October, and you can have no idea of the agitation which my arrival occasioned. From New Hampshire to Georgia (an extent of 1,500 miles) every newspaper was filled with applause or abuse.

My property in this country has been taken care of by my friends, and is now worth six thousands pounds sterling; which put in the funds will bring me £400 sterling a year.

Remember me in affection and friendship to your wife and family, and in the circle of your friends.

THOMAS PAINE.

A man in those days worth thirty thousand dollars was not a pauper. That amount would bring an income of at least two thousand dollars per annum. Two thousand dollars then would be fully equal to five thousand dollars now.

On the 12th of July, 1809, the year in which he died, Mr. Paine made his will. From this instrument we learn that he was the owner of a valuable farm within twenty miles of New York. He also was the owner of thirty shares in the New York Phoenix Insurance Company, worth upwards of fifteen hundred dollars. Besides this, some personal property and ready money. By his will he gave to Walter Morton, and Thomas Addis Emmet, brother of Robert Emmet two hundred dollars each, and one hundred to the widow of Elihu Palmer.

Is it possible that this will was made by a pauper—by a destitute outcast—by a man who suffered for the ordinary necessities of life?

But suppose, for the sake of the argument, that he was poor and that he died a beggar, does that tend to show that the Bible is an inspired book and that Calvin did not burn Servetus? Do you really regard poverty as a crime? If Paine had died a millionaire, would you have accepted his religious opinions? If Paine had drank nothing but cold water, would you have repudiated the five cardinal points of Calvinism? Does an argument depend for its force upon the pecuniary condition of the person making it? As a matter of fact, most reformers—most men and women of genius, have been acquainted with poverty. Beneath a covering of rags have been found some of the tenderest and bravest hearts.

Owing to the attitude of the churches for the last fifteen hundred years, truth-telling has not been a very lucrative business. As a rule, hypocrisy has worn the robes, and honesty the rags. That day is passing away. You cannot now answer the arguments of a man by pointing at holes in his coat. Thomas Paine attacked the Church when it was powerful—when it had what was called honors to bestow—when it was the keeper of the public conscience—when it was strong and cruel. The Church waited till he was dead then attacked his reputation and his clothes.

Once upon a time a donkey kicked a lion. The lion was dead.

CONCLUSION.

From the persistence with which the orthodox have charged for the last sixty-eight years that Thomas Paine recanted, and that when dying he was filled with remorse and fear; from the malignity of the attacks upon his personal character, I had concluded that there must be some evidence of some kind to support these charges. Even with my ideas of the average honor of believers in superstition—the disciples of fear, I did not quite believe that all these infamies rested solely upon poorly attested lies. I had charity enough to suppose that something had been said or done by Thomas Paine capable of being tortured into a foundation for these calumnies. And I was foolish enough to think that even you would be willing to fairly examine the pretended evidence said to sustain these charges, and give your honest conclusion to the world. I supposed that you, being acquainted with the history of your country, felt under a certain obligation to Thomas Paine for the splendid services rendered by him in the darkest days of the Revolution. It was only reasonable to suppose that you were aware that in the midnight of Valley Forge the "Crisis," by Thomas Paine, was the first star that glittered in the wide horizon of despair. I took it for granted that you knew of the bold stand taken and the brave words spoken by Thomas Paine, in the French convention, against the death of the king. I thought it probable that you, being an editor, had read the "Rights of Man"; that you knew that Thomas Paine was a champion of human liberty; that he was one of the founders and fathers of this republic; that he was one of the foremost men of his age; that he had never written a word in favor of injustice; that he was a despiser of slavery; that he abhorred tyranny in all its forms; that he was in the widest and highest sense a friend of his race; that his head was as clear as his heart was good, and that he had the courage to speak his honest thought. Under these circumstances I had hoped that you would for the moment forget your religious prejudices and submit to the enlightened judgment of the world the evidence you had, or could obtain, affecting in any way the character of so great and so generous a man. This you have refused to do. In my judgment, you have mistaken the temper of even your own readers. A large majority of the religious people of this country have, to a considerable extent, outgrown the prejudices of their fathers. They are willing to know the truth, and the whole truth, about the life and death of Thomas Paine. They will not thank you for having presented them the moss-covered, the maimed and distorted traditions of ignorance, prejudice and credulity. By this course you will convince them not of the wickedness of Paine, but of your own unfairness.

What crime had Thomas Paine committed that he should have feared to die? The only answer you can give is, that he denied the inspiration of the scriptures. If this is a crime, the civilized world is filled with criminals. The pioneers of human thought—the intellectual leaders of the world—the foremost men in every science—the kings of literature and art—those who stand in the front rank of investigation—the men who are civilizing, elevating, instructing and refining mankind, are to-day unbelievers in the dogma of inspiration. Upon this question, the intellect of Christendom agrees with the conclusions reached by the genius of Thomas Paine. Centuries ago a noise was made for the purpose of frightening mankind. Orthodoxy is the echo of that noise.

The man who now regards the Old Testament as in any sense a sacred or inspired book is in my judgment an intellectual and moral deformity. There is in it so much that is cruel, ignorant and ferocious, that it is to me a matter of amazement that it was ever thought to be the work of a most merciful deity.

Upon the question of inspiration Thomas Paine gave his honest opinion. Can it be that to give an honest opinion causes one to die in terror and despair? Have you in your writings been actuated by the fear of such a consequence? Why should it be taken for granted that Thomas Paine, who devoted his life to the sacred cause of freedom, should have been hissed at in the hour of death by the snakes of conscience, while editors of Presbyterian papers who defended slavery as a divine institution, and cheerfully justified the stealing of babes from the breasts of mothers, are supposed to have passed smilingly from earth to embraces of angels? Why should you think that the heroic author of the "Rights of Man" should shudderingly dread to leave this "bank and shoal of time," while Calvin, dripping with the blood of Servetus, was anxious to be judged of God? Is it possible that the persecutors—the instigators of the massacre of St. Bartholemew—the inventors and users of thumb-screws, and iron boots, and racks—the burners and tearers of human flesh—the stealers, whippers and enslavers of men—the buyers and beaters of babes and mothers—the founders of inquisitions—the makers of chains, the builders of dungeons, the slanderers of the living and the calumniators of the dead, all died in the odor of sanctity, with white, forgiven hands folded upon the breasts of peace, while the destroyers of prejudice—the apostles of humanity—the soldiers of liberty—the breakers of fetters—the creators of light—died surrounded with the fierce fiends of fear? In your attempt to destroy the character of Thomas

Paine you have failed, and have succeeded only in leaving a stain upon your own. You have written words as cruel, bitter and heartless as the creed of Calvin. Hereafter you will stand in the pillory of history as a defamer—a calumniator of the dead. You will be known as the man who said that Thomas Paine, the "Author Hero," lived a drunken cowardly and beastly life, and died a drunken and beastly death. These infamous words will be branded upon the forehead of your reputation. They will be remembered against you, when all else you may have uttered shall have passed from the memory of men.

In the literature of the ancient Persian or Chaldeans, which was chiefly brought to light by the late discoveries at Nineveh and other localities by George Smith and Gen. Rawlinson in the excavations there made, of tablets, etc., in which they found cuneiform or arrow-head shaped inscriptions, which at length they were able to decipher and read—is found much that has been held sacred by those who have lived in later times. Those cuneiform inscriptions are probably the oldest form of written language of which the world has any knowledge—older than the hieroglyphics, or picture writing, of Egypt, and older by far than any word that was ever written in the Hebrew language. There is a marked difference in each system of writing. The cuneiform inscriptions of the ancient Chaldeans, Ninevites, and Babylonians employed no alphabet, no letters to represent sounds used to spell out words, but each word or syllable had a character to represent it, on a plan somewhat similar to the Chinese system of writing; they have no alphabet proper, but each character represents a word instead of a simple sound. This character-writing, I repeat, is the oldest system known to man. A later system was the picture-writing of the Egyptians, in which they used somewhat rude representations of men, animals, etc., to give their meaning. In this way they recorded the histories of their wars and conflicts; and these were engraved upon their temples, monuments, obelisks, pyramids, etc., etc., which have stood more than five thousand years, and are, some of them, still preserved in all their glory. Philologists and archeologists have learned to read those ancient inscriptions, and thus become possessed of many of the facts of ancient history not otherwise attainable. The third system of writing was the latest and most perfect, in which an alphabet was employed, or characters to represent the various sounds used in speaking. These alphabets vary from twenty-two to twenty-six characters or letters, with which all languages may be written. We are learning now, however, that there are some forty sounds employed in speaking our language, and that twenty-six letters are not enough to represent all of them. To have one letter, as "A," represent four different sounds, as it now does, is a mistake, and leads to many difficulties in learning to read and pronounce, and is extremely awkward and imperfect. There is a reform to be made in this direction which is now occupying the attention of the most learned philologists of the age; and it is to be hoped that before many years shall have passed away our alphabet will be so improved that no letter will be compelled to represent more than one sound. When this shall have been accomplished, our language will be greatly simplified, and the labor of learning orthography and pronunciation greatly facilitated.

The alphabetic system of writing, as I have said, is more modern than the other two systems, and is more perfect, even with the defects that still adhere to it. The Hebrew is written with an alphabet, and consequently came into use at a much later period of the world's history than either the cuneiform inscriptions of Nineveh and Assyria or the picture-writing of Egypt. This very fact proves that the Hebrew is comparatively a modern language, and was not known till ages after the other systems of writing had been employed.

To return to the cuneiform inscriptions in which the history and the literature of the ancient Chaldeans, of Nineveh and Babylon were written; there the indefatigable Smith and Rawlinson found recorded such nursery tales as "Jack the Giant Killer," "Jack and his Bean Stalk," "The House that Jack built," "Blue Beard," "Cinderella," and many other nursery tales which delighted us in the days of our childhood.

They found recorded there also the story of the creation of the world, of the formation of man and woman from the dust of the earth, of the "temptation and fall" in the Garden of Eden, of "the Flood" which deluged the earth and drowned all the inhabitants save one family, which were preserved in a crude vessel built for the purpose. Yes; there were found engraved or inscribed those old legends which form the groundwork of the Bible history and the theology of Judaism and Christianity. This not only proves that the Hebrew is not the oldest written language, but that the old Bible legends of creation, the flood, etc., etc., were not original with the writers of the Jewish Scriptures, but were borrowed probably during their captivity, of the nation who had a far more ancient literature than themselves, and a language that was undoubtedly used thousands of years before the Hebrew was invented. We get here unmistakable information as to the source of those old fables about the creation of the world which millions have pored over with so much sacred veneration and confidence.

The religion of the Hindoos is probably still more ancient than that of the Chaldeans or Persians. It descended from the ancient Aryan race, which peopled central and southern Asia many ages ago. It is beyond our power to penetrate back into those prehistoric times and fix dates and eras with any precision, but this we do know, that the Aryan race was a very ancient one, and that from it sprang the nations that people civilized Europe to-day. The literature, the history, and the theology of India was a sealed book to the rest of the modern world until enterprising Europeans went there and remained years, and by patient investigations and explorations learned much of the literature and religion of that ancient people. Prominent among this studious class of philologists, investigators, and explorers stand Sir William Jones, Sir Godfrey Higgins, Burnouf, Sir Cockburn Thompson, Jacoliot, Max Müller, and a few others. Several of these learned men have spent years in India, have made the acquaintance of learned Brahmins; they have studied the ancient Sanscrit language which was employed thousands of years ago, and they have been enabled to read the voluminous literature and theology of that ancient country. They found these sacred writings far more extensive than the Jewish Scriptures, consisting of hymns, invocations, lessons, dialogues, etc., etc., embracing much that is sublime, elevated, and spiritual, and were written long before the Jewish Scriptures were penned, even before the Hebrew nation had an existence. The Vedas, the Puranas, the Shastras, the Mahabharata, the Bhagavad Gita, and other extensive writings, make up the Hindoo Scriptures, and in the aggregate embrace thousands of volumes, great numbers of which have never yet been translated into English.

Interrogatories to Jehovah.—No. 35.

GREAT JEHOVAH:

Have not the inhuman enactments contained in the Bible against the unfortunate class of persons denounced as witches been the apology and impetus for the putting to death in Europe during a term of years of not less than one hundred thousand unfortunate victims adjudged of being guilty of witchcraft, and the by no means small amount of similar persecution that was meted out to the same unfortunate class in this country?

Were not all the zealots engaged in the diabolical work of hunting up, tormenting, and putting to death in the most cruel manner conceivable, those unfortunate wretches, all firm believers in the divinity and infallibility of the Bible?

Is it not a strong argument against the divinity of the Bible that in its very earliest chapters it placed a stigma upon labor, and made it a punishment for errors committed on the part of inexperienced man?

Is not the idea inculcated that but for the untimely eating of some specimens of fruit, man would never have needed to toil and labor for his livelihood, and that he could have passed his days and years in ease and idleness?

Has not this idea been a most mischievous and fallacious one? Is not labor one of the most ennobling qualities known to man?

Had man always lived in idleness, would he not have remained in a savage state? Was a race of idlers ever known to progress in civilization and enlightenment?

Has not labor been one of the greatest blessings that man has possessed? Has it not subdued the wild forests to lovely habitations and beautiful cities? Has it not whitened the ocean with millions of sails? Has it not made highways and railroads over the civilized globe? Has it not made the earth to teem with bounteous crops? Has it not been the source of all the wealth, all the comforts, all the luxury, all the civilization that man possesses to-day?

Is it not, then, untruthful and opposed to the spirit of divinity to represent labor as a curse to man, and that indolence and idleness are superior to it or more to be desired?

Is not the advice which thy son is said to have given his hearers equally mistaken and unsound when he instructed them to take no thought for the future as to what they should eat or drink or clothe themselves withal?

If these instructions were carried out, would it not destroy all enterprise, all preparation for the wants and necessities, and render mankind thriftless, poverty-stricken mendicants?

If men and women should make no more provision for the winter season and old age than do the lilies of the field and the birds of the air, would they not inevitably starve to death by thousands and hundreds of thousands?

Is it not an impracticable, misleading assurance that thou wilt provide food and clothing for those who lift not a finger to provide for themselves? Is it not far better to teach men the importance of their being enterprising and prudent, in securing the necessities of life for themselves and their families, and that thou helpest those most who help themselves?

Is it not really anti-divine to instruct men to become idle and improvident—mere houseless and homeless beggars?

Does not thy book uphold capital punishment? Is not its code a code of vengeance, and was not the most cruel punishment in thy law meted out for the most trivial offenses?

Is it not an indication that the Bible is not divine that it recognizes and tacitly approves of kingcraft and tyranny on the earth?

Has it not been opposed to the best interests of the race that the many should bow down to and worship the few who manage to wear a crown of gold or silver or iron? Has not the oppressive rule of kingcraft and priestcraft greatly retarded man in his march towards the higher mental and civil liberty?

Are we to understand that thou art in favor of this sort of thing? that you want the few to govern and override the many and make them mere abject slaves in the world?

Is it true that such a government on earth is modeled after thy government in heaven? Is it true that thou art a great king, sitting on a throne, governing thy vassals with severity and despotism, leaving them no alternative but to submit to thy rule or burn in flames of fire forever?

Has not the tyranny of the Bible, and much, also, that has existed in the world, arisen from the supposition that thy rule was one of compulsion of the many to the one?

Has not the government on earth been modeled after the supposed government of heaven? Is tyranny on earth any better than tyranny in heaven?

Was Ingersoll far out of the way when he said, "There can be no liberty on earth while men worship a tyrant in heaven?"

From the points alluded to, and many others not here touched upon, are not men fully justified in doubting the divinity of the book which teaches all these things? Are they not more correct in thinking that it was written by unprogressed men, and that it contains the crude and barbarous notions that prevailed in the world at the time it was written?

Another Discussion.

The Rev. Cyrus Romulus Teed, of Moravia, Cayuga county, N. Y., a few weeks ago challenged Freethinkers, Spiritualists and Unbelievers of all grades to meet him in a seven-days' discussion on the 12th inst., at Moravia, on "The Divinity of the Bible and Christianity." Two or three of his bills or circulars were sent to us. In our issue of the 6th inst. we alluded to his challenge, and took occasion to say that if he failed to meet "foemen worthy of his steel," that we would discuss the questions with him, and that the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER should be open to him. It appears that few or none came forward to meet him, and he has seen fit to accept our offer. Two or three letters have passed between us, and we have agreed to discuss in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER the three following propositions:

1. Jesus Christ is not only Divine, but is the Lord God, Creator of Heaven and Earth.
2. Christianity is an Original and Divine System of Religion.
3. The Bible is the Natural Written Expression—historic and prophetic—of the Word, God, and was given by Divine Inspiration.

Mr. Teed takes the affirmative and leads off, we take the negative and will follow. The Discussion will probably commence in our next issue, the first number in November.

Such parties as are not now taking the paper, and wish to read the Discussion, will do well to subscribe, commencing with our next issue. We offered in our last to send the paper from Nov. 1 to Jan. 1 for the nominal sum of twenty cents, to afford the public a favorable opportunity to become acquainted with the sheet. The Discussion will offer additional inducements to thousands to accept our offer. We hope our friends will send in all the names they can.

Mr. Teed, in his last letter to us, makes this statement: "I am thirty-eight years of age Oct. 18th, 1877. Seven years ago I was a lay member of the Baptist church, and know nothing to the contrary of my name's being recorded there yet. I read medicine and practised for a while. Since 1870 I have given my energies to the investigation of the Word. I am now engaged, maintaining publicly and privately the doctrines and life of Jesus Christ as the only means of salvation to the human race. I might be styled a clergyman, though not dependent upon any recognized sect for my authority to declare the truth against all opposition."

Thus it appears that Mr. Teed is a sort of independent defender of Jesus, and as we have not as much faith in Jesus as he has possibly he may enlighten us somewhat. We shall endeavor to keep the debate within bounds and to occupy the space of two columns to each installment. Come on, Brother Teed.

The Rochester Convention.

We hope to meet many friends and patrons at the Congress of the Liberal League which assembles at Rochester on the 26, 27, and 28th inst. Important measures will be acted upon and a forward step will be advocated for the Liberals of the country to take. The Manhattan Liberal Club of this city will be represented there by Prof. A. L. Rawson, Theron C. Leland, and D. M. Bennett. It is expected that each will deliver a discourse. (See note on first page giving the names of the other speakers who will address the meeting.) The Convention will be held in Corinthian Hall—the finest hall in the city of Rochester.

We give in this issue the remainder of Col. Ingersoll's reply to the New York Observer's attack on Thomas Paine. We know our readers will peruse it with deep interest. We shall publish the whole in tract form, including the Observer's article, and in a few days have it ready to send to customers. Price by mail, 10 cents each, or 75 cents per dozen.

ATTENTION is called to the advertisement of our friend, Frank Rivers, of Boston, in reference to the "Fruits of Philosophy." He is prepared to serve all with that work, which is now so greatly in demand. Not wishing to interfere, we would say that we have the work in stock and are prepared to furnish all who see fit to order of us.

The Crimes and Cruelties of Christianity.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

The Bible enjoins intolerance and encourages persecution. The Levitical code pronounced idolatry not simply an error but a crime, and the penalty attached thereto was death. Moses commanded that idolaters and false prophets should be stoned to death. Whenever it is mentioned in the Old Testament that a king tolerated heathen worship it is mentioned as a stain upon his character. The monarchs who destroyed the altars and put to death the priests of Baal are spoken of as patterns of piety and the favorites of Jehovah.

In a skeptical age, like this, the example of the Jewish legislators can exert but little influence; but in past ages, when faith was strong, it was different. "In the early Church the Jewish was deemed the type of the Christian Church, and the policy that was common in the one, was regarded at least not blamable in the other." The massacre of the Canaanites, the slaughter of the priest of Baal, and the coercive measures of Josiah, were regarded as sufficient sanction of force; and the shedding of blood if necessary, to put down Paganism and heresy. The Christians of the 16th century viewed the matter in the same light. The Puritans have been much extolled for their sincerity and zeal; but no Christians ever appealed more frequently to the Old Testament for laws and precedents to justify their deeds of cruelty and blood. And in this they acted consistently. Optatus, in the time of Constantine, advocated the massacre of the Donatists on the ground of the Old Testament precedents (Milman's Hist. Christianity). The first law that has come down to us, making the profession of heresy a capital offense is law 9 De Hæreticis in the Theodosian code, and that was made by a Christian emperor, who, in this, copied from the Old Testament.

But independently of the influence of the Old Testament teachings, the Christian system makes persecution inevitable in proportion as the system is believed. Intolerance and persecution are a natural result of the doctrine that certain religious opinions involve moral guilt. The Bible declares, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be damned." This makes unbelief and heresy a crime, and unbelievers and heretics criminals. It makes it the religious duty of Christians to legislate for the extirpation of the former and the punishment of the latter. Can men treat with charity and kindness those with whom they believe God is displeased—those who are spreading doctrines that are regarded as plainly an offense to God? Is it not the wish of God that unbelief and heresy should be destroyed, and, as an obedient subject, is it not natural that the Christian should, as far as possible, carry out the wishes and designs of the God he worships?

But the most powerful consideration with a truly benevolent man, if he be a Christian, for the extirpation of heresy by force, is the belief that its unfortunate victims will suffer unending torments in hell. Not for a few days, not for a few years must they suffer, but forever. Under the burden of such an awful thought can the sincere, kind-hearted Christian fold his arms and look calmly upon the efforts of men who are spreading unbelief or heresy in every direction, who are not only going to hell themselves, but are taking with them thousands of their fellow men. Is it not natural that the sincere Christian, having the power, should suppress such opinions? that if necessary he should resort to coercive measures? that if new heresies are constantly springing up he should punish some of the offenders with severity, and thereby endeavor to deter others from leaving the true faith? Under the influence of such a faith, must not the desire for the suppression of the heresy be a measure of the desire for the suppression of the most injurious and dangerous errors? and will not the zeal to destroy them be in proportion to the love of truth and regard for the welfare of humanity? Will not, therefore, the most sincere, earnest, and devoted Christians, in an age of unquestioning faith, be the most active and zealous persecutors? On à priori grounds we cannot help arriving at such a conclusion, and the facts of history attest the correctness of the conclusion thus arrived at from a consideration of the natural effects of the doctrine that certain opinions involve merit and others guilt. It has been shown by Llorente that the men who founded the Inquisition were men whose characters were free from the stains of vice, and who were actuated in their cruel work of torturing and burning men, by the most philanthropic motives. Many of the worst persecutors, Catholic and Protestant alike, as Mr. Buckle has mentioned, have been among the most conscientious of men and women. Their cruelty was the result of their faith. What, they argued, are the fleeting pains of a few thousand men in comparison with the eternal agony of the thousands and tens of thousands they will, unless checked, lead to hell. Thus argued the Christians when they first obtained power and used it in killing pagans; thus argued the Catholics of the Middle Ages; thus argued the Protestants of Geneva; thus argued the advocates of Episcopacy, the defenders of the Kirk of Scotland, and the pious Puritans of New England. In proportion as men believe that correct theological beliefs involve merit and are essential to salvation, and that theological errors involve guilt and are punished with torments in hell, and have power, they must be persecutors. Such has been the case in the past. It was only when Rationalism, acting in opposition to the Church, rendered persecution impossible, that theologians discovered that the punishment of men was at variance with their religion. "With the merits of this pleasing though tardy conversion," says Lecky, "I am not now concerned; but few persons, I think, can follow the history of Christian persecution without a feeling of extreme astonishment that some modern writer, not content with maintaining that the doctrine of exclusive salvation ought not to have produced persecution, have ventured, in defiance of the unanimous testimony of the theologians of so many centuries, to dispute the plain historical fact that it did produce it" (Hist. Morals, vol. i, p. 422).

The Philosophy of Art.

Mrs. Augusta Cooper Bristol, of Vineland, N. J., gave a lecture Sunday afternoon, Oct. 7th, at Science Hall, 141 Eighth street, before a small but appreciative audience, on "The Philosophy of Art." "Art," said the speaker, "is divided into the useful or mechanical, and the fine arts or æsthetics. The former is made to subserve the physical needs of the body, the latter to satisfy the aspirations of the soul. It therefore embraces the good and the beautiful. Art in its highest form might properly be defined as the embodiment and expression of the highest human capacity. The love and appreciation of the beautiful is instinctive in the race. Man, even in the lowest stages of development, refuses to be satisfied with the mere gratification of his physical wants. He has a natural and instinctive craving to supply his emotional nature, which leads him to employ colored earths, feathers and flowers for personal adornment. So powerful is this desire for decoration, that great hardship and bodily suffering is endured with patience in order to gratify it. Nor is this instinct in any degree lessened by the progress of civilization. Do we not repeatedly observe instances in which health and comfort are sacrificed in order to gratify appearances by ornament and display? The back rooms and the kitchen are gloomy and neglected in order that the parlor may be adorned and cheerful. The young man who avowed that he could readily dispense with food and sleep, but his happiness and life depended on the possession of a breast-pin, was, no doubt, an extreme example; but in varying degrees the passion for ornament is universal among mankind. As the race advances in civilization, and social and moral influences dominate the life of the individual and society, the domain of art becomes enlarged and its power invoked to embody in ideal forms the aspirations of the human soul. These become objects of veneration and worship, binding the nation in a common faith. Hence all true art must of necessity have a religion, but not necessarily a theological basis. The history of Greece furnishes a striking illustration of the power and influence of art on the social and political life of the people. In reality the æsthetic influence of the beautiful creations of Greek genius furnished the most comprehensive and enduring bond of union among that gay and active people, far more powerful than their philosophy or politics. What I have said of the influence of art on Greek civilization is to a great extent equally true of Roman civilization. As to the relative merits of men and women as artists, disclaiming all partisan considerations, it must be conceded that the creative faculty essential to the production of the highest art belongs to man. At the same time, it must be also conceded that woman has ever furnished its highest and noblest aspirations. In recent times many women have chosen the career of artists (may there be many more such); but it must be confessed that thus far their position and achievements have been those of pupils. But, we must remember, the devotion of the pupil is the inspiration of the master. My remarks have special reference to sculpture and painting, but are equally applicable to music. The great composers have been exclusively men, but women have been the best expositors of their genius. While I claim for man superiority in creative power and intellectual force, it by no means implies that woman is to occupy an inferior position; far from it. There is a higher and nobler sphere reserved for woman, in which she reigns supreme queen and priestess. In the home the genius of woman finds its legitimate field for the exercise of those faculties in which her superiority over man manifests itself, in their power and beauty. In the cultivation of the arts of social life; in the nurture and culture of the young; in the formation of manners, habits and character, these are the highest of all arts constituting the essential elements of welfare and happiness. In this regard man occupies a subordinate place and plays an inferior part. Woman, therefore, from this point of view occupies a position and performs a function at once noble and natural, in which she reigns supreme, wielding a power far transcending that of emperors or kings—a power that shapes not only the form of governments and institutions, but the destiny of humanity on this planet."—Graphic.

The first edition of the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion" is rapidly disappearing. "Now is the accepted time."

By PROF. W. ROBERTSON SMITH, OF THE UNIVERSITY OF ABERDEEN.

The prophecies contain: 1. Reproof of present sin; 2. Exhortation to present duty; 3. Encouragement to the godly and threatening to the wicked, based on the certainty of God's righteous purpose. In this last connection prophecy is predictive. It lays hold of the ideal elements of the theocratic conception, and depicts the way in which, by God's grace, they shall be actually realized in a Messianic age, and in a nation purified by judgment and mercy. But in all this the prophet starts from present sin, present needs, present historical situations. There is no reason to think that a prophet ever received a revelation which was not spoken directly and pointedly to his own time. If we find, then, that, after the prophecy of Zechariah i-viii, which is complete in itself, there begins at chapter ix a new oracle, quite distinct in subject and style, which speaks of an alliance between Judah and Israel as a thing subsisting in the prophet's own time, which knows no oppressor later than Assyria and Egypt, and rebukes forms of idolatry that do not appear after the Exile; if, in short, the whole prophecy becomes luminous when it is placed a little after the time of Hosea, and remains absolutely dark if it is ascribed to Zechariah—we are surely entitled to let it speak for itself. When the principle is admitted, other applications follow, mainly in the book of Isaiah, where the anonymous chapters xl-lxvi cannot be understood in a natural and living way except by looking at them from the historical standpoint of the Exile. Then arises a further question whether all titles are certainly authentic and conclusive; and here, too, it is difficult to answer by an absolute affirmative. For example, in Isaiah xxx, 6 the title, "The burden of the beasts of the south," interrupts the connection in a most violent way. This is not a solitary instance, but, on the whole, the titles are far more trustworthy in the prophecies than in the Psalms, and partly on this account, but mainly from the direct historical bearing of prophetic teaching, we can frame a complete history of written prophecy than of any other part of Old Testament literature. We have, on the one hand, a series of prophets—Amos, Hosea, and the anonymous author of Zechariah ix-xi—who preached in the northern kingdom, but are not descendants of the school of Elisha, which had so decayed under court favor from the dynasty of Jehu that Amos had to be sent from the wilderness of Judah to take up again the forgotten Word of the Lord. In Judah proper we have the great Assyrian prophet, Isaiah, with his younger contemporary Micah, the powerful supporters of the reformation of Hezekiah, laboring, one in the capital, the other in the country district of the Philistine border. To the Assyrian period belongs also Nahum, who wrote, perhaps, in captivity, and foretold the fall of Nineveh. Then comes Zephaniah, about the time of the Scythian ravages, followed by the prophets of the Chaldean period, first Habakkuk, and then Jeremiah and Ezekiel, men of a heavier spirit and less glowing poetical fire than Isaiah, no longer upholding the courage of Judah in the struggle with the empire of the East, but predicting the utter dissolution of existing things, and finding hope only in a new covenant—a new theocracy. In the period of exile more than one anonymous prophet raised his voice; for not only the "Great Unnamed" of Isaiah xl-lxvi, but the authors of other Babylonian prophecies, are probably to be assigned to this time. In the new hope of deliverance, the poetic genius, as well as the spiritual insight of prophecy, awakes to fresh life, and sets forth the mission of the new Israel to carry the knowledge of the Lord to all nations. But the spirit of the new Jerusalem had little in common with these aspirations; and in Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, prophecy retains not much of its old power, except an uncompromising moral earnestness. The noble poetry of the old prophets, which even in the time of Ezekiel had begun to give way to plain prose, finds no counterpart in these latest oracles; and imaginative power is shown, where it still exists, in the artificial structure of symbolic visions. No important new ideas are set forth, and even the tone of moral exhortation sometimes reminds us more of the rabbinical maxims of the fathers in the Mishna than of the prophetic teaching of the eighth century. And as if the spirit of prophecy foresaw its own dissolution, Malachi looks not to the continued succession of prophets, but to the return of Elijah, as the necessary preparation for the day of the Lord. In this sketch of the prophetic writings we find no place for the book of Daniel, which, whether composed in the early years of the Persian Empire, or, as modern critics held, at the time of the Maccabean wars, presents so many points of diversity from ordinary prophecy as to require entirely separate treatment. It is in point of form the precursor of the apocalyptic books of post-canonical Judaism, though in its intrinsic qualities far superior to these, and akin to the prophets proper.

Humphrey-Bennett Discussion.

SUNDAY, (OUR DAY,) Oct., 14th, 1877.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I have just received the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion," and after carefully reviewing it must say, that of all the discussions I have ever read, this one pleases me the best! It is so direct, plain and simple, yet full of earnest thought and strong reason, and as both sides are given in their entirety it will be equally valuable to Christian and Infidel, and therefore I trust the demand for it will fully equal its merits.

The Infidels will no doubt call for as many as half of the present edition, and as Christians are said to outnumber us as ten to one, they see that the call from them will exhaust the edition ten times over,

Then to add to the value of the book we have the interesting biographies of both disputants, and every one likes biography, especially autobiography, which from representative men like Bennett and Humphrey, is sure to be correct to the letter.

Two years ago Mr. S. and myself prophesied that D. M. Bennett would soon exhaust his repository of information, judging by the way he was lavishly pouring it out in weekly installments of editorials in perfect floods and torrents in every number of THE TRUTH SEEKER and supplementing these profuse deluges by every now and then issuing a book full of the very cream of pure, scientific, rational materialism, fairly taking the whole country by surprise and causing each and all to wonder "How one small (?) head could carry all he knew."

In view of all these Herculean labors for the cause I worship, I must once more be allowed to offer my sincere and most grateful thanks for the benefit and pleasure I have derived from all the publications hitherto issued from the darling little TRUTH SEEKER office, and to hope the fountain may never run dry, but continually grow wider, deeper and stronger, till

"The old straight-lacings of the past,
Shall all be burst and riven;
And creeds and dogmas to the wind,
Like threshed-out chaff be given."

Very truly,

ELMIRA DRAKE SLENDER.

Our Common Schools.

NEW YORK CITY, Oct., 1877.

When we come to consider the subject of our public schools we should forget for the time our special prejudices and try, as far as we can, to meet on a neutral ground. Our institutions make all phases of religion and philosophy equal before the law. All are equally eligible to any office in the gift of the people, yet it must happen that things are and will be shaped somewhat after the prejudices of the preponderating majority, and somewhat against the prejudices of the minority. We should try to be mutually forbearing, and as little aggressive as possible. We have greatly regretted to see the religious controversies in relation to our public schools. There is some danger of the public free schools being seriously damaged by these controversies about the Bible in the schools, or the opening of them with prayer, or the singing of hymns, or the reading of a chapter in the Bible. If these controversies go on and increase, and each party insists in having its own way the prosperity and usefulness of the schools will be seriously impaired, and even their very existence endangered. The liberal party are making such rapid progress and have such a future before them that they can well afford to act magnanimously. We have often thought of a plan that appears to us to be just and wise; liberal to all and aggressive to none. It is the plan that was pursued in the schools the writer of this attended in a country place something over half a century ago. The neighborhood was decidedly a religious one, pretty much all the different phases of Christianity and of unbelief of that system were represented in the neighborhood. We had a few Roman Catholics, pretty much all the different phases of Protestantism, a few representatives of the deistical, atheistical and materialistic type of opinion. The schools were so conducted that all were satisfied, none felt themselves aggrieved upon. How, it may be asked, was this done? Simply through the instrumentality of the reading books. All of the pupils were learning to read. They were each allowed to use such books in their reading lessons as were used or accepted in the families where they belonged. These books represented the broad and liberal phase of the parties they represented, avoiding those points that were controversial or aggressive upon others. While there was a good deal of religious and moral teaching through this mode of proceeding there was no official Bible reading, or prayers, or any thing that could fairly be considered as aggressive upon any. Neither were the schools exclusively secular as is claimed by many they should be. This exclusive secularism when forced upon unwilling parties becomes a species of illiberal and aggressive sectarianism.

Cannot the Rochester Liberal Convention strike out a plan something like the preceding and that shall be satisfactory and harmonize the school question. They would thereby render an important and valuable service to the country.

HORATIO D. SHEPPARD.

Humphrey-Bennett Discussion.

PAUL the Apostle said a good thing in his first epistle to the Thessalonians, 5th chapter and 21st verse. "Prove all things, hold fast that which is good." We are forcibly reminded of this injunction, in reading the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion," just published. In this volume of 539 pages, sold for $1.00, may be found the strongest arguments which two able and representative men, thoroughly familiar with the subject which they discussed, could bring to bear upon the great question at issue, viz: CHRISTIANITY AND INFIDELITY. The three questions forming the basis of the argument were as follows:

1st. The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.
2d. The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.
3d. Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine, than that Infidelity is true?

In obedience to the advice of St. Paul, we advise every reader of the Advocate to procure this instructive volume, and by carefully comparing the arguments presented, "Prove all things, and hold fast that which is good." In harmony with St. Paul, The Apocryphal Esdras says: "As for truth, it endureth and is always strong; it liveth and conquereth for evermore."—Advocate, N. Y.

Freethinkers' Association

OF ANAHEIM, LOS ANGELES COUNTY, CALIFORNIA.

ED. TRUTH SEEKER: The above association was organized at Anaheim on Sunday, Oct. 7th. The creed of the society—Morality and Education.

PLATFORM OF PRINCIPLES.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall cease.

3. We demand that all appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall be discontinued.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the Government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States, or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the Government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly and promptly made.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: Mr. J. F. Walker, President; Mrs. Kate Parker, Mr. P. A. Clark, and Mr. A. G. Beebe, Vice-Presidents; C. A. Lohmuller, Secretary; Mr. R. Luedke, Treasurer; and the following gentlemen were appointed an Executive Committee: Messrs. M. R. Gaddy, E. A. Pullen, Leonard Parker, R. Luedke and John Adams.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. LOHMULLER,

Anaheim, Oct. 8, 1877.

Secretary.

To Western Liberals.

We cheerfully clip the following from the Boston Investigator in reference to the lectures of Bro. W. S. Bell. Mr. Bell is able and worthy, and we hope our Western friends will keep him busily at work.

W. S. BELL'S LECTURES.—On our next page may be found a new and enlarged list of Free-thought lectures which Mr. W. S. Bell proposes to deliver this autumn and winter to Liberal and Spiritual Societies. We would earnestly commend him to all friends of advanced thought in this vicinity, and as he intends to leave for Western New York and Ohio about the 1st of November, we suggest to our friends in that locality that they give him invitation to lecture and encourage him in his work as a Liberal speaker.

Mr. Bell is thoroughly qualified by education and disposition to impart great interest to his lectures, and as we are certain that he will give satisfaction to his hearers and promote the Liberal cause, we are desirous that he shall be kept constantly engaged. He is a gentleman of decided ability, a convincing reasoner, and an eloquent speaker, while in social life he is a very pleasant, affable and genial companion. As our Western Friends will be sure to like Mr. Bell when they hear him, we ask them to provide him with frequent opportunities for lecturing. He is greatly interested in Liberalism and can do much to increase it if encouraged. Let him have enough to do, for such men are useful and needed. His address is New Bedford, Mass.

Our Growing Cause.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: It is a pleasing and noticeable fact that the cause of Liberalism is daily gaining, or winning, to its already strong ranks so many valuable acquisitions. It is the old axiom but repeating itself, that truth will in the end prevail, though it suffer from the injustice of the enemy at first. In scanning the various journals of the day, we can see almost every week accounts of prominent ministers throwing up their charges, being no longer able conscientiously to hold to doctrines which they have espoused in their youth—which espousal is, in a large majority of cases, the result of education merely, and not of personal investigation. In truth, this is the only correct way of accounting for the numbers within the pale of Christianity to-day: they have been taught from infancy up to believe in the Bible from Alpha to Omega as unquestionably true, except, it may be, certain apocryphal sentences, which are smoothed over by the sweeping word "figurative." I think the condition of things would be materially improved if Christians would mark the entire book figurative and adopt in its stead some good code of morals, such as that of Confucius or of Seneca. There is, of course, no denying, nor is there any cause for so doing, that there are many moral and humane teachings in the Christians' text-book; but then it is such a medley of all that is most vicious, with some good interspersed, that the benefits arising from a study of it by an immature and uninitiated mind are more than counteracted by the evil accrued.

I do not propose entering into a dissertation on the merits or demerits of that book divine, for you have so completely shown up its shortcomings in your well-sustained debate with your clever opponent, Rev. Humphrey, that any further remarks by another would be perfectly useless. Though Mr. Humphrey adduced arguments that could not but claim our most calm and deliberate consideration, when we came to that fifty-stranded cable of yours, there was no getting around it. It is perfectly non-confutable. If every Christian in the land could have it alone to ponder in his hours usually devoted to useless invocation, I think such a change would be wrought as would astonish the most hopefully sanguine.

There are, no doubt, many of us who are anxious to see if the Observer man is going to accept Col. Ingersoll's challenge. The gauntlet has been thrown down to the seventy thousand priests of the United States. Is there not a second David to come out and boldly defend his wavering cause? If not, what a quietus on the Paine and Voltaire death-bed-confession subject will pervade the files of the clergy forever! For fear of becoming prolix, I am truly,

KIPTON, OHIO, Oct. 10, 1877.

TO THE EDITOR: I have carefully perused the article of Francis E. Abbott, Esq., regarding the apparent necessity for a "New Conscience Party," by way of suggestion to the National Liberal League who are to meet at Rochester, N. Y., Oct. 26, 27 and 28th. I appreciate the idea truly, and it seems to me a duty incumbent upon the true guardians of our great Deistical compact of political union given us by the wisdom of our fathers. That we have the opportunity to register our strength by ballot at the next presidential election as a demand that our voice be known and respected.

Yes Mr. Editor, let the Convention give us a ringing liberal platform with an ever separation of Church and State, the constitution as it is, with taxation of all Church property and the freedom of our Public Schools from all sectarian influences—with Col. Robt. G. Ingersoll for president, and Francis E. Abbot, or one of the most stalwart, from the ranks of the spiritualists for Vice-President.

"CHRISTIANITY AND INFIDELITY," the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A thoroughly exhaustive treatment of the subject in hand, by two learned heads impelled by equally honest hearts. Both Christians and Infidels will find it a well stocked arsenal of weapons to defend their special systems. Though a thick 12mo volume of over five hundred pages, it is sold for the low price of $1.00. Buy less beef next month and get this mental meat which the more you consume the more you have it. The Arguments for Christianity.

Christian's arguments in favor of supernatural religion: 1. A revelation from God is possible. Ans.—The Christ-Jew-God consists only in priest-forged names. Hence, the revelation would be a priest-forged one. The Christian Bible is a mass of contradiction and absurdity—so is man, especially all priests: they preach one thing and practice another. They talk against being lords over God's heritage; but the heritage is all theirs, a thousand disputing sects—all the people of their own forged God. And all the people must be damned unless they join some one of these sects, and help support a lying priesthood.

Arg. 2. A revelation from God is desirable. Having forged a God name (Josephus Ant. book 1, chap. 7; book 2, chap. 12, and Dr. Clarke on Gen. 1 chap). Instead of studying the book of nature, spread out, on the whole universal face of real existence, by the impartial ruler of all, priests have fabricated an imaginary world, where their forged God live after we are dead if we hate this world, deny ourselves everything to please the priests, worship and support them in great pomp and hypocrisy. By devil, hell, and ghost! shall we prostitute our intellects here, to prepare for an imaginary world we know nothing about, to be enjoyed after we are dead? This is why a priest-forged revelation is so desirable for priests.

Arg. 3. A revelation from God is necessary. Ans.—No man ever knew God, only priests fabricated names. The cause of all existence is incomprehensible, inconceivable, indescribable, unknown, and unknowable. But the Christians say a revelation is necessary to prove the existence of God. The Jew books prove the existence of the Jews' God; and the first two chapters of Matthew and Luke prove the Christian's God; and the Old Testament and New

All the commentators and sects, and the conduct of all Christendom is overwhelming evidence that our Bible is the greatest book of lies that ever was made, and that priests made the book. That there is not one word of truth in the first three chapters of our Bible Genesis; the first two chapters of Matthew and Luke, except the first four verses of Luke. Dr. Clarke says (Com. on Mat. 17): "Christianity was not introduced to reform the external man. It would be like ocean into tempest tossed to wait a feather, or to drown a fly. But to establish the doctrine of Miracles." Priests, devils, have been working lying miracles ever since and are at it now. The most human-damning curse that ever existed.

"Seed of the Woman." After four thousand years the Highest overshadowed her; and begat Abram's seed, and the woman's seed. "Before Abram was, I am." The Lamb slain before the foundation of the world. "The son of God; the son of ghost; the son of Mary; the son of man; the son of David and Bathsheba. Old as his father and mother; born in the days of Herod the King." [And began to be about thirty years old, and as supposed.] Infidel's evidence, Einstein, Graves, Guild, Amberley, Grant, Mosheim. Our Bible, Voltaire, Rebold, Brennan, Whiston, Josephus, Paine, etc., etc. Priests say Paine died an awful death. So have criminals on the gallows, but confessed and went to heaven. Catholics say Voltaire confessed and Paine recanted; but they would not bury them, nor have them in heaven. Because Paine's "Age of Reason," and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" contain more truth about Godology than ever was on earth before.

Now Brother Bennett, you have been talking very familiarly with Jehovah. I suppose all the orthodox brethren are mad at you. Well, I am mad at all priests in Christendom because they say "God created." It is a lie—unless they will let us Atheists know positively that there is a real thing in existence which they call God. "For when he would swear by no greater, he swore by himself." I swear, I don't know God created. I think there is a vital force in the Universe that rules the whole by unchanging law. But that force never made a Christ, nor a Jew Book, nor the millions of lying priests, Call me Atheist, if you please, brother, you ignorant priests' dupe. Why, after "God created all," and retired, did Lord God "make" man, woman, serpent, devil, garden, man-trap, and woman's seed? etc. (Gen. ii. iii.).

Eve had a Cain, and then gave out the word: "I've got a man-child right straight from the Lord. If sired by Nick or Adam, just as well." She said 'twas from the Lord, and she alone must tell.

But where is the Jehovah "ye are spakin' to," all this time? Very respectfully yours, Richford, Vt. JOSEPH NOYES.

M. J. HINES, Oak Ridge, Mo., writes: Having read the Rev. Humphrey's charges and your reply to them touching the recantation of Infidels upon their death-beds, I propose to speak of the death of a neighbor and friend, J. A. McLane, who died in this vicinity (Perry Co., Mo.) one month ago. Mr. McLane died in his 74th year. For fifty years he was an admirer of Thomas Paine. He was an avowed Deist, a man of good morals and active brain. His sickness was of a trying form. He lingered, however, for some ten or twelve weeks, rational almost to the last hour, and conversed freely upon the subject of death, well knowing that the end of his earthly career was near at hand—always speaking of it calmly. Three days before death he said, speaking to his son and myself: "You should not neglect to support that paper. On being asked by his son, 'What paper?' he replied, 'THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is an advocate of Truth.' Mr. McLane died as calmly (I am informed) as an infant falls asleep in the arms of its mother.

Christianity and Infidelity

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n. Clergyman, OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

- I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.
- II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.
- III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers; and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion.

Heathens of the Heath;

A ROMANCE, BY WM. McDONNELL,

AUTHOR OF "EXETER HALL," ETC.

This work is rich in romantic and pathetic incidents, and exhibits with an overwhelming array of facts the atrocities committed by the Church. It shows that the purest morality exists without the Bible, and that many of the heathen philosophers were lovers of virtue. The folly of Christian ministers is fully portrayed. Hypocrisy and bigotry are clearly exposed, and the road to virtue and true happiness plainly marked out. A most pleasing romance is woven into the work, in which much opportunity is afforded the author for fine descriptions and beautiful sentiments which he so well knows how to give utterance to. The characters in the tale are invested with much interest; the hero and heroine gain the love of every reader. "On the whole, it is the work of a master hand—a work of unaffected beauty and the deepest interest." "One of the most valuable features of the work is, its positions are all proven. . . . Every thinking, enquiring mind should peruse it." 500 pp., 12mo. Price, in paper, $1.00; cloth, $1.50.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Author of "The Biography of Satan," and "The Bible of Bibles" (comprising a description of twenty bibles).

This wonderful and exhaustive volume by Mr. Graves will, we are certain, take high rank as a book of reference in the field which he has chosen for it. The amount of mental labor necessary to collate and compile the varied information contained in it must have been severe and arduous indeed, and now that it is in such convenient shape the student of freethought will not willingly allow it to go out of print. But the book is by no means a mere collation of views or statistics; throughout its entire course the author—as will be seen by his title-page and chapter-heads—follows a definite line of research and argument to the close, and his conclusions go, like sure arrows, to the mark. All that are free and freedom-loving in this nation, all that are in favor of republican principles and republican government, will be called to battle with this terrible enemy as never before. Nay, the hour has already come; and if we would not be surrounded and captured, we must grapple the foe to-day.—Francis E. Abbot.

Nor the truth which one possesses, or believes himself to possess, but the honest striving after truth is what makes the worth of man. If God should hold all truth enclosed in his right hand, and in his left the ever active impulse to the pursuit of truth, although with the condition that I should forever err; and should say to me, choose, I should fall with submission on his left hand, and say, Father, give! Pure truth is for thee alone.—Lessing.

I CAN imagine no happier way to end one's life than in the quiet of the country, far from the demands of business, out of the mad race for place and money and power. In this way, surrounded by pleasant fields and genial friends I hope to end my days. I hope you will all end your lives in the country, in houses covered with vines and clothed with flowers. I hope that you, looking upon fields of corn and wheat, over which run the sunshine and shadow, surrounded by friends and crowned by honor, will pass away from earth serenely as the Autumn dies.—Ingersoll.

JEHOVAH is the idol of a Syrian mountain tribe that has been foisted upon the rest of mankind under the penalty of eternal torments, and modified from age to age, but his worst features retained even to our own day. I arraign him in the name of the millions who are held by him in spiritual bondage; in the name of the freemen of America, whose enslavement is sought by the incorporation of this tyrant's name into the charter of our liberties. Away with you, hideous monster, in whom meet the worst vices of the barbarous people who made you, and the ignorant and fearful who still believe in you! You may do for God of the wolves that prowl over our Western prairies and hunt down sick buffaloes, or the hyenas that make night hideous in your Holy Land. You may properly be inserted on the black flag of every pirate vessel, between the death's head and the cross-bones. Infinite tyrant, king of miscreants, woman-cursing, soul-tormentor, destroyer of the world, architect of hell, and supplier of its eternal fires, go with your co-partner, the Devil! You belong to the ignorance, brutality and lust of an age long past. Go to the hell to which you have so long consigned the best representatives of our race and may your name and history alone remain for a warning and a lesson to all generations.—Wm. Denton.

Odds and Ends.

MERE matter of form—fitting a dress.

WHEN is a cube a sphere—When it is turned round.

THE best binding for a borrowed book is homeward bound.

A poor fellow who pawned his watch says he raised money with a lever.

THE last performance that Samson gave literally brought down the house.

WHY is a school-mistress like the letter O? Because she makes classes of lasses.

WHY do white sheep eat more than black sheep? Because there are more of them.

WHAT is the difference between a sentinel and a spy? One guards the pass and the other passes the guard.

OLD snuff-takers are but pleasantly stimulated by an article that would maceaboy sneeze the top of his head off.

AN orator, declaring that fortune knocked at every man's door once, an old Irishman said: "When she knocked at mine I must have been out."

WHEN a clergyman remarked that they were to have a nave in the new church, an old lady whispered that she "knew the party to whom he referred."

"CAN you see me, dear?" said a Chicago man to his dying wife. "Tell me; can you see me?" "No," she faintly whispered, "but I can smell your breath."

SAYS the Hawkeye: "The rage for yellow ribbon often makes lovely woman look as though somebody had slapped her on top of the head with a fried egg."

AN eccentric clergyman lately said in a sermon that about the strongest proof we have that man is made of clay is the brick sometimes found in his hat!

A BALTIMORE man dreamed that he should die at six o'clock on the first day of the month. See how little dependence can be placed upon dreams—he died at eight.

As General Tcherthemoslemsheadoff was leaving for the wars, his sweetheart remarked to him in tears: "Though I never more behold thee, yet is thy name a spell."

GOING FOR THE DOCTOR.

A jolly old German farmer rode to town after a physician for his wife, who was very sick. He dismounted from his horse in front of a saloon, just as the boys inside had begun to make merry over the first keg of buck. He approached and looked cautiously around the screen. The foaming glasses were held high above the heads of the revelers, as one of the number pronounced a toast appropriate for the occasion. The silent watcher licked his lips and wished his errand to town had been one requiring less despatch. He was turning reluctantly away when the crowd saw him.

"Hullo!" they shouted, "there's Fritz. Bring him in."

He was laid hold upon and hauled up to the bar, all the while protesting:

"Poys, I was in a quick hurry. Ole vooman sick like der tyval. I vas come mit der toctor sooner as lightnin'."

"Well, you can take some buck while you're here, and kill two birds with one stone," was the reply.

"Yaas; I kill von shicken mit a couple stone, und der ole vooman diemitoud der toctor. I ton't forget myself uv it, eh?"

"Oh, she won't die. Buck beer don't come but once a year, and you've got the old woman all the time. Fill 'em up again."

"Yaas, I got her all der time, but supposin' she go dade? I don't got her sometime any more yet. It's petter to go mit der toctor seldom right away."

But he didn't go; and as one glass after another was forced upon him by the reckless crew, the subject of his errand was floated further and further from his vision, and his voice, untuned with anxiety, joined in the drinking songs, and rose above all the others.

Thus he was found by his son, late at night. The boy grasped him by the sleeve, and said: "Fader, coom home."

Fritz turned, and at the sight of the boy a great fear arose in his mind, which swept away the fumes of the beer and brought him to a sense of the situation. In a penitential tone he asked:

"Yawcup, how you come here? Vas some-dings der matter?"

"Yaw," replied the lad.

"Vell, spoke up about id. Vas der ole vooman—is your mudder—is she—dade? I can shtan der best. Don'd geep your fader in expense, poys. Shpit it oud. Vas ve a couple of ophansees, Yawcup?"

"Nein," answered Jacob, "you vas anoder. A leedle baby come mit der house."

Fritz was overcome for a moment, but finally stammered out:

"Vos dot so? I expose it vas not so soon already. Vell, vell, in der middle uv life ve don't know vat is going to turn up. Man exposes and Gott supposes. Fill up the glasses. The boy ventured to ask the old man why he had not sent the doctor.

"Vot! did she vant a doctor! Petter she tole me so. I got him pooty quick. Nevare mind, I save more as ten dollar toctor pill on dot baby. Ve von't go home till yesterday."

Fritz went home at last, and in a couple of days was in town again after some medicine, but the boys couldn't get him to drink again. He said to them:

"You bate I tend to my peesness now—I go back and vatch der ole vooman dot she don't got dwins! byshiminy! She's got herspunk up like everydings."

Notes and Clippings.

QUEEN POMARE, of the Society Islands, is dead.

SPAIN has sent 30,000 more troops to Cuban graveyards.

EIGHT millions of cigars were manufactured daily in this city before the strike.

THE Chinese have discontinued their only railroad. They considered it, in a certain sense, blasphemous.

MR. BEECHER says that the newspapers print too many scandals. Doubtless, in his opinion, there has been at least one too many printed.

AT Fernandina, Fla., the yellow fever has unfortunately broken out again and threatens to sweep away the whole colored population of the place.

DICK TURPIN used to say, "Your money or your life." The present robbers say, "Put your money in our savings bank," or, "Insure in our company," and thereby bid defiance to the law.

A SHAKER community at Pleasant Hill, Ky., has been almost broken up. First a young couple eloped, next an elderly pair went the same way, and within a month nine more marriages have occurred.

MINISTER MANCINI refuses to allow bishops and priests to be appointed for services in the kingdom of Italy without previous sanction from the Government. A new bill on the subject is to be introduced.

THE Presbyterian Synod (Jersey) has decided that women cannot properly preach, but that there is a rare beauty and sublimity about them when they are making pin cushions for a church fair to purchase a central chandelier.

A WEEKLY paper has the following: "Wanted, as Housekeeper, a Christian female accustomed to Poultry." Can this be a trap set by Beecher? And has he nest-hiding in view? or what means this sinister association?

THE pious Gilman will work at the forge in Auburn prison. He is positive that faith and piety will save him in the next world, but begins to realize that morality would have answered his purpose better in this world.

A CANADIAN doctor named Blumleigh is being prosecuted for practicing without a diploma. The difference between him and the woman in Solomon's Song is that one is black and comely, and the other is quack and Blumleigh.

THE Rockville Christian Advocate, being asked who wrote the festive ballad about "Women, Wine and Song," replies that it was "some dissolute person of the middle ages at the beginning of a debauch." Correct: Martin Luther wrote that song.

A LADY in general conversation, by ingeniously cooking her dates, was reducing her age to an astonishing limit. Her daughter, whose partly French blood had brought a keen wit, interposed with the remonstrance, "At least, leave nine months between our ages, mamma!"

A SMART girl in Vassar claims that Phtholagn-yrrh should be pronounced Turner, and gives this little table to explain her theory:
First—Phth (as in phthisis) is..... T
Second—olo (as in colonel) is..... UR
Third—gn (as in gnat) is..... N
Fourth—yrrh (as in myrrh) is..... ER

A PORTION of the stake used at the martyrdom of Bishop Hooper at Gloucester, in England, in the time of Queen Mary, was advertised recently in the local newspapers for sale. The two members of Parliament for that city, Messrs. Monk and Wait, having contributed the sum required for its purchase, the relic is to be preserved in the Gloucester Museum.

A SCOTCHMAN, being examined by his minister, was asked, "What kind of a man was Adam?" "Oh, jist like ither folk." The minister insisted on having a more special description of the first man, and pressed for more explanation. "Weel," said the catechumen, "he was jist like Joe Simpson, the horse-shoer." "How so?" asked the minister. "Weel, naeboddy got anything by him, and many lost."

A JERSEY CITY minister, who was crossing the ferry on Sunday, expressed astonishment at seeing a church deacon officiating as pilot. He remonstrated with the deacon for thus breaking the Sabbath. The deacon responded: "Why yes; that's so; but I have to do it; there are so many ministers who want to cross on Sunday that we are obliged to run the boats on that day." The parson had no more to say.

THE prohibition of the celibacy of the clergy in Russia is carried to such an extent that no priest can perform any spiritual function before he is married, nor after he becomes a widower; and as by the rules of the church he is not allowed to remarry, the death of his wife occasions the cessation of his clerical functions. The priests may, however, on the death of their wives, enter a convent and enjoy the privilege of becoming eligible to bedignitaries of the Church.

SERIOUS trouble is feared in Montreal, Canada, on the 5th of November, the Orange Young Britons having decided to turn out and celebrate the anniversary of Guy Fawkes with an immense procession. The Irish Catholic Union Society has met by sections and formally resolved to prevent this, and consequently bloodshed is feared. The manager of Mechanic's Hall has cancelled an engagement with the Young Britons, who had engaged the hall for a grand Hallowe'en, in view of the threatening state of things generally.

TWO professional gamblers, Loring M. Black and Stephen Fields, were sent to the penitentiary recently by Judge Gildersleeve for plying their infamous trade in this city; while the proceedings against the wealthy gamblers, Morrissey, Chamberlin and Simmonds are postponed for political reasons. This is one of those discriminations which the public will fail to comprehend. Why should one gambler be sent to the penitentiary and another to the legislature? Why should not the public deal out stern and impartial justice and send them both to the legislature?

THE society formed in France a year or two ago for the purpose of surveying for a canal to unite the Atlantic and Pacific by the Darien route, is making progress in its operations. Its explorers are busily at work in the United States of Columbia, under the direction of Lieut. Wyse, who reports his confidence that an interoceanic canal by way of Columbia will soon be an accomplished fact. He specially favors the Columbia route because it will not require such expensive locks as the Nicaragua route, while the lowest gradients and the narrowest isthmuses are also found in Columbia.

THE investigating committee of Piedmont church, Worcester, Mass., which has been inquiring into the charges against Deacon Rufus N. Merriam, alleged to have made false returns and oaths before the Register in Bankruptcy as senior partner in the bankrupt firm of Merriam, Richardson & Co., and to have fraudulently acted in other matters connected with the failure of his firm in 1875, and its subsequent entrance into bankruptcy in 1876, reported at a church meeting recently, and it is understood they consider the charges proven. No action was taken, and the meeting was adjourned for one week.

ASIATICS live as no other races can, and upon food which would not sustain a European house dog. Frugal as badgers, industrious as bees, they undersell every labor market which they enter, and outdo every civilized artisan at his own trade. Anyone who sees a Japanese carpenter at work, with his toes for a vice and his thighs and stomach for a bench, has seen tools well used, and goods equal to European turned out. They will, in fact, become formidable rivals of all kinds of Western manufactures. The Japanese are always ready to learn, and to outvie everything that the West does, and this they do with less food, less air, less clothing, and less comfort than any civilized workman.

THE Episcopalians are in a sad quandary. The feminine communicants have seriously fallen off in numbers because the present style of dress will not permit the wearer to kneel. Who would have thought that a fashionable pullback would become a religious drawback? The omnipotence of fashion, however, is clearly shown in the fact that when religion and dress come to an issue, religion quietly steps up to the wall until the fashion changes. Indeed, we are compelled to believe that one reason why Mr. Moody is at present laying siege to the frontier towns and avoiding the great cities is that he is waiting for the advent of the late fall and winter styles which will allow of greater freedom in genuflection.

THE following are two of the sections of a proposed canon on marriage and divorce, which has passed the House of Delegates of the Episcopal Convention, but which were not concurred in by the House of Bishops, and is now before a committee of conference: "Section 1. If any persons be joined together otherwise than as God's Word doth allow, their marriage is not lawful. Sec. 2. No minister shall solemnize the marriage of any person who has a divorced husband or wife still living, if such husband or wife has been put away for any cause arising after marriage; but this canon shall not be held to apply to the innocent in a divorce for the cause of adultery, or to parties once divorced seeking to be united again."

SINCE the year 1872, according to the statement of the Commissioner of the Board of Charities of New York State, an outdoor relief of seven hundred thousand dollars has been expended, five hundred thousand dollars of which were for groceries and coal, and two hundred thousand dollars for the expense of distribution. In one district alone, out of every dollar used for the outdoor relief, at least eighty-seven cents were expended for distribution. That is to say, thirteen cents were given to the poor, and the remainder went into various official pockets. The accounts of other districts are scarcely less edifying. In consequence pauperism has been increasing throughout the country at an alarming rate. In the course of five years there has been an increase of over one hundred per cent.

THE Russian police have discovered a fresh Nihilist plot, which is said to have been supported by persons of all ranks and classes in various parts of the empire. Even general officers holding commands in the army, now in the field, are implicated. Numerous arrests have been effected in consequence, chiefly at Moscow and Kieff. The political clubs and associations in these cities have been dissolved by order of the police, and more stringent regulations have been enacted against the press. A copy has been found of an anonymous letter, dated Kazan, inciting the people to rebellion, and suggesting disturbances on the occasion of the arrival of sick trains from the seat of war, and of friends of soldiers who have fallen victims to the campaign. The Minister of Justice presented a report to the Czar, stating that Nihilism, Socialism, and disaffection are rapidly spreading, and that the police find themselves unable to suppress those tendencies in the face of the corruption and moral decay prevailing throughout Russian society.

FROM time to time a cry arises that the number of churches is too small to accommodate our increasing population, and that furthermore we stand in pressing need of clergymen. A reply is often made to the effect that, although it is true that population increases, many of the churches attract but meagre congregations. A recent statement, bearing upon this subject, goes far to indicate the real condition of things. According to the Presbyterian Synod there are now five hundred regular Presbyterian ministers out of employment, and, what is still more singular, in view of this statement, there are more than five hundred churches in need of pastors. These facts, when viewed together, may appear somewhat contradictory, but from them certain conclusions may be drawn which give rise to strange speculations. The fact that there are five hundred unemployed ministers seems to prove that these ministers, for some reason or other, cannot find employment. The further fact that there are five hundred churches in need of ministers demonstrates either that there is a lack of competent persons to fill the positions, or else the churches in question are not making very vigorous efforts to obtain pastors. Whatever may be the real cause of this seeming incongruity, it is evident that the cry for more churches is wholly illogical. If this is the record of Presbyterianism, the records of other branches of the Christian religion must be similar.—Telegram.

Events of the Week.

THE business on the Erie Canal is increasing.

WM. LLOYD GARRISON denounces Hayes's Southern policy.

WE have had a good deal of cloudy and rainy weather within the past week.

GENERAL GRANT is now doing up France, but he can't parlez-vous worth a cent.

GEO. L. FOX, the celebrated comic actor of Humpty Dumpty memory, is dead.

CONGRESS is overwhelmed with new bills, 1,000 having been presented already.

SENATOR MORTON is very low, and it is thought he cannot survive very much longer.

EDWIN ADAMS, the distinguished tragedian, after a long and painful illness, has passed away.

ONE hundred and thirty-seven Mormon converts arrived at this port on the steamer Idaho from Europe.

REV. MR. MILLER, has been condemned by the New Jersey Presbyterian Synod for writing heresies.

A TERRIBLE hurricane passed over the island of Curacao, in the West Indies. The loss of life was heavy and the damage to property fully $2,000,000.

WM. SCOTT, aged 77, a workman in the Rogers Locomotive Works, Patterson, N. J., was caught in the abdomen by a circular saw and so badly injured that he died.

THE striking cigar-makers held an enthusiastic meeting at Cooper Institute on Wednesday evening. They are determined to hold out till the manufacturers come to their terms.

THERE is much activity with the Democratic politicians of this city. The determination of John Morrissey to run for State Senator stirs up the active opposition of his fellow Democrats, Augustus Schell opposes him.

A PASSENGER train on the Utah Central Rail Road, near Farmington, was lifted from the track by a gale of wind, and two passenger cars and a baggage car were turned over and set on fire from the stoves. Several passengers were badly hurt.

THE Russians have gained still further victories over the Turks. In one battle the latter are reported to have lost four thousand killed and wounded. The siege of Plevna is also being prosecuted vigorously. The Russians have nearly surrounded that stronghold and are daily drawing their lines more and more closely. The final struggle, it would seem, cannot long be deferred. It is only a matter of time that the Turkish power will be compelled to be subservient to that of the Russian Bear.

A MOB of Christian Ku-Klux in Bell county, Texas, being filled with true Christian zeal, went at night to the house of Dr. J. S. Russell, an estimable citizen living in the southern part of the county. Leading him to think that a sick person required his services, they got him away from the house into the woods, where with leveled six-shooters, they compelled him to strip, and tied him. They then told him they knew he was an honest man and a good physician, but they would tolerate no Infidels in Bell county, and "by the help of God," they would put an end to his career as a Freethinker. They then gave him one hundred lashes on his bare back and turned him loose. They then stuck up a placard at the place, stating that if any more Infidel lectures were given in that section they would burn out and hang all who dared to do so; that they had fifty men to back them and were determined. This high-handed and outrageous proceeding will make the blood of Liberals in all parts of the country boil with indignation. It is a fair sample of the spirit which pervades the hearts of the supporters of orthodox Christianity, and shows how they are disposed to act when they feel at liberty to do all they wish. It is, however, getting too far along in the nineteenth century for such diabolical conduct to be approved of by the intelligent and order-loving people of this country. Such a storm of indignation will be raised as will make the devotees of superstition retreat to their dark hiding-places.)

CHAPTER VIII.

THE GREAT THEOLOGICAL PROBLEMS.—THE ORIGIN OF EVIL, THE NATURE OF GOD, AND THE FUTURE STATE.

THE ORIGIN OF EVIL.

'Tis not for lack of goodness, man,
The flames of hell are lit;
Hear a whole world's experience
Proclaim—"Tis lack of wit."

Ah! sighing over empires wrecked,
And mighty nations cowed in gloom?
Error is mortal and must die,
But Progress rises from its tomb.

EMMA TUTTLE.

THERE is a tendency of the human mind to accept its ignorance of a subject as involving a problem, and after research has shown that what it mistook for profundity was only vacuity, the devotee holds to his opinion with a tenacity inversely proportioned to the nothingness of its cause. At one time Astrology was believed to present problems the solution of which would unravel the grand enigma of the stars in their relation to man. In another age the Philosopher's Stone and Fountain of Youth were as eagerly sought. We now know that Astrology, the Philosopher's Stone, the Fountain of Youth, were not problems but chimeras. In like manner, moral problems have been imagined, and the welfare of man, not only in this life but in the future, made to depend on their solution. These imaginary problems have probably engaged more attention and discussion than those which have a reality.

Of these, the origin of good and evil, redemption, predestination, free-will, and the existence of Satan are examples, each having called forth the keenest thought, and many having served as controversy for ages, yet all actually being names standing for nothing.

Of these, none have received more attention than the existence of evil. Out of it have grown the overshadowing systems of theology, and the wonderful cosmogonies—childish dreams of infantile man—to account for the phenomena of Nature.

Man is placed in a beautiful world, where the grand and inspiring scenes of land and ocean, boundless forests and plains, the stormy grandeur of the sea, the dreary expanse of the prairie, constantly excite activity of thought and profoundest emotions. Nature with bountiful hand spreads happiness and enjoyment on every side. Man plants the grape, the corn, and olive, and genial showers and sunshine mature the harvest. Nature works expressly for him. The uncultured savage is impressed with the presence of a good Deity who governs for the express purpose of bestowing happiness on his children. He is met, however, by counter-phenomena, which it seems impossible to refer to a good being. The sunshine and shower, the abundant harvest, the exhilaration of health are mingled with the rush of storm, with swift lightnings and terrible thunders, prostrating in a moment the labors of centuries of repose; the parching drought withering and destroying the efforts of man; pestilence dark and fearful, and famine preying on friend and foe. There is an antagonism which cannot be referred to one source. There must exist an inferior or equal power delighting in subverting the designs of the good and benevolent one.

This belief is not of a tribe or race, but is common to all at a given stage of advancement. It is not a question of time, but of development. Although widely differing in the trappings which surround them, there is slight difference in the countless myths of the world. Viewing Nature through his animality, the savage beholds a reflection of himself, and, unbiassed by his geographical position or age, has arrived at similar conclusions. He is constantly impressed with this antagonism. Storm and zephyr, sunshine and cloud, health and disease, life and death, speak in unmistakable language, and as fear is stronger than love, the God of Evil receives by far the greater homage. He views with apathy the blessings poured forth by the Good Deity, but becomes frantic with fear and servilely prostrates himself in the dust at the approach of the Evil. Days of sunshine, bounteous harvests, years of health, are effaced by an hour of storm, the failure of a season, or a moment of pain.

Evil is imperfection. We are not to inquire why an all-wise, omnipotent Creator did not create perfectly in the beginning; we must accept the fact. Our improvements acknowledge Nature's imperfections. We would destroy noxious weeds, venomous reptiles, and insects, thereby lessening our toil and ensuring the harvest; we would abolish whirlwinds and earthquakes, equalize climates, demolish mountains, fill up rugged places, and drain marshes and lakes. Such to us are physical evils; to other children of Nature they are not. She loves the reptile of the slime as well as the eagle of the crag, and is equally attentive to their wants. She will perfect herself in due season, imperceptibly, without convulsion or revolution, while man must suffer the pains of his imperfect surroundings and organization. Out of this imperfection grew the evils of individual action. The savage, barely able to fashion a bow and spear, as little feels the impress of a higher law as the lion or tiger, and as well might we say to the latter, as it leaps on its victim, "Cease; it is wrong." Both act in accordance with their organization. It is just and honorable for the New Zealander to refresh himself at his cannibal repast according to his standard. The passions being first developed and unguided, there is, previous to the growth of the intellect, a period of great excess. This is overcome by growth, and, one by one, errors none the less necessary for being false are discarded. The mind matures as the limbs of an infant are enabled to walk. Progress is the evolution of inherent qualities. It is not derived from revelation or any foreign source. To understand a revelation there must be answering faculties in man's mind, else it would be unintelligible. A revelation of morals to a totally depraved being would be in an unknown tongue. Man is organically moral, else he could not have a moral idea; and, possessing innate moral capacities, he has no need of a revelation.

The first conception of evil originated in an imperfect knowledge of Nature, and the personification of this imperfect knowledge is the God of Evil.

The attainments of a later age, by indicating its origin, demolish the dogma. If the Good Deity is infinite in benevolence and power, and created everything as pleased him, he could not have created evil. Then, if evil exists, it must be self-existent—a supposition conflicting with the infiniteness of the Good Deity.

Evil is the friction of Nature's activities working for eternal good.

As man advances, he is torn less and less by the thorns against which he is thrust by ignorance, and we realize that the only divine life is that wherein he comprehends Nature and gladly does her bidding.

Evil can only be overcome by growth.

The Teed and Bennett Discussion.

I.—JESUS CHRIST IS NOT ONLY DIVINE, BUT IS THE LORD GOD, CREATOR OF HEAVEN AND EARTH.

MR. TEED'S FIRST LETTER.

MORAVIA, October 26, 1877.

MR. BENNETT, Dear Sir: There are three principal avenues through which knowledge enters the mind, which may be specially recognized during the course of this discussion—belief on the testimony of others, observation, and intuition. Belief on testimony is more or less reliable, depending upon the character of the witnesses. Belief founded upon testimony is faith. This constitutes by far the greatest proportion of direct knowledge, or whatsoever is called knowledge, now existing in the world.

Knowledge from the observation of facts and phenomena is comparatively limited. For instance, I may cite what are called scientific and religious knowledges. There are a few who investigate, calculate and discover; then follows a larger class who commit to the understanding the principles discovered, true or false, and they become teachers. The masses accept what they teach. This acceptance is through the exercise of faith. This is true of what is called science, and also of what is denominated theology. Faith may be divided for our present purpose into theological and scientific.

In Christendom there are two systems presented for our acceptance. One by theologians and the other by scientists. As a foundation for these two systems, we have the Bible, derived from some source, and the physical Universe, with its array of facts and phenomena from the author of nature. It is not my ambition to bolster up any system of religious belief, simply because it takes the Bible for a foundation, neither do I accept or reject any system of scientific belief simply because it conflicts, or seems to, with the apparently revealed purpose of God through the Bible. All inferences, explanations and interpretations of the Bible, and also of nature's manifestations, must pass for what they are worth. I am not bound by theological dogmas, and when my skepticism is awakened toward theological inferences it extends beyond into the domain of so-called scientific deductions, and I am compelled in justice to reject scientific dogmas. This is because the time has come to add to my faith knowledge. The uncertainty, contradictions and impossibilities openly revealed in the positions of the advocates of the theological and scientific systems have destroyed my faith in both, and I am now compelled to make my own deductions, through both channels of communication, that my knowledge may be founded upon the rock, and my faith or belief subject to such knowledge. This reverses the order, gives knowledge the predominance, and subordinates belief. I believe because I know. This will leave, at least on the side of the affirmative, modern theology entirely out of the question. This resolves the whole subject with the affirmative to the Bible itself as one source of information, nature and her revelations as another source. The honesty of purpose of those who wrote the Bible I do not question, nor the honesty of purpose of those who collate facts and make scientific deductions. In this particular I place them on an equality. From these two sources I shall derive my argument in favor of the proposition.

The masses of Christendom only know of Jesus Christ through theological and biblical channels. For our historical knowledge of him, his character and mission, we can depend only on the Bible.

What demand has the Bible upon the rational mind for a compliance with its teachings and a belief in its testimony? None at all, if it is in contradiction to the correct interpretation of nature, because all men know that the author of nature is the original and true source of all knowledge relating to the works of nature, and that whatsoever is in conflict with truthful inferences and deductions cannot be a revelation from the first great cause. The source whence is derived creation, with its form and functions, may be called the first great cause, or God. This cause is either abstract, structural without personality, or personal. It is knowable or unknowable.

Nature is either in process of development or complete. If incomplete, and in process of unfoldment into higher organic form, its true interpretation depends largely upon its prophetic declarations—its predictions of itself from what it is, and has been, to what it will be. Have these predictions been correctly rendered? If so, then the whole question of destiny and origin is settled. The scientific world has not as yet reached a conclusion in regard to the ultimate of creation. Those who depend upon a scientific deduction to settle the question await in suspense the scientific dictum. If the cause of all things is not known in the world, it is no argument against the possibility of such knowledge in future. All will admit that cause is adequate to the effect produced. If cause and effect are equal, no effect can be greater than the cause; neither can cause be greater than effect. Any other relation of cause and effect would unbalance the universe and the mind making the admission, and destroy all foundation for correct reasoning.

The physical universe is the result of operation. The potency capable of producing the physical universe must contain enough of function to equal all that it projects into being. Creation in its boundaries cannot exceed the confines of causation. If there is any process of reasoning by which these postulates can be refuted, I am anxious to see it developed.

Now, what are the teachings of the Bible in regard to cause and effect? It declares God, a personal being, to be the creator of all things. It declares him to be possessed of attributes, and states clearly the character of them. It declares that God has a form, and gives a clear statement of the kind of form. It says God is spirit. It also declares that he is body as well. Hence the character of the first cause and the origin and destiny of man are problems, the solutions of which are already reached. So far, then, the Bible has the advantage over "science." If these statements are true, and they can be proven, then the Bible differs from "scientific" claims in that its conclusions are "past finding out"—that is, they are already reached in regard to the character of the first cause and ultimate effect. It differs also from the claims of acknowledged science in this, that it is positive in its instruction concerning man's duty in acquiring a knowledge of the first great cause. The Bible throughout emphasizes the importance of knowing God and man's destiny. "Science," in that phase or school the most largely relied on, invariably leads to the implication that the first cause is "unknown and unknowable."

That Jesus Christ is the Lord God, and Creator of Heaven and earth; I claim on his own authority confirmed by the entire scriptures, and the revelations made to us through the operations of law in the physical universe. That the revelations of nature and scripture are in perfect agreement I shall positively demonstrate, and also that these conclusions harmonize with the postulates previously stated. As a final demonstration added to the corroborative testimony of the Bible, and the physical creation, deductions, physical in character, will be made as conclusive as the solution of a problem in mathematics, with the most absolute mathematical demonstration.

In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth. In the beginning of whom, or what? Let the first cause answer this question. To the mind belongs three general concepts especially worthy of consideration, time, space and quality. However indefinite the concept of duration or spacial immensity, we cannot eradicate from the thought the idea of a beginning and an ending as properties of duration, and the idea of center and circumference or limitation, as properties of space. These ideas are constituent factors of thought. Duration is marked by rhyme and rhythm—rhyme by duration itself, and rhythm denoting the end of one duration and the beginning of another. We say the sun is the center of the solar system, from this center or source are transmitted the energies generated in the sun which are communicated to the remotest boundaries of its influence. We do not hesitate to say that the sun is the source or beginning as to space of the forces generated there, and communicated as active energy towards the limitation of such influence. Who shall say to which of these concepts belongs the thought expressed in the first words of Genesis, whether to time, space, quality, or in fact, whether it does not belong to all three combined?

If the sun is the source or origin of a special kind or quality of power, it is the beginning, of that kind or quality; not the time beginning, but the spacial and qualitative beginning or source. Time, space and quality are correlates. We only know of time by its properties; duration, marked by events; space, by extension of substance; and the quality by variation of phenomena. The mind now begins to awake into an amplified concept of the beginning idea—a beginning or source as to time, as to space, and as to quality. In this the mind grows naturally and absolutely into a triune perception of creation, and it becomes an incorporated factor of man's entity. What was the special object, according to scripture, for which creation was instituted? Man. "And God said, let us make man in our image, after our likeness, and let them have dominion," etc. This dominion is universal. So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him. (this refers to man generically,) male and female created he them. Them refers to the individuals of the genus, not to men and women, because the man, male and female in the image and likeness of God, had not yet been segregated. It is therefore shown that this series of operations had for its end or aim the creation of man, and his exaltation to universal dominion.

Man had his beginning according to scripture statement in God—both in his image and after his likeness. We do not as yet find any date from which to reckon time.

Let us inquire more definitely into the character of this source of man's being.

"In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. And the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us" (1 John i, 14). "I am the beginning and the ending" (Rev. 1, 8; xxi, 6).

"And he is before all things, and by him all things consist, and he is the head of the body, the church: who is the beginning, the first-born from the dead" (Col. i, 17, 18).

"These things saith the Amen, the faithful and true witness, the beginning of the creation of God" (Rev. iii, 14). "And thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth" (Heb. i, 10). According to the Bible, the beginning in which man was created is the Lord Jesus Christ, for he is declared to be the express image of God, and man is declared to be created in this image—not after it nor according to it, but in it. We will now examine the account of this creation as given in Genesis. Genesis ii, 7, gives the account of the formation of the man. The name Adam does not yet occur. Then God planted a garden, and there he put the man whom he had formed, not to dress it and keep it, but he planted him there for the purpose of regenerating or reproducing man, to whom he should add, through the law of development, other attributes. "And the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he had formed" (Gen. ii, 8).

We discover in the account that from this seed the man that God put into the garden, there was caused to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight and good for food, the tree of Life, etc. In the 2d chapter, 15th verse, we discover the product, the man whom God takes and places in the garden to dress and to keep it. This completes the second series. "And the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and he slept; and he took one of his ribs and closed up the flesh instead thereof." "And the rib which the Lord God had taken from man, made he a woman and brought her unto the man" (verses 21, 22). This completes the third series. "And the Lord God said, Behold the man is become as one of us to know good and evil," etc. "So he drove out the man" (Gen. iii, 22, 24). This completes the fourth series. Herein is presented four historic and prophetic series of operations extending over a period of twenty-four thousand years, as I shall hereafter prove from the Bible. This is a presentation of one cycle or grand year. I will simply suggest here its coincidence with the cycle of the precession of the equinoxes as a physical phenomenon.

In the foregoing I have simply outlined my work. I do not claim to have presented any proof of the proposition. I have stated some of the claims the Bible makes for itself. If I cannot show them to coincide with the revelations of nature or physical science I fail in my object.

Respectfully, CYRUS ROMULUS R. TEED.

The Rochester Liberal Congress.

The First Annual Congress of the National Liberal League convened at Rochester, N. Y., Friday, Oct. 26, 1877, at 10:30 A. M. After the meeting had been called to order the Rev. S. M. Mann, of the Unitarian Church of Rochester, stated that probably those present were united neither upon politics nor religion. He approved the principles set forth, but doubted the wisdom of the methods proposed. The delegates would find Rochester a beautiful city. It only needed the influences of Liberalism to convert it into a paradise. He tendered, on behalf of the Committee on Arrangements, the use of the hall to the League.

On taking the chair Mr. Abbot thanked the Committee on behalf of the League. There was a propriety, he said, in the selection of Rochester as the place for the holding of the first annual congress, because it was the only city in the State that had completely secularized its schools. He was also thankful to Mr. Mann for his cordial expression of opinion. Though the Convention might not be wise, he believed in the necessity of free discussion upon the subject. He concluded his remarks by thanking the convention.

The minutes of the last meeting were adopted as printed.

Mr. Green, of Salamanca, presented the following resolutions:

Following the precedent of the Centennial Congress of Liberals, be it

Resolved, That the proceedings of this congress shall be governed by the rules of parliamentary law.

Resolved, That in order to secure the prompt and orderly transaction of the important business of this congress, all resolutions, after being read, shall be referred to the Committee on Resolutions without debate.

Resolved, That the general order of business shall be to devote the evenings of Friday and Saturday and the morning, afternoon, and evening of Sunday to addresses, essays, and free conference, as shall be announced by the President from session to session; but that the morning and afternoon sessions shall be devoted to the special business of this congress, which shall be taken up and disposed of in the following order:

First—Appointment of Committee on Membership.

Second—Opening address by the President.

Third—Report of Committee on Membership.

Fourth—Apportionment of Committees on Nominations, on Resolutions, and on Finance.

Fifth—Report of the Directors for the past year.

Sixth—Report of the Treasurer.

Seventh—Report of the Committee on Nominations, and election of officers for the ensuing year.

Eighth—Report of the Committee on Resolutions, and free debate on the proposed political platform.

Ninth—Report of the Committee on Nominations as to a Presidential ticket for 1880.

Tenth—Report of the Committee on Finance.

Eleventh—Miscellaneous business.

Twelfth—Free conference, short speeches, etc.

Professor Toohy, J. W. Truesdale, and E. M. Sellon were then appointed as a Committee on Membership.

A communication from the executive committee of the North American Union Radical Association was read. Enclosed was a copy of the platform and a resolution asking for the appointment of a committee to make arrangements for a general meeting in 1878 of all Liberal Leagues.

At this stage of the proceedings, the Chairman delivered an address upon "The New Conscience Party in Politics." He opened by saying that there existed a painful lack of conscience in business, in politics, and in life. There were those who believed that the time had come when conscience should assert itself and something should be done to right the prevalent wrongs. The three great national duties which had been neglected were: first, total separation of Church and State; second, national protection for national citizens; third, universal education on the basis of universal suffrage.

These three points formed the real principles of the League and were proposed for adoption. The speaker in analyzing the first proposition said that the Constitution was strictly secular. Until 1833 Massachusetts was taxed for the support of the Church, but the tendency had been toward entire separation of Church and State. This idea was still gaining ground. There were, however, those who believed that this principle was wrong, and demanded the recognition of God, Jesus, and the Bible. To carry out this principle, a party was organized in 1863. Conventions were held all over the country, and it was declared that no Atheist should hold office. The strength of this party lies in the desire of the clergy for power. It closed the gates of the Centennial Exhibition on the Sabbath. This measure was indorsed by the State Universalist Association of Massachusetts. The speaker also referred to the action of the Episcopal Convention, which tabled a resolution sympathizing with the efforts to separate Church and State in England. At the same time other resolutions were passed that declared the invalidity of marriage ceremonies not performed in accordance with Church views, and that the Church should mold and educate the people. Another example of this was the introduction of resolutions by Mr. Blaine, in Congress, that prohibited any State from making laws in regard to religious corporations, and at the same time established the reading of the Bible in the public schools. The resolution only lacked two votes to make it a law, every Republican favoring and every Democrat opposing it. Had it passed, the divine authority of the Bible would have been recognized. All ecclesiastical bodies were organizing to prevent the advance of liberal thought, and the time was not far distant when the Protestants would be as closely combined as the Catholics. The making of Sabbatarian laws was an evidence of this, and it was necessary to make a protest against such steps. The object of the League was to prevent a union of Church and State. In regard to the taxation of Church property, Mr. Abbot said that if exemption was increased the country would be driven into bankruptcy. In that case it would confiscate the Church property as had been done in Mexico.

As to the second proposition, the speaker said that national protection for all citizens included protection for women, and black as well as white men. Under the present laws the state only protected its citizens. To show the absurdity of this he argued at considerable length. He spoke in favor of woman suffrage, discussing the condition of the freedmen in the South who had no protection except that offered by the State. The withdrawal of the troops from the Southern States was not the fault of President Hayes, but it would be the fault of the people if they did not attempt to remedy this defect in our laws.

As to compulsory education, Mr. Abbot contended that every State should maintain public schools and require every child to be educated. It was not necessary that the child attend the public schools, so long as it was educated.

Mr. Crandon moved that the Chairman appoint a committee of five on nominations.

The Chair appointed as such committee, D. G. Crandon, William Barnsdall, William Dudgeon, Charles Roth, and John Verity.

The Chair was also ordered to appoint a committee on resolutions, which were as follows:

H. L. Green, W. S. Bell, Morris Einstein, A. B. Brown, Moses Hays.

John Verity and Mr. Foster were appointed as a committee to pass through the audience and make a collection.

The report of the Directors of the League for the past year was then read by the Secretary, W. H. Hamlin. The report was accepted.

The report of the Treasurer, J. H. A. Wilcox, was also read by the Secretary. The receipts were $445.10; the expenditures $115.75; balance on hand October 21st, $329.35.

The report was accepted and the accounts referred to the Finance Committee for audit. The Convention then took a recess until 2 o'clock.

THE AFTERNOON SESSION.

was opened at 2 o'clock by the chairman.

After some delay the Committee on finance reported to the effect that the treasurer's count was correct. This was accepted and the committee discharged.

The Secretary read the names of the President, Vice-Presidents, Secretary and Committees of the National Liberal League as elected at Philadelphia in 1876, and they were elected for the ensuing year.

The Committee on Membership presented a partial report, which would be completed at a future time.

THE committee on resolutions presented the following:

First—Resolved, That all those Christians who declare that "this is a Christian government," and that the government as such is bound to favor, promote, and propagate what they term "unsectarian Christianity," are drifting consciously or unconsciously into a dangerous and wicked conspiracy against the religious liberties of the American people, striking a deadly blow at that separation of Church and State on which the government is founded, and evincing a reprehensible contempt for the equal rights of Christians and non-Christians under the United States constitution.

Second—Resolved, That the success of the National Reform Association to "put God into the Constitution," and to incorporate the common creed of Christianity into the fundamental law of the land, would be the blackest treason and crime of the nineteenth century; because, under a government sacredly pledged by the Declaration of Independence to the equal liberties and equal rights of all men, it would covertly but effectively unite Church and State, to the total destruction of those equal rights and the total ruin of free institutions.

Third—Resolved, That the government of the United States is not a Christian but a secular government; that it would be a piece of flagrant iniquity and injustice for the government as such to patronize either sectarian or unsectarian Christianity; and that the treaty with Tripoli, approved by George Washington in 1793, did but recognize and proclaim the righteous equality of all citizens as to religious rights and liberties when it solemnly declared: "The government of the United States is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion."

Fourth—Resolved, That every motive of national patriotism and of personal self-respect calls loudly upon the Liberals of the United States to defend the cause of secular government against the insidious, multiplying, and formidable dangers which threaten to overwhelm it; that the time for apathy and submission to ecclesiastical encroachments has gone by, and the time for activity, courage, and lawful resistance to these encroachments has arrived; and that the great principle of the total separation of Church and State, on which the national government is founded, needs now to be defended by stronger and more explicit constitutional guarantees and by the determined support of all true patriots.

Fifth—Resolved, That no government has a right to claim supreme allegiance from its subjects except in return for direct and efficient protection in their equal civil, political, and religious rights; that it cannot without absurdity and injustice exact such allegiance while it shirks the duty and responsibility of affording such protection; and that any people which, through its government, persists in repudiating this reciprocal obligation of allegiance and protection forfeits all title to an honorable place among the nations of the earth.

Sixth—Resolved, That in the gradual development of the United States as a nation, it has become necessary that the national government should cease to present the humiliating spectacle of refusing to protect United States citizens at home, while yet it recognizes its duty to protect them in foreign lands, and of forbidding the separate states to claim the supreme allegiance of their own citizens, while yet it obliges the latter to look for personal protection to their own separate states alone; and that the United States constitution ought to be so amended as to rid the nation of this humiliation and disgrace.

Seventh, Resolved, That among the most precious rights in which the national citizen ought to be protected by the national government is the right to enjoy his independent opinions respecting religion, no matter what they may be, on equal terms with all other citizens before the law; that all state patronage of religion or of "unsectarian Christianity," so called, unavoidably casts odium and disrepute upon the minority on account of their honest thought, is intended to do so, and is gallingly unjust; that we protest energetically against the "clerical policy" which, by exempting church property from taxation, taxes every man for the support of the churches, and which, by requiring Bible-reading in the public schools, taxes every man for the support of a religion to that extent established by law; and that we demand national protection against the injustice of this oppressive and outgrown "clerical policy."

Eighth—Resolved, That we affirm the paramount duty of the national government to guarantee and effectually maintain by its own immediate authority the equal civil, political and religious rights of all national citizens, whether white or black, male or female, rich or poor, literate or illiterate, Christian or non-Christian; that this duty ought to be discharged through the United States Constitution, and not by the United States army, unless there is overt rebellion against the national government; and that we therefore approve the southern policy of President Hayes's administration, provided it is supplemented by adoption of the principle for which we contend—national protection for national citizens in their fundamental personal rights.

Ninth—Resolved, That public intelligence is the sole possible foundation for a free and stable republic; that the right to a good elementary education belongs to every child in the country, and ought to be protected by the national government as a measure necessary to the nation's prosperity and continued existence; that the only way to protect this right efficiently is to maintain every where good schools at the public expense; that, since it is confessedly right for a state to require its various towns and cities to maintain such schools, it is self-evidently no less right for the nation to require each state to maintain an efficient public system; that the United States Constitution ought to be so amended as to recognize and discharge this national duty; and that the crying evils of ignorant suffrage, especially at the south and in our large cities, forbid delay in establishing strictly universal suffrage and strictly universal education at the same time.

Tenth—Resolved, That public schools cannot be maintained in justice to all, unless they are confined exclusively to secular instruction; that to teach religion or sustain public worship in them unavoidably infringes on the reserved rights of conscience in some class or classes of the community; that nobody is wronged, if nothing is taught in positive violation of these rights; that the mere omission to teach religion where the teaching of it would be patent injustice is a wrong to no one; and that the self-evident rule of justice in the matter is briefly—secular schools in a secular state.

Eleventh—Resolved, That, postponing to future conventions the addition of such planks on other issues as future events may render necessary or expedient, the National Liberal League now adopts, as its political platform for the Presidential campaign of 1880, these three great principles of overshadowing importance:

"First—Total separation of Church and State, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution; including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

Second—National protection for national citizens, in their equal civil, political and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

Third—Universal education the basis of universal suffrage in this secular republic: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education."

Twelfth—Resolved, That we respectfully but earnestly urge upon all who favor this platform, regardless of their opinions on other subjects, to cooperate with the National Liberal League in all practicable ways, and especially to organize everywhere, if possible, local auxiliary leagues for vigorous local agitation in behalf of the common cause.

Thirteenth—Resolved, That the members of the executive committee of the National Liberal League, to whom the supervision of local organization in their respective States and Territories is intrusted by the constitution, are requested to prosecute this most important work as rapidly and energetically as possible, in order to secure a large delegate representation at our next annual congress, and thus command the public influence which the magnitude and justice of our cause deserve; and they are hereby authorized to issue a call for a State or Territorial Liberal League in their respective fields, whenever in their judgment a sufficient number of Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues has been organized to render such a step useful.

Fourteenth—Resolved, That we receive with the most cordial appreciation and reciprocation the very friendly address of the National Executive Committee of the Union of Radicals; that we tender them our sincerest thanks for their valuable cooperation in the past and their pledge of still further cooperation in the future; that, in the opinion of this Congress, the basis of the National Liberal League would be narrowed, and not broadened, by attempting to accomplish all reforms at once, and by thereby multiplying causes of disagreement when concentration of effort in defense of liberty is the supreme necessity of the Liberal cause; that we regard the measures proposed by this League as at once simple, comprehensive, transcendently important, and certain, when fairly understood by the general public, to rally an immense number of the most intelligent voters of the country to their support; that we deem it the part of practical wisdom to make our platform so broad as to command the sympathies of all thorough Liberals, rather than to narrow both platform and party by taking up issues on which Liberals themselves are divided; and that the proposed project of a joint congress of all Liberal and Radical organizations in the year 1878 is hereby referred to the board of directors, with full authority to act in the premises as circumstances shall in their judgment render advisable.

The Resolutions were discussed separately, several amendments were made, but they were adopted nearly in accordance with the above draft.

Mrs. Amy Post, at the conclusion of the report, said she was astonished that no women were named in the list of officers. She thought some should be added.

The chairman then said that the reason why no names of women were added was because, in correspondence with the Liberal female thinkers, they had refused to act with those interested in the National Liberal League.

It was then moved that the names of Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson, Mrs. Amy Post, and Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton be added to the list of Vice-Presidents.

General business being in order, Professor Rawson, of New York, read a letter from the Society of Humanity of that city, commending the work of the Convention and expressing great sympathy with its object. Mr. Verity moved that the thanks of the Congress be sent to the Society of Humanity for their letter.

Mr. Verity said that he thought that Christians did not understand the claims of Liberals and Atheists. When Liberals and Atheists demanded liberties, they did not require the government to propagate their ideas. They did demand that they be allowed to believe as they pleased—the same rights which all Christians preached. He did not want all men to believe as he believed, but he did contend that the honest ideas of an honest man should be respected.

The Chairman read a telegram from the German Association of Free Thinkers of Buffalo. It was moved that a proper recognition of this courtesy be made.

Several delegates in the Convention spoke of the necessity of having Liberals subscribe for those periodicals whose object was the propagation of Liberal ideas.

Mr. J. Ick Evans, of Toronto, extended a sympathetic greeting to the Convention from the Liberal Society of that city. He was agreeably surprised to see that Liberalism had made such headway in the United States, as the number present showed. He was greatly interested in the work, and should do all in his power to promote its interests.

After some further unimportant remarks the Convention adjourned until half-past 7.

THE EVENING SESSION.

Professor A. L. Rawson, of New York, was introduced. His subject was "Compulsory Education." He said that this subject of compulsory education was rather a serious one. If we should invent a patent medicine and ask every one to use it whether or no, we should object. We may consider the subject of Compulsory Education in the same light. Every man should be allowed to consider the subject and not prejudice himself in favor or against it. There was a misconception in regard to the strength of the Liberals. They were like grains of sand. Their number was very great but they were not united. When solidified they would be a force that could be effectively used. The believers in Liberalism should become as one to fight against orthodoxy.

The great work of education was receiving attention everywhere. The attention given to it by Liberals was creating alarm in the ranks of theology. There were good men in the church and we should respect them for their belief: at the same time we are not compelled to have them as teachers for our children.

The speaker continued for the space of one hour in a similar line of remarks which were well received.

Dr. T. L. Brown, of Binghamton, next delivered a spirited discourse on the Ethics of Secular Education.

Elder Frederick W. Evans, of the Shaker Society at Mount Lebanon, closed the exercises of the evening with a speech of half an hour or more on the nature of the American government. He insisted that our government is an infidel government, and that it was established on an infidel foundation, and that it was infidel principles that must sustain it in its purity. He warmly commended the objects and actions of the Liberal League and said he was with them heart and soul. He approved of its platform; he was opposed to the exclusion of church property from taxation; he was opposed to putting the Jewish tutelary deity or the Christian God into the Constitution; he was opposed to the employment of chaplains by the government and to a union of church and state in any way.

SATURDAY MORNING.

Elizur Wright, of Boston, led off with a speech of moderate length, giving reminiscences of the old Liberty party, and the "Free Soil" party, and closed by naming this movement the "Free Soul party" which was received with much favor.

The Committee on Nominations reported in favor of the inexpediency of making a nomination for the presidency of the United States at the present time. Prof. Rawson made a motion that the report be accepted, and the committee discharged and the matter referred back to the League. Carried. A debate was then opened upon the question of making a nomination at the present time.

D. M. Bennett spoke perhaps two minutes in favor of making a nomination at the present time, believing that with the platform we had to stand upon, with a good leader to rally around, we could make a stronger advance in the warfare we had to wage with the ecclesiastical and political forces we had to contend with than without. He saw no objection to making the nominations now, and of being able to present ourselves before the country, not only with a good platform, but with good candidates to stand upon it. He read a short letter from a Western correspondent approving the nomination of Col. Robert G. Ingersoll for President and some respectable Spiritualist for Vice-President. The name of Ingersoll was received with applause.

H. L. Green opposed a nomination now on the ground of inexpediency and of its being premature. He thought the Convention had done a good work, had agreed upon an excellent platform, and that it would be better to defer the nominations till another year.

Dr. T. L. Brown spoke in favor of nominating now. He said we had done a good work; a good degree of enthusiasm prevailed, the times were auspicious, and we could do no better than to make nominations at the present time.

A. B. Brown, of Worcester, Mass., John Verity, of Boston, Prof. Toohey, of Chelsea, Mass., and Mr. Harwood opposed the nominations. L. C. Harding, of Orleans Co., warmly favored making nominations, while Elizur Wright, Mr. Hayes, Judge McCormick, of Pa., and Morris Einstein spoke in opposition. Mrs. Sparks made a short speech, taking the Convention to task for not giving women a more prominent place in the movement, and berating men as tyrants and oppressors. Her remarks were not well received even by the ladies. After a few remarks from Mrs. Woodruff, the Convention adjourned.

AFTERNOON MEETING.

Nominations further considered.

Mr. Verity favored deferring the nomination for the presidency until five hundred or at least three hundred Liberal Leagues were added to the fraternity.

H. L. Green, again opposed making nominations now. After some amendments had been voted down the Convention voted to defer nominations for another year.

General business resumed.

Mr. Abbot urged the completion of organization. He also made an explanation in reference to a resolution passed by the Liberal Congress last year in reference to placing the words "In God we trust" upon some of the coins issued from the mint. He exonerated the superintendent of the mint from the charge that was made against him and placed it upon Congress where it belonged.

Dr. T. L. Brown made a short speech.

H. L. Green proposed discussing the platform. A gentleman, name unknown, followed.

A dispatch was read from J. P. Mendum, Boston, stating that Mr. Seaver had been rudely attacked upon the street, and that they would be unable to attend the Convention.

Among those who spoke were Mr. Harwood, Mr. Oliver, Judge McCormick, warmly approving toleration towards all shades of belief, Dr. T. L. Brown, Mr. Hunt, and Prof. Toohey at considerable length, giving several anecdotes.

A letter on filiation and fraternity was read from the Turn-Verein of Rochester.

Prof. Toohey introduced a resolution in favor of extending aid and patronage to the Liberal and reform journals of the country, calling them by name, and he also spoke in favor of organization.

Elizur Wright, in a speech of some length, complimented the Boston Investigator and also spoke very warmly in favor of the Index, and urged that steps be taken to place it firmly upon its feet.

H. L. Green mentioned THE TRUTH SEEKER, and said that paper should be mentioned with those making urgent efforts in the good work of progress and reform. He spoke of the industry of its editor, and referred to the numerous books, tracts, etc., which he had brought out, recommending that the same should be patronized.

Mr. Verity spoke of the work that should be performed by local leagues, and made some strictures upon the League in Boston.

Mrs. Otis defended the Boston League.

Mr. Abbot made some remarks upon the labors and duties of local leagues.

Mr. Green followed upon the same subject.

Mr. Barnsdall, of Titusville, made some enthusiastic remarks on organization and efficient work.

Mrs. Amy Post made a few remarks, followed by other speakers.

SATURDAY EVENING.—REGULAR SPEECHES.

W. S. Bell, of New Bedford, Mass., led off with a very pleasant and interesting speech of half an hour on the "Questions of the Day." His remarks were well received.

Mr. Abbot made some remarks on donations and relative subjects.

Prof. Toohey, spoke for nearly an hour upon the relation of the Reformation toward the reforms of the present time, when he was taken ill and was compelled to leave the platform. He was subsequently taken to the hospital.

J. H. Harter, of Auburn, N. Y., made a few spirited remarks on the subjects of temperance, anti-capital punishment, and Freethought. He gave the composition of his "Own Temperance Society," and made some humorous observations in connection therewith, which afforded the audience considerable amusement.

Mr. Abbot made some remarks in favor of a free platform, and defended the Liberal League against insinuations to the contrary.

Dr. T. L. Brown was called for and made remarks in defense of Materialism.

Judge McCormick spoke at considerable length in favor of Spiritualism.

A Christian (an Irishman), who had disputed some statements made by the last speaker, was called upon the platform. He made a few remarks in defense of his belief, and amused the audience very much.

Prof. Rawson followed with the recital of his story about the shrines of two donkeys in Palestine, where the bones of those animals had been covered with stones. A shrine, or chapel had been built at each, and numerous devotional persons had gone to them to perform their sacred and religious rites, to say their prayers, and be cured of their ills and maladies. The point was, the stones were supposed to cover the bones of departed saints, whose memory was most sacred, when, in fact, they were only the bones of donkeys.

SUNDAY MORNING, 10:30.

An able and elaborate paper on "Taxation" was read by Elizur Wright.

It was on the programme that the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER should follow with a paper on the "Bible in Common Schools," but as the audience had been seated an hour and a half, and the dinner hour had arrived, he deemed it unreasonable to keep them another hour to listen to him. He therefore proposed that all should go to dinner, hoping there would be an opportunity for him to address them in the afternoon or evening. It turned out, however, that the time was allowed to be so occupied by those who had spoken before, or who neither belonged to the League nor were delegates from any body of Liberals, that no available opportunity was offered him. To those of his friends who were disappointed at not hearing him he would say that the remarks he would have made will probably appear in these columns at an early day.

SUNDAY, 2:30 P. M.—Prof. Toohey having sufficiently recovered, delivered another address of an hour in continuation of his discourse of the previous evening.

Mrs. E. L. Watson, "trance speaker," from Titusville, Pa., was the next speaker. She made some preliminary remarks of a few minutes, explanatory of her style of speaking under spirit control. While a hymn was being sung by some of her Spiritualistic friends, she took her seat and passed, as is claimed, under spirit control, after which she arose and with closed eyes addressed the audience in a rapid, earnest and vehement manner for fully an hour and a half. The topic of her discourse seemed to be in favor of the investigations of science, the advance of mental liberty and of spirit influence. When this discourse was finished it was nearly dark, but several ten-minute speeches were made by different persons.

SUNDAY EVENING.—Elder F. W. Evans led off with a discourse on the woman question and her connection with theology and our social system. He spoke almost in words of ridicule of the monstrosity of three males forming one God, and of the incongruity of the idea with the male and female elements of the human race and the entire animal and vegetable kingdom. He declared the true deity as much female as male, and asserted that Jehovah was only a tutelary divinity of the Jews, and was not the true God over all. He gave reminiscences of his own experience, of his connection with the Freethinkers of New York in the days of Robert Dale Owen, Frances Wright, George H. Evans, and others; that he was an infidel when he went to the Shakers, where he found the community principle, fraternity, equality of the sexes, and other elements with which he easily agreed. He enlarged upon the principles of Shakerism in comparison with the dogmas of orthodoxy. His address was listened to attentively.

The closing, and probably the most acceptable address of the entire three days' proceedings, was delivered by Mrs. Clara Neyman, of this city and member of the Society of Humanity. She is a German lady of culture, but speaks English very well. She represented to a certain extent the Radical German element of this city as well as other parts of the country. She said the Germans of the country partook of the spirit of their brothers in the Fatherland in the matter of Liberalism and of kindred subjects, but until very recently they had not given their ideas to the American people. There was no question which so aroused the Germans as the religious question. They were very enlightened and enthusiastic on this point. This was because while other nations were studying politics, German philosophers contemplated the problems of life. Sometimes they might have taken wild flights, but they gave birth to the scientific method. The Scientist became the complement of the Philosopher. Reflections on philosophical subjects emancipated the people from theological prejudices.

The intelligent German had outgrown a long time ago the absurd ideas of superstition. In this respect the Americans were far behind. They had studied no book but the Bible—a book that contained more errors than any other, etc. A considerable portion of her lecture was a consideration of what should be the aim and labor of Liberals and Freethinkers in the future.

We were so well pleased with her discourse that we will take pleasure in soon laying it before our readers. And in this connection we would express the hope which the Liberals of the country, both German and American, have to encourage them in this talented lady. She has recently passed a number of years in Europe and in philosophical and scientific studies, and being almost an enthusiast in the truths pertaining to science, philosophy and the higher life that men and women ought to live, she proposes soon to take the platform and devote a portion of her time in the dissemination of what she believes to be the grandest and most important truths in existence. She will assuredly add that element of geniality and enthusiasm to our cause that it needs, and we regard her as a decidedly valuable acquisition to the list of our public lecturers. She speaks fluently both the German and English, and we bespeak for her a welcome greeting from all the Liberals of America.

Short speeches of five or ten minutes each from Mr. Verity, Mr. Evans of Toronto, Dr. Brown, Mr. Bretzner of Mt. Lebanon, Mrs. Watson, Mr. Morse, and others closed the proceedings at nearly 11 P. M.

The attendance upon the Convention by those from a distance as well as by those in the vicinity was very respectable. A portion of the time the large hall was well filled. The enthusiasm and general harmony that prevailed was cheering and reassuring. The moral effects of the Convention upon the entire country must be very considerable. In the criticisms that may be made in respect to the conduct of the Convention it might be urged that the speakers were allowed to take too wide a range, embracing too far a defense of Materialism on the one hand and of Spiritualism on the other. It would have been more proper had the discussion been directed to the immediate objects of the meetings and had a limit been placed to the amount of time consumed by the speakers, thus preventing some from engrossing an undue share of the time while others, more modest, were unable to be heard from. It would seem, too, that a preference should have been shown more to delegates and members in place of those not connected with the movement. But upon the whole, the work performed was most commendable and effective for good.

In the theology of India is found much that is metaphysical, much that is ethereal or spiritual, much of mystery and mysticism, much that is lofty and elevated, much that is grand, much that is poetic, and also much that is obscure and much that is absurd. Here is found the material that has proved a sufficient basis upon which to build subsequent systems of theology. Here is the source of nearly all the dogmas, rites, sacraments, symbols, and sacred observances which have been woven into more modern systems of religion. Here is found the original doctrine of the "Trinity" which has within the last eighteen centuries been such an important item in the stock in trade of the system of theology called Christianity. Here is found the doctrine that gods could cohabit with virgins and produce a progeny half divine and half human. Here is found that it had been believed for thousands of years that the son of the great god Brahma came into the world to teach the mysteries of heaven, to suffer and die an ignominious death for the happiness and salvation of the human race.

Their trinity consisted of Brahma the creator, Vishnu the preserver, and Siva the destroyer. It was held that Vishnu had been incarnated many, different times, and that during these incarnations the most sage lessons had been taught to the children of men. One of the most important incarnations of Vishnu was in the person of Christna, who, it is believed, came into the world some twenty-five hundred or three thousand years ago. It was believed that Vishnu held peculiar sexual intercourse with a virgin named Devanagay, and that in due time she brought forth the eighth Avatar or incarnation; that Nanda, tyrant of Madura, actuated by Ravana, the prince of the evil spirits called Rackshassas, attempted to destroy the young child, and that the virgin was removed in a miraculous manner beyond his reach, where the child grew up to manhood, when he commenced his mission. He drew around him a small band of disciples or followers to whom he gave many lessons of humility, morality, and godliness. He showed his love towards his disciples by washing their feet and various acts of a similar nature. He led a blameless life; he performed many miracles, making astonishing cures, and even raising the dead. He was noted for his amiability and mild disposition. He was a great favorite with his followers, and especially with the females, who regarded him as their special deity, and to him they paid their earnest devotions and their most devout adoration. At length the machinations of the evil spirit seemed to prevail over the son of God, Christna, and he was taken by his enemies and was put to death near the river Ganges by crucifixion on a tree.

India never had a demi-god to whom such great homage was paid as to Christna. The people loved him for his mildness and goodness, for the excellence of the lessons taught, and the lovely disposition he always displayed. This Savior was believed in from five hundred to fifteen hundred years before the dawn of Christianity upon the earth. The similarity between the Indian demi-god and the one which was said to have figured conspicuously at a much later period in Palestine is most marked. One only, however, could be the original, and that was he of India. He of Palestine was the copy.

Among the great lights and teachers in the Hindoo religion was the great lawgiver, Menu, the reputed author of the "Institutes," which embraced a mass of instructions and laws bearing upon nearly all subjects, political, social, and religious. I would be glad to give you specimens of the high morals and good sense taught by Menu, but I am already detaining you too long and I must hasten on to the consideration of other subjects. Considering the age in which Menu lived he was probably the greatest lawgiver and teacher the world has known. The date of his existence is variously placed from three to five thousand years ago. It is extremely probable that he was the prototype or original of the lawgiver Menes of Egypt, Minos of Greece, and Moses of Palestine. We have many illustrations of the habit that prevailed in ancient times of one system of religion borrowing ideas, characters, and incidents from other systems, and the case of Menu is a strong one in point. He was older than either of his copies, and the palm of originality must assuredly be awarded to him. He was the pattern, the others the copies.

The Bennett-Teed Discussion.

It will be seen that our opponent, Cyrus Romulus R. Teed, commences in this number the discussion which is to take place between us, to be followed up from week to week till completed. We only hope it may prove as interesting to our readers, generally, as did the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. Those who are not subscribers and wish to read this discussion from the commencement will do well to subscribe at once. They can enter the list for six months for one dollar or they can avail themselves of the offer we make to trial subscribers—two months for twenty cents. How large shall our list of trial subscribers be?

Card to the Public.

MORAVIA, N. Y., OCT. 29, 1877.

The discussion to take place as announced in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 27th ult. does not grow out of an ambition to acquire public notoriety, nor from any love of discussion for its own sake. Neither does it proceed from a challenge originally made by myself to Infidels, Freethinkers, and others.

Infidelity, embracing Materialists and Spiritualists, openly, boldly, and defiantly challenges Christianity to meet it in the discussion of certain questions pertaining to Christian life and doctrine. In my call for a convention I accepted the challenge which had been given by Infidelity, and Mr. Bennett appears to be the only bold man to come to the front in support of the party making the boast.

In the diversity of opinion entertained in regard to the great questions now agitating the religious and scientific world, I can discern no well defined lines of demarcation between theology and science.

Theology is in conflict with itself. The foremost theologians of the age are step by step yielding to the foremost scientific dogmas. Not by rejecting the Bible and Jesus as a foundation for religious faith, but by substituting new religious statements for the old inferences and interpretations.

Theologians are not agreed in regard to the conclusions derived from their investigation of the scriptures. An equal degree of discord obtains with the anti-Bible and anti-Christian classes upon the subjects and conclusions that lead them to oppose Christianity.

Theologians mostly agree on one point. That Jesus sustains in some way an important relation to man's future, and generally that through him salvation is attainable. The opposition are agreed upon one point, that in no way does man's destiny depend upon Jesus more than any other man who may declare important truths to the world. Upon this agreement they united to destroy the Christian idea. I am in no sense upholding modern theology. I am in no sense opposing true science.

If there is to be a conflict between two opposing powers or principles, the lines of distinction must be clear, perfectly defined, and the two positions made manifest to the world, that the world may judge in the matter. These points are important, that it may be known what the fight is about. I aim to present first the claims of the Bible in regard to the claim made in the proposition, that Jesus is God, etc., and the conclusion it arrives at, and then to compare these claims and conclusions with the facts and phenomena of law, and present in bold relief the two conclusions, and see if they are not in perfect concord. If they fail to agree, then I lose my case.

Respectfully, CYRUS ROMULUS R. TEED.

MR. J. S. TEED, of Moravia, N. Y., is an authorized agent to take subscriptions for THE TRUTH SEEKER in Central and Western New York.

WE ARE pleased to receive so goodly a number of names as trial subscribers. Several friends have kindly sent in twenty-five names, and some more. We hope many more names will come in. As we propose to give THE TRUTH SEEKER from Nov. 1st to Jan. 1st for the small sum of twenty cents, hundreds and thousands of names ought to be sent in. Will not our friends generally make an effort in this direction?

Letter from Miss Wixon.

FALL RIVER, MASS., OCT. 25th, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT—Kind Friend: Please accept my thanks for a copy of your late publication—"Christianity and Infidelity or the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion."

This discussion is argumentative, exhaustive and convincing of the errors of Christianity and firmly establishes the truth of Free Thought. It is really the best thing of the kind I have ever seen, and will doubtless have a wide circulation.

Every Free Thinker and Liberal minded individual should possess a copy, and also every Christian the world over, for it is not only an "eye opener," but contains much useful and valuable information, and shows deep research and careful study as well as wise application on the part of the opponents of Christianity, and I am very glad you have put the whole matter in book form, so that it may be preserved, not only for this time but for coming generations.

Your publications, all that I have seen, are excellent, timely and appropriate, deserving extensive circulation, especially as they are placed at such a low price as to bring them within the reach of all.

I am very truly yours, SUSAN H. WIXON.

The Opinion of a Southern Lady.

The "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion; or, Christianity and Infidelity," is worthy a careful reading by every person, no matter what the creed or opinion. It is a book of 550 pages, containing the most terse and exhaustive arguments for and against Christianity that have ever been condensed into book form. Even those not particularly interested in these subjects will find a peculiar interest in following the arguments of these learned men through the pages of this book. The great ability and scholarly research of both parties to the discussion holds the attention of the reader from the first to the last. So many important facts of history are brought to substantiate the arguments from all authorities, that the book is essentially valuable as a work for reference. The Christian side of the question is very ably sustained by the Rev. G. H. Humphrey, of the Presbyterian Church, New York, who finds in D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, a "foeman worthy of his steel." They start out with three propositions to debate—to wit:

I.—Did unbelievers in the Bible do as much for American Independence as the believers in it?

II.—Has Infidelity done as much as Christianity to promote Learning and Science?

III.—Is there a stronger probability that Infidelity is true than that the Bible is divine?

Humphrey leads off with the affirmative of the first proposition by telling shots and facts, with canister, grape and shrapnel, which would seem to annihilate any hope of a successful refutation; but Bennett rises like a sleeping giant above the smoke and din of this fearful fusillade, and hurls back red-hot shot and cannon balls of substantiated history, until his opponent reels in his stronghold. Staggering as Humphrey already is under the heavy blows, he rallies with accumulated power for his next attack, and dexterously finds the weak places in his adversary's armor. Bennett, however, rises with equal force to meet the occasion and turn aside the assault.

It is this gathering strength of the contending parties which increases the thrilling interest of the book, like some exciting romance, all the way through. A Christian might feel that his cause had been ably championed in the conflict, while the Infidel would be exultant in feeling the triumph of his belief.

This book, before all others which have been published in behalf of liberal ideas, free religion and disenthralment from church slavery, stands preëminently at the head. Showing as it does every possible effective argument which could be brought against Infidelity—and which has been so ably set aside—and thoroughly establishing the truth of Infidel assertions, D. M. Bennett deserves at least the thanks of humanity for the herculean blow struck at this monstrous slavery.

MR. EDITOR: Please permit me to make a little appeal to those who may feel disposed to aid in the publication of Dr. Randolph's book, "Beyond the Veil." Thus far I have been to nearly all the expense of getting it written and published. Now, as the book will be out in a month, or less, will some who may take an interest in it send to you for a number of copies, at wholesale or retail prices, and thereby greatly oblige Yours Respectfully? The Old Testament.—Concluded.

By PROF. W. ROBERTSON SMITH, OF THE UNIVERSITY OF ABERDEEN.

Further History of the Old Testament Canon in the Jewish Church.—Under this head we confine ourselves to points which lead up to the reception of the Old Testament by Christendom. These are mainly two: 1. The history of the Hebrew text, which we now possess only in the recension established by Jewish scribes at a time later than the Christian era; 2. The history of those versions which arose among Jews, but have influenced Christendom.

The text of the Old Testament.—Semitic alphabets have no full provision for distinguishing vowels; and the oldest writing, before orthography became fixed, was negligent in the use even of such vowel-letters as exist. For a long time, then, not only during the use of the old Phœnician character, but even after the more modern square or Babylonian letters were adopted, the written text of the Bible was consonantal only, leaving a certain scope for variety of pronunciation and sense. But even the consonantal text was not absolutely fixed. The loose state of the laws of spelling, and the great similarity of several letters, made errors of copying frequent. The text of Micah, for example, is often unintelligible, and many hopeless errors are older than the oldest versions. But up to the time of the Alexandrian version, MSS. were in circulation which differed not merely by greater or less accuracy of transcription, but by presenting such differences of recension as could not arise by accident. The Greek text of Jeremiah is vastly different from that of the Hebrew Bible, and it is not certain that the latter is always best. In the books of Samuel the Greek enables us to correct many errors of the Hebrew text, but shows at the same time that copyists used great freedom with details of the text. For the Pentateuch we have, in the copies of the Samaritans, a third recension, often but not always closely allied to the Greek. The three recensions show important variations in the chronology of Genesis; and it is remarkable that the book of Jubilees, a Jewish treatise, which cannot be much older than the Christian era, perhaps not much older than the destruction of the Jewish state, sometimes agrees with the Samaritan or with the Alexandrian recension. Up to this time, then, there was no absolutely received text. But soon after the Christian era all this was changed, and, by a process which we cannot follow in detail, a single recension became supreme. The change was, no doubt, connected with the rise of an overdrawn and fantastic system of interpretation, which found lessons in the smallest peculiarity of the text; but Lagarde has made it probable that no critical process was used to fix the standard recension, and that all existing MSS. are derived from a single archetype, which was followed even in its marks of deletion and other accidental peculiarities (Lagarde, Anmerkungen zur griech. Uebersetzung der Prov., 1863, p. 1; cf. Noldeke in Hilgenfeld's Zeitschr., 1873, p. 445). Then the received text became the object of further care, and the Masorets, or "possessors of tradition," with regard to the text, handed down a body of careful directions as to the true orthography and pronunciation. The latter was fixed by the gradual invention of subsidiary marks for the vowels, etc., an invention developed in slightly divergent forms in the Babylonian and Palestinian schools of Jewish scholarship. The vowel-points were not known to Jerome, but the system was complete before the ninth century, presumably several hundred years before that time. All printed Bibles follow the Western punctuation, but old Karaite MSS., with the Babylonian vowels, exist, and are now in course of publication. It is from the Masoretic text, with Masoretic punctuation, that the English version and most Protestant translations are derived. Older Christian versions, so far as they are based on the Hebrew at all (Jerome's Latin, Syriac), at least follow pretty closely the received consonantal text.

Jewish Versions.—Versions of the Old Testament became necessary partly because the Jews of the Western Dispersion adopted the Greek language, partly because even in Palestine the Old Hebrew was gradually supplanted by Aramaic. The chief seat of the Hellenistic Jews was in Egypt, and here arose the Alexandrian version, commonly known as the Septuagint or version of the LXX., from a fable that it was composed, with miraculous circumstances, by seventy-two Palestinian scholars summoned to Egypt by Ptolemy Philadelphus. In reality there can be no doubt that the version was gradually completed by several authors and at different times. The whole is probably older than the middle of the second century A.C. We have already seen that the text that lay before the translators was in many parts not that of the present Hebrew. The execution is by no means uniform, and, though there are many good renderings, the defects are so numerous that the Greek-speaking Jews, as well as the large section of the Christian Church which long depended directly or indirectly on this version, were in many places quite shut out from a right understanding of the Old Testament. Nevertheless, the authority of the version was very great, its inspiration was often asserted, and its interpretations exercised a great influence on Jewish and Christian thought, though among the Jews it was to a certain extent displaced by the version of the proselyte Aquila (second century of our era), which followed with slavish exactness the letter of the Hebrew text.

Among the Jews who spoke Aramaic, translations into the vernacular accompanied, instead of supplanting, the use of the original text, which was read and then orally paraphrased in the synagogues by interpreters or Mechurgemanim, who used great freedom of embellishment and application. This practice naturally led to the formation of written Targums, or Aramaic translations, which have not, however, reached us in at all their earliest form. It used, indeed, to be supposed that the simple and literal Targum of Onkelos on the Pentateuch was earlier than the time of Christ. But recent inquirers have been led to see in it, and in the linguistically cognate Targum on the Prophets (Targum of Jonathan), products of the Babylonian schools, in which the freedom of the early paraphrastic method was carefully avoided. Upon this view the date of these Targums is some centuries after the Christian era. On the other hand, an older style of paraphrase is preserved in the Palestinian Targums, which nevertheless contain in their present form elements later than the Babylonian versions. The Targum of Pseudo-Jonathan on the Pentateuch is apparently the latest form of the free Palestinian version, full of legendary adornments and other additions to the text. Other fragments of Palestinian translation, known as the Jerusalem Targum, and referring to individual passages of the Pentateuch and Prophets, probably represent an earlier stage in the growth of the Aramaic versions. There are also Targums on the Hagiographa, which, however, have less importance, and do not seem to have had so changeable a history. The Targums as a whole do not offer much to the textual critic. They are important, partly from the insight they give into an early and in part pre-Christian exegesis, partly from their influence on later Jewish expositors, and through them on Christian versions and expositions. In some cases the literal or Babylonian Targums have a text differing from the Masoretic. But it is not unlikely that, if we had a satisfactory text of the Targums (toward which almost nothing has been done), these variations would find their explanation in the Eastern text and the Assyrian punctuation.

A Long Deferred Letter.

FRIEND BENNETT: I have just read Brother Humphrey's reply No. ix. I have been sorry that I am obliged to read so many affirmations without clear evidence to prove them true. There are thousands of men preaching religion, a thousand different sorts; and Christians have been preaching their religion eighteen hundred years, about a thousand different sorts—all discord. Only Dr. Adam Clarke has attempted to give a definition of religion, in an essay, "I fear a Demon." Com., vol. v, p. 329. "I fear the Devil" is religion, superstition, and idolatry. What a pity that the Lord God made a serpent-devil! The Lord God made a man-trap, baited with nice apples, and a devil to flatter them into the trap; which made it necessary for the seed of the woman to bruise the serpent's head. The Almighty Jewish Jahou Elohim God could not or would not do it. After twenty years sober reflection, we sincerely declare to all the world that there is not one word of real fast truth in the first three chapters of our Bible Genesis, or in the first two chapters of Matthew or Luke, excepting the first four verses of Luke. We defy all the priests, lawyers, and doctors on earth to produce any good evidence to prove that there is one word of truth in those chapters. No book is evidence of its own veracity. No man's story alone is evidence of its veracity. Priests have trained infants and youth in their credulous ignorance to assume, take for granted, that the Bible is the miraculously inspired word of God; when there never was a man on earth who knew what God is, only a priest's forged name.

We are frightened with endless devil and hell if we do not adopt it. The Christian priests adopted the Jewish books and their yahou Elohim, rendered them into the English tongue—full of forgery—and they call a man an Infidel if he does not believe this forgery is the word of the Cause of all existence. If a man denies the real existence of the Jewish Jehou Elohim Christians have forged into our God, they call him an Atheist. There never was so abominable a character described by pen or pencil as the Jewish Jehou Elohim. Christians have adopted that character, and claim they are his image. There is not a paper book in the world that contains such overwhelming evidence, clear and conclusive, of its own falsehood as the Bible, from the first verse—which has four falsehoods—to the last text in Revelations. This is the reason why a sincere class-leader, Methodist, I now belong to no sect of superstition. I never saw a person of any sect who would not tell what he did not know is truly a fact, and swear to it, in support of his ism. By reason of falsehood and lying our world is filled with discord and crime. Truth for truth's sake—and let the sky fall—is not sought after, only by a few. But my ism, my darling ism!

Say the Catholic priests (Mission Book, p. 221) "As soon as children begin to talk, their parents should teach them to pronounce reverently the name of Jesus, and Mary; and to know their Father in heaven; to know his only-begotten Son; and also to know the Holy Ghost; to speak often to them of Mary the Mother of God," etc. This is being done now, all over the world, and has been for more than a thousand years. Pretended Protestants approve of this course, because they do the same thing in a different form. What does a child know when it begins to talk about the Mother of God or Holy Ghost or only-begotten Son? Train them ten years and they'll know. These Catholic children will know Mary the Mother of God after being drilled ten years just as well as a Protestant Sunday-school child knows God created, and Abram begat Isaac, and Isaac begat Jacob. They will know the Holy Ghost and his only-begotten Son. Christian priests made the English language, forged the names of their religious dogmas, got Noah Webster to put down their definitions, and then got Webster's Lexicon to prove their dogmas true. "Soul is the spiritual, immortal part of man." It can fry in a forged hell, eternal, unconsumed. Webster says so. Love means fifteen different things. "God is love," etc., Priests fabricated the names of every dogma, and the definition of their religion. Dr. Clarke, Parkhurst, Miles Grant, E. E. Guild, and G. H. Humphrey all say that Infidels are immoral, illiberal, bigots, and profane. They use pulpit words in common talk—consecrated words, priest-forged words! The climax of all crime! They think Infidels are credulous and ignorant bigots because they do not want to pay salaries to support a hundred sects of orthodoxy, to make lying harangues from a priest-fabricated God, pulpit, and Book of God?

We Infidels do as honestly and sincerely think; so surely as we breathe. We think Infidels regard the Golden Rule more than Christians do, as a class—which rule is all the morality on earth, the true religion.

Slate-Writing Among Scientists.

The following is from the well-known and distinguished scientist, Alfred R. Wallace, and is copied from the London Spectator. We have ourselves witnessed slate-writing by invisible agencies, in full daylight, apparently as wonderful as this.—Ed. T. S.]

The sitting was at a private house in Richmond, on the 21st of September. Two ladies and three gentlemen were present, besides myself and the medium, Dr. Monck. A shaded candle was in the room, giving light sufficient to see every object on the table round which we sat. Four small and common slates were on the table. Of these I chose two, and after carefully cleaning them and placing a small fragment of pencil between them, I tied them together with a strong cord, passed around them both lengthways and crossways, so as effectually to prevent the slates from moving on each other. I then laid them flat on the table, without losing sight of them for an instant. Dr. Monck placed the fingers of both hands on them, while I and a lady sitting opposite me placed our hands on the corners of the slates. From this position our hands were never moved, till I untied them to ascertain the result. After waiting a minute or two, Dr. Monck asked me to name any short word I wished to be written on the slate. I named the word "god." He then asked me to say how I wished it written. I replied "lengthways of the slate"; then if I wished it written with a large or small "g," and I chose a capital "G." In a very short time writing was heard on the slate. The medium's hands were convulsively withdrawn, and I then myself untied the cord (which was a strong silk watch-guard, lent by one of the visitors), and on opening the slates found on the lower one the word I had asked for, written in the manner I had requested, the writing being somewhat faint and labored, but perfectly legible. The slate with the writing on it is now in my possession. The essential features of this experiment are: That I myself cleaned and tied up the slates, that I kept my hand on them all the time, that they never went out of my sight for a moment, and that I named the word to be written and the manner of writing it after they were thus secured and held by me. I ask, how are these facts to be explained, and what interpretation is to be placed upon them?

ALFRED R. WALLACE.

I was present on this occasion, and certify that Mr. Wallace's account of what happened is correct.

Obituary.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to make known to you the death of my father, James Nichols, of 90 Ohio street, Allegheny, Pa., an earnest reader of your writings and a constant subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He died of apoplexy, Sept. 25th, 1877, in the 85th year of his age. Throughout his long life he has been indefatigable in work and thought, always taking the most lively interest in everything appertaining to the welfare of mankind. He hesitated not at personal sacrifice in the promotion of the rights of humanity or the progress of thought. His practical common sense found extreme satisfaction in the writings of Col. Ingersoll, especially his "Oration on the Gods." His mind took to nature as we find it—discarding entirely the supernatural. In this view he was happy while living, and ready to die. While at our fireside his presence is missed, the philosophy which he inculcated teaches us to submit with grace to the inevitable.

Respectfully,

JAMES F. NICHOLS.

It would be difficult to find a wider difference of views upon the subject of Christianity than is contained in a book entitled "Christianity and Infidelity; or, the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion," between G. H. Humphrey, a New York Presbyterian clergyman, and D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Both sides are here vigorously presented, and in as convenient shape as the searcher for evidence will be apt to find it. Published by D. M. Bennett, New York.—Boston Post.

LINDSAY, ONT., Oct. 20, 1877.

MR. EDITOR: I have just received a copy of the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion," a very creditable-looking volume, from your office. As I presume that I am entitled to you for the gift, please accept my thanks for the same. During the publication of the letters I was much interested with the arguments used by yourself and your opponent—Mr. Humphrey, who evidently has the usual strong clerical prejudices against Infidelity, but has on the whole done very well for his side of the question, while you I think have good reason to feel that, trained to controversy as your opponent has been, he has made no headway against you. Those who try to read both sides impartially, will, I am confident, see more clearly the inherent weakness of the popular superstition of the day—Christianity.

Yours sincerely,

W. McDONNELL.

Friendly Correspondence.

J. S. LIXON, M.D., Springfield, Ind., writes: The "Collection" is splendid—the best hymn or song-book I ever saw. It is altogether good and fully up to the times.

S. BAKNHART, Springville, N. Y., writes: After perusing your paper myself, I allow others to read it that they may learn the truths you advocate. I would not part with the volumes I have already received for any consideration. I place great value upon any production that promotes the general welfare of mankind.

JOSEPH COVENEY, Buchanan, Mich., writes: THE TRUTH SEEKER is a welcome visitor to our household. It is doing a grand work in breaking down old errors and theological superstitions. Christian bigotry is surely dying out of the minds of the multitude, and the people are shaking off the shackles of mental slavery. I enclose you $4 for two years' subscription, and 75 cts. for a copy of the "Collection."

MRS. L. H. GURLEY, Danville, Ill., writes: The little monitor on my paper admonishes me to renew my subscription, which I cheerfully do. It is not only a truth seeker, but a truth finder, and is a most welcome and interesting weekly visitor. It ought to be read by all. If there be a God, and if it be true that "he serves God best who serves his fellow beings most," surely THE TRUTH SEEKER would be approved by him for its lessons of truth, goodness and kindness to our fellows. If all who strive for a heaven hereafter only sought it here and now, they might make a heaven on earth. The Discussion was a very interesting feature of the paper. I trust the time is not distant when reason shall take the place of idolatry.

P. HOFFMAN, Inland, O., writes: Before I subscribed for your paper, three months ago, no Liberal journal had ever found its way to this little priest-ridden village; but now I have the satisfaction of knowing that your excellent TRUTH SEEKER regularly visits three families in this place, and the prospects are that I shall be enabled to send you more subscribers soon. The enthusiasm you show and the efforts you put forth to crush superstition out of the minds and hearts of the people should win for you the aid and support of every one who has the great cause of humanity at heart; and you may depend upon it that I at least will lend you all the material encouragement that my means will allow.

WALTER WALKER, Farmington, Utah, writes: I have been a patron of your paper since the first number was issued. The reading of it led to investigation, and the clouds of error were removed. I am now called an Infidel and very wicked because I hold views different from my neighbors. But assured as I am that I am on the side of truth and right, I can afford to put up with their jeers and sneers and hard names, for I know that I am on the winning side. This would be a pleasant and peaceful world if people would give to each other the privileges they claim for themselves. I went on an excursion a few weeks ago, and sold my "Thirty Discussions" and "Collection." I hasten to order other copies, for I would as soon be without Amberley as these, and I would not be without that for any consideration.

J. KINSEY, St. Clair, Iowa, writes: What a grand worker in the field of Free Thought THE TRUTH SEEKER is! Every question that relates to our moral, physical or political interests can be reached through its liberal columns from men and women of educated brains. In No. 34 we have an article from the pen of J. Petty on the subject of religion. It contains the most precise and comprehensive definition of the word "Religion" that I have read out of hundreds. It is broad enough and elaborate enough for a century to come. It needs only to be read to be endorsed by every Liberal. The word religion should not be used by unbelievers to define their creed or belief. Let us take it out of our vocabulary and substitute the better and nobler word and deed—Morality.

LEE NORTON, Madison, Ohio, writes: I feel ashamed that I could not do better by you than I did when you sent me the "Collection." It is just what I have wanted these many years. I would not exchange it for a dozen Bibles. When I pass away I want no priest to have anything to do or say: neither will they have my consent. When my first wife died I got along without a priest, and let folks talk as they pleased. Should my present one go before me, her wish will be respected. The longer I read your paper the better I like it. I have read your discussion with Humphrey as it came to hand. It seems as if the man don't know when he is beaten; if he did, he would have backed out with the best apology he could make. Long ago you have used him up. Good! If I prayed at all, my prayer to God would be that you might live and press on in the good work for a thousand years.

BENJAMIN GRIFFIN, Lawrence, Mass., writes: I have just finished your last Reply to Rev. Mr. Humphrey, and have come to the conclusion that if there be such a thing as inspiration, you must be a subject. Although you lay the Rev. out every time, I consider your last the best. Your calmness in answering his childish assertions is commendable. I wish everybody—especially the clergy—could read your replies in this interesting discussion. They would learn much about Jewish history and that old monstrosity, the Jewish Jehovah. They do not seem to know anything about the God they pretend to worship. If they read the Bible accounts of him, it does not seem credible that they could give him reverence. According to all accounts, the Devil is the best fellow. I am sorry that the discussion is to close so soon, just as it begins to increase in interest. I think I shall be able to make additions to the Lawrence club soon.

W. F. GRAVES, Castile, N. Y., I have just read some of your tracts—the only ones of the kind I have ever seen. I herewith send you five dollars for more matter of the same sort. I was reared in an orthodox Sunday-school, and heretofore have heard the names of Paine and Voltaire merely mentioned as devils in human form. I was brought up to believe that to doubt one word of the Bible was the quintessence of wickedness, and would consign me to the everlasting brimstone burning. My reading was limited to pious publications. I read Nelson's book against Infidelity through three times. I finally began to think for myself. Before I was twenty-five years of age I became thoroughly convinced that orthodox religion chiefly consisted in hypocrisy and was a huge humbug. I still professedly held on to the faith for a while as a matter of policy. But for several years past I have given expression to my candid convictions. I find that they coincide with the views expressed in your tracts and in Ingersoll's incomparable lectures. The most of my friends, like myself, are wholly unacquainted with Infidel publications. I see my name among the Vice-Presidents of the Wolcott organization. Before taking any active part as a leader in the Liberal movement of the day I wish to read more and become better informed.

F. H. SHAWWOOD, Colchester, Ill., writes: Allow me to say a few words in praise of your able Replies, from the first to the last, in your discussion with the Rev. Humphrey. In my opinion the arguments you have adduced are sufficient to convince the most superstitious. I think your arguments must have their effect on Friend Humphrey, for he cannot help seeing the truth when it is so plainly presented before him. Some of his arguments were exceedingly thin, but they were the best that could be brought forward for his cause. Christianity is losing ground at Colchester, and truth and reason are beginning to obtain a hearing. It is only a short time since, when the Methodist Episcopal pastor had occasion to announce an evening meeting, that a deacon of the church arose and, in a penitential tone, informed the congregation that, in spite of the example of the foolish virgins of Scriptural fame, their ecclesiastical kerosene had been allowed to burn out, and the money was played; consequently they would not be prepared to entertain the Bridegroom that evening. That is the way Christianity stands at Colchester, and thus does the modern worshiper allow to pass unheeded the sacred injunctions which warn him of the wrath to come.

Geo. F. KESSLER, Baltimore, Md., writes: After a trial of six months of your paper I have concluded to become a life-time subscriber. It is worthy of the earnest support of all true Liberals. It has gratified my wishes beyond my expectations. The "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion" has been of inestimable value to the readers, as it has imparted a vast amount of information which could only be gathered by the ordinary reader in years of diligent study and attention. The Rev. Mr. Humphrey called Liberals and their publications "illiberal." Now, I would like to ask Mr. Humphrey if any of the orthodox Christian papers would have admitted a discussion within their columns similar to the one in which he engaged with Mr. Bennett. Now, I think Christians are far more illiberal than Infidels, and I have grounds upon which to base my opinions. I have had many Christians tell me that Infidel publications ought to be suppressed by law—that they were a shame and disgrace to the community. Has Mr. Humphrey or any one else ever heard an Infidel express the opinion that the Bible ought to be suppressed? I think not; we would rather that every one examine it closer, so they might see its inconsistencies, absurdities, and contradictions, and then consign it to the library with the other books, to be read, studied and admired according to the amount of information it imparts to us concerning ancient ideas, manners and customs.

Christianity and Infidelity

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n. Clergyman,
OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

- PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.
- PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.
- PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers; and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion.

A thick 12mo volume of 550 pages, well bound sent, post-paid, to any address, for the low price of one dollar.

Heathens of the Heath;

A ROMANCE, BY WM. McDONNELL,
AUTHOR OF "EXETER HALL," ETC.

This work is rich in romantic and pathetic incidents, and exhibits with an overwhelming array of facts the atrocities committed by the Church. It shows that the purest morality exists without the Bible, and that many of the heathen philosophers were lovers of virtue. The folly of Christian ministers is fully portrayed. Hypocrisy and bigotry are clearly exposed, and the road to virtue and true happiness plainly marked out. A most pleasing romance is woven into the work, in which much opportunity is afforded the author for fine descriptions and beautiful sentiments which he so well knows how to give utterance to. The characters in the tale are invested with much interest; the hero and heroine gain the love of every reader. "On the whole, it is the work of a master hand—a work of unaffected beauty and the deepest interest." "One of the most valuable features of the work is, its positions are all proven. . . . Every thinking, enquiring mind should peruse it." 500 pp., 12mo. Price, in paper, $1.00; cloth, $1.50.

Heroines of Freethought.

BY MRS. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

Containing most interesting biographies and descriptive sketches of Madame Roland, Mary Wollstonecraft, Mary W. Godwin, Shelley, George Sand, Harriet Martineau, Frances Wright, Emma Martin, Margaret Chappell-Smith, Ernestine L. Rose, Frances Power Cobbe, and George Eliot. The work is written in a most pleasing style and the mechanical execution is of the best description. Every Freethinker who takes pride in the noble women who have bravely espoused the truth ought to send for a copy. Price, $1.75.

Sold by D. M. BENNETT,

Underwood-Marples Debate.

HELD BETWEEN

B. F. UNDERWOOD

AND THE

Rev. JOHN MARPLES,

At Napanee, Ont., July, 1875. Continuing four nights.

PROPOSITIONS DISCUSSED.—First. "That Atheism, Materialism, and Modern Skepticism are illogical and contrary to Reason." Marples affirming; Underwood denying.

Second. "That the Bible, consisting of the Old and New Testament, contains evidence, beyond all other books, of its divine origin." Marples affirming; Underwood denying.

Reported by JOHN T. HAWKE, of the Toronto Leader, and revised by the disputants. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents, by mail.

MR. MARPLES writes to Mr. UNDERWOOD: "Copies of the Debate were sent me and I have looked them through, and on the whole I approve of them very much. You have done me full justice. . . . I intend to push the sale all I can."

By PROF. RICHARD A. PROCTOR.

Five of them were delivered at Steinway Hall this city, in the winter of 1875-6, and were reported phonographically expressly for THE TRUTH SEEKER by Miss M. S. Gontcharoff. This is the most popular course of Lectures ever delivered by Professor Proctor, and ought to be in the possession of every person.

The titles of the Lectures are:

- I. Growth of Worlds.
- II. Life and Death of Worlds.
- III. Other Worlds than Ours.
- IV. Other Suns than Ours.
- V. The Great Mysteries of the Universe.
- VI. Religion and Astronomy.

TESTIMONIALS.

I admire the ingenuity of your parallelisms.—Prof. W. D. Whitney, of Yale College, New Haven, Conn.

I very greatly admire your extreme ingenuity and your enthusiastic support of the Mythological element in Hebrew history.—Dr. Thos. Inman, of Bristol, England.

A mighty mine of research and speculation.—Chicago Daily Inter-Ocean, Feb. 10, 1877.

This book will repay perusal, because it will help the reader to think—and that in a new direction, and is certainly entitled to be regarded as a valuable contribution to the fund of human thought, even by those who will stoutly deny both its premises and conclusions.—Chicago Daily Tribune, Feb. 17, 1877.

Among the many attempts recently made by scientists to crush the Bible, this is unquestionably the most vigorous.—Chicago Daily Times, Feb. 10, 1877.

This book is strictly what its title purports it to be. All the great miracles of the Bible are solved by Science.

New, Startling, and Extraordinary Revelations in Religious History, which disclose the Oriental origin of all the doctrines, principles, precepts and miracles of the Christian New Testament, and furnishing a Key for unlocking many of its Sacred Mysteries, besides comprising the History of Sixteen Oriental Crucified Gods.

BY KERSEY GRAVES,

Author of "The Biography of Satan," and "The Bible of Bibles" (comprising a description of twenty bibles).

This wonderful and exhaustive volume by Mr. Graves will, we are certain, take high rank as a book of reference in the field which he has chosen for it. The amount of mental labor necessary to collate and compile the varied information contained in it must have been severe and arduous indeed, and now that it is in such convenient shape the student of freethought will not willingly allow it to go out of print. But the book is by no means a mere collation of views or statistics; throughout its entire course the author—as will be seen by his title-page and chapter-heads—follows a definite line of research and argument to the close, and his conclusions go, like sure arrows, to the mark.

HISTORY OF THE CONFLICT BETWEEN RELIGION AND SCIENCE. Truly one of the most valuable works that have appeared within the last ten years. By PROF. DRAFF. Price, $1.75.

Gems of Thought.

A NOBLE heart, like the sun, showeth its greatest countenance in its lowest estate.—Sir Philip Sidney.
Ah, how much suffering might be spared sometimes by a single abstinence, by a single no answered in a firm tone to the voice of seduction.—Lavater.

WHEN certain persons abuse us, let us ask ourselves what description of characters it is that they admire; we shall often find this a very consolatory question.—Colton.

ABUSE is often of service. There is nothing so dangerous to an author as silence. His name, like a shuttlecock, must be beat backward and forward or it falls to the ground.—Johnson.

To do an evil action is base; to do a good action, without incurring danger, is common enough; but it is the part of a good man to do great and noble deeds, though he risks everything.—Plutarch.

BLESSED is the memory of those who have kept themselves unspotted from the world; yet more blessed and more dear the memory of those who have kept themselves unspotted in the world.—Mrs. Jameson.

THERE is a time when men will not suffer bad things because their ancestors have suffered worse. There is a time when the hoary head of inveterate abuse will neither draw reverence nor obtain protection.—Burke.

THE Bible is the most betrahsed book in the world. Coming to it through commentaries is much like looking at a landscape through garret windows over which generations of unloathed spiders have spun their webs.—Beecher.

UNSELFISH and noble acts are the most radiant epochs in the biography of souls. When wrought in earliest youth, they lie in the memory of age like the coral islands, green and sunny amidst the melancholy waste of ocean.—Dr. Thomas.

ALLOWING the performance of an honorable action to be attended with labor, the labor is soon over, but the honor is immortal; whereas, should even pleasure wait on the commission of what is dishonorable, the pleasure is soon gone, but the dishonor is eternal.—John Stewart.

Many people have their own God: and he is much what the French mean when they talk of Le bon Dieu—very indulgent, rather weak, near at hand when we want anything, but far away out of sight when we have a mind to do wrong. Such a God is as if he were an image of stone.—Hare.

THE sun should not set upon our anger, neither should he rise upon our confidence. We should forgive freely, but forget rarely. I will not be revenged, and this I owe to my enemy; but I will remember, and this I owe to myself.—Colton.

To be ambitious of true honor, of the true glory and perfection of our natures, is the very principle and incentive of virtue; but to be ambitious of titles, of place, of ceremonial respects and civil pageantry, is as vain and little as the things are which we court.—Sir P. Sidney.

WORDS are good, but there is something better. The best is not to be explained by words. The spirit in which we act is the chief matter. Action can only be understood and represented by the spirit. No one knows what he is doing while he is acting rightly, but when doing wrong we are always conscious.—Goethe.

To set the mind above the appetites is the end of abstinence, which one of the fathers observes to be not a virtue but the groundwork of a virtue. By forbearing to do what may innocently be done, we may add hourly new vigor to resolution, and secure the power of resistance when pleasure or interest shall lend their charms to guilt.—Johnson.

THE domestic relations precede, and, in our present existence, are worth more than all our other social ties. They give the first throb to the heart and unseal the deep fountains of its love. Home is the chief school of human virtue. Its responsibilities, joys, sorrows, smiles, tears, hopes, and solicitudes form the chief interest of human life.—Channing.

THERE is no word or action but may be taken with both hands—either with the right hand of charitable construction, or the sinister interpretation of malice and suspicion; and all things do succeed as they are taken. To construe an evil action well is but a pleasing and profitable deceit to myself; but to misconstrue a good thing is a treble wrong—to myself, the action, and the author.—Bishop Hall.

WHAT is the Bible in your house? It is not the Old Testament; it is not the New Testament; it is not the Gospel according to Matthew or Mark or Luke or John; it is the gospel according to William; it is the gospel according to Mary; it is the gospel according to Henry and James; it is the gospel according to your name. You write your own Bible.—Beecher.

SET no man up in thy mind as an infallible guide. Believe nothing upon the simple say-so of another, let him be ever so wise, but take Nature, Reason, and Science as thy teachers and submit all things to their tests, as touchstones that will not deceive thee. Men are finite and fallible, whether they be reputed sons of God or only common clay; and if we follow as leaders the very wisest and best that earth can produce, we shall inevitably bring up against the dead wall of ignorance and error; for all of science, knowledge, or fact can never be combined in any one individual of the race.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

Oddz and Enns.

It was a Vassar girl who, when a sailor of forty years' voyaging had been pointed out to her as an "old salt," subsequently alluded to him as an "ancient chloride of sodium."

A DAYTON, Iowa, Irishman discussing the strike with a friend, protested that he would "rather stand up and be shot at, and clear kilt, than to live all the while starved to death."

A MAN took his clock to a Port Chester clock-repairer and asked him, "What time is it when this time-piece strikes thirteen times?" "Time it's repaired," replied the man of time.

THE model husband lives in Little Falls. He never allows his wife to do more than half the work. She puts up all the canned fruit in the summer, and he puts it all down in the winter.

WHEN the coachman of Frederick the Great upset his coach, Frederick swore like a trooper; but the coachman coolly asked, "And you? did you never lose a battle?" The King smiled graciously.

"Bob, can you tell me why I'm like the moon when it is twenty-three days old?" Bob gave it up, and the questioner explained: "Because I've passed my last quarter." A small loan was immediately advanced.

THE difference between having a tooth properly drawn by a professional surgeon, and having it knocked out miscellaneously by a fall on the pavement, is only a slight verbal distinction—one is dental, and the other is accidental.

A DISSIPATED and unmannerly nobleman, presuming upon his "nobility," once asked Sir Walter Scott, who sat opposite him at dinner, what was the difference between Scott and soot. "Just the breadth of this table," retorted Sir Walter.

CONCLUSIVE TESTIMONY.—"Mr. Brown, you say the witness was honest and intelligent. What makes you think so? Are you acquainted with him?" "No, sir, I have never seen him." "Why, then, do you come to such a conclusion?" "Because he takes ten newspapers, and pays for them in advance."

A LITTLE Athol boy, guilty of some misconduct, upon being asked why he could be so naughty, replied that he really thought he was doing nothing wrong. "That's no excuse," said his mother, "thinking doesn't help the matter." "Well, mamma," said he, "what's the use of having a thinker if you can't think?"

THE TEN LITTLE GRASSHOPPERS.

Ten little grasshoppers
Sitting on a vine,
One ate too much green corn,
Then there were but nine.

Nine little grasshoppers,
Just the size for bait,
A little boy went fishing,
Then there were but eight.

Eight little grasshoppers
Stayed out till after leven,
A white frost nipped one,
Then there were seven.

Seven little grasshoppers
Lived between two bricks;
There came a hurricane,
Then there were six.

Six little grasshoppers
Found an old bee-hive;
One found a bumble bee,
Then there were five.

Five little grasshoppers
Hopping on the floor;
Pussy took one for a mouse,
Then there were four.

Four little grasshoppers
Sighed for pastures new;
Tried to cross the river,
Then there were two.

Two little grasshoppers
Sitting on a stone;
A turkey gobbler passed that way,
Then there was one.

One little grasshopper
Chirped good-bye at the door,
Said he'd come next summer
With ten millions more.

Notes and Clippings.

IN Sweden primary education is compulsory on all.

ANNA DICKINSON is quite ill at Elizabeth, N. J. Cause, overwork.

FRANCIS MURPHY is out West, and getting $200 a night every time he lectures.

A WESTERN teamster calls his near mule Ann, and says it is a Scripture name—Ann, a nigh ass.

QUERY.—Is the Rev. Mr. Humphrey's book, "Hell and D—nation," intended as a guide-book for travelers?

At the Episcopal Church Congress, John Jay read a paper condemning the press for "rancor, slander," etc. Observer please copy.

BOSTON has lost a deacon. His name is Taylor, and he has been committed for trial on a charge of swindling a poor woman out of $500.

You would never regard a penitentiary as a theological school, and yet the doctrine of free will is conclusively settled for every man who enters.

A FRENCH screw-steamer running from Havre to Rouen is called the Immaculate Conception. This has no connection with the number of births on board.

THE Presbyterian Synod has decided that women cannot properly preach, so the poor souls saved by the preaching of Phoebe Hanaford are only miserable counterfeits.

FATHER CURET, for many years the editor of Olivetti Cattolica, in Rome, has been expelled by the order of Jesuits for constructive heresy. The order is very vindictive against him.

THE Widow Van Cott declares that to save one soul in Athol, Mass., requires labor enough to save a hundred in any other place in which she has ever had any experience.

ANOTHER serious earthquake has visited South America, shaking it up considerably for the space of a minute. That part of the world appears to be afflicted with the ague.

DANVERS, Mass., has lost one of its leading citizens—not by death, but by burglary. His name is William H. Porter, he is an elder in a church, and he pleads guilty to a series of robberies.

THE Pacific Churchman was for eleven years the organ of Episcopallians on the Pacific coast. For several years it has had a desperate wrestle with impecuniosity, and now calmly expires.

RELIGION has its consolations, and it is doubtless a part of the divine scheme that the Evangelical Knowledge convention and the Lydia Thompson burlesque troupe coincided in Boston a few weeks ago.

A CONVENTION of the Free Religious Association will be held at New Haven, Conn., Nov. 8 and 9. Among the speakers will be O. B. Frothingham, T. W. Higginson, J. W. Chadwick, Felix Adler, F. E. Abbot, W. J. Potter, and B. F. Underwood.

WENDELL PHILLIPS pronounces in favor of a plentiful currency and a low rate of interest. "His head is level." With these and with common honesty on the part of our lawmakers and officers the country would be on the high road to prosperity.

THE Italian army is thoroughly equipped and prepared for mobilization, and the coasts and fortresses are in a state of defense. These preparations have been completed during the present year, owing to urgent military advice forwarded to Rome by the Berlin Cabinet.

MR. BEECHER preaches on a subject concerning which nothing is known definitely, i. e., the union of the soul and body. Hence it encourages the largest amount of theory and speculation. People hear with great interest and go away just as wise as they come in.—Graphic.

A SYNODICAL injunction has now been served on Brother See of Newark to keep him from preaching the doctrines of the "higher life" and Christian perfection. He is at liberty to preach the other doctrines, including that of hell fire and everlasting damnation; to his heart's content.

THE coast at the Port-Said mouth of the Suez Canal is advancing outward at a rapid rate, estimated at fifty yards per annum—a truly alarming statement, which, if only half correct, will involve extensive dredging operations every year. The general level of the Mediterranean sea is said to have fallen about four inches since the canal has been opened.

THE Providence Journal is not complimentary to the Rev. James Cook. It says of his lecture in that city the other evening, that it "was as crude, undigested and incorrect a discussion of the question of labor in New England as we remember to have seen anywhere. It was not true in its statements, and it was wholly or nearly false in its inferences. Mr. Cook is safest when he talks of what nobody knows anything about."

BOB INGERSOLL says that it takes more sense to make a good cook than a tolerable lawyer. Anybody who has eaten beef steak that resembles a strip of slippery elm bark, with the slippery left out, and has listened to lawyer talking four hours to prove that asking the witness whether his name is John Smith is a leading question, will be willing to walk up to Robert and say, "Put it there, you horizontal-headed old Pagan."—Brookville Jeffersonian.

THE "Arch-Confraternity of Our Lady of Perpetual Help" was inaugurated on Friday by Archbishop Wood at St. Bonifacius' Church, in Philadelphia. A copy of the picture of the Blessed Virgin in the Church of St. Alphonso, Rome, is exposed in the church to the veneration of the faithful. Those who will visit the picture and pray a certain number of times are entitled to an indulgence of 300 days; and "all these indulgences," it is stated—"remissions of sins and relaxations of penances—may be applied, by way of suffrage, to the souls of the faithful who have departed this life, united in charity with God."

THE Marquis of Salisbury having recently said in a public address that "the duty on the part of those who are well off to assist the poor in the time of illness has been recognized from the earliest periods of Christianity," a correspondent of a London newspaper takes exception to the limitations of the statement. The history of relief of human suffering, he remarks, does not date from the earliest periods of Christianity, but from the earliest periods of humanity. The duty was lovingly taught by the religion of Judaism—a religion on the morality of which the ethical canons of Christianity are founded.

PROF. HEMHOLTZ was installed on Oct. 15th, as rector of the University of Berlin. In his speech he reviewed the position of the universities in the middle ages, and remarked with regard to Oxford and Cambridge, that they have been changed the least since then, even in things where change would have been very necessary. He recommended, however, the imitation of those old English universities in two things—in the perfection of the art of expressing thought, and in the care for the physical development of the students, whose athletics are far preferable to the German fencing and gymnastic exercises.

THE TABLES TURNED.—The heathen are organizing foreign missions for the conversion of Christians. The Hindoos of the sacred city of Benares have founded a society for the propagation of Brahminism among the Christians of Australia. An eminent Brahmin of the name of Suradschi, a man of great authority, has recently been visiting some of the English colonies, and while traveling in Australia was appalled and grieved at the fearful prevalence of drunkenness among the Christians. On returning to India he called together a number of the thoughtful Brahmins, to whom he communicated his glowing zeal to do something for the salvation of their degraded fellow men and fellow subjects in Australia. The only perfect remedy, he considered, would be the conversion of these Christians to a better and purer faith. A large sum was collected for the pious and benevolent enterprise, and some of the Brahmins declared their willingness to devote themselves to the work, and to spend and be spent in this humane and holy cause. Suradschi is now engaged in translating fitting passages from the Vedas into the English tongue, for the use of the missionaries.

PERHAPS the most important discovery made by Prof. Cope in Western Texas is that of a domestic hog with undivided hoofs, similar to those of a horse. Nature, in a freak, first made one, and from that more came, and now they are quite numerous and raised for meat. The professor has the skin and skeleton of one for his collection. This is one of the most important arguments in favor of evolution, for here we have not only a new genus, but probably a new order of animals evolved or created.

A RECENT traveler has given an account of the manners and customs of the Zaporas of Ecuador. The mode of courtship presents suggestive features. The enamored swain goes to the woods and hunts game; when he has procured it, he presents it to the maiden of his choice. This constitutes the proposal; if she accepts, she cooks the meat. Hence, before entering upon the bonds of matrimony, the Zapora suitor has the advantage over civilized wooers of being assured as to the lady's capacity for preparing a square meal. On the other hand, the Zaporiness is favored with some foreknowledge as to her spouse's ability to keep the larder supplied.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Graphic says: Apropos of the Tom Paine discussion, I should like to ask what, after all, is the importance or significance of this matter? Would Tom Paine's happy or remorseful death prove anything? Ah Mok, a Chinese criminal executed for murder a few months since in San Francisco, when efforts were made to commute his sentence, discouraged such proceedings by remarking that he didn't want to live, and that he was ready and anxious to die and get into a happier world. A hundred thousand of Ah Mok's countrymen will to-day go to the headsman's block as calmly and seemingly in full assurance of waking up in some happier condition of existence as they would lie down to rest and opium dreams. Now, if happy deathbeds are to prove anything, I would respectfully refer the disputants over Tom Paine to our dying contemporaries, the Chinese.

THE Rev. Harvey Hersey and his wife, of Watertown, did not agree as well nor live as pleasantly as a Christian minister and his wife should. The latter charged her liege lord with certain acts which amounted to "unministerial conduct." The Watertown Universalist church appears to have put the wife rather than the parson on trial, and expelled her. She appealed to the State Convention, where the case was reopened, and the results were not satisfactory. Again, Mrs. Hersey appealed to the General Convention of Universalists, and arraigned both her husband and the inferior courts. The Board of Appeals of that body ordered the Watertown church to restore Mrs. Hersey to full membership, and then if they like prefer charges against her and try the same orderly, and her husband they suspend from the ministry for eighteen months.

WE certainly live in a wonderful age. Melville Bell discovered a method of reproducing any and all sounds of the human voice, which he called "visible speech." Prof. Graham Bell invented the telephone, by which sounds can be transmitted to a distance. And now comes Mr. Thomas A. Edison, with an invention of the most marvelous kind. It registers the tones of the voice, and is capable of reproducing every sound and every word exactly. Mr. Edison's invention is not yet perfected, but enough has been accomplished to convince him that his scheme is feasible. All recent inventions sink into insignificance when compared with this. It appeals to the imagination as nothing else can do. By its aid one is able to hear the voice of his friend—absent or dead—as though he were in the room. The illustrious orators would be present wherever one of these instruments was found, and we would have it in our power to crystallize down for future use the tones of the great singers in the greatest operas. It is only the other day that Professor Huxley objected to any form of immortality, and here is Mr. Edison doing for the voice, by means of a mechanical contrivance, what Frederic Harrison asserted history and tradition and heredity did for the soul and mind. Sound has become immortal. Who knows if other forms of feeling will not be immortalized some day through other inventions?—Graphic.

Events of the Week.

SENATOR MORTON is dead. His remains laid two days in state in Indianapolis.

SEVERAL Mormon missionaries sailed for Europe in the fore part of the week to hunt up more proselytes.

A GRAVE crisis is imminent in the French government. MacMahon is determined to uphold the Conservative party.

AN elevator at Belleville, Ont., containing 38,000 bushels of wheat was burned, and Richard Dewsberry, the engineer, also.

THE Silver Bill has passed the House. The silver dollar weighing 412½ grains is to become a legal tender. This is a step in the right direction.

REV. JOHN J. HUGHES, pastor of St. Jerome's church, Catholic, in North New York, was knocked down by one of his parishioners named James O'Brien.

It is reported that the President has offered the Mission to Germany to Col. Robert G. Ingersoll. He would make a most credible minister to any court.

EX-MAYOR A. Oakley Hall has returned from Europe, but is rather chary about explaining his sudden departure from this city. He has seen few but his most intimate friends.

THE Rev. O. P. McCarthy has been expelled from the Manhattan Liberal Club for having used slanderous personal, and ungentlemanly remarks about the club and its members.

THE winds and frosts of winter are approaching by steady degrees. Stoves are becoming decidedly companionable, and coal dealers find their trade growing livelier.

A POWDER-MILL explosion occurred at Concord, Mass. Charles H. Perry was blown to atoms, and nothing could be found of him save a part of his rubber boots. Others in the vicinity were injured.

EIGHT hundred barrels of Bourbon whiskey were burned in a fire at Louisville, Ky. Thousands of burning throats would rather have put it to a different but worse use. A tobacco warehouse also burned, and much of the filthy weed destroyed. Loss, $60,000.

THE wife of Stephen May, Mechanicsville, N. Y., left her husband sleeping in his bed and took four of her children and threw them into a swiftly-running stream hard by, and jumped in herself. The oldest boy got out and raised an alarm, when the mother and one child were rescued, two of the children drowning. Partial insanity.

FOR some time the fortunes of war seemed to be decidedly against the Turks, but the later news is more favorable to them. The Russians have made a number of attacks upon their stronghold at Plevna and other places in the vicinity and have been repulsed with heavy loss. The Turks feel somewhat encouraged and think Allah has not wholly forsaken them.

THE pious ex-mayor Lambert of Brooklyn has been guilty of dishonesty and a breach of trust. His brethren of the Church have suspended him till he repents and says he won't do so again until he has a good opportunity. If a few of those swindling deacons were suspended from some convenient tree instead of from Church membership, they would be thoroughly reformed, though the Church would be robbed of some of its strongest pillars. Good deacons, like good Indians, are generally the dead ones.

ELECTIONS took place in the twelve States on Tuesday last. As we go to press it appears from the returns that the Republicans have lost in many localities and the Democrats correspondingly gained, especially in Pennsylvania. The vote of the workingmen, the greenbackers and the bread-winners was greater in many localities than was looked for. General McClellan is elected Governor of New Jersey. The event at which many are rejoicing is the election in this city of John Morrissy to the State Senate. Although he is a notorious gambler, he is deemed more honest than the average politician.

BY HUDSON TUTTLE.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE NATURE OF GOD.

Each nation believes that its own laws are by far the most excellent. No one, therefore, but a madman would treat such prejudices with contempt.—HERODOTUS.

THE rise and growth of the God-idea has been considered in those chapters treating the subject historically. From the All-God to the One God who rules all, is a long and painful journey. The idea was conceived in a false understanding of natural phenomena, and its progress is the application of increasing knowledge. Monotheism, simply substituting one God in place of many, is scarcely removed from Polytheism. Its great advance is made when it shakes off its personality and believes God to be a spiritual essence.

The protean forms which the idea and conception of God have assumed should teach the falsity of the theory that God is revealed to the intuitions. Xenophanes saw the error of supposing man's conception of God a proof of his existence or character. He said, "If horses or lions had hands and should make their deities, they would respectively make a horse and a lion." English theological writers have rarely ventured to attempt the proof of the existence of God by philosophical argument. Kant has shown their insufficiency. The stronghold is in intuition. The reason acknowledges God's existence. But what becomes of this supposition when it is found that whole nations have no idea of God, and when some of the most enlightened men fail to feel his existence? Monotheism is not the end of the series, but it reduces the gods to one. What is his nature?

He is self-existent.

It is said, in argument of the existence of God, that we cannot conceive of creation, with all its designs and adaptations, without a planner, a creator; at the same time it is asserted that we can conceive of the self-existence of the designer! Great is the mind that cannot comprehend the lesser but is amply able to grasp the greater! He is of infinite power, wisdom, and love. Are these spiritual abstractions, or are they personified? Necessarily the latter, and every man's conception must be different, as the god of the lion would be a perfect lion. What logically follows? That as our ideas of God are projections of ourselves, there can be no certain and true idea of the Divine. We may build an ideal of what God must be, analyzed to his elements. He must be infinite causation, as the cause of all; he must be the controlling mind, yet he cannot reason, for that would imply imperfect consciousness; he cannot be said to foresee, for that implies relations as to time; he cannot be said to have judgment, fancy, comparison, qualities of the finite mind. The primary elements left, by analogies, are being, cause, knowledge, love—each of infinite degree.

Can personality be formed from these? Can they be infinite in a personal being? Well did the learned and pious Dr. Arnold say: "It is only of God in Christ that I can, in my present state of being, conceive anything at all." The abstract God is the Father; the personified God is Christ. The Trinity supplies both the metaphysician and the most sensual mind.

God must be infinite. Man, being finite, can form no conception or idea of him whatever. This is an unavoidable logical conclusion, from the necessity of man's constitution.

But, it is claimed, we cannot understand Nature or ourselves—not even the growth of the humblest flower; shall we therefore cease investigation? The fields of thought thus compared are totally unlike. With matter we deal with finiteness, and pause on the threshold of infinite generalizations. With God there are no finite qualities to seize hold of; his very being and constitution of mind are different from ours, and to us his thoughts cannot be translated.

As children strive to clutch the moon, philosophers and metaphysical theologians have endeavored to grasp the infinite. They have failed because attempting the impossible. The world is little better for all their dogmatical speculations. They are only mental gymnasts, and perform no productive labor.

It is claimed that belief in God is the foundation of all religion. This is true of religion considered as the ceremonial growing out of a belief that God demands respect and reverence from man, but not true of morality. Men have believed in all varieties of gods, or renounced all gods, and yet lived honest, upright, and noble lives. The solution of this vexed problem has no relation to morality, being only interesting to religious schemers, who of course must have a God to carry them forward. While the best of men have held diametrically opposed ideas of a God, or placed such ideas with the indeterminable, the worst and most fiendish of mankind have claimed to understand God perfectly, and have waded in human gore to vindicate their opinions, often sealing their faith by terrible forms of martyrdom.

Let Theology bury its myriad dead, whose bones whiten the plains of the Old World; wait till the pitying showers of heaven wash away the stains of blood, the fogot ceases to smoke, the tears of widows and mothers and helpless children be dried, and a great race of people rise from the dust in which with iron heel it has crushed their spirits, ere it call its worship the religion of love and peace sent to redeem mankind.

Science will go her quiet way, of God neither affirming nor denying. Her only office is to point out errors where they occur. All that the past has furnished in proof of the existence of a Divine Architect she pronounces as the assumption of children grasping at the moon. The vexed so-called problem is not a problem; it is a chimera. She goes forward from facts to the order of facts called law, on to the organization of matter. Here the human mind stands on the threshold of an unknown universe into which it can go, which it will conquer and claim, only to find, as the intellect grows acute, new domains extending beyond. As we pass from matter to law, from law to principle, from principle to attribute far beyond the outermost skirts of space, we may tread the sanctuary of the Supreme Being. What is his nature? Is he personal? Is he an omnipotent spirit? Vain questions! When the intellect enters the sanctuary, all shall be made plain. Until then it must calmly wait, content with investigations it can comprehend. The theologians, who fail even to understand the organization of finite man, and scoff with priestly sneer at the words of accurate knowledge, untrammelled by facts may vault on the wings of discordant fancy, and between the tilts they give each other in religious tournament enlighten the laity as to the being of an Infinite God. When they agree among themselves and produce their facts, Science will readily receive their conclusions. Until that time their beliefs must remain inadmissible hypotheses.

An Address

READ BEFORE THE NATIONAL LIBERAL CONGRESS, AT ROCHESTER, N. Y., BY MRS. CLARA NEYMAN.

Though I do not come among you as a delegate of any special German Society, I do not think that I assume too much when I express the great and warm interest our German Liberals take in your movement.

Our German independent newspapers—the Boston Pioneer, Milwaukee Freidenker, and others of a like tendency, are rejoicing that their American brothers give decisive expression to liberal thoughts. They encourage and advocate coöperation and consider it the best and surest means for success. But not only do our independent papers respond to your call and prepare the way for united action amongst the Liberals of the country, but I have also noticed that in more independent circles great pleasure is felt at the practical measures which the Liberal League is trying to introduce.

You are aware, I suppose of our German reputation—that our country has ever had great theorists, idealists, and many subtle thinkers. The Germans of this country have inherited somewhat of that peculiar tendency, and while our Freethinkers have worked for years, diffused Liberal principles and educated Freethought, they have not succeeded in bringing their views before the National Liberal League, and only commenced last year to secure public action upon their proclaimed principles.

The American, on the contrary, is noted for his practical good sense. Very often it happens that before an idea is fully developed, before he can realize the depth and magnitude of a question, even before the question has taken accurate shape in the minds of the people, he is willing to test it by a political indorsement.

The coöperation of the two nationalities, with their diverse gifts and characteristics, each excellent if not carried too far, is therefore of great importance. The German gladly recognizes the quickness and intelligence of his American friend, and I hope that our American friends do equally appreciate the sincerity, the earnestness and accurate reasoning of their German co-workers.

During the last two years the German Freethinkers have made great progress in their organization, and every well-wisher to the Liberal cause ought to advocate a union, ought to use all his influence for the establishment of a mutual and harmonious activity. Single, we are weak; united, we shall be strong.

The indorsement and support of the German element will be gained so much the easier, as they have long felt and discussed the dangers which are threatening our free institutions. Catholicism is growing more and more daring every year; its widespread influence, its untiring efforts, its zeal is a constant anxiety to the liberal-minded. The Catholic religionists would like to celebrate a new revival in this country; and well may they succeed if their actions are not better guarded, if they are left unmolested to spread their creed and its evil influences.

There is no question upon which our German population are so united, no question upon which their feelings can be so easily aroused, as the question of religious independence. They may differ about questions of finance, of civil service reform, of prohibition; they may even find it difficult to decide which of the two political parties is the most erect, the most trustworthy; they may bring weighty arguments against woman suffrage and dispute her participation in public affairs; but on the free religious question they are, on the whole, more unanimous, more enlightened than their American brethren and, I think I may add, quite as enthusiastic. Why this is so, the student of the history and development of Germany will easily perceive.

While other European nations had directed their best efforts and greatest talents to political affairs, to national aggrandizement, to military and commercial glories, Germany's best talent was engaged in philosophical and literary pursuits. Our earnest men endeavored to unravel the mysteries of life; they were engaged in solving the problem of human existence. They were digging, searching, investigating the nature of the mysterious phenomena of life; they tried to explain man's destiny upon earth, his relation to himself, his duty towards his fellow-men, and his connection with and dependence upon surrounding nature.

It is true that their way of reasoning was not always correct; that they lost themselves at times in their dangerous flights and carried their speculations into untraceable regions, still their critical reasoning, their clear logic, the great ethical laws which they established independent of religious worship or Bible-teaching, took root in the mind and heart of the people and prepared the way for the religious change which the new scientific revelations are now making more complete. The German philosophers had reasoned out deductively what our scientists to-day manifest through induction by a verification of facts and actual proofs. The harmony of the Universe, the laws by which our life is governed, the nature of man's duties and responsibilities, what effect good and virtuous actions have on the individual, on society, on the State—ethical and esthetical questions which form the basis of a higher life and a nobler being—these and other problems they discussed ably and intelligently in their writings. Reflections of so grave a nature emancipated the people from the churches long ago, and greatly lessened the influence of the priesthood.

On my way home last year from Europe I met an American clergyman who had spent a few weeks in Germany. He told me that he was greatly puzzled about my country people. He had found them on the whole to be good, honest, trusty, inclined to walk in the paths of virtue and righteousness, and yet they were Infidels. They did not support the churches; and the comparatively few churches extant were attended principally by women and children. Very true. The intelligent German has long ago outgrown the established and popular creed. His morality is not dependent upon the Bible teaching; his ethics rest on a firmer structure, and his actions are not guided by the fear of an angry God or a reward in a hereafter.

It is not so with the majority of Americans. The Bible has been the only source—and alas! it is so still—from which the great nation has drawn its inspiration for right-doing and right-thinking. The Bible is the book out of which they have received instruction in morality; their consciences have been formed according to its fallacious teachings. A book which has been written nearly two thousand years, containing some noble, sentiments but more errors than true convictions; more false statements than true ones, serves to-day an intelligent race as the sole instigator, the sole inspirer to moral virtues, moral conduct, and moral excellences! Is it to be wondered at that our social edifice is trembling to its very foundation, that vice is multiplying; that sin is increasing, that the infection is spreading; and that the passions are breaking through their artificial restraints? Distrust is undermining our social, commercial and political relations. Honest men are losing all confidence; theft has become a universal vice; stealing, defrauding, embezzling, absconding under some cunning device, are every-day occurrences. The temptation to go astray has taken a hold upon the people. And mind! it is not amongst the poor and needy; not amongst the lower orders of society that vice is increasing. There are many, it is true, who are driven by want and by a neglected education towards dishonesty and licentiousness. It is not to them I am referring now. The malady of evil, the debasing propensities, have reached our upper and middle classes as well. Our well-to-do and well-cared-for sons and daughters—the children of honest parents—are infected with the moral pestilence.

Their education has been first-class; they have attended the Sunday-school regularly; they have been devout church members, and their love for God cannot be doubted. They have lately read about the new science; they have seen extracts from Darwin's "Origin of Species," from Huxley's explanation of the evolution of the Universe, from Spencer's Sociology, of Tyndall's lecture on Light and Electricity. They are puzzled. Why? This is all in contradistinction to what the Bible teaches; that differs widely from what they had learned, what they had read in the book of books. Either here or there, there must be falsehood.

The average American is quick to see, intelligent to perceive. The new revelations are much more convincing; there is sense, proof, rationality in all this; he is beginning to doubt; his faith is tottering and he has broken loose from the old before he is himself aware of it. But he dares not acknowledge it; he is not brave enough to break from the customary habits or to face his friends with the truth; besides, it would cost him his position. What would his friends say if he were to give up his pew in church? And so he goes on doubting until he doubts the very essence of all religion. He must practice hypocrisy to accommodate the old to the new; the voice of conscience is growing more faint as he advances; and the time comes when it is hushed down, and the love of self, the lower passions rule him throughout.

The anathemas against the new revelations are of no avail. Its doctrines have already advanced too far. The spell of the church is broken; and the sooner it is recognized the better for man's happiness and his ultimate advancement.

The Liberals have a great work before them. They have to educate the people's conscience, so that they may perceive the new truth. They have to establish a new morality derived from scientific experiences. The Religion of Humanity must have a fixed standard of morals. It has to show and explain the evil effects of vice—how it acts upon ourselves, our children and our posterity. The Liberals have to explain, teach, expound, make clear the laws by which our life is governed. They have to show that our actions are indeed foreordained by a wise unrelenting power of nature, and that a neglect of these laws will be punished here amongst our own kind and kindred. Every noble act, every sacrifice for the good and the true is a benediction to those nearest to our hearts, and brings bliss and happiness to mankind.

Righteousness means happiness in the visible world. Goodness and purity of action produces goodness and purity of sentiment. Goodness is and always will be good; badness is and always will be bad. The Liberals have to popularize the sciences, show their bearings upon all the relations of life and make the right application of the manifold beneficial discoveries. They have also to show the value of esthetical culture; how inspiring, ennobling and elevating the different arts and sciences have been in the past; that the cultivation of art is a necessity—a necessary part in the education of a civilized community. They have also to show that the most lovely and amiable, the most beautiful sentiments are an outgrowth of elevated and intelligent thought, leading us to higher spheres of action; that these lovely sentiments are by no means peculiar to the Christian Religion, but belong to all ages and to every civilized country. Man's vanity, his ambition, his self-love, his egotism, have to be directed to loftier spheres, where there is satisfaction without satiety, gratification without repentance. What has been held out to be gained in a future life has to be realized here, and it has to be shown that this can only be when all men and all women know and fulfil their duties, love and show proper regard for their fellow beings.

"Love thy neighbor as thyself," "Do unto others as you would have others do unto you," are no religious creeds, but maxims of life which have to be carried into our daily intercourse. These maxims have a deep meaning, a wide significance; they contain the wisdom of ages, of experience. Love is indeed life; it encases, builds up, smooths the path and magnifies every being, every emotion, every act. Hatred and ill-feeling are debasing, destroying and leading us on to destruction. The Religion of Humanity is carrying out the fundamental doctrines of the old creed—doctrines which have been obscured and neglected by outward formalities and coarse egotism. The Christian Religion, once pure and simple, has long ago forgotten the beautiful maxims of its founder; its redeeming qualities are almost hidden by the selfishness, ignorance and prejudice of its followers. The old idea has so renewed itself again that it has to be enlarged and placed on a new pedestal.

Life is full of sacrifice, but man wants to know why he shall sacrifice. He cannot soar on high without a clear ideal held out for his reach. The temptations to go astray are too strong, vice is too alluring, and his ignorance of causes and effects is too great. The new ideal is loftier, more beautiful, more inspiring than it ever was, but it wants to be proclaimed, it awaits its new apostles.

The Liberals must stand firmly together; we have a great, an arduous work before us, and we have a mighty enemy to contend against.

Success can only be gained by a close alliance, by self-sacrifice and by a clearness of purpose. We have to be magnanimous toward those who cannot sympathize with our cause, severe, unrelenting but just toward our opponents. Many of us may have to give up our own less important schemes for the sake of the party and its success. Our demands are founded upon reason, and so let our actions, our deeds be guided by a superior wisdom, and may we never forget the high aim we are pursuing! Let us have a clear perception of our ideal, and let the ideal stand out in vivid colors before the mind's eye, so that we may gain strength and endurance for the arduous task upon which we start out to a better life—a nobler existence.

The Jew.

MR. EDITOR: In the present progressive endeavor to right wrong and suppress tyrannies, the Jews stand prominently forward for a little tardy justice. Christian persecution and intolerance have so long strongly impressed and prejudiced the world against this ancient race, and referred to them as the personification of all contemptible meanness, that it is the fewest number of even liberal people who comprehend the fendish wrong done this long-suffering people. For eighteen centuries it has been the rule, wherever the Christian upas tree has tainted the air, to malign, taunt, rob, murder, and banish the Jew, simply because he was a Jew; not because he committed any offense against established law, or was anything but an orderly, peaceful citizen, but only on account of his faithful adherence to his ancient religion. The hate has been varied in intensity only by progressive civil liberty, still the venom was there. But why this hate? They say it is because the Jews killed Jesus, their Savior; but in the event of their not having done so, there would have been no atonement, and the last shadow of a Christian would have been damned to all eternity. So right here the Jew deserves the everlasting gratitude and reverence of every Christian on the face of the earth. More than this, Christianity was an impossibility without the Jewish Biblical foundation.

The very fact of the Israelite retaining his ancient faith and holding so tenaciously to the old land-marks of his race in one unbroken history for over six thousand years, though living in active contact with every important nationality on the globe, is a proof of some inherent intrinsic truth in his religion and principles. The insignificant ritualistic observances of the faith of his forefathers are recognized more as sacred, time-honored symbols by the educated few than as positive worship. Considering the fewness of their numbers in civilization in comparison with other nationalities, their great percentage, above them all, of distinguished scholars, erudite philosophers, artists, and great commercial financiers becomes a subject of respectful wonder. Remember, the Jew has fought his way against fearful odds. In his art he was not encouraged by priestly patronage until by superior merit he forced it. In his commercial pursuits it was piously lawful to rob him. In philosophical thought he was ignored until anti-Christian intellectual thought saw and recognized the great kinship of his ideas. In every undertaking in Christendom he has been compelled to struggle against prejudice and persecution. Out of such conditions can the Israelite be expected to develop any but the strongest clannish peculiarities?

If their poor offer cheap china for old clothes, they do not beg. If they make shrewd bargains, they are rarely found in penitentiaries. If they have little respect for the Christian Sunday, they are seldom found in prisons for law-breaking. If they feel violent resentments, they are not often, if ever, seen mounting a murderer's scaffold; and yet ignorant bigotry contemptuously sneers at the Jews, calling them "Christ-killers," as though they were the worst criminals on the broad earth.

Christians would never admit that the Jew has at all aided in civilizing the human race, but historical facts give the lie to all such intolerant statements. Scholarly literature, scientific knowledge, and the finest types of artistic taste are reforming and civilizing beyond gainsaying—and these the Jew has given to the world, more, in proportion to his numbers, than any other race of people.

I respectfully raise my hat to their refined genius and indomitable, stubborn perseverance, and bow in humble reverence to their grand historical past, which reaches back in golden links until lost in the obscurities of ancient time.

MARY J. HOLMES.

These persecutions were urged on by the Fathers of the Church. Eusebius eulogized Constantine for his edicts against the pagan worship. Augustine used all the powers of his brilliant mind to fan the flame of persecution, drawing his arguments from the commands for the extirpation of idolatry in the Old Testament, and from the sinfulness of unbelief as taught in the New.

St. Augustine declared that in his time the sentence of death was incurred by any one who celebrated the rites of the religion which had been universal but a few centuries previous, and that this sentence was unanimously applauded by the whole Christian Church.

When paganism was suppressed the persecuting spirit of the Christian system exhibited itself in the attempts made to extirpate by violence every heresy that appeared, although when the Church had been for some time supreme, when for centuries the influence of the Church had permeated every relation of life, and by suppressing all critical spirit and paralyzing the mental faculties, had produced a harmony between herself and the faith and feeling of the people, there was seldom the intellectual activity to doubt, or the courage openly to oppose the persecutions or authority. Yet when, occasionally, a heresy did appear, she exerted her power to crush it, and with the first movement of intellectual life, with the first divergence from the old line of thought, true to her principle, true to her instinct, she exercised her authority and might to arrest it.

What an innumerable multitude have suffered and perished by violence that the Christian religion might live! It has been estimated that the controversy about transubstantiation, which raged at intervals all over Christendom, cost the lives of between three and four hundred thousand human beings. The famous image controversy, ecclesiastical historians say, cost fifty thousand lives. During the persecution instigated in the ninth century against the Manicheans, incited by Theodora, widow of Theophilus, there fell in Greece, it has been computed, more than one hundred thousand.

The loss of life by the religious wars known as the Crusades, which Gibbon calls "the world's debate," was not less, probably, than five millions of human beings. There were seven distinct expeditions. When the first of these was announced, it is said six millions of warriors assumed the red cross. "European nations," says Mosheim, "were deprived of the greatest part of their inhabitants by these ill-judged expeditions; immense sums of money were exported into Asia for the support of the war, and numbers of the most powerful and opulent families either became extinct or were involved in the deepest miseries of poverty and want. It could not easily be otherwise, since the leaders of the most illustrious houses either mortgaged or sold their land and possessions in order to pay the expenses of their voyage, while others imposed such intolerable burdens upon their vassals and tenants as obliged them to abandon their houses and all their domestic concerns, and to enlist themselves, rather through wild despair than religious zeal, under the sacred banner of the cross. Hence the face of Europe was totally changed and all things were thrown into the utmost confusion. We pass in silence the various enormities that were occasioned by these crusades, the murders, rapes and robberies of the most infernal nature that were everywhere committed with impunity by those holy soldiers of God and of Christ, as they were impiously called; nor shall we enter into a detail of the new privileges and rights to which these wars gave rise, and which were often attended with the greatest inconvenience. Whole legions of bishops and abbots girded the sword to the thigh, and went as generals, volunteers, or chaplains, into Palestine; the priests who had lived under their jurisdiction and were more or less awed by their authority threw off all restraint, and led the most lawless and profligate lives, and abandoned themselves to all sorts of licentiousness, committing the most flagitious and extravagant excesses without reluctance or remorse" (Eccl. Hist., vol. i, p. 25-7).

Bernard, whose zeal and eloquence contributed largely to arouse Europe to the second crusade, boasted that when the expedition started "scarcely one man was left for the consolation of seven widows." For centuries the fairest regions of the earth were reddened with human blood and covered with human skulls. And the object of these terrible wars was to get Palestine, because it contained the empty sepulchre of Jesus, and because the Bible declares that God said unto Abraham, "Unto thy seed will I give this land."

Mosheim says, in alluding to the Saracens, that "had they been infected with the same odious spirit of persecution that possessed the crusaders, there would not, perhaps, have remained a single Christian in that part of the world (Asia). But though these Infidels were chargeable with various crimes and had frequently treated the Christians in a rigorous and injurious manner, they looked with horror upon those scenes of persecution which the Latins exhibited as the exploits of heroic piety, and considered it as the highest and most atrocious mark of injustice and cruelty to force unhappy men to abandon their religious principles, or to put them to death because they refused to change their opinions" (Ibid, p. 337).

The extermination of the Albigenses forms another dark page in the history of Catholic Christianity. This unfortunate people were murdered without pity because they would not change their religion. Thirty thousand men, women and children were butchered in one day. When some of the leaders declared that among the crowd they could not distinguish the believers from the unbelievers, the legate of the Pope replied, "Kill on, God will know those which are his own." At Beziers 80,000 were put to death, and in almost every town in Languedoc, without regard to age, sex or condition, similar outrages were perpetrated.

The expatriation of the Moriscos, the unfortunate remnant of the Moorish nation, from Spain, at the instigation of the Spanish Church, is another great crime with which Christianity is justly chargeable. "About one million of the most industrious inhabitants of Spain," says Buckle, "were hunted like wild beasts because the sincerity of their religious opinions was doubtful. Many were slain as they approached the coast; others were beaten and plundered; and the majority, in the most wretched plight, sailed for Africa. During the passage, the crew in many of the ships rose upon them, ravished the women, and threw the children into the sea. Those who escaped this fate landed on the coast of Barbary, where they were attacked by Bedouins, and many of them put to the sword. Others made their way into the desert and perished from famine. Of the number of lives actually sacrificed we have no authentic account, but it is said on a very good authority that in one expedition, in which 140,000 were carried to Africa, upwards of 100,000 suffered death in its most frightful form within a few months after their expulsion from Spain" (Hist. Civ. vol. ii, p. 49-50).

Yet this was a remnant of the people that had made Spain illustrious among the nations of the earth. And at this late period, when the priesthood were urging the expulsion of these Moriscos, the Spanish barons pleaded in their favor that they were "the most valuable part of the Spanish population." When they were thrust out of Spain, says Buckle, "there was no one to fill their place; arts and manufactures either degenerated or were entirely lost, and immense regions of arable land were left uncultivated. Whole districts were suddenly deserted, and down to the present day have never been repopulated. These solitudes gave refuge to smugglers and brigands, who succeeded the industrious inhabitants formerly occupying them; and it is said that from the expulsion of the Moriscos is to be dated the existence of those organized bands of robbers, which, after this period, became the scourge of Spain, and which no subsequent government has been able entirely to extirpate" (Ibid p. 52-53).

Shiloh Home.

This is another effort in socialism, made by W. B. Billings, the writer of "Spiritual Evolution proven from History," published in the New Ch. Independent, but more generally known by his letters upon Shakerism. The following is the result of a year and a half of prospecting and pioneer work:

A tract of about 400 acres of land has been purchased in Pike Co., Pa., two and a half miles from the Bushkill P. O., and thirteen miles from Strontsburg, on the Del., L., & W. R. R.

Of this land, about twenty-five acres are now in garden, orchard, meadow, and pasture, with frame house (unfurnished) with ten rooms. The soil has few equals and no superiors for all kinds of roots, vegetables, and fruits, such as berries, peaches, plums, pears, apples, and grapes. The product of the place this season has been 600 quarts of strawberries and sixty bushels of peaches—marketed at better prices than were paid in New York or Philadelphia—and fifty-two gallons of wine from grapes, with five tons of hay, a few bushels of wheat and rye, and vegetables.

Peaches were gathered this season measuring nine inches in circumference. The elevation of about 500 feet above the Delaware River, three miles to the south, saves the fruits from the late and early frosts, while the air is of the purest, and the water of the very best. Chestnuts and butternuts grow in great abundance and of the finest quality.

There are two streams of water running through the property, upon which are falls, and scenery about them much sought after. The falls are known as the "Little Bushkill" and "Pond Run" Falls, but lately named "Union Falls." The Home will derive a good income from these Falls by serving refreshments to visitors and from summer boarders.

The property is held in trust by Henry J. Newton and Dr. J. B. Newbrough of New York and Hannah L. Marsh, for an "Industrial and Educational Institution or Home for Women and Children."

The social basis of the Home will be much like that of the Hicksite Friends upon the marriage question, and as set forth in the "Science of a New Life," by John Cowan, and in the "Better Way," by A. E. Newton.

The Bennett-Teed Discussion.

I.—JESUS CHRIST IS NOT ONLY DIVINE, BUT IS THE LORD GOD, CREATOR OF HEAVEN AND EARTH.

MR. BENNETT'S FIRST REPLY.

MR. CYRUS ROMULUS R. TEED, Dear Sir: I must confess myself not a little surprised at your opening letter, and I am at a loss how to reply. It seems to me much like a sophomoric compound of metaphysics and gnosticism that has about as much relation to the proposition that "Jesus Christ is God and Creator of heaven and earth" as it has to the discovery of the North Pole. I know very little about metaphysics, and am inclined to think the Scotchman was not far from right when, in describing what metaphysics is, he said, "When a man talks what nobody knows anything about and what he knows nothing about himself, that is metaphysics." It is much like the ignis fatuus, now here, now there, now nowhere, now something, now nothing. I would fain be a little like the Irishman in the melee at Donnybrook Fair—wherever he saw a head, to hit it. But I do not like to strike at nothing. I remember in my boyhood days that a friend of mine injured himself badly by kicking at nothing. He aimed to kick a dog that offended him and he let his foot fly with full force, but the dog was watchful and agile, and sprang out of the way, and my unfortunate friend hit nothing and ruptured himself for life. I have since been wary about striking and kicking at nothing.

It is possible that in order to prove that Jesus Christ is the person who got up the earth, the sun, the planets, and the countless millions of other suns and worlds, the kind of argument outlined in your opening letter is just the thing that is necessary, but if that is the case, I fear I shall be incompetent to meet you. When I cannot see where I am going, and can have no conception of the road I am pursuing, I do not feel anxious to prosecute my journey. I prefer something definite, solid, and certain—to travel in the light rather than in darkness and mists.

I supposed that in you I would meet a defender of genuine orthodox theology, but I begin to suspect that I was mistaken. You say that it is not your ambition to bolster up any system of religious belief founded on the Bible; that you are "not bound by theological dogmas," and in your "card" you say you are "in no sense upholding modern theology." The inquiry naturally arises, What do you defend? Possibly your system might be denominated a species of Teedism that I will scarcely know how to oppose. I hope at all events that you will give me something that I can comprehend—tangible arguments that need not be misunderstood. Perhaps when you get warmed up with your subject you will give me as solid arguments as I can manage, and as numerous as I can desire.

Before you claim that Jesus is God and the creator of all worlds, all beings, and all existences, I will ask you to prove that he had an actual existence himself. I know of no proof that he was anything more than a myth, save the narrations ascribed to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, and some of the books in the apocryphal New Testament; and as these narrations were not known to be in existence for some two centuries or more after the period in which he was said to have come into the world, those stories sadly need confirmation.

His life and adventures were so near a copy of personages who had lived hundreds of years earlier in the world and performed the same works and led the same kind of a life attributed to him, that it is easy to understand that he did not have an actual existence, but that he was a character gotten up after a previous pattern. With the models before the early Christian writers, it was no more difficult to get up the character of Jesus than it was that of Robinson Crusoe, Sinbad the Sailor, Blue Beard, the Wandering Jew, or David Copperfield. In all ages of the world there have been men with fertile imaginations who have been capable of inventing and dressing up characters which existed in the imagination only. I would like some proof that Jesus was not a similar character.

Before I can accept the claim that Jesus Christ was the creator of all matter and all substances I wish you to show that down to eighteen hundred years ago he had the slightest comprehension about the laws and affinities governing matter, and that he knew anything of the science of chemistry. Before I can believe that he was the author of all life, vegetable and animal, you will have to show me that he understood the first principles of biology; that he knew the nature of protoplasm, and that he was acquainted with the gradations existing between inorganic and organic matter; also, that he knew something of the subtle forces of electricity, magnetism, nervous energy, etc., which are known to be component qualities in animal life; that he understood the laws of digestion, assimilation, the circulation of the blood, the secretions and excretions, as well as the natural supply for the wastes of the system. Before I can admit that he was the author of all form of life, I shall have to be assured that he understood the laws of life, the functions of the brain and nervous system, the lungs, the liver, the stomach, the spleen, and every part and organ of animals and men.

Before I can acknowledge that he was the author of the sciences I shall have to be convinced that he knew something about them. Before I can admit that he devised mathematics I must know that he at least knew the multiplication table and could do a sum in simple addition. Before I can believe that he got up the science of astronomy I must be satisfied that he understood that the earth revolved on its axis every twenty-four hours; that it performed a journey around the sun every three hundred and sixty-five days; that the sun is an immense body around which, in a similar manner, revolve numerous planets, asteroids and satellites; that the distant suns and stars constitute systems and constellations beyond the comprehension of man. Before I can yield that he was the author of geology, you will have to show me that he understood all about the nature of the geologic ages—the Silurian, the Devonian, the carboniferous, the reptilian and the mammalian; that he comprehended the character of all the primitive and composite rocks, the granite and sandstone of various kinds, shale, conglomerate, limestone, green sand, chalk, etc. Before I can consent that he was the inventor of chemistry I ask you to prove to me that he knew of the existence of oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen, carbon, etc., and that he understood something of the manner and proportions in which they combine, forming the innumerable forms of substance that exist. Before I admit him the designer of geometry I shall need to be convinced that he understood the nature of a parallelogram, a right-angled triangle, a rhomboid, a pentagon, and Euclid's pons asinorum. Before I can acknowledge that he knew everything and was the author of all knowledge, I ask you to demonstrate that he really knew as much as an ordinary school-boy ten years of age in these days.

If Jesus is God, the Supreme Ruler of the Universe, will you please explain how he came to be so? How did he come into existence prior, I mean, to the time he was born of that Jewish maiden who was espoused to Joseph the carpenter? You speak of Nature as having an author, and of the Universe as having been created. If these needed a source, origin or creator, why not Jesus? And why is it not just as reasonable that he is an effect as they? How can you demonstrate that he is a cause and not an effect?

You say: "That Jesus Christ is the Lord God, and Creator of heaven and earth, I claim on his own authority." In the first place I don't believe he ever made such an absurd assertion—that he was creator of heaven and earth; and in the next place, if he did, that would not make it so. I might declare that I had made heaven and earth, and you might do the same, but that would not make it true. Nature has no author; it never was invented. The Universe was never made. Something was never made from nothing, and all the Gods and all the Jesuses that men ever devised could not make an ounce of something from the whole expanse of nothing. Whatever exists to-day, ever did exist in some form; and if it ever existed, it has ever combined with the powers or forces that are inseparable from it. Having had such existence, all the modifications that have taken place with it have been changes of form, or evolution. Eternal change is the order of the Universe; but not a particle of the substance of which it is composed can by any possibility be lessened or increased.

You insist that cause and effect are of the same value and precisely equal; then, if Jesus was the cause of the Universe, and it was just equal to him, he was simply changed into the Universe, and as the Universe still is, it is only Jesus in another form; and what was once Jesus became the Universe, and Jesus, as such, ceased to exist. If that is true—and according to your reasoning it must be—the Jesus that came into the world nearly nineteen hundred years ago was a fraud and was not the real Jesus who became the Universe and consequently ceased to exist as himself. As the boy could not both eat his cake and keep it uneaten, so a cause cannot become an effect and still remain the same original cause. But I trust you will explain all these difficulties and tell us in plain language, free from metaphysics, how Jesus Christ came to be the great original cause, and then how he could become the great effect and still continue, unimpaired, the same cause.

Metaphysics deals not with things—with actualities—but only with vagaries and idealities. It will do well enough, while talking about Gods, First Causes, and ideal Jesuses; but when we approach real existences of matter and force it is inadequate to reach them and must be ruled out.

You assume to prove some of your positions by the Bible; now, let me say to you in the kindest spirit in the world that I cannot accept that volume as authority for anything until you first prove it to be true and reliable. It sadly needs confirmation, and when you can take the leisure to establish its truth I will be glad if it may suit you to do so.

I see you divide the story told in Genesis up into eras or series, but did you not drop your system too soon? If planting the trees of life and knowledge was the first series, placing man in the garden to dress it was the second, putting Adam to sleep and performing a surgical operation upon him by abstracting a rib, of which small bone God manufactured a plump, blooming, blushing woman, was the third, and driving the unfortunate pair out of the garden was the fourth, why was not God's repenting that he had made man the fifth; the departure of Cain to the Land of Nod, where he found a wife, the sixth; the murder of Abel the seventh; the cursing of Cain the eighth; the determination of God to drown out the world the ninth; the building of the ark the tenth; the embarking of the living cargo the eleventh; the pouring down of the rain for forty days and forty nights at the rate of six and a half inches per minute, or over thirty feet per hour, the twelfth; the landing of the ark and the disembarking of the two or three millions of quadrupeds, birds, reptiles, insects, and worms on the top of Mount Ararat, 17,000 feet above the level of the sea or five thousand feet above the line of perpetual frost, the thirteenth; Noah's getting drunk and exposing his person in an indecent manner while in a state of beastly intoxication the fourteenth; the cursing of Canaan, the son of Ham, and his posterity forever to slavery, the fifteenth; the setting of the bow in the clouds for the first time the sixteenth; the building of the Tower of Babel the seventeenth; the confounding of tongues the eighteenth; the call of Abraham the nineteenth; his falsehood about his wife being his sister the twentieth; his inhumanity in turning his concubine Hagar and his own child out into the desert to perish the twenty-first; his attempt to offer up his son Isaac as a burnt offering the twenty-second; the trick played on old man Isaac by Jacob the twenty-third; the sharp game played by Jacob at cattle-raising the twenty-fourth; his wrestling with God nearly all night the twenty-fifth; and so on down to the five or ten thousandth? If your division is correct, I claim mine to be also.

You promise to prove by the Bible itself that over twenty-four thousand years have passed since the creation of the world and of man. Your efforts will be watched with curiosity. I think you will have to do it in a metaphysical sense, or at least in a Pickwickian sense, for if the Bible is to be taken at its word in anything, it is not quite six thousand years yet since the sun, moon, earth, and all the stars were gotten up inside of a week. But you may have superior light upon the subject, or your style of argument may make every year into four. We shall see.

Very truly yours, D. M. BENNETT.

Brahminism was eminently an intellectual religion. Probably no system of theology has ever been devised containing more depth of thought or more transcendental philosophy. It was also, compared with other systems, pure and exalted. It was a system that contained much thought and a great depth of mental culture.

It, however, had its defects. It had a great multitude of priests. These priests were hereditary, and, by a ruinous system of caste, they were looked upon as being of better blood and of a higher grade of existence than the common classes. This system of caste was the bane and ruin of Brahminism. The priestly class became idle, dissolute, and worthless. Many excesses and corruptions crept into their system, including idol-worship, gross superstitions, and the many evils which grew out of them. The aristocracy of the Brahmins proved a great curse to the system and to the nation, and a reform was necessary to purify and redeem it from the grossest corruptions. Brahminism, for thousands of years, has been a popular religion, and to-day there are over 150,000,000 who acknowledge allegiance to its rule and power; but it has greatly degenerated from its early exalted station among the great religions of the earth.

Buddhism is the next system that demands our attention. It is of later date than the variety we have been considering, and in many respects is an improvement upon it. It has been said that Buddhism bears the same relation to Brahminism that Protestantism does to Catholicism.

I approach the consideration of Buddhism with a profound respect, for, take it all in all, I regard it as the grandest system of religion that the world has known, and as possessing fewer faults and extravagancies. Its founder was one of the best men, one of the purest teachers, one of the most faultless persons that the earth has produced; while not a little mysticism has been thrown around him, while a miraculous birth and conception has been claimed for him by his disciples and admirers, while it was held that he was begotten by a ray of the sun as it fell upon his mother, a virgin named Maia, and while it was also held that a variety of supernatural events occurred at and after the time of his birth, there is no doubt but there was such an individual as Buddha, and that he founded the greatest system of religion which mankind has yet embraced. He was of noble blood, and his early education was attended to with great care. At the early age of sixteen, it is said, he took a bride—the beautiful maiden Ila—in order to fulfill the requirement of the customs of the country. After the birth of a son he renounced his princely rank and gave his attention to heavenly meditations and ultra-religious pursuits. He adopted the life of an anchorite and separated himself from the world and spent years in deep thought and profound meditation. When he had passed through this severe preparatory course he was duly fitted to be a teacher to the multitudes that flocked to him for instruction, and his fame as a religious leader rapidly spread over several populous countries of Asia. His doctrines were pure, and contained little that was sensual or low. He incited his followers to the performance of good deeds and to the subduing of their baser animal passions. The morals he inculcated have hardly been excelled by any other great teacher. Love to man was the leading sentiment that controlled him, and he enjoined his followers to lead such lives as would give them peace of mind, contentment, and self-satisfaction.

The fundamental doctrine of Buddhism taught by its founder was incorporated in what he called the four sublime truths, to wit:

1. All existence is evil, because all existence is subject to change and decay.
2. The source of this evil is the desire for things which are to change and pass away.
3. This desire and the evil which follows it are not inevi table, for if we choose we can arrive at Nirvana, when both shall wholly cease.

4. There is a fixed and certain method to adopt, by pursuing which we attain this end without possibility of failure.

These four truths were the foundation upon which the system of Buddha was built: 1. The evil; 2. The cause; 3. Its end; 4. The way of reaching the end. Then follow the eight steps which lead to the way, namely:

1. Right belief, or the correct faith.
2. Right judgment, or the wise application of that faith to life.
3. Right utterance, or perfect truth in all that we say and do.
4. Right motives, or proposing always a proper end and aim.
5. Right occupation, or an outward life not involving sin.
6. Right obedience, or faithful observance of duty.
7. Right memory, or a proper recollection of past conduct.
8. Right meditation, or keeping the mind fixed on permanent truth.

After these eight steps or modes, follow certain commands and prohibitions, namely: five which apply to men, as follow: 1. Do not kill; 2. Do not steal; 3. Do not commit adultery; 4. Do not lie; 5. Do not become intoxicated; and five for the novices, making ten in all—namely: 1. Take no solid food after noon; 2. Do not visit dances, singing, or theatrical representations; 3. Use no ornaments or perfumery in dress; 4. Use no luxuriant beds; 5. Accept neither gold nor silver.

A very marked feature in Buddhism is the belief in and desire for Nirvana—a place of perfect rest and quiet—so near quiet as to amount almost to non-existence. This state is the highest ambition of the devout Buddhist, and he aspires to no more ecstatic pleasure than to enter into a state of bliss and perfect rest. This state so nearly resembles annihilation that many have been induced to believe that Buddhists do not believe in a future existence of the soul, and many regard them as out-and-out materialists, but upon closely looking into their system and becoming acquainted with their views it will be found that they do believe in the retention of the soul's individuality and of a conscious existence after death.

If there is little of immortality in Buddhism there is also little of a personal God. It may, perhaps, be said to have a God, but he is like the God of Materialism, simply the powers and forces of the Universe. It recognizes no anthropomorphic Being who can only occupy a single point in space at a given time. The Buddhist idea of God is grand and elevating—simply Nature's God. "The God of Buddhism is the Buddha himself, the deified man, who has become an infinite being by entering Nirvana. To him prayer is addressed. In Thibet and other countries where this religion prevails, prayer, even in the streets and on the highways, is much employed. It seems singular, when we see how free that religion is from many of the absurdities that have attached to other religions, that they still believed it necessary to perform penance, to deny themselves of the rational pleasures of life, and should deem such orders as monks and such institutions as monasteries as unlikely to be employed, but on the contrary they were greatly patronized, and a life of celibacy and strict self-denial was enjoined. As this system of religion came into existence some five hundred years earlier than Christianity, it is very fair to conclude that it was the source whence the latter system derived its monasteries and monks, its celibate vows, its confession of sins, and many of the symbols and sacraments employed. Those who have visited Buddhist countries have been struck with the great resemblance between that religion and Catholicism. The case of the pious French Abbé Huc who was sent as missionary to one of the Asiatic countries is doubtless well remembered. When he found that the religion prevailing there was so nearly like his own, he could not understand it, and came to the conclusion that the Devil had been there before him in order to controvert the work and purposes of God, and had instituted a system of religion so near like the true religion as it is in Christendom that the two could not be told apart.

Some of the commendable points in Buddhism are,

1. Its peaceful character. Although it has been in existence nearly three thousand years, it has not attempted to propagate itself by the sword. It has not waged war with other creeds with a view to overpowering them and subduing them to its will. It has been a bloodless religion and has been the means of driving very few out of the world in fear and terror or by violence.

2. It has fewer priests in proportion to the number of its followers than any other system of religion. The number of its priesthood is small, and they are allowed few prerogatives or exclusive privileges. It is eminently a democratic system which allows all its devotees to stand upon an equality.

3. It discards much of the clap-trap and flummery that pertains to other systems.

4. When it obtained power in several of the most populous countries on the globe, and reached the unparalleled number of 400,000,000 followers, it exhibited a wonderful spirit of toleration. It did not shed human blood; it did not try to suppress nor oppress those who deviated from its line of thought; it did not persecute; it established no Inquisition; it had no dungeons, racks, thumbscrews, pinners, burning-irons, with which to persuade unwilling men and women to embrace its dogmas. It had no autos da fe, no beheading-blocks for decapitating those who had the temerity to entertain opinions of their own.

If the number of believers can be taken as a test of the truth of a religion, or of the favor it has met with from the invisible powers which are imagined to rule this intricate business, Buddhism is the most true and the most favored of heaven, for it has during the last twenty-five centuries had double the number of followers of any other system of religion. It numbers to-day nearly three times as many followers as does the religion of Jesus, which is held to be par excellence the religion favored by heaven and to have been instituted by divine interference.

The Last Word.

Mr. R. Peterson has seen fit, in his issue of Common Sense for Nov. 1st, to insert nearly three columns of such scurrility, abuse and falsehood in reference to ourselves as no true gentleman would be guilty of. Our offense was that, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 1st, we published a brief letter from M. R. Nichols speaking affectionately of the death of a mutual young friend, Charles Stephenson, in which he gave the last words Stephenson ever wrote—written an hour or two before he breathed his last, and showing calmness, fearlessness and firmness on the part of the dying man. We were glad to lay his dying words before our readers. In the letter of Nichols, by way of parenthesis, was a brief allusion to a pamphlet young Stephenson had published. This was scarcely noticed by us when we hastily read the letter; and when we published it we had no more idea that we should offend Peterson than we now have that he is a gentleman. We had never made the slightest allusion to the troubles between Peterson, Stephenson and Nichols, one way or another. If we had entertained an opinion on the subject, we had given no public expression to it; nor did we care anything about it. We regarded it as a wrong spirit in Stephenson to write to Peterson as though he were glad that he (Peterson) had lost a child, and we said the same to Stephenson, but he best knew the provocations he had received that forced out such a sentiment. In the main we regarded Stephenson as a worthy and intelligent young man, and we did not think it incumbent upon us to become his enemy simply because Peterson was. He is dead now and cannot speak for himself, and we feel it to be only right to say a word in his defense.

The letter of Nichols was written in a good spirit, and we saw not the slightest objection to publishing it. It was but a fitting tribute to the memory of a dear and loved friend, and was couched in respectful language. We did not dream that there was any more harm in publishing it than any other obituary notice; but for doing this Peterson abuses us without stint and says many things totally untrue, and his conduct goes far to convince us that the estimate placed upon him by the young men was largely correct.

The epithet "living dog," which Peterson applied to the dead Stephenson, was rendered in our columns "lying dog," by an error of our printers, but was not so written by us. The correction was marked in the proof, but by mistake was omitted to be made. We certainly did not intend to change a word nor a letter of Peterson's venomous diatribe, as we are entirely willing that he should use such epithets and abusive language as he sees fit. We have not had the slightest intention of wronging him in a word we have said. We propose hereafter to let him alone, and we will thank him to treat us in the same manner. Not being a blackguard by nature and breeding, we cannot meet him on terms of equality.

"The Priest in Absolution."

The demand for this work has been so great that we have procured a copy from London at some expense, and have it now in press and will have it for sale in a few days; it being the only edition ever published in this country. It will be remembered by our readers that this is the work issued by the High Church authorities in England to the priesthood as a guide to the clergy in conducting auricular confession from young people and others. Its language is so plain that the authorities deemed it of an immoral character, and it was suppressed. Even the library authorities at Oxford refused to allow a person to see the copy they had in keeping, and a suit is now pending brought by the individual so denied. Probably no work ever issued from the press has been more sought for than the "Priest in Absolution," and none more difficult to obtain. This is from the latest London abstract edition. Price 25 cents. Orders may be addressed to this office.

Trial Subscribers.

We present our thanks to the friends who have sent us the names of so many persons who have not heretofore taken THE TRUTH SEEKER. Some have sent in as many as fifty names, and our list has been largely increased. We hope this good work will not stop here. There are thousands more who ought to read THE TRUTH SEEKER who up to this time have scarcely ever heard of it. We are still offering to send THE TRUTH SEEKER from Nov. 1st—the beginning of the "Bennett-Teed Discussion"—to Jan. 1st for 20 cents. If the friends of the paper will continue their generous efforts thousands of names may yet be sent in and thousands of minds may be enlightened by the truths found in these pages. If every friend would make up his mind to send in a name thousands more will subscribe for this out-spoken, fearless sheet. Let the names flow freely in.

THE FRUITS OF PHILOSOPHY has been going by the hundred and we can still fill more orders.

THE publication office of The Spiritual Offering has been removed from St. Louis to Springfield, Ill.

THE HUMPHREY-BENNETT DISCUSSION continues to go off "like hot cakes," but still we have a few hundred more left for those who want them. A large book, full of choice instruction, for one dollar!

HORACE SEAVER, editor of the Boston Investigator, was knocked down in the streets of Boston, on the 27th of October, with something like a slungshot in the hands of an unprincipled ruffian, who could have had no possible motive or adequate justification for such a villainous assault. We are glad to hear that the injuries are not likely to prove permanent.

Paine Vindicated.

Those who wish Ingersoll's powerful defense of Paine against the slanderous attacks of the New York Observer can be accommodated. We can supply orders for from one to one thousand. Our edition is the only one which contains the Observer's article. The whole thing only ten cents or 75 cents per dozen, including postage. The Observer is again out with another batch of Christian lies against Paine, and we hope "Bob" will give it one more blast.

On Saturday evening last, as the closing meeting of a Free-love Convention was being held in Nassau Hall, Boston, in which E. H. Heywood of The Word, Princeton, Mass., was one of the presiding officers, the notorious Anthony Comstock arrested him and took him to Charles St., prison. Heywood had stepped into an ante-room on business, whereupon Comstock arrested him and demanded that Heywood accompany him at once. Heywood wanted to know by what authority he was arrested and by whom, but Comstock gave no satisfaction, saying that if he did not go peaceably at once he would take him without his hat or overcoat. He was not even allowed to see his wife and brother. The manner of Comstock was imperious and intolerant. Heywood was able to give bail in the sum of $1,500, and the preliminary examination is to take place on Tuesday the 13th. The charge is disseminating obscene literature. This is another instance of inquisitorial tyranny, delegated by government to this meddlesome, prying personage. Will the people of this country always submit to such an obnoxious censorship of the press? It would seem that this Christian Paul Pry might be better employed than to be ever sticking his nose into other people's business. It would be a good thing, too, if our immaculate law makers would withdraw from this individual some of the power to annoy honest people which they unwisely placed in his hands.

New Books—The "Holy Cross" Series.

We have in active preparation the following series of pamphlets, bearing upon the acts and practices of the Church from the sixth century to the present time. Some of them are works that have been tabooed and expurgated by European authorities, and are now for the first time to be published in America:

- No. 1. "The Priest in Absolution." 25 cents.
- No. 2. "The Confessional Unmasked; or, Holy Immorality," showing the depravity of the priesthood and the crimes of the confessional, giving the form of questions put to females in confession, etc., etc. Translated from the Latin, and taken from the Theological Works used in Maynooth College, Ireland, and sanctioned by the "Sacred Congregation of Rites." 50 cents.
- No. 3. "The Mother of Harlots; or, Popery Dissected," being an inside view of the enormities of the Romish Church in Europe and America, and taken from authentic sources. 50 cents.
- No. 4. "The Popes and their Doings; or, the Vicars of Christ and Vicegerents of God." A succinct history of some of the blackest criminals the earth has ever borne. 50 cents.
- No. 5. "Facts About the Jesuits." A succinct history of these pious villains from Loyola down to the present date. 50 cents.
- No. 6. "The Story of the Crusades; or, the Shame of History." A terse and startling narrative of the foolhardy, fanatical and depopulating expeditions by which it is estimated the blood of 30,000,000 human beings was made to redder the earth. 50 cts.
- No. 7. "The Atrocities of the Inquisition," the blackest disgrace of humanity, by which, according to Victor Hugo, the great French writer, more than five millions of human beings were put to death in the most excruciating torture, in dungeons, on the rack, in the death-chamber, and at the stake in fire. This work will be illustrated. 50 cts.
- No. 8. "The Horrible Persecutions of the Church," including the conduct of the Church towards the Moors of Spain, the Vaudois, the Albigenses, the Waldenses, the Huguenots, the Quakers, and others, by which millions of unfortunate men and women were inhumanly put to death. Illustrated. 50 cts.
- No. 9. "Auricular Confession and Nunneries," by Wm. Hogan, twenty-five years a confessing priest. A most important book. 25 cts.
- No. 10. "Maria Monk, or the Mysteries of a Convent, alias Monks and their Maidens." 25 cts.
- No. 11. "Priestly Celibacy Exposed." By Rev. George Townsend Fox. A full disclosure of foul priestly practices. 15 cts.
- No. 12. "Newton's Thoughts on Popery." 15 cts.
- No. 13. "Popery only Christian Paganism." 15 cts.
- No. 14. "From Windsor to Rome, through Anglican Sisterhoods." 10 cts.
- No. 15. "The Secrets of Ritualism, a Word of Warning." By Rev. C. H. Wainwright, A. M. 10 cts.
- No. 16. "Monastic Institutions." 10 cts.
- No. 17. "The Church of Rome and Image Worship." 10c.
- No. 18. "Escaped from the Snare." By an ex-Jesuit. 10c.
- No. 19. "Reasons for Abjuring Allegiance to the See of Rome." 10 cts.
- No. 20. "Sister Lucy, and Disclosures at New Hall Convent." 10 cts.
- No. 21. "Convents and Confessionals." By Rev. H. Seymour. 10 cts.
- No. 22. "Plea for Inspection and Suppression of Nunneries." 10 cts.
- No. 23. "Apostolic Binding and Loosing." 5 cts.
- No. 24. "Convent Education and Nunnery Victims." 5c.
- No. 25. "Domestic Wives and Religious Sisters." 5cts.

Numerous others will follow as rapidly as possible.

Letter from Moses Hull.

MR. EDITOR: I have just arisen from a perusal of your discussion with G. H. Humphrey. I like it; I like it all. Mr. Humphrey is quite a man—too much of a man to be a minister. He thoroughly understands how to make the most out of his evidence. His efforts to prove that Christians had done everything and Infidels nothing toward establishing a Republican form of government, reminds me of a little trick of the Christians in the city of Battle Creek, Mich., in 1884. Everybody was urged to do all they could for the Soldier's Aid Society; so the Society of Spiritualists and Infidels sent out their begging committees a la church, and beside that got up a strawberry and ice cream festival and raised, I think, one hundred and thirty dollars in money and goodies for sick and wounded soldiers. This money and these goodies were carried to the officers of the society, who deposited them with the common fund raised by the church. When the report was made it was observed that our hard-earned contribution was counted in with the sum total of what our city had done and was credited to the churches.

I have related this several times, and have found that in nearly every instance where I have told it, some one has known of similar games being played by the sharp Christians on Infidels and Spiritualists. Ever since Jacob was rightly named "supplanter," and cheated his brother Esau out of his blessing and his father-in-law out of cattle, the children of God have been too sharp for sinners. How many games similar to the above have been practised upon our Infidel Revolutionary brothers, it will take the judgment day to decide.

One thing more; Bro. Humphrey would have us believe that Christians have, with their own money, built and endowed every college and almost everything from colleges down to pigpens, but one case will illustrate how they have done much of that work.

I was called once to go three hundred miles to lecture on Spiritualism and kindred subjects. The man who wrote me assured me that the Infidels and Spiritualists were few and poor (and I will add, stingy), but could I come for my traveling expenses or a very little more, it would be an act of charity, inasmuch as it would help them. I consented to do so. On the same day that I was to be there there was to be a great Methodist meeting. They had just finished a church which was to be dedicated, so in the forenoon we—the Infidels and Spiritualists—went in. After the dedicatory discourse the presiding elder says: "Now we are in debt five thousand dollars on this church. We don't want to give God a piece of mortgaged property. This debt must be paid now, here, to-day (Sunday)." So the rich Christians and Infidels stepped forward with their subscriptions, amounting in some instances to five hundred dollars each, and from that down as low as ten dollars. The two Infidels who accompanied me to that church—one of them seated on my right and the other on my left—arose, and one of them said: "You can put me down for fifty dollars." The other said: "Put me down for twenty." As they sat down, they looked at me and said: "This will help our business more than that amount." These men let me speak there nearly two weeks, and go away with not money enough to pay my railroad fare one way. The village papers came out that week with the boast that the Christians had raised money enough to pay off the entire debt on the new Methodist church. Yes, they did raise the money, but they milked the goats that stood at the "left hand" to do it. Now trace out the real history of all these Christian works, and it will be found that a goodly portion of this charitable butter was made from goat's milk.

I have not said what I took my pen to say. I see Mr. H. has a peculiar way of boasting of his condition, not by saying that he has read more than everybody else, but by accusing Infidels of not having investigated. He names over many works which he advises Infidels to read, and thinks their perusal would cure Infidelity. Now I have read almost every book he mentions—some of them several times—and many quite as good works he did not mention before I left the church. Nelson, Watson, Horn and Paley did more than all other authors to convince me that the Bible was only a human production. Whether I am capable of debating or not, Mr. Humphrey can find out by consulting any of the hundreds of people who used to hear me in Apollo Hall. I ask Mr. Humphrey to go into an oral discussion with me on the merits of the Bible or on the comparative merits of the Bible and Spiritualism, even including the Free-Loveism which he went so far out of his way to hit in his recent discussion with you. If Free-Loveism and licentiousness are the same, I, for one, wish to know it. If not, Bro. H. should take back his charge.

This letter is much longer than I intended to write. Any communication concerning a discussion or other matters will reach me at my residence and office, 31 Chapman street, Boston, Mass. Truly your brother, MOSES HULL.

From Miss Ella Gibson.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Nov. 2, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: Permit me to congratulate you on your success in book-making, also your victory in the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion," promising that your intended debate with the Rev. Mr. Teed will not be a whit behind its predecessor.

Further, I would express my joy at the prospect of a more successful combination of organized Liberal talent and effort in the Annual Convention of the National Liberal League, recently held in Rochester. Glad to see a "Conscience Party" proposed, since conscience is so completely left out of most parties and sects in Christendom.

Would further offer my services as a lecturer in the Liberal field in New York State or anywhere else not too remote, this cold winter. Would prefer to speak a month of Sundays in some locality, or would give a course of four or five lectures during the week in one place, or even one lecture in a town or city.

Read, ponder and respond, Liberals of New York State.

What is the Shaker System?

What is the Shaker system? The world, in which we live, is a large world, containing many nations, each nation many sects and people. Is it the Shaker idea and faith that all of these should become ascetics—celibates—Shakers in this world? It is not. What then is the "Shaker system" that they, as religionists, would aim to inaugurate? It is the God system of sowing and reaping the human race. The harvest is the end of the world—and the end of the world is the harvest of mankind. Two distinct and dissimilar operations—two orders—result from this condition of humanity. The civil government of a nation, which, according to Shaker religious faith, should be dual—male and female—to begin with, woman and man citizens, equal in wants, duties and functions, conjointly making the laws, and unitedly administering them. But, as no two things can exist in one and the same place at the same time—so neither can men and women occupy in two families—the private family and the public family—at one and the same time. The man or woman who has a private family to care for cannot neglect that duty without being worse than an infidel—to some false theology. They should not, while thus burdened, assume to care for or to rule the national family. He or she who is married, careth for husband and wife, how to serve and please, and how best to conserve and please, and how best to conserve family interest. Let all such stay at home—not for one year, as was the Jewish rule, to comfort wife or husband—but so long as that relation and its duties exist. In short, when a people have progressed beyond the patriarchal family relation, they should develop a class of intellectual celibates, who do not marry, individually, but who marry the State—the State becoming their family. This is under a natural law of evolution that has hitherto been overlooked, disregarded or ruinously violated. In all governments we have had man, with man working in governmental relations, what is unseemly and destructive to private and public virtue—passing laws that are not just—class legislation—stealing—public sexual immorality—husbands and fathers being away from their proper sphere—the family homestead. Hence result private vice, private divorce, family quarrels and public wars. What else could result—will not a tree bring forth its appropriate fruit?

In the God element, in humanity, is the germ of a new earth—new civil government—having no theological war, no God, Christ or chaplain, but RIGHTEDNESS, in all the relations of human beings with each other, and with themselves individually. When society evolves a class of men and women, as now in England, in whom the Westminster Review declares that the marrying instinct has died out, these should fill the houses of Parliament and our Halls of Legislation; these should enact righteousness. First, a law relieving all, who have private families, from public burdens. Second, a law of citizenship endowing male and female as citizens. Third, a law of property, giving the land of the nation to the people of the nation, and securing its just distribution and possession. Fourth, a law of population, setting forth the physiology of reproduction, its rule of right, with appropriate checks and restrictions. Fifth, the law of digestion, or the assimilation of food—the kind, quantity and quality that is scientifically right and best for the individual and the nation. Sixth, the law of association, under which no one should live for himself or herself, in family, society or nation—but each live for all. In each family and society, there should be a throne of judgment, unconditionally deferred to by the unit or individual. This would end private feuds and strifes. Seventh, nations, when organized upon these principles of righteousness, can recognize a law of nations that would be God's justice and right incarnated—a Supreme Court of Arbitration—all the nations commencing by universal disarmament. War creates war; it begins with warlike preparations. The girl, with her doll baby, is learning the rudiments of maternity. The boy, with his toy rifle, drum and gun, is a germinal warrior. Cease to think war. Learn to think peace, and nothing but peace. Let the decision of the parent, of the majority, be as the court of arbitration for nations, be as the fiat of the Almighty, or as the Medo-Persian decree of humanity, that a nation shall no more revolt from the decision of the grand Supreme Court of nations, than law-abiding Americans revolted from the revolting decision of the United States Supreme Court, that "The black man has no rights that the white man is bound to respect."

Thus much for the new earth, under the Shaker system. Shall we try it?

Respectfully yours,
F. W. EVANS.

"It takes four columns for Bob Ingersoll to tell how Tom Paine died."—Fort Wayne Morning Gazette, Oct. 19, 1877.

It would take four thousand times four thousand columns to contain all the falsehoods told about his death in orthodox pulpits, presses, and tracts.

That Little Discussion.

WHAT THE Pittsburgh Leader SAYS OF IT.

The Rev. G. H. Humphrey was a few years ago one of our best-known and, if we may use the word, most aggressive of our city ministers. He removed to New York, and his aggressiveness it was, probably, that incited him to court an intellectual battle with the famous Colonel "Bob" Ingersoll. He challenged that gentleman to mortal combat in the pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER on the burning question of the truth of Christianity and the Bible. Ingersoll, pressed, probably, with too many engagements, failed to respond. But Mr. D. M. Bennett, the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and a rising light among the "Infidels" of the country, took up the glove. The result was a long series of letters and replies from the two champions, which Mr. Bennett, being a publisher, has put together and issued in book form, with the motto, "Hear both sides and then decide." His fellow-students at Washington & Jefferson College say that Mr. Humphrey was decidedly the best debater of his class. His sermons delivered in Pittsburgh were all eminently controversial, and his curious little pamphlet, "Hell and Damnation," which we criticised at one time in these columns, bears strong evidence of his love of argument, and of mental wrestling over difficult theological problems, and, let us add, to his ability in this line. But a perusal of the pages of "Christianity and Infidelity," as the work is called, will convince any one that in Bennett he has met a foe man worthy of his steel. The fact of his publishing the book is evidence that Mr. Bennett thinks he gets the best of his opponent, but that is a question each reader is likely to decide according to his own prepossessions on the great questions at issue. Our own opinion is that neither proves his point. Indeed, it is one of those questions that can not be absolutely decided by arguments; for when each has piled up all that can be said about the defects, shortcomings, sins and crimes of Infidels and Christians respectively, there is nothing particular proven. The discussion is intensely interesting for all that; and in parts even amusing. The list of murders and adulteries of prominent unbelievers compiled by Humphrey is offset by a list of the fallen ministers, some three or four hundred in number, compiled by Mr. Bennett, which is appalling from one point of view and rather ludicrous from another. Mr. Humphrey made one bad slip in Bible quotation, which the Infidel was prompt to take advantage of. To prove that the ancient Jews were highly civilized he cited, among other things, the fact that "they played on a harp of a thousand strings." "Are you sure of that?" cries Mr. Bennett. "Is that in the Bible?" Is it not rather a quotation from the famous old hard-shell Baptist sermon in which "the lion roareth and the whang-doodle mourneth?" Mr. Humphrey very gracefully acknowledges the error, and "coming down nine hundred and ninety strings," claims that the Jews did play on "an instrument of ten strings."

But we did not intend to notice this curious controversy at such length. The fact that Mr. Humphrey is a Pittsburger is our apology, and we think the book needs none.

Organization.

TO THOSE WHO FAVOR EQUAL RIGHTS FOR ALL.

At the National Liberal Congress held at Rochester, N. Y., Oct. 26th, 27th, and 28th, a platform was adopted which I believe future generations will regard as the second declaration of American independence. The first duty of every friend of freedom should be to see that this platform has a wide circulation. Go to your local editor and request its publication, and if your request is refused raise sufficient funds to pay for its insertion; for depend upon it, when the people understand the full import of that document, those of them who are at heart American will endorse it. The three words that best represent it are Education, Liberty, Equality. Therefore I repeat, friends of equal rights to all, see that it has a wide circulation.

At the Congress there was appointed a National Executive Committee, consisting of one member from each State and Territory, whose special duty it is to organize local Liberal Leagues in the various towns throughout the country. And if we would succeed in building up a national political party upon our platform of "Freedom for All" that shall be felt at the next presidential election, we must engage in this work with a zeal and earnestness worthy of our principles.

And as Chairman of that Committee I desire to request each member of the Committee at once to appoint, as the N. L. L. Constitution requires, four persons from his State to act with him as a State or Territorial Committee, the duties of which are very important and are laid down in the National League Constitution. I desire that in the next thirty days these State and Territorial Committees may be appointed so that we may be prepared to go to work immediately.

And as it is proposed next year, at our annual Congress to nominate a President and Vice-President for 1880, it is very important that local Liberal Leagues be organized everywhere and delegates elected for that Congress. I hope that at an early day the Directors of the N. L. L. may fix upon the time and place for holding the second annual Congress, that all who endorse our platform may go to work to make it one of the most important national conventions ever held in the United States. I think that by indefatigable labor we can by that time have organized a thousand local Liberal Leagues which would give us a representation of six thousand delegates.

With such a Congress, representing the intelligence, virtue, and patriotism of the nation, we could put into the field a ticket headed by some such man as Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, and go to the American people with a fair prospect of success. Will every friend of liberty and the equal rights of man, including women, work for so glorious an achievement?

Letter from a Young Friend.

LOUISVILLE, KY., Oct. 22, 1877.

DEAR UNCLE BENNETT: All this summer I have wondered whether you owed me a letter or I owed you one. I received a book—"Humphrey-Bennett Discussion"—last week, and as it was direct from the publisher, I decided that you must have sent it, and that decided me as to which should write first. Thank you, Uncle Bennett; I am very proud of it, not only as I value its contents, but as a token of your kind remembrance. I read every word of the discussion as it was published weekly in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and, in my opinion, you came off victoriously. Mr. Humphrey did very well; but his not answering your "fifty reasons" was very damaging to his side. Sometimes I would read his letter and then I would say, "Oh dear! what will Uncle Bennett say to that?" But next week you would come out in "flying colors," and I would have given anything to have been near enough to have shaken hands with you. I was deeply interested in the discussion, but I am glad it is over at last; it kept me in suspense week after week. And then I missed the correspondents' column. You cannot imagine how much I missed it. It was like a few Liberals meeting and each giving his experiences. Some of them were so interesting, and were a source of great amusement and encouragement to me. One evening not long since, as I was returning home on the train, the conductor, whom I had seen quite often but was not acquainted with, came and sat down beside me, saying, "So you are an Infidel, too." I looked at him in astonishment and asked him "how he knew that?" For an answer he smiled and pointed to THE TRUTH SEEKER which I held in my hand. "And are you a wicked Infidel?" I asked. He said "Yes," and we shook hands like old friends. And now Madam Grundy thinks it was quite shocking in me to have been so familiar with a stranger. I generally read my paper on the train, and very often I have caught persons reading it over my shoulder. I remember one morning I sat next a nice, pious-looking old gentleman who was evidently under the impression that I was reading some religious paper. Being of an accommodating turn of mind, I held the paper so he could see the contents. Presently he started, gave me an icy stare, looked again at the paper, and actually moved away from me, with such an expression of horror depicted upon his honest old face that I looked out of the window so he might not be further shocked at seeing me laugh.

To Freethinkers.

THE TRUTH SEEKER REPORT OF THE "CONGRESS."
—MRS. NEYMAN.—MR. W. S. BELL.—THE CIRCULATION OF LIBERAL PAPERS, ETC.

DEAR BRO. BENNETT: I drop you this line for the special purpose of thanking you for your fine report of the Rochester Congress and for your just notice of Mrs. Clara Neyman's address. Aside from the President's opening speech, Mrs. Neyman's address, as you say, was the most acceptable one delivered during the three days' proceedings. This new Free-thought speaker has appeared in good time, and she should not be permitted to remain idle. I can assure the Liberal Leagues and Freethought Associations in the country that they can do no better than to engage Mrs. Neyman to address them.

And while I am speaking of Liberal meetings, allow me to say to my Freethought friends in Central and Western New York, that our able and eloquent lecturer, W. S. Bell, is now speaking in this vicinity, and I hope he may be invited to speak in every one of the counties of our Association. He should be retained with us through the winter and liberally patronized.

Then again, allow me to ask our county committees to make a special effort to extend the circulation of our Liberal papers. There should be ten taken where there is now one. And I hope the publishers of our Liberal papers will arrange club rates for their papers. For instance, I am confident, Mr. Editor, you would send ten papers to one address for one year for fifteen dollars, and I doubt not liberal arrangements could be made with the other Liberal publishers. Then any enterprising Freethinker could get ten subscribers in most any town. We must have the circulation of all our Liberal papers increased tenfold if we intend to elect the next President on the National League Platform. To-day is the time to commence the work.

H. L. GREEN.

Sensible Teaching.

A pious young man, a teacher in an orthodox mission Sunday-school, having occasion to be absent one Sunday, his scapegrace brother, full of fun and mischief, undertook to teach his class of boys in the above-mentioned Sunday-school.

Arriving before the class, the young gentleman was puzzled as to how he should conduct the exercises, for instructing the young ideas in religious matters was somewhat out of his line.

Finally a happy thought struck him, and "Here goes," he said mentally. Then aloud: "Boys, who discovered America? Two pennies for the boy who tells."

A prolonged and painful silence followed, and an anxious fluttering of eager hearts; but no answer.

"Well, then," continued the somewhat nonplussed teacher, "tell me how many States in the Union? That's easy; come, hurry up! No answer.

"Come, speak, you freckle-faced fellow, with a sore nose."

"Dunno, sir."

"Can either of you bound the State of New York?"

Only answer, open mouths and staring eyes. "Well, can you tell where was the first settlement by whites in this country?"

"Dunno, sir."

"Well, now, you must know this: Who is the President of the United States? Ten cents for the boy who answers correctly;" and a glittering ten-cent piece was held before the vision of the ignorant pupils.

An agony of breathless suspense followed, but no audible answer.

"What do you know, you little Hindoos?" hastily inquired the teacher.

"Mr. B. teaches us Bible, and we know that, if you please, sir," said a rosy, round-faced urchin often.

"Bible! what do you know about the Bible, youngsters?"

"We know lots; Adam was the first man, Moses was the meekest, Samson the strongest, and—"

"There, there, that will do! I'll be blamed if I'll teach such stuff as that. Look here, boys; you know beans—when you see the pods?"

"Never seed no pods," said the little freckle-faced one; "but I've seen beans enough and eat 'em, too!"

At this juncture the superintendent of the school came along, severely reprimanded the would-be teacher for teaching "irreligious" ideas, and summarily dismissed him.

When we reflect upon the mass of ridiculous nonsense crammed into the heads of children, what wonder that they grow up ignorant, bigoted, intolerant and conceited! Robert Raikes, the originator of Sunday-schools, had only the imparting of secular knowledge in view when he established such schools for those who had no chance for such information on other days of the week.

The need of the present hour is for the sensible, practical instruction of children in the things and appointments of this world, in which they "live, move and have their being," and their maturity will find them sensible and useful members of society, instead of drones and villains, often committing offenses against the laws of the land and good society, and declaring that their sins are forgiven through the "blood of the Lamb."

Obituary.

NEW ALBANY, IND., Oct. 25, 1877.

MR. EDITOR: I will inform you that Joseph Lamb, my father, aged eighty-three, departed this life on the 23d ult. He was a Freethinker, a Materialist in belief, and died as he had lived, without any faith in the supernatural. He lived a long and useful life, having the confidence and esteem of all his acquaintances. He had no real enemies, not even among the ignorant and superstitious. He had no funeral services held over his remains, yet all who knew him feel his loss. A good man is gone, we know not where, except to his mother earth.

LAFÉ LAMB.

"Christianity and Infidelity."

These two subjects make a great deal of inquiry, writing and discussion; and it is important, that they should be understood and appreciated for what they are really worth. One or the other—Christian or Infidel—must be the fate of humanity, and which shall it be?

This question may be helped towards a solution by a book which has lately appeared entitled "Christianity and Infidelity." It consists of a debate between the Rev. G. H. Humphrey, a Presbyterian minister of New York, and D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, a Liberal paper of that city. Both of the disputants are men of ability, and as their debate is very thorough in regard to facts and arguments, and temperate, candid and friendly in tone, it is a very interesting and useful volume to have in one's library to refer to in matters of ancient and ecclesiastical history, and also to ascertain the meaning of disputed passages in the Bible. Mr. Humphrey has done as well as could be expected under the circumstances, and if Mr. Bennett makes out the better case, it is owing to the fact that Infidelity is more rational, more humane, wiser in principle, and has shown a greater degree of justice in practice. The debate is divided into three parts: 1st. The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty; 2d. Their relative services to Learning and Science; and 3d. Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The volume is of large size—350 pages—and cheap, the price of it being only $1.00, and post-paid.—Boston Investigator.

D. M. Bennett, of New York, publisher of THE TRUTH SEEKER, a widely circulated weekly paper, strongly infidel to church dogmas, pugnacious, radical, and apparently determined to tell the truth though it shame the parsons and all other devils, has been holding a discussion in the columns of his journal with a congregational minister of New York by the name of Humphrey on the subject of Christianity and Infidelity. The questions forming the basis of the argument were: 1st. The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty. 2d. The relative services of Christianity to Learning and Science. 3d. Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine, than that Infidelity is true? The discussion was spirited, though gentlemanly, throughout, and we must admit that considering the poor ground he had to stand on Mr. Humphrey did exceedingly well though hardly a match for the tough facts and rugged reasoning that his opponent brought constantly to bear upon him. It is not our purpose now however, to sit in judgment on the discussion. Suffice it to say that each side brought forward an amount of information calculated to astonish those who have not made an impartial and patient study of the matter in question. This discussion, which was continued in THE TRUTH SEEKER for weeks, the letters alternating, has been brought out in book form by Mr. Bennett, making volume of some 550 pages closely packed with the strongest arguments and most convincing facts that two talented and dreadfully earnest men, with the important aid of extensive New York libraries, and a fund of information the result of years of devotion to the subject discussed, could present. The book is at once thoroughly orthodox in its Christianity and savagely truthful in its Infidelity, and is entertaining as well as instructive on its every page. It can be obtained for $1 by addressing D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth St., New York city.—Winsted Press.

Christianity and Infidelity

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n. Clergyman, OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers; and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Author of "The Biography of Satan," and "The Bible of Bibles" (comprising a description of twenty bibles).

This wonderful and exhaustive volume by Mr. Graves will, we are certain, take high rank as a book of reference in the field which he has chosen for it. The amount of mental labor necessary to collate and compile the varied information contained in it must have been severe and arduous indeed, and now that it is in such convenient shape the student of freethought will not willingly allow it to go out of print. But the book is by no means a mere collation of views or statistics; throughout its entire course the author—as will be seen by his title-page and chapter-heads—follows a definite line of research and argument to the close, and his conclusions go, like sure arrows, to the mark. Heathens of the Heath;

A ROMANCE, BY WM. McDONNELL,

AUTHOR OF "EXETER HALL," ETC.

This work is rich in romantic and pathetic incidents, and exhibits with an overwhelming array of facts the atrocities committed by the Church. It shows that the purest morality exists without the Bible, and that many of the heathen philosophers were lovers of virtue. The folly of Christian ministers is fully portrayed. Hypocrisy and bigotry are clearly exposed, and the road to virtue and true happiness plainly marked out. A most pleasing romance is woven into the work, in which much opportunity is afforded the author for fine descriptions and beautiful sentiments which he so well knows how to give utterance to. The characters in the tale are invested with much interest; the hero and heroine gain the love of every reader. On the whole, it is the work of a master hand—a work of unaffected beauty and the deepest interest. "One of the most valuable features of the work is, its positions are all proven. . . . Every thinking, enquiring mind should peruse it." 500 pp., 12mo. Price, in paper, $1.00; cloth, $1.50.

Gems of Thought.

SPEAK out in acts; the time for words has passed, and deeds alone suffice.—Whittier.

FROM the moment a man desires to find the truth on one side rather than another, it is all over with him as a philosopher.—Harriet Martineau.

IN youth grief comes with a rush, an overflow, but it dries up, too, like the torrent. In the winter of life it remains a miserable pool, resisting all evaporation.—Madame Swetchin.

TO REJECT consecrated opinions needs a consecrated mind. The moving impulse to such rejection is faith; faith in reason, faith in the mind's ability to obtain truth.—O. B. Frothingham.

WE strive as hard to hide our hearts from ourselves as from others, and always with more success; for in deciding upon our own ease we are judge, jury, and executioner; and when sophistry cannot overcome the first, or flattery the second, self-love is always ready to defeat the sentence by bribing the third.

WE cannot be held to what is beyond our strength and means, for at times the accomplishment and execution may not be in our power; and, indeed, there is nothing really in our power except the will; on this are necessarily based and founded all the principles that regulate the duty of man.—Montague.

THE manner of saying or doing anything goes a great way in the value of the thing itself. It was well said of him that called a good office that was done harshly and with an ill will, a stony piece of bread; it is necessary for him that is hungry to receive it, but it almost chokes a man in the going down.—Seneca.

NOT alone to know, but to act according to thy knowledge, is thy destination—proclaims the voice of my inmost soul. Not for indolent contemplation and study of thyself, nor for brooding over emotions of piety—no, for action was existence given thee; thy actions, and thy actions alone, determine thy worth.—Fichte.

FROM Copernicus we learned that this earth is only a grain of sand on the infinite shore of the Universe; that everywhere we are surrounded by shining worlds vastly greater than our own, all moving and existing in accordance with law. True, the earth began to grow small, but man began to grow great.—Ingersoll.

FEELING, as I do, daily comfort in the knowledge of some things which I should once have shrunk from supposing, it would be weak—as foolish as cowardly—ever again to shrink from knowing anything that is true, or to have any preferences whatever among unascertained matters of speculation or fact.—Harriet Martineau.

CONCEALED innocence is like an imprisoned lark—open the door and it is off forever. The bird that roams through the sky and the groves unrestrained knows how to dodge the hawk and to protect itself; but the caged one, the moment it leaves its bars and bolts behind, is pounced upon by the fowler or vulture.—Haliburton.

Few people have reason to regret that they have talked too little. Forbear to sport an opinion on a subject of which you seem ignorant, especially in the presence of those to whom it is familiar. If it be not always in your power to speak to the purpose, it certainly is to be silent; and, though thousands have remembered with pain their garrulity, few have reason to repent of their silence.—Anon.

THE wise teachers of to-day are generous, tolerant, charitable and forgiving. They seek not to force their ideas upon others, but ask each one to read, ponder, search and examine for himself, and accept only that which will bear the test of the severest scientific scrutiny. They say, go as far as possible in search of bottom facts, but do not then stop and bar up the way to further progress for thyself and others by saying thou hast reached a God, a great First Cause; but rather pause, confess thy ignorance, and then wait for developments and revelations of the future, leaving the unknown for debatable ground.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

WHAT a satisfaction it must be to know that there is not the least necessity for any one to be a Christian for our welfare in this life or in the next does not in the slightest degree depend upon it. You can be a philosopher, as Humboldt was, and be no Christian, as he was none; you can be a poet, with Shelley; a philanthropist, with Henry C. Wright, who had long cast off the Christian name and the Christian pretence; you can be a good father or mother, a good citizen, a lover of man, and a doer of right, a practitioner of temperance and every virtue, and yet be no Christian. And a man may be a thief, drunkard, murderer, adulterer, hypocrite, and brute, and yet be a Christian in the only sense in which any man can be a Christian.—Wm. Denton.

THERE are moments in the life of a solitary thinker which are to him what the evening of some great victory is to the conqueror and hero—though milder triumphs and longer remembered with truer and deeper delight. And, though the shout of multitudes do not hail his success, though gay trophies, though the sounds of music, the glittering of armor, and the neighing of steeds do not mingle with his joy; yet shall he not want monuments and witness of his glory; the deep forest, the willow brook, the gathering clouds of winter, or the silent gloom of his own chamber, "faithful remembrancers of his high endeavor and his glad success." As time passes by him with unreturning wing, still is awakened the consciousness of a spirit patient and indefatigable in the search of truth, and a hope of surviving in the thoughts and minds of men.—Wm. Hazlitt.

Quads and Quads.

A GREAT composer—Sleep.

THE best thing out—A dangerous conflagration.

WHEN is fire like a bad husband?—When it goes out at night.

WHY is a dishonest bankrupt like an honest poor man.—Because both fail to get rich.

WHAT language does an Arabian child speak before it cuts its teeth?—Gum-Arabic, unquestionably?

"WHAT are you doing?" said a father to his son, who was tinkering at an old watch. "Improving my time, sir."

"Poor but respectable" people are common enough; but what we want now is a few who are rich and respectable.

WHY is the tolling of a bell like the praying of a hypocrite?—Because it is a solemn sound by a thoughtless tongue.

"TIME flies," suggested she. "Yes," he answered sadly, taking a dark object out of the cream, "time flies were gone."

WHY should a man always wear a watch when he travels in a waterless desert?—Because every watch has a spring in it.

A LITTLE girl sent out to hunt eggs came back unsuccessful, complaining that "there were lots of hens standing round doing nothing."

AN Irishman upon seeing a squirrel shot from a tree, said, "Faith and that's a waste of powder; the fall itself would have killed the animal."

THE question as to where all the Smiths come from is answered. A factory in a neighboring city bears the sign, "Smith Manufacturing Company."

"WHY should we celebrate Washington's birthday more than mine?" asked a Sunday-school teacher. "Because he never told a lie," shouted a little boy.

A SHREWD old Yankee said he didn't believe there was any downright cure for laziness in a man; "but," he added, "I've known a second wife to help it some."

JOHN asked Julia if she would have him. "No," said she, "I will not have you." But before John could recover from the shock, she archly put in, "but you may have me."

A MAN in Waterloo, Iowa, hugged a girl so hard that a revolver in his pocket was discharged, seriously wounding the young lady's brother, who was passing the gate where the pair stood.

AN Irishman, referring to the sudden death of a friend, was asked if he lived high. "I can't say he did," said Terence, "but he died high." Like the banks in these days, he was "suspended."

A MODEL bill, made out by an old farmer against a neighbor, reads as follows: "Neighbor Ames, Dr. to Brown to horse and waggin, goin' to mill and back, once since and twice before, one dollar."

A STUDENT of the Wesleyan University at Middletown, Connecticut, who is near-sighted, began a handkerchief flirtation with what he thought a beautiful young lady in the street, but on coming nearer it proved to be his mother.

A YOUNG fellow, having been very extravagant, wrote to his father for more money, and used all means, but nothing would prevail. At length he very ingeniously wrote that he was dead, and desired him to send up some money to pay for his burial.

"Do you make any reduction to a minister?" said a young woman at Boston, last week, to a salesman with whom she was talking about buying a sewing machine. "Always. Are you a minister's wife?" "Oh no, I'm not married," said the lady, blushing. "Daughter, then?" "No." The salesman looked puzzled. "I'm engaged to a theological student," she said. The reduction was made.

WALKING along the street an officer saw approaching him a man in tatters, carrying a tray on which were some small pies marked two cents each. As he got near him he recognized a brother officer who had served in the same regiment some years previously. He accosted the poor fellow, and was sympathizing with him on his sad plight and altered circumstances, when the other exclaimed: "Damn your pity! Buy a pie."

A SUDDEN CURE.

A melancholy woman lay In sickness on her bed, And in a faint and broken voice To her sad husband said:

"Dear David, when my earthly form Has turned to lifeless clay, O wait an' weep a little time, Nor throw yourself away."

"I know a woman kind and true, On whom you may depend, O marry Aramilla Jones— She is my dearest friend."

"Yes, Hannah, I have wanted long To speak of this afore; For Aramilla Jones and I Have talked the matter o'er."

"Then you an' Aramilla Jones Have been too smart and sly: I tell you, David Wilkinson, I'm not a-goin to die!"

Her dark eye flashed; her strength returned; She left her bed of pain; A week had scarcely passed away When she was well again.

Vol. 4. No. 46. { PUBLISHED WEEKLY } New York, Saturday, November 17, 1877. { SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., } $2 per Year.
BY D. M. BENNETT. NEAR BROADWAY.

Notes and Clippings.

THE vicegerent of God and successor of St Peter, otherwise known as the Pope, is now carried around in an arm-chair.

THE reason why Gen. Howard is called the "Bible Chief" is because he has had so much to do with "Joseph and his brethren."

MANY New York clergymen voted for the gambler, Morrissey. Expounders of the gospel voting for an ex-pounder of his fellow-men's Politics, like misery, makes strange bedfellows.

THE Telegram says a law ought immediately to be passed to prevent any more earthquakes on Sunday. How can the overruling Power be so unmindful of the only holy day in the week as to get up an earthquake on it?

DANIEL WALDO, a Seventh Day Baptist, of Crawford county, Penn., who was fined by a Justice of the Peace for working on Sunday, has received a favorable decision from the County Court overruling the Justice's record.

At the Episcopal Congress, Mr. Moody's "bell-punch" plan was tried with great success on the long-winded speakers; Bishop Potter being the bell-ringer. Bishop Potter's new field of usefulness proved a Potter's-field for many a dead sermon.

WORK on the submarine tunnel between France and England has at last been fairly begun. A well and a gallery are being dug at Calais, and within three or four years the world may see the banks of the Seine in direct communication with those of the Thames.

THE city authorities of Leipzig, in Germany, have imposed a fine of not less than five nor more than ten marks upon any woman who may wear trailing dresses in the streets. The police have orders to arrest them, and their names are to be published each week in the local papers.

A PETRIFIED wasp nest has been found near Eureka, Nev., by blasting in the solid rock forty feet below the surface of the ground. On breaking it open some cells, larva, and two perfectly formed wasps were found, also petrified. The rock is a granite sandstone of sedimentary formation.

THE lynching of Owen Wright, an Alabama negro murderer, was preceded by a debate as to whether he should be burned or hanged. He pleaded piteously to be hanged, but the wife of the man he had killed urged that he be burned. A vote was taken, and the majority was in favor of hanging.

MRS. MERRILL, of this city, died recently, leaving about $300,000 to Cardinal McCloskey and the Catholic Church. She was not of very sound mind, and has been under the influence of priests for several years, having been followed to Europe and back and all over this country by them. Her relatives will contest the will.

JUDGE DONOHUE, of this city, in a recent decision in a clerical case, said: "It may perhaps be a feature of religious controversies that they are conducted with bitterness. It seems to me neither side in this case is justified in the manner in which this controversy has been conducted. In its management all decorum has been set at defiance, and all rules regulating the trial of disputed facts disregarded."

THE Jewish papers of Europe and the United States are as full now of reports of shocking outrages by the Cossacks and the Bulgarian peasantry upon Jewish residents in the territory bordering upon the seat of war, as the secular press was some months ago of the massacre in Bulgaria. In Kazanlik eleven men, three women, and a girl of fourteen were butchered with wood-axes, but not until the women had met with a worse fate than death. This affair was noted in Constantinople by public morning services in the twenty synagogues of the city, to which many high Turkish officials and leading representatives of many other forms of belief were invited. Hundreds of Jewish refugees from Kazanlik and other places sought safety in Adrianople, where the English Consul and others gave them such relief as they could. These refugees spread reports of outrages that were as horrible as anything related of the Bashi-Bazouks in Bulgaria.

THE beatification of Joan of Arc, which has been for some time applied for by Bishop Dupanloup of Orleans, has been refused at the Vatican. The Committee on Rituals could not discover in the merits or deeds of Joan sufficient motive for beatifying her, and, moreover, had no documentary proofs of her chastity. Joan must remain an Arc-angel unless this earthly court with heavenly jurisdiction should change their mind.

PEOPLE talk about Christian fortitude, but Mohammedan fortitude seems to be quite its equal. Nothing can exceed the endurance displayed by the Turkish soldiery. There is what seems a preposterous rule, according to which a Turkish soldier's limb cannot be removed by a surgeon without the sanction of the authorities at Constantinople, whose decisions are oftentimes delayed for weeks, and the poor fellows will lie day after day in agony, awaiting their fate without a murmur. Christian fortitude cannot excel that.

IN a Sunday-school book recently published in this city Paul's journey to Caesarea, which was under the escort of a guard of soldiers, is illustrated by a remarkable wood cut. A squad of United States Infantry is marching along, double quick, and taking exceedingly long steps. The regulation army cap is on their heads, and the knapsack on their backs. It is difficult to make out whether the weapons which they carry are the old smooth-bore muskets or rifles. A color sergeant brings up the rear, carrying a bucket marked "lemonade," and proudly waving over these soldiers the Stars and Stripes.

IT is understood that during the Paris international Exhibition there will be tests made of the various methods of lighting streets and buildings with electricity, and the relative value of the different systems will be determined. One division of the Exhibition is to be devoted exclusively to electricity. Although it is conceded that the light afforded by electricity is far superior to any otherwise available, some difference of opinion exists regarding the superiority of the several apparatus now introduced, and the comparative expense. Measures are to be taken to insure the utmost impartiality in the experiments, and the result will be anticipated with great interest.

DEACON SAMUEL P. PATTERSON, a colored exhorter, arrived in Harlem two years ago, and Caroline Thompson of this city was married to him on the ninth of September, 1875. On the 10th of April last Rose Read was married to him, the Deacon having in the meantime taken the name of Thompson. A few weeks ago he engaged himself to Mary E. Cook, and the wedding was to have been performed on Thursday at her home. Patterson this time assumed the name of Peck. Officer Armstrong laid his hand on Patterson's shoulder early on Thursday evening, and locked him up in the Harlem police station. In the Harlem police court the three women appeared against him. He was judged.

ADVICES from Panama report a disturbance in the State of Antioquia on account of an attempt to assassinate Gen. Julian Trujillo, the popular candidate for President of the Republic. The attack is said to have been made by three armed ruffians, instigated by the Clerical Party, but was fortunately unsuccessful. As a result, the State of Antioquia, according to our information, has been placed under martial law until the Bishops either voluntarily withdraw or are banished. It will thus be seen that in spite of all the hopes of moderate men, and contrary to the best interests of the country, the "irrepressible conflict" between the Liberal and Conservative elements, between Church and State, is likely to give abundant future trouble.

THE N. Y. Sun has the following editorial notice of the late Texas outrage: We have frequently taken occasion to arouse the churches to the danger in which they stand, owing to the spread of modern infidelity of the scientific sort, and we have advised them to prepare themselves to meet the enemy. But everybody must severely reprobate the method of overcoming infidelity adopted by certain Baptists of Bell county, Texas. It seems that Dr. S. I. Russell of that county is an infidel, and also a man of prominence. The other night, some Baptist brethren who were outraged by his skepticism, took the doctor from his bed to the woods, and, having stripped him, thus addressed the infidel: "We know you are an honest man and a good physician, but we will tolerate no infidels in Bell county; so, by the help of God, we will stop your career of infidelity." They then gave him a hundred lashes on his bare back, set him at liberty, and posted a notice on a tree that hereafter infidelity in Bell county will be punished by the torch and halter. Whipping and hanging infidels will not, however, stop infidelity. The only way to do that is to meet and overcome its arguments, as we have urged the Baptists and the other denominations to do without delay.

A GREAT sensation has been caused at Geneva by the sudden departure of two priests who had become converts to the Old Catholic doctrine, but who appear to have repented of their conversion, for they left Geneva addressing to the President of the Church Council the following letter: "Having found that attempts to establish a national Catholic Church at Geneva have only a political end, we declare our intention of separating from them, of returning to the bosom of the only Catholic Church, and of making submission to the authority as the sole guardian of the Christian faith." The Ultramontane party exulted very much over the declaration, but it now appears, according to Swiss papers, that these two priests before leaving Geneva went to see Monsignor Mermillod, the exiled bishop, who is living on the French frontier, and received from him a sum of $5,000 to recant. This accusation was first made in an anti-Catholic journal, and would, it was supposed, be at once repelled as a calumny. But, upon the contrary, the Courier de Geneve, which is Monsignor Mermillod's own organ, frankly admits that money passed, and adds that a Catholic association has been formed for the purpose of buying back the converts.

A SOMEWHAT objectionable and dangerous feature of some of our church prayer-meetings is that when they are "thrown open for remarks" they are at the mercy of any bore or injudicious person who may feel it his special mission to inflict his harangues on the assembled brethren. A curious instance of the nuisance of this occurred a few evenings ago at a fashionable church in Classon avenue, Brooklyn. An eccentric old gentleman arose to make his customary speech, in the course of which he remarked that he had heard all the best preachers in Brooklyn, including the pastor of that Church, and though he liked them all, he believed that his wife was more of a preacher than any of them. This he knew of his own knowledge, he said, for she gave him a sermon every night. These remarks of the old gentleman threw the audience, including the pastor, into a frame of undevotional mirthfulness. It would seem that the practice of introducing the "free and easy" element into prayer-meetings, while it has an air of liberty and sociability about it, is hardly as edifying as if the leader of the meeting were expected to designate the speakers, and thus to select people of good sense to deliver the exhortations.

THE Rev. Mr. See has been convicted of two heresies. In the first place he allowed a woman to occupy his pulpit, which the Presbytery regards as a very naughty and unscriptural thing to do. It did not object to the woman because she could not preach, but because she was a woman. If the Presbytery would go still further and abolish all women, without regard to sex, it would hit the right nail on the head. In the second place, the reverend gentleman was advised neither to preach nor profess what is called "the perfect life." It would be a delight, certainly, to find a perfect man, but in such times as these we must be contented, and many of us would be more than contented to find one who had the ordinary virtue of honesty and promptly paid his debts. Diogenes had a hard time of it and a long hunt when he sought for an honest man, but nowadays we fear that the seeking kerosene would give out before his object was accomplished. If the pulpit would cease to try to make men perfect, and be satisfied with making them honorable enough not to run off with other people's money, a startling and wholesome change would be effected in the community. What we need most is not the frothy nonsense of sinfulness, but a good dose of ordinary moral principles.

Events of the Week.

THE floating population of this city is 30,000 daily.

A FIRE occurred at Kennebunk, Me. Loss, $32,000.

A LARGE fire occurred in San Francisco. Loss $450,000.

RUSSIAN agents are purchasing horses in Canada.

THURSDAY, the 29th, is to be kept as Thanksgiving day.

MOODY and Sankey are holding forth in New Hampshire.

A SHOWER of fish took place in Canada; said to be pickeral.

TWO HUNDRED thousand bushels of grain left this port for Europe last Saturday.

THE past week has been unusually mild and pleasant for this season of the year.

THE wheat shipped to Europe from this port in one week amounted to 7,800,000 bushels.

AN unknown man was found in Central Park, his body perforated with three bullet holes.

RUSSIA is going to let another loan. She should have let Turkey alone in the first place.

TEN thousand people attended the dedication of the monument to John Brown at Ossawatoma, Kansas.

BETWEEN one and two thousand tramps have attacked freight trains on the Pennsylvania railroads.

THE Pope has again been reported very sick, then dead, and still again better and able to receive company.

SOME miserable tramps, dissatisfied with a breakfast they obtained at a New Jersey farmer's, set fire to his barn and burned it down.

HENRY HAUSMAN, of this city, shot his babe and killed it, wounding a son and daughter, and then shot himself. It is a pity he did not begin where he left off.

STRONG efforts are being made by Eastern capitalists to defeat Bland's silver bill in the Senate Committee on Finance. The free coinage clause has been struck out.

THE principal of a public school in Covington, Ky., lectured on "The Duty of Good Example." On the following day he was arrested for bigamy, a deserted wife having arrived from Canada.

FOUR hundred medical students who are attending lectures in this city, combined together to prosecute and annoy the New York Liberal Club for a fancied injury they thought had been done them.

THE cigar maker's strike still continues. Several manufacturers are employing girls and Chinese workmen. The strikers say the girls will waste more tobacco than they make up. The strikers are said to be wavering.

A COMPANY of two hundred farmers in Monroe county, Ill., served lynch-law upon a German murderer who had killed a man and wife by the name of Goetz. The murderer was hung to a tree with little ceremony, and richly deserved the fate he met.

JERUSALEM has furnished a battalion of Jewish volunteers to the Sultan's army. They have a field preacher of their own faith, and cook their rations strictly in conformity with their dietary laws. Jewish soldiers are also in the Russian and Roumanian armies, but those in the Turkish host doubtless serve with as much more zeal and cheerfulness as their treatment under the Sultan's army has been more humane.

THE news from the Russian-Turkish war is variable; first we hear of the Turks obtaining a victory over the Russians, and next of their meeting a repulse and losing heavily. The news is calculated to afford pleasure to the friends of both parties. The latest is that the Russians are drawing their lines closer and closer around the Turks at Plevna who finally must yield to superior forces. Two day's hard fighting has taken place there with heavy losses on both sides.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE FUTURE STATE.

Do right; act justly; love your race; then you will safely close your eyes in sleep when age has settled on your earthly form. No shadow will darken your soul, but peacefully will the internal unfold itself, and you will awake in heaven an angel of light.—THE SAGE.

But my mind—by I know not what secret impulse—was ever raising its views into future ages, strongly persuaded that I should then only begin to live when I ceased to exist in the present world. Indeed, if the soul were not naturally immortal never, surely, would the desire for immortal glory be a passion which always exerts itself with the greatest force in the noblest and most exalted bosoms.—CICERO.

A BELIEF in the immortal existence is perhaps more universal than that in the existence of the gods. There are tribes of men too low to entertain it, but it seems that no high state of advancement is requisite for its rudest form. It is from its lowest to its most perfect state a reflection of the intellectual status of its recipient. The savage passes to a land where the chase is successful, a country stocked with game. They place in the grave of the dead warrior his bow and arrow and provisions for his lonely journey. All go to one place. As man advances, orders of merit are recognized; the good are separated from the bad; either directly or through mediators, the gods pass judgment on mortals.

The doctrine in Hindostan and Egypt early attained a complex expression. The spirit, although immortal and descending from eternity, became involved in the vortex of metempsychosis, and was compelled to follow a weary round of being. The belief has descended to the present in the petrified theology of Hindostan. The visible body contains a subtle invisible body, to which the faculties are assigned. This spiritual body is not cast off at death, but accompanies the soul in its transmigration, until it is left at the beatific absorption into the bosom of Brahm; then it returns, and is again clothed with a physical body, the form of which depends on the character of the soul that last inhabited it.

This expression of the doctrine has been more widely received than any other. It was early transferred to Greece, and appears in the songs of her bards and the speculations of her philosophers. Greece always had her sceptics, but immortality was defended by her best minds. Her philosophers built up metaphysical arguments with similar tact and acumen to that manifested by metaphysical theologians of to-day, and equally well succeeded in asking more questions than they answered. Her poets dreamed of Elysian fields, and her people received their fancies with the same relish they did the lucubrations of her sages. When there are no facts to guide the vaulting imagination, there is no predicting whither it will take its erratic course. The doctrine as prepared by the Grecians was received by the Romans.

The priests early seized the doctrine, and forged out of it chains for the spirit. It gave them not only power over the body, but also enabled them to blast the immortal being. It would be inferred that the chosen people of God from the beginning had a clear and perfect conception of immortal life. As a cardinal doctrine of religion and incentive to morality they should have understood its elements, and their sacred books definitely expressed it. These books indicate their human origin by their conflicting statements of this important subject, at times showing that the writers had a dim idea of futurity, and at others positively denying it. The early writers placed the seat of the soul in the blood, the breath, the heart, and the bowels. Their ideas were fluctuating and indefinite. The future state was a dark, joyless, conscious state, like the shadow-land of the Greek poets. The prophets could be evoked by witches; and favorites of the gods, like Enoch and Elijah, were miraculously translated. Again, the doctrine is positively denied in the Sacred Word. "As the waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and drieth up, so man lieth down and riseth not," &c. "For there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave whither thou goest." "For that which befallth the sons of men befallth the beasts. . . . As the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath."

During the exile, the Jews imbibed from the religion of Zoroaster a more complete idea of immortality. Henceforth the sacred writers speak more definitely, and in Macabees a moral application is made. It is used as an incentive. The righteous are to be happy, the sinful miserable, in the next life. At the advent of Jesus we find three phases of the belief entertained by three distinct sects. The Pharisees maintained the resurrection of the body—an idea older than the Egyptian Pyramids. A divergent portion received also the doctrine of transmigration, and must have entertained the companion belief of pre-existence. The Essenes believed in a future state, where the actions of this life would be rewarded or punished, but discarded the corporeal resurrection. The Sadducees were doubters, and entirely discarded the doctrine. Such was the influence of revelation on those for whom it was especially designed.

The advance of the idea of a future state as a reflection of the receiving mind kept pace with intellectual growth. It has been discarded by many great thinkers, and received by other minds equally great, and it would seem that the abilities of metaphysics have been exhausted in the arguments on either side.

The New Testament, as well as the Old, leaves the subject of the form of future existence indeterminate. From them certain sects claim the resurrection of the body and its inhabiting the earth; others the reverse. Some claim the eternal death of the wicked; others their eternal torture.

The belief has been used to terrible account by the priesthood. The ghastly theology of Christianity turns on immortality. Hell and its fearful despot are the stock-in-trade of the Protestant, and praying souls out of purgatory the lucrative business of the Catholic priesthood.

Man having fallen, and thereby committed an infinite sin, must be saved. This theology does not trouble itself about this life, but is vitally concerned with the next. Earthly life is too brief for it to carry out its diabolic schemes of endless torture. Eternal life must be admitted for that purpose. It breaks the continuity of existence at death; what is good for this life may be damnation for the next; overrides all laws, and howls the doom of myriads damned. It is not surprising that culture, disgusted with such barbarous doctrines, should revolt against them and support absolute materialism, finding in that system the true basis of morality and happiness.

Metempsychosis does not meet the scientific demands of an immortal existence. It involves the birth and existence of every living being in direct interference of a personal God, a perpetual miracle. If the spirit clothes itself with flesh through embryonic growth, then it follows that generation itself is only another name for this process, and could not exist without a spirit ready to be incarnated. The science of life in such case would become valueless and visionary. While every fact of science opposes this theory, it has not a single evidence of its own to bring in support. The vague sense of double existence, or a preceding state, to which is given so much weight, is fully explained by the well-determined duality of the brain, both hemispheres normally receiving the same impression at the same instant, and thus combining them as one, as the double organs of seeing and hearing convert two waves or two images into one. But abnormally one hemisphere acts slower than the other. An indeterminate interval of time intervenes between the two actions, and one is projected into the past, confounded with things remembered. The theory is opposed to science, as it breaks the continuity of evolution, and substitutes miracle for law.

As sure as creation is pervaded by a fixed and determinate plan, is it certain that man's future life, whatever its form may be, constitutes a part of that plan. When we survey the realm of causation this unity cannot escape us. All causes and all effects tend in one direction, like the irresistible set of a great current. The evolution of organic life out of the primeval slime, its progress through successive types, ascending step by step the ladder of existence, through molluscs, fishes, reptiles, and mammals, to man, indicate terms in the series of advance. Is man the last term? Shall causation, having reached its limit in him, go no further, or expend itself in making him more and more perfect? Then, to our finite reason, Nature is a failure. The perfection of physical form was reached years ago, and advance has been diverted into the new channels of moral, intellectual, and spiritual life. Only in this direction is unlimited progress possible. Man's immortality thus becomes a part of Nature's plan—the great end and aim of creative energy: not a foreign element introduced at death, nor a supernatural state, but an evolution from physical existence, and amenable to determinate laws.

The future state thus considered is no longer a part of theology, but a portion of knowledge, and its religious and moral bearing is radically changed. What its superstitious inculcation yields has already been noticed. It often has a beautiful effect on the life, but more often in the past became a terrible engine of misery and degradation as it was manipulated by craft and unflinching selfishness. When made a part of accurate knowledge, stripped of supernaturalism, held to the rule of law, reduced to the province of science, and viewed with calm reason, immortality becomes the crowning desire and blessing of human life. Under its best phase, as a religious institution, the future of the righteous was a curse; and Prometheus bound to the rock, with insatiate vultures tearing his vitals, is an appropriate symbol of man forced to accept an immortality of despairing misery or passive inactivity. Ennobled as the goal of physical causation, emerging from the slime of superstition, taking rank with sister sciences, the future life, with its lofty ideality, reacts with irresistible force on the earthly existence.

Ingersoll's Reply to the Observer's Last Attack.

PEORIA, Nov. 2d, 1877.

To the Editor of the New York Observer:

You ought to have honestly enough to admit that you did, in your paper of July 19th, offer to prove that the absurd story that Thomas Paine died in terror and agony on account of the religious opinions he had expressed, was true. You ought to have fairness enough to admit that you called upon me to deposit one thousand dollars with an honest man, that you might, by proving that Thomas Paine did die in terror, obtain the money.

You ought to have honor enough to admit that you challenged me and that you commenced the controversy concerning Thomas Paine.

You ought to have goodness enough to admit that you were mistaken in the charges you made.

You ought to have manhood enough to do what you falsely asserted that Thomas Paine did—you ought to recant. You ought to admit publicly that you slandered the dead; that you falsified history; that you defamed the defenseless; that you deliberately denied what you had published in your own paper. There is an old saying to the effect that open confession is good for the soul. To you is presented a splendid opportunity of testing the truth of this saying.

Nothing has astonished me more than your lack of common honesty exhibited in this controversy. In your last, you quote from Dr. J. W. Francis. Why did you leave out that portion in which Dr. Francis says that Cheetham with settled malignity wrote the life of Paine? Why did you leave out that part in which Dr. Francis says that Cheetham in the same way slandered Alexander Hamilton and De Witt Clinton? Is it your business to suppress the truth? Why did you not publish the entire letter of Bishop Fenwick? Was it because it proved beyond all cavil that Thomas Paine did not recant? Was it because in the light of that letter Mary Roscoe, Mary Hinsdale and Grant Thorburn appeared unworthy of belief? Dr. J. W. Francis says in the same article from which you quoted, "Paine clung to his infidelity until the last moment of his life." Why did you not publish that? It was the first line immediately above what you did quote. You must have seen it. Why did you suppress it? A lawyer, doing a thing of this character, is denominated a shyster. I do not know the appropriate word to designate a theologian guilty of such an act.

You brought forward three witnesses, pretending to have personal knowledge about the life and death of Thomas Paine: Grant Thorburn, Mary Roscoe and Mary Hinsdale. In my reply I took the ground that Mary Roscoe and Mary Hinsdale must have been the same person. I thought it impossible that Paine should have had a conversation with Mary Roscoe, and then one precisely like it with Mary Hinsdale. Acting upon this conviction, I proceeded to show that the conversation never could have happened, that it was absurdly false to say that Paine asked the opinion of a girl as to his works who had never read but little of them. I then showed by the testimony of William Cobbett, that he visited Mary Hinsdale in 1819, taking with him a statement concerning the recantation of Paine, given him by Mr. Collins, and that upon being shown this statement she said that "it was so long ago that she could not speak positively to any part of the matter—that she would not say any part of the paper was true." At that time she knew nothing, and remembered nothing. I also showed that she was a kind of standing witness to prove that others recanted. Willet Hicks denounced her as unworthy of belief.

To-day the following from the New York World was received, showing that I was right in my conjecture:

TOM PAINE'S DEATH-BED.

To the Editor of the World:

SIR: I see by your paper that Bob Ingersoll discredits Mary Hinsdale's story of the scenes which occurred at the death-bed of Thomas Paine. No one who knew that good lady would for one moment doubt her veracity or question her testimony. Both she and her husband were Quaker preachers, and well known and respected inhabitants of New York City. Ingersoll is right in his conjecture that Mary Roscoe and Mary Hinsdale was the same person. Her maiden name was Roscoe, and she married Henry Hinsdale. My mother was a Roscoe, a niece of Mary Roscoe, and lived with her for some time. I have heard her relate the story of Tom Paine's dying remorse, as told her by her aunt, who was a witness to it. She says (in a letter I have just received from her), "he (Tom Paine) suffered fearfully from remorse, and renounced his infidel principles, calling on God to forgive him, and wishing his pamphlets and books to be burned, saying he could not die in peace until it was done."

Harpersville, New York.

You will notice that the testimony of Mary Hinsdale has been drawing interest since 1809, and has materially increased. If Paine "suffered fearfully from remorse, renounced his infidel opinions and called on God to forgive him," it is hardly generous for the Christian world to fasten the fangs of malice in the flesh of his reputation.

So Mary Roscoe was Mary Hinsdale, and as Mary Hinsdale has been shown by her own admission to Mr. Cobbett to have known nothing of the matter; and as Mary Hinsdale was not, according to Willet Hicks, worthy of belief—as she told a falsehood of the same kind about Mary Lockwood, and was, according to Mr. Collins, addicted to the use of opium—this disposes of her and her testimony.

There remains upon the stand Grant Thorburn. Concerning this witness, I received, yesterday, from the eminent biographer and essayist, James Parton, the following epistle:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll:

Touching Grant Thorburn, I personally know him to have been a dishonest man. At the age of ninety-two he copied, with trembling hand, a piece from a newspaper and brought it to the office of the Home Journal, as his own. It was I who received it and detected the deliberate forgery. If you are ever going to continue this subject, I will give you the exact facts. Fervently yours, JAMES PARTON.

After this, you are welcome to what remains of Grant Thorburn.

There is one thing that I have noticed during this controversy regarding Thomas Paine. In no instance that I now call to mind has any Christian writer spoken respectfully of Mr. Paine. All have taken particular pains to call him "Tom" Paine. Is it not a little strange that religion should make men so coarse and ill-mannered?

I have often wondered what these same gentlemen would say if I should speak of the men eminent in the annals of Christianity in the same way. What would they say if I should write about "Tim" Dwight, old "Ad" Clark, "Tom" Scott, "Jim" McKnight, "Bill" Hamilton, "Dick" Whately, "Bill" Paley, and "Jack" Calvin? They would say of me then just what I think of them now.

Even if we have religion, do not let us try to get along without good manners. Rudeness is exceedingly unbecoming, even in a saint. Persons who forgive their enemies ought, to say the least, to treat with politeness those who have never injured them.

It is exceedingly gratifying to me that I have compelled you to say that "Paine died a blaspheming infidel." Hereafter it is to be hoped nothing will be heard about his having recanted. As an answer to such slander his friends can confidently quote the following from the New York Observer of November 1st, 1877: "WE HAVE NEVER STATED IN ANY FORM, NOR HAVE WE EVER SUPPOSED THAT PAINE ACT-UALLY RENOUNCED HIS INFIDELITY. THE ACCOUNTS AGREE IN STATING THAT HE DIED A BLASPHEMING INFIDEL."

This for all coming time will refute the slanders of the churches yet to be.

Right here allow me to ask: If you never supposed that Paine renounced his Infidelity, why did you try to prove by Mary Hinsdale that which you believed to be untrue?

From the bottom of my heart I thank myself for having compelled you to admit that Thomas Paine did not recant.

For the purpose of verifying your own admission concerning the death of Mr. Paine, permit me to call your attention to the following affidavit:

WABASH, INDIANA, October 27, 1877.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll:

DEAR SIR: The following statement of facts is at your disposal. In the year 1838 Willet Hicks made a visit to Indiana and stayed over night at my father's house, four miles East of Richmond. In the morning at breakfast my mother asked Willet Hicks the following questions:

"Was thee with Thomas Paine during his last sickness?"

Mr. Hicks said: "I was with him every day during the latter part of his last sickness."

"Did he express any regret in regard to writing the 'Age of Reason,' as the published accounts say he did—those accounts that have the credit of emanating from his Catholic housekeeper?"

Mr. Hicks replied: "He did not in any way by word or action."

"Did he call on God or Jesus Christ, asking either of them to forgive his sins, or did he curse them or either of them?"

Mr. Hicks answered: "He did not. He died as easy as any one I ever saw die, and I have seen many die in my time."

WILLIAM B. BARNES.

Subscribed and sworn to before me, October, 27, 1877.

WARREN BIGLER, Notary Public.

You say in your last that "Thomas Paine was abandoned of God." So far as this controversy is concerned, it seems to me that in that sentence you have most graphically described your own condition.

Wishing you success in all honest undertakings, I remain, Yours truly, ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

The Bennett-Teed Discussion.

1.—JESUS CHRIST IS NOT ONLY DIVINE, BUT IS THE LORD GOD, CREATOR OF HEAVEN AND EARTH.

MR. TEED'S SECOND LETTER.

MORAVIA, N. Y., Nov. 15, 1877.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: You express astonishment at my letter of introduction. It does not appear to you to bear any material relation to the proposition.

You more than intimate that I deal in metaphysics, and you say you know very little about metaphysics. You ought to know, that if, in the proposition it is claimed that Jesus Christ is Creator of heaven and earth, that not only does physical science take its place in the discussion; but that causation has as intimate a relation to the subject as the thing caused. The science of mind has as much to do with the issue, as the organic form upon which the mind expends its energies. If you know so little of the nature of cause as you claim, you are poorly qualified to enter into a discussion involving the seat of causation, for it is the primal factor of our argument. If my communication is metaphysical in its character, then Spencer, Huxley, Darwin, Tyndall, Haeckel and other "scientists" upon whom the masses depend for their "scientific" deductions, deal in metaphysics, and your objections rest with equal weight against their productions.

You also strongly intimate that you find nothing against which to argue. I am glad, sir, that in laying the foundation upon which I aim to establish a superstructure, you discover nothing discordant with well attested and recognized and fundamental facts. I heartily thank you for the gentlemanly acknowledgement of the plain statement of fact which must constitute the foundation of my argument. Do not think yourself too old to learn. It does not follow because you are not well versed in a principle, that another may not be well-informed in regard to that of which you acknowledge you know but little.

We are not discussing this question for the mere sake of argument. The world is hungering for truth. It perishes for lack of knowledge, and I cannot for one moment lose sight of the great fundamental principle at issue, and upon which hangs the hope of the world, now at a time when the confusion of ideas is rushing into one energetic phalanx, to crush out the vital spark which is to illumine and resurrect the race.

The very question at issue is the cause of things, as related to its effect. If we declare ourselves ignorant of the character of that cause, we ignore the issue, and there remains no foundation for a discussion. It will be well for you to remember, sir, that I take the affirmative of this proposition, and I shall endeavor to hold you strictly to the question. It will be wisdom on your part to meet the arguments I set forth, and the claims I make, and avoid the assumption of something you apprehend I may claim some time in the future. It will be honorable in you to acknowledge the actual facts I set forth, either by silence or your expressed acquiescence.

I am not ignorant of the great strength of the power against which I contend. I consider myself arrayed, in this issue, in opposition to the combined powers of anti-Christ. When I accepted the challenge in my call for a convention, I did so in view of the fact that anti-Christ had thrown the gauntlet, and in the name of Jesus Christ, and not in my own, I took it up. I trust you are fully aware of the relation you sustain to me in the contest, and that you will take no offense in the directness of my remarks.

It is no part of valor for me to under-rate the power and skill of the enemy, and the influence he wields over the masses of mankind to-day. Knowing his skill and cunning,

I shall be on my guard, and not needlessly exhaust my lines of battle by a careless exposure to the skirmishing of the enemy. The great importance of the question in issue demands that I choose well my positions, and fortify them with known facts as a ground-work for the plan of battle. It ought not to remain for me to say that the Bible is one wing of my battle line, and that upon its right to exist depends somewhat the success of the cause I espouse; and while it only, of the two sources I have chosen from which to derive my external support, is questioned, it is my right to establish its authority by presenting its claims and comparing those claims with the facts and phenomena of nature. I have not attempted to prove anything from the Bible, and shall make no such attempt till I settle the question of its validity.

There are a few points in your reply that cannot be passed over. I shall criticize them before taking up the argument from my first communication. The first in importance is your misconception of my statements. I did not, as you assert, say, it is not my ambition to bolster up any system of religious belief founded upon the Bible. In this particular I have not declared my intention. It remains to be seen what my purpose is in that regard. These are my words: "It is not my ambition to bolster up any system of religious belief simply because it takes the Bible for a foundation." Again, you report me as saying, "That Jesus Christ is Lord God and Creator of heaven and earth, I claim on his own authority," while my statement is "That Jesus Christ is the Lord God, and Creator of heaven and earth, I claim on his own authority confirmed by the entire Scriptures and the revelations made to us through the operations of law in the physical Universe." Without such corroborative testimony I claim nothing on his authority in connection with the proposition. Again, you say I promise to prove by the Bible itself that over twenty-four thousand years have passed since the creation of the world and of man. What is my statement? "Herein is presented four historic and prophetic series of operations extending over a period of twenty-four thousand years, as I shall hereafter prove from the Bible." This I represented to be a Bible presentation of one grand year or cycle. I promise to prove from the Bible that such a presentation is what the Bible intends. It will then remain to be seen whether the statement is true. If true, it may be only one of billions of such cycles in the volutions of man's perpetually recurring inceptions, growth, and maturity.

I insist that cause must be adequate to the effect produced. You do not question the statement, but employ it as a foundation for a specious argument. If I were to consider the Universe in relation to Jesus Christ as cause, I would embrace him as a component factor of the same, and not associate him with it, as you have done, as an independent or extrinsic entity. If you will examine the proposition with care you will discover that it claims him to be the Creator of heaven and earth. If it is not clear what the proposition embodies, it will become my duty to give an exposition of its terms.

In returning to the question, as there appears to be a misconception of its scope, let me first examine clearly its range. It embodies the attribute Omniscience—Divinity—also the origin of causation, and the object or objects upon which the energies of cause are exerted. That there is a cause upon which depend things and their phenomena we know. This is not a scientific deduction, but the intuitive cognition of a truth. That cause is greater than all things less than the complete sum of all effect, we know with equal certainty. We also know that cause is the seat of the life-principle of the Universe. In approaching this point, the question of life itself, to present you with the "scientific" view, and I should think the term science would cause you to blush, I will quote the echo from the whole "scientific" world, from a staff correspondent of the New York Tribune, in the Tribune extra, No. 37, page 6, under the title of "Treasures of Science." I quote from page 4. "In this long history of ancient life, I have said nothing of what life really is. And for the best of reasons, because I know nothing. Here at present our ignorance is dense." We approach in this investigation this very principle, of which all "scientists" declare themselves ignorant.

The physical forces are correlates; this is an intuition, or discovery of a fact, and accepted on faith by the masses who receive it. That force and matter are correlates is equally true. This last truth I have not seen stated by the scientific priests (we have our scientific priests as well as theological). With the same certainty I can declare that the physical or material world, with its forces, is correlated with the world of mind or thought. This is an intuition. I embrace in the term correlate, as existing between the world of matter and that of mind, all that is implied in the use of the term associated with the forces; their reciprocal relation through changes of state; their interchangeability as affected through mutations.

Consider for a moment the power of mind over physical substance, through what are called voluntary and involuntary operations. The mind, in its power over organic and inorganic matter, including the forces inseparably connected as being substance also, is not limited to a perception of things and their attendant phenomena; but with its amplification in concept, its power to control is extended. Proportionally with the enlargement of the intellect, are the powers of external nature rendered subservient to the domination of the mind. As the mind marches upward through successive flights of ascending stairways, landing upon corridor after corridor of the stories, replete with the hidden riches of nature's resources; the desire to explore the archives of nature becomes mutated to the knowledge that it may add to its explorations all of the secret treasures of the mind, and extend its explorations and acquisitions into God.

The fact that these secret recesses are yielding up their treasures to the aspirations of the will, and that the intellect extends its boundaries to one after another of these limitations or confines, is proof conclusive that the center and circumference of causative operations can be reached. If this be true of mind, if it is in the province of the intellect to conquer and subordinate the laws of Nature, then mental energy is the mastering, subduing and positive energy of being. This all-dominating principle must of necessity exist in an adequate and corresponding organic structure. That which you call science (science is simply another word for knowledge) bewails its ignorance of what life is, and also of the properties of cause, yet cries "follow me, I will lead you to the throne of knowledge, the citadel of life."

Let us return again to the question of priests and their following. Not one in ten thousand of those who accept the dogmas of science have reached their conclusions through their own investigations. The scientific priest presents his special scientific creed and demands a following, and he gets it. The scientific creeds are as numerous as the theological, but not so well defined, for the simple reason that they originated in a less positive domain of universal activity. In the past the theological priest has been in the ascendancy, and his authority has been more or less arbitrary according to his power to control either through the faith or the fear of his subjects, or both. As the authority of the theological priest declines he becomes less insolent in his demands and more patronizing. As the power of the scientific priest augments he becomes more insolent in his demands and less patronizing, denounces the faith of the religionists, and assume that the faith of the devotees of science is knowledge. I speak especially of the second and third-hand traffickers in the two domains of activity.

The greater divisions of the scientific world are the Spiritualist and Materialist. These are both subdivided into mutationist and anti-mutationist. The Materialist has not reached his conclusion in an accepted decision as to persistent life, but the Spiritualist is positive there is no death. These incongruous elements are united in one grand object: that object the avowed determination to destroy the influence of modern theology and the power of priestcraft as apparently founded upon the doctrine of Jesus and his apostles.

Spiritualists are numbered by millions, it is claimed, and I have no reason to dispute the claim; and the Materialists are legion. They are strengthening their efforts by every possible bond of unity that can exist between incompatibles, that their united forces may be hurled with irresistible fury against whatever opposes; that they may sweep away with the besom of destruction every impediment to the universal spread of infidel sentiments. This power is arrayed in deadly antagonism against its quaking, tottering and falling adversary, modern theology. One wing of this army is boasting of its scientific achievements and its sure foundation, and declares on the highways and byways that Modern Spiritualism is the supreme scientific discovery of the age. The other wing cries with equal assurance and vehement utterance that the material philosophy is the grand acme of scientific attainment, and that Spiritualism is the most monstrous hallucination of the nineteenth century. That such a relation exists is confirmed in your own paper, probably by your own pen, in commenting upon the Rochester Convention—"In the criticisms that may be made it might be urged that the speakers were allowed to take too wide a range, embracing too far a defence of Materialism on the one hand and of Spiritualism on the other." What a magnanimous scientific consistency and unity foisting itself for recognition as a true guide to all attainable knowledge, upon the faith of a too credulous humanity, demanding its substitution for the life and doctrines of the humble Nazarene.

The two systems of priestcraft as now obtaining are the degenerations of higher forms of both orders, the one confining its operations to the physical domain and the inverted mind; the other combining the physical with the phenomena of life itself, and extending its predictions over longer periods. Bible predictions are as true as your so-called scientific predictions; and the fact that correct predictions of eclipses, transits, etc., can be made is no proof of the truth of science in general. All these predictions were made under the old Ptolemaic system with that as a basis for calculations; and the mathematical rules were discovered, or invented, as you please, by these ancient astronomers that are employed in calculating to-day.

I have not proved the validity of the Bible as authority. I have not proved the existence of Jesus. I have suggested the possibility of the mind's being the origin of all voluntary and involuntary law. This I shall prove as one step in the argument.

One thing I have effectually done. If the Bible seems to be poor authority, I have demonstrated that what you term science is less reliable. I have gained one step.

Respectfully, CYRUS ROMULUS R. TEED.

THE November number of Wide Awake, an illustrated magazine for young people, has been received; and an excellent number it is. There has been a very rapid growth of young people's literature within the past few years; much of it, particularly of the magazine class, being very expensively and elaborately gotten up. Young folks will have reading matter, and parents cannot be too careful in their selections. There are three classes of publications now issued for children: The goody-goody Sunday-school kind, full of old theology, which is sure to make dull children stupid and disgust bright ones; the blood-and-thunder, story-paper kind, which goes as far the other way; and a smaller class which takes a middle ground. Of this last class is Wide Awake. It is brimful of good, moral, interesting and instructive matter, without a taint of the intellectual leprosy, theology. Published by D. Lothrop & Co., Boston. $2.00 per year.

Interrogatories to Jehovah.—No. 36.

Great Jehovah, has not a great imposition been palmed off upon the world in regard to the writers of the books in the older part of thy volume, and also as to the time when they were written?

Is there the slightest proof that the books composing the canon of the Old Testament were written by a man named Moses?

Is the claim even set up in any part of the book that Moses ever wrote a word of it? did Moses himself ever say that he wrote any of it?

Is there any proof that the children of Israel ever had a law in their possession called a Holy Law from thee, given by inspiration, prior to the time, some six hundred years before the Christian era, when the priest Hilkiah set up a claim as narrated in 2 Kings xxii, that he had found such a law in the temple, or thy house, and the scribe Shaphan took it to the King Josiah and read it to him, producing great consternation in the mind of the King, even causing him to tear his clothes?

Does not the very fact that thy law had such a fearful effect upon the King, and upon the elders of Israel who heard it read for the first time, show conclusively that they had never before known nor heard anything about it?

Does not this statement effectually set aside the claim that the law was written by Moses and had previously existed among thy people, and does it not prove conclusively that no such written law had ever been known?

Again, when thy people, the Jews, were taken in captivity to Babylon, and during their residence there of seventy years, did they not lose their sacred writings, so that when they returned to their own land they were under the necessity of re-writing them?

Did not the priests Nehemiah and Ezra, and more especially the latter and his numerous scribes, take it upon themselves to reproduce thy law and thy sacred writings?

Is not an account of the manner in which the work was performed given in the book of Esdras, where he was commanded to open his mouth and drink what was given him, when he drank something that was like water but of the color of fire, and which "made his heart to utter understanding, and wisdom to grow in his breast, when his mouth was opened to be shut no more—when he and his scribes were told things they knew not before?

Did they not do their eating at night and spend the days writing books containing thy word?

Did they not thus continue writing for forty days, during which time they wrote two hundred and four books; and wast thou not reported to have said: "The first thou hast written, publish openly, that the worthy and the unworthy may read it. But keep the seventy last that thou mayest deliver them openly to such as are wise among the people?"

Is it not perfectly natural that people in this age should entertain some honest doubts about the authenticity and reliability of a work thus produced?

Even if Esdras, after drinking the liquid which possessed the quality of fire and the effect of causing him to write thy word and will, is there any certainty that his scribes could have been similarly influenced, when they had drunk none of the fluid?

Was that peculiar liquid imbibed by Esdras anything of the character of the alcoholic fluids now in use in the world, called brandy, rum, whiskey and gin; and if so, would not the inspiration which it imparted be of a very suspicious and uncertain character?

Has it not been held by many of thy favorite people that thy writings were reproduced by Ezra after the return of the Jews from captivity?

Did not Hattel say, "The ancient Jews have a tradition that the Mosaic law had been burned at the time of the captivity, and that it had been reproduced by Ezra, and the tradition was received as trustworthy by Irenæus, Clement of Alexander, Chrysostom and Theodoret?"

Did not the Christian Father Irenæus say that "they (the books of the Old Testament) were fabricated seventy years after the Babylonish captivity by Esdras?"

Did not the pious and learned Dr. Adam Clarke guardedly say, "All antiquity is nearly unanimous in giving Esdras the honor of collecting the different writings of Moses and his prophets, and reducing them into the form in which they are now found in the Holy Bible?"

Can it, with any show of reason, be claimed that writing so produced, or reduced, by an ordinary man, should be regarded as thy authentic word, given from thy throne in heaven?

If the deeds and records of a county were all to be destroyed, by fire or otherwise, and there was nothing to show who the owners of the numerous pieces of property are within the bounds of the county, or where the lines of division are, and some modern Ezra should assume, after drinking a peculiar fluid that appeared like water but had the nature of fire, should claim that he was able to reproduce and re-write all the deeds and mortgages, showing the true titles and bounds of all the real estate in the county, would anybody accept such a reproduction as the genuine deeds and documents?

If the public could not believe that such a modern Ezra could be able correctly to write out all the deeds and mortgages that had been in existence, how can they any more have confidence in an ancient Ezra, when he claimed to re-write thy holy word which must of necessity be of vastly greater consequence than the title deeds of any and all the counties in the world?

Is it likely that man in olden times would be any more truthful or correct in writing what he knew nothing about than as though he lived in this age of the world?

What are we to conclude became of the books so badly lost that Ezra and all other priests failed to produce them? more especially such books as "The Wars of Jehovah," "Joshua's Division of the Holy Land," "The Annals of Gad," "The Life of Solomon," "The Acts of Rehoboam," "The Chronicles of Judah and Israel," "The Book of Jashur," "The Life of Hzekiah," "The Life of Manasseh," "The Prophecy of Ahijah," "The Book of Shemaiah," "The Sayings of Hosea," and several others.

If Ezra reproduced all the other books of the Bible, why did he not reproduce these also? If they were originally written by thee, or at thy dictation, why were they not preserved from loss? but if lost, why were they not re-written by the same process as the others? Was it because of their unimportance or being of secondary consequence?

Is it not true that the books composing the Old Testament were not collected together in one volume or collection till two or three centuries before the beginning of the Christian era?

Is it not true also that in the days of Abraham, Jacob, Moses, Joshua, Gideon, Samson, Samuel, David, Solomon, Jeroboam, Hzekiah, Josiah, and the other Kings of Israel and Judah, there was no Bible, no volume called thy revealed and written word?

In those days was there any way to learn thy will upon any subject, save by going to men who styled themselves thy prophets and who claimed to be in special communication with thee and to be able to make known thy will and law?

If for more than a thousand years thy people were able to get along very well without a Bible, and if for nearly another thousand years it existed only in detached parts in the hands of priests and others, could not the descendants of the same people, as well as those who adopted their theological opinions, have got along equally as well without a Bible for another thousand years or two?

Is there anything in the nature of the Jewish Scriptures or sacred writings, or in the manner in which they were written and placed upon record, any more remarkable, any more divine, any more exalted, any more sublime, any more pure in character than the sacred writings of the Hindoos, the Persians, the Chinese, the Egyptians, and others of the ancient nations?

Was it not common with many of the ancient nations, from three to five thousand years ago, to have their sacred writings, the same being regarded as the mind and will of their respective gods?

Is it not strictly true that several of these sacred writings possess a far greater antiquity than can be justly claimed for the Jewish Scriptures? and are there not older scriptures equal in every particular to what was afterwards gotten up in the small Jewish nation?

If it was thy original purpose to write or compile a Bible, is it not a little bit singular that thou sawest fit to wait till other nations than the Jews, which had other gods than thee, had preceded thee in the enterprise?

Is it not true that the theory of the cosmogony of the world—of the creation of the earth, of the sun, moon, and stars; of all varieties of vegetation, and of animals and man; of his temptation and fall; of the flood which deluged the earth—similar to what is now recorded in the Bible, existed in Chaldea long before thy people, the Jews, were taken there as captives?

Is not this fact abundantly confirmed by plates found by those indefatigable explorers, Smith and Rawlinson, at the site of ancient Nineveh?

Were they not able to decipher those characters? and did they not find there inscribed on those plates not only the story of the creation of the world, of the fall of man, and of the great flood which came upon the earth, but did they not also find the originals of the nursery tales such as "Jack the Giant Killer," "Jack and his Bean Stalk," "The House that Jack Built," and many other similar tales which for at least four thousand years have contributed to the pleasure and edification of little children?

Is it not true that those cuneiform inscriptions referred to were executed long before the Jewish Scriptures were written, yes, many centuries before a word was penned in the Hebrew language?

Is it not a well-ascertained fact that human language was written or transferred to plates, stones, monuments, etc., in the cuneiform inscriptions and in hieroglyphics long, long before any language having an alphabet was brought into use?

As the Hebrew has an alphabet, is it not comparatively a modern language? and was it not brought into use at a much later date than the employment of the cuneiform inscriptions of Assyria and Chaldea or the hieroglyphics of Egypt?

This being the case, is it not fair to conclude that Ezra or Esdras, or whoever wrote the Bible account of the creation, of the fall of man, etc., got the whole thing in Chaldea when the Jews were in captivity there, and that the same was re-written in Hebrew after the return to Palestine, some five hundred years before the beginning of the Christian era?

By looking all these things in the face and coming to the most natural conclusion that can be arrived at, is it strange that men should entertain the opinion that the foundation story of the Jewish Scriptures was borrowed from ancient pagan nations, and that instead of being written by thee or by thy dictation it was written by Ezra and his scribes or by some other equally officious persons or priests?

And is it not a mistake that the civilized world of to-day attach so much more importance to the Jewish sacred writings than to those of other nations, which are far more ancient and far more voluminous and extensive?

A LECTURE DELIVERED AT WOLCOTT, AUG. 18, AND AT NEW HAVEN, SEPT. 23, 1877.

Let us for a few moments step over into China, that country of five millions of square miles and its five hundred millions of inhabitants, and take a cursory glance at its religion. Many of its vast population are Buddhists; many are worshipers of idols, and many hold in high veneration the teachings of Confucius, a remarkable reformer who lived in that country nearly twenty-five hundred years ago. He saw the light of the sun 550 years before the dawn of the Christian era. He was of poor parentage, though his forefathers belonged to the powerful potentates who ruled the Flowery Kingdom one thousand years before his birth. Owing to the poverty of his youth, he was forced to sustain himself by manual labor. But, humble as was his origin, the influence of his teachings, oral and written, has been greater for good than that of almost any other man that has lived in the world. His writings have been termed the "prose of Asia," but their effect has been unequalled by all the poetical imagery that man's fertile brain has been the author of. His minute and practical system of morals has exerted and still exerts an influence on the almost innumerable people of the country of his birth which it is impossible to estimate, but it is quite sufficient to make the world admire the power that can be exercised by a single individual. None but a great man could wield such an influence. Confucius belongs to that select class of men whose lives have been devoted to the best interests of their fellow-beings. He sought to implant the purest principles of morals and religion and to make his fellow-men better, wiser, and happier. The great peculiarity of his system of instruction consisted in its being confined solely to the duties, proprieties, and labors of this life. He directed no attention to a world above the sky and owned no allegiance to a being whom no one has ever seen or ever can see or know anything about. He strove to reform the abuses of society and to impart to his countrymen the knowledge they needed to make them better citizens, to show them how to live more useful lives, and how to obtain from this earthly existence the greatest amount of happiness without infringing upon or detracting from the rights of others.

He had most worthy disciples, and among them was Mencius, who, for wisdom and plain, practical sense, was almost the equal of his master.

Among the commendable and excellent sentiments which Confucius taught I can only detain you long enough to repeat a very few:

"The essence of knowledge is, having it, to apply it; not having it, to confess your ignorance."

"To rule with equity is like the North Star, which is fixed and all the rest go round it."

"Worship as though the Deity were present."

"Be rigid to yourself and gentle to others and you will have no enemies."

"Fix thy thoughts on duty; practice without ceasing the virtue of humanity, and if you have leisure cultivate the arts."

"Return bad treatment with equity, and recompense kindness with kindness."

"Do unto another what you would he should do unto you, and do not unto another what you would he should not do unto you. Thou only needest this law alone; it is the foundation and principle of all the rest."

This most excellent sentiment was uttered more than five hundred years before another distinguished teacher is said to have uttered it in Palestine, and which his followers have regarded as the very acme of deific wisdom and excellence. It has been named by them the "Golden Rule," and it has been pointed to as the sublimest and best rule that was ever given to man. Much of the praise is just, but Confucius is at least as much entitled to the credit of having uttered it, and as priority of an invention or a copyright is what usually decides the matter of proprietorship of merit, to Confucius rather than to Jesus belongs the distinguished honor of having first taught the Golden Rule. Confucius was eminently distinguished by energy and persistency. The labor of his life was to promote the public weal. He always inculcated respect to parents, to the aged, and to the worthy. Many are the beautiful and noble things that are repeated of him. His courage in the midst of danger is highly extolled, while his humility was equal to his sense of honor. Truthfully has it been said, "His writings and life have given the law to Chinese thought." For twenty-five centuries he has been the patron saint of that great nation. His books are published every year by societies organized for that purpose, who distribute them far and wide without money or price. The number of temples that have been erected to his memory is sixteen hundred and sixty. One of them alone occupies ten acres of land. Two festivals are held yearly in memory of his great services, during which are sacrificed some seventy thousand animals of various kinds and twenty-seven thousand pieces of silk are burned on his altars. Of course this is a useless waste of a great amount of valuable property, but it is the way his numerous admirers take to show their respect for his memory.

In taking our leave of this excellent man—this great moral teacher—the greatest encomium we can bestow upon his memory, the greatest tribute we can pay to the superiority of his system of religion is to say that it is a religion without priests, liturgy, or public worship. If Buddhism is calculated to please us well, the religion of Confucius pleases us still better.

Trial Subscribers.

Again we wish to thank those friends who interested themselves in obtaining trial subscribers. The names have poured in liberally, but, like Oliver Twist, we are still crying for "more." We still are inclined to send THE TRUTH SEEKER two months for twenty cents. The extra numbers for Nov. 3d and 20th are nearly out, but we will send the paper two months for the price named, and give the back numbers as long as they hold out. Many wish to begin with our discussion with Mr. Teed, and we will continue to send it so long as we are able to do so, but we cannot send all the back numbers, though we will do the best we can. In addition to the discussion for the next few weeks or months as the case may be, and other interesting features of the paper, it will contain a full report of our examination, trial, etc., as they develop. Many new subscribers ought to be obtained on this account, and if any feel like subscribing for a year they will not be required to begin on the trial plan. We hope our list of bona fide subscribers will grow largely within the next few weeks.

B. F. UNDERWOOD lectured at Kenton, O., Nov. 14th; at Marion, O., 15th and 16th; and will lecture at West Liberty, O., Nov. 17th, 18th, and 19th; and at Napoleon, O., Nov. 21st, 22d, and 23d.

It has Come at Last!

One week ago was announced in these columns the arrest in Boston, by Anthony Comstock, of E. H. Heywood, of Princeton, Mass. I was not then aware that the time of my own arrest was so near at hand; but at that very moment a warrant had been issued against me, and was only awaiting the pleasure of Mr. Comstock to serve it.

On Monday last, a little after the hour of twelve, while busily engaged in my office, preparing matter for this issue of the paper, that noted champion of Christianity, with a Deputy United States Marshal at his elbow, visited me with the information that he had a warrant for my arrest. I inquired by what authority and upon what charge? He replied by the authority of the United States and upon the charge of sending obscene and blasphemous matter through the mails. In reply to my enquiry what the objectionable matter was, he exhibited two tracts, one entitled "An Open Letter to Jesus Christ," and the other, "How do Marsupials Propagate their Kind?" He then demanded the amount of those tracts that were on hand, which were delivered to him. He showed a package of tracts, etc., which had been put up at this office and sent by mail to S. Bender, Squan Village, N. J., and a registered letter receipt for the money accompanying an order for THE TRUTH SEEKER, tracts, etc., which was signed in this office. I asked him whether the party to whom the tracts were addressed was a real party, and he had opened his package, or a bogus party, and the letter ordering the tracts a mere decoy letter, such as he had used on other occasions. He acknowledged it was the latter—that he had written the order in an assumed name.

Being satisfied that Mr. Comstock was a special agent, empowered by the government of the United States to do the kind of work he is doing, I deemed any show of resistance useless, and passively accompanied him and the Deputy Marshal Fritz Bernard to the room of U. S. Commissioner Shields, in the U. S. Court-rooms in the new Post-Office building, who fixed my bail at $1,500 and set Wednesday, the 21st, as the day for the preliminary examination. The matter of procuring bail was the next thing in order. Several persons were ready to obligate themselves for my appearance on the day set, but some one owning real estate in the city was required. This was soon procured and I was allowed to go about my business.

Thus I, hard upon sixty years of age, and who for nearly a half-century have been a supporter of our government, am now arrayed by it as an offender against it for sending indecent and blasphemous matter through the mails. The two tracts complained of were published two years ago. The "Open Letter" I wrote, and the other was written by Ex-Rev. A. B. Bradford, as pure and honorable a man as this country can produce, and it is of a perfectly scientific character, being originally written for the Popular Science Monthly. Though the "Open Letter" may be thought pretty radical and outspoken, it is not obscene any more than the notion of a god begetting an offspring upon the person of a young Jewish maiden is obscene; and I consider that I had a perfectly legitimate right to ask the questions which I did upon the subject. The charge is ostensibly "obscenity," but the real offense is that I presume to utter sentiments and opinions in opposition to the views entertained by the Christian Church. Had I been a supporter of the Church and its dogmas, I should not have been disturbed by Comstock though I had sent matter through the mails twice as plain or "indecent"; and so I said to Comstock while on our way to the Commissioner's. I asked him why it was, if he was so anxious to prohibit the circulation of obscene literature, that he did not indict the Bible Society. I told him that that book contained more obscenity than any other publication I knew of, and enquired of him where he could find more indecent narratives than the account of Abraham and his concubine, Lot and his daughters, Jacob and his wives and concubines, Judah and Tamar, David and Bathsheba and his other wives, the rape of Amnon and his sister Tamar, the adultery of Absalom and his father's concubine, of the extensive operations of Solomon with his seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines and his amorous lovesick song. He evaded these inquiries by remarking that some ladies near us might hear our remarks, thus virtually confessing that the persons and subjects named were indecent.

I have always striven to be a law-abiding, upright citizen, doing injury to none who came within my reach; but I am now in the meshes of the law, held as a criminal, because I have vindicated the freedom of the press and have had the temerity to express my honest convictions. What the result of the trial will be is a question to be decided. Judging by the precedents, it will be likely to go hard with me. I am a prominent advocate of heterodox opinions and have made myself obnoxious to the theological powers that be, and am considered a belligerent enemy to the system of Christianity. It is desired to remove me as much as possible from the field of action. John A. Laht, prosecuted at the instigation of Comstock, was fined $500 and sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for eighteen months, and his offence was, perhaps no greater than mine. Dr. E. B. Foote, another of Anthony's victims, for simply publishing useful scientific information, was fined $3,500, with costs amounting to $1,500 more. What, then, is there to be expected for D. M. Bennett?

This system of persecution may well be denominated the American Inquisition, and it will be truly lamentable if this great, free government, which was founded upon a non-Christian and anti-theological basis, is to become the head and front of a fearful tyranny. Anthony Comstock, the great informer in these mail cases, is an ardent Christian, and is backed by the Young Men's Christian Association and the God-in-the-Constitution party. He wields an immense power, arresting whom he pleases, and at his beck the United States Marshals are prepared to run. The Judge presiding over the U. S. District Court is a firm Christian, and no matter how objectionable or prejudiced he may be thought to be, there is no change of venue; and however severe the verdict or sentence may be, there is no court of appeals to take the case to—no redress. Thus the reader can see at a glance how near like the Romish Inquisition, before which unfortunate wretches, but two or three centuries ago, were arraigned for opinion's sake, our present system is. The Christian Comstock takes the place of the grand informer, the Christian Judge becomes, possibly, the inquisitor-general, Christian jurors become aiders and abettors, and Christian fines and imprisonment take the place of the Christian rack, wheel, thumbscrew, beheading block, and stake. Much progress has been made in the last three hundred years, but much more has yet to be made before a man can express his candid convictions without being in danger of summary arrests and of being deprived of his property and his liberty.

I protest that I have committed no crime. I have wronged no person who walks upon the earth, and if there be supernal beings who float in the ether above the earth, I do not believe I have wronged them. I have not intended to wrong the smallest child nor the greatest man that lives, and in a court of equal justice I do not fear to meet the consequences of my conduct.

I have not been fighting a personal warfare. I have battled for human rights, for mental liberty and the freedom of the press, and I trust the friends of liberty and equality will not forsake me in my hour of trial. At best, it costs a good deal of money to defend a case in the United States District Court. The best lawyers ask $1,000 to defend a case of "obscenity" before that court, and other expenses are correspondingly heavy. Justice is a very dear article, and then one is liable to be imposed upon in the quality. If a fine is imposed it has to be paid at once or imprisonment follows.

I rest my case with my friends and make no special appeal. I embarked in the Liberal publishing enterprise without capital, and I have held my own. I have no money with which to fee lawyers, to pay fines, nor to meet other heavy expenses. I am willing to spend my last breath in defense of what I believe to be truth, justice, and righteousness, but I have not gold with which to retain my meagre effects, to preserve my personal liberty, or to save my life.

When Charles Bradlaugh and Mrs. Annie Besant were brought to trial in England on a similar charge, it was thought by the Secularists of that country that the cause was their own, and they contributed liberally to meet the expenses of the trial. I know not whether my friends will take the same view in the present instance. Should they do so, and feel like sending in contributions or naming the sum they will be willing to contribute in case of necessity, the same will be duly acknowledged in these columns and will not be used unless absolutely needed. In another place a proposition bearing upon the point named is made by friends, to which attention is called.

It is hoped that in the emergency that soon must come those who know themselves to be indebted to THE TRUTH SEEKER will be prompt to pay, and that those who feel like subscribing for the paper to help it through its trouble will be ready to do so. Under any state of things it is hoped that the paper will continue right along in its path of duty and halt not. It will not fail unless its friends fail to support it. Those who send for books and pamphlets will also help push the cause along and render THE TRUTH SEEKER more able to weather the approaching storm. May it not be expected that every Liberal in the country will do his duty?

I am the Liberal public's most obedient servant,

D. M. BENNETT.

To the Liberals of America.

In the light of recent events and the numerous prosecutions of Liberal publishers, culminating in the arrest of the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER by the infamous Comstock (the Torquemada of America), it is clear that it is the settled purpose of the bigots of the country to suppress so far as they can the rights of free speech and a free press, and especially all adverse criticism of the Christian superstition.

To obviate the strong prejudice existing in the public mind in favor of that invaluable right of freemen, they seek—and have partially succeeded, through loose and ambiguous Congressional legislation, ostensibly aimed at the circulation of obscenity through the United States mail but really to curb the attacks of modern criticism upon the so-called sacred books of the Christian religion—to prevent inquiry into the origin and truth of the system. Under our present imperfect laws several convictions against Liberal publishers have already been had and others are threatened.

The issue must be met, and the time seems now to have come to meet it.

The recent arrest of D. M. Bennett, the editor of this paper, for the publication of opinions distasteful to the votaries of superstition should arouse every Liberal in the land to the danger impending.

This fight is not alone Mr. Bennett's. He is but the standard-bearer in the struggle. The cause imperiled is the cause of Liberalism in America, and the rights threatened are the rights of every Freethinker in the land.

Not that every Freethinker has any particular sympathy with the particular articles or sentiments for the utterance of which he is indicted. These may or may not receive the sanction of all Liberals, but the principle involved is our quarrel, and to the end that it may be fought out to a successful issue, we, the undersigned, pledge to Mr. Bennett our aid and sympathy, and will contribute for his defense the sums set opposite our names.

HENDERSON & BROWN,

THE GOSPEL OF NATURE.—By M. L. Sherman and Wm. F. Lyons, authors of "The Hollow Globe." Chicago: Hazlitt & Reed, Clark street, 1877. The bungling record of Genesis is a very lame and unsatisfactory solution of the mighty problem of the when, how and wherefore of conscious existence; and as yet the materialistic theory of evolution is exceedingly crude and undigested. This being so, the above volume, given "through the organism" of M. L. Sherman, and written in the same manner as the famous "Hollow Globe," is legitimately concerned in a new search after foundations, a new investigation of the hidden wheels of Nature's wondrous machinery. It is not pretended, however, that it will solve the mighty problem; but the authors hope the book may cast a flood of light upon very numerous questions concerning man's earlier history, and his relation not only to his planet, but to the boundless Universe. By what method and how well this is done a thorough perusal of this neat volume will alone satisfy the inquiring reader or the more methodical student, to whom we heartily commend it.

A CHALLENGE TO THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—By Charles Wyman. Stoneham: Ed. T. Whittier, 1874. This pamphlet of 87 pages is a direct onslaught on "the God of the Bible," and an endeavor to prove that he (or rather it, because it is all a myth) is a false representation of what the author calls the "God of Nature." The first seven chapters are purely destructive, announcing that there is a total absence of the love of God, as represented in the Bible—that man was never in a state of perfection, and consequently never could have "fallen"—that there is no security for sin in the "salvation" offered to the sinner—that Christ was a hypocrite, and otherwise quite imperfect—that the "prophecies" are inconsistent and absurd—that the cruel deeds recorded in the Old Testament and ascribed to God are as cruel as the most barbarous deeds recorded in "profane" history—and that the Church has always been inefficient, perfidious, and corrupt. The eighth and last chapter is a sober and dignified attempt at the construction of substitutes for the cardinal doctrines of mythology or Christianity. His substitutes for the Bible God, for the Bible immortality, for the Christian theories of the origin of evil, of damnation and salvation, for Jesus as a model of life, for the Church, and for the Bible itself, will strike the reader as great improvements, to say the least; but the question still remains whether we want substitutes for some of them at all. The a priori and optimistic arguments of the author for personal immortality seem to us decidedly weak. Nothing—not even the finest intuitions and impressions—nothing in fact this side of scientific tests will ever convince the best thinkers of the world of "continued existence," and these tests seem to us only possible and obtainable within the domain of the so-called phenomena of Spiritualism.

The Unbeliever's God.

TO ONE WHO DEPLORED MY NON-BELIEF IN AN ANTHROPOMORPHIC GOD.

BY MRS. E. L. SAXON.

"Tis true we kneel at a different shrine,
But alike we love and pray;
The God I worship is also thine,
But adored in a different way.
I love my God in a different way—
In childhood's and woman's grace:
There's a sermon for me in every breeze,
A lesson in every place.

I scorn the cant of learned lore.
But a rose can thrill my heart,
And the tiny ant has a lesson more
Than I gain from the preacher's part.
The grand banana's perfect cone,
With its fringes of golden bloom,
Was the work, I know, of a hand divine
In Nature's wonderful loom.

Whatever the mind of man hath wrought,
Or the hand of man hath traced,
May be tortured, twisted, turned aside,
Abolished, despised, defaced.
Not so the work of the Master-hand
That hung the world on high.
Gathered the seas and spread the land,
And unrolled the scroll of the sky.

The engine, polished and beautiful,
All perfect in every part.
Is driven at speed o'er the iron road
By the steam at its fiery heart;
So, too, the engine battered and old,
All ruined by want of care,
Feeble in action, uncertain in course,
Still the steam's great power is there.

The spirit of God, in lofty power,
Thrilled keenly in Shakspeare's brain,
And blew to blossom the folded flower
In the reasoning soul of Paine.
In the lowliest being of all the earth
Doth the life of the Infinite dwell,
Impresses the leprous, unclean soul
And the sweetest saint as well.

"Christianity and Infidelity."

Barely have we had such a feast as we have found in perusing this book of 510 pages. On both sides the discussion is conducted with unusual ability and decorum. The disputants handle the arguments of each other without gloves but at the same time treating each other as brethren. The treatment of each on the part of each is such that a man or woman of peace can enjoy reading both sides of the questions here presented.

Mr. Humphrey, the affiant in this controversy, appears to us a rare specimen of manhood; it is so seldom that so much man is found in a minister that we almost felt to fall in love with him. He is a young man of very much more talent and erudition than is common to ministers, and with more geniality than we have ever known in an out-and-out Presbyterian. In fact, he is so genial that were it not for a few slips of his pen we should question his orthodoxy. Of course he did his duty to his cause by retailing a few second-hand slanders about Infidels, but the largest lies that have ever been told he "passed by on the other side." Concerning Thomas Paine Mr. Humphrey says on page 58:

"He had his good traits. He was honest. Nor was he uncharitable. He abstained from profanity, and rebuked it in others. He opposed slavery. Many will endorse his condemnation of Masonry. He was not the worst kind of an Infidel. He believed in a personal God. He considered Atheism a 'scandal to human nature.' In the language of Col. Ingersoll, an Atheist, 'he was orthodox compared with the Infidels of to-day.' He held his opinions sincerely. He died as he lived, a Deist."

Such statements as the above will almost choke some of the ministers who have almost blown their lungs out in descriptions of Paine's dishonesty, refusing to pay his whiskey bills, swearing at his drunken black paragon, and finally his horrible death, as he, calling upon the Lord Jesus to have mercy on him expired, the blood pouring out of his person in five places. Mr. Humphrey is laconic, artful, and elegant in his diction; he knows how to weave his writings full of quotations from or references to great authors. He also has a happy faculty of making a little stock in trade go a long way. Christians may well be proud of the work he has done in this debate.

So far as D. M. Bennett's part of the debate was concerned, we were thoroughly astonished. We knew Mr. Bennett, and besides had read very many of his writings. We were prepared for a genial, candid, straight-forward argument. But knowing that he had always labored with his hands, we supposed he had not had time enough in the interim of seed-growing, putting up medicines, doctoring, and attending to editorial duties to prepare himself so thoroughly for a discussion. He is not so terse as his opponent, but he was thoroughly at home on every proposition. His part of the debate betrayed an acquaintance with the literature of the world, that we doubt whether any of his friends had suspected.

Persons wishing to know what part Infidels took in establishing a free government, what part they have done towards introducing science and reform in the world, and whether the Bible is more liable to be divine than Infidelity is to be true, should send one dollar to D. M. Bennett and get a book which would be cheap at twice the amount of money.—Hull's Crucible.

S. MYRA HALL will lecture before the Manhattan Liberal Club, Friday evening, Nov. 16th, on "Woman, Finance and Labor." These popular subjects will no doubt be presented with the usual energy and eloquence which characterize this lady's speeches.

Another Testimonial.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please accept many thanks for your "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion." I had read the very interesting discussions as they appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I prize the book very highly, as it is a valuable record for reference. Indeed, I would not be without it, for if any doubt should ever occur concerning the famous historical characters which gave rise to the debate, we may be sure that the truth about them is all contained therein, as given by you or your worthy antagonist. The public must judge by the strongest facts and reasoning—which, we think, Friend Bennett, are on your side. May you find ready patronage for this most valuable publication.

Very truly yours, SOPHIE W. KENT.

WEST JUNIUS, N. Y., Nov. 4, 1877.

MR. EDITOR: After leaving the very interesting, pleasant and successful Congress at Rochester I went northeast to Wolcott and lectured three times in Cosad's Hall to audiences which were attentive and appreciative. The three days' meeting held at this place last August is proving a success in the permanent influence it has left upon the society here. Freethought is not popular yet, but it is no longer looked upon with contempt. It has won some respect and rejoices in a name to live. Mr. Cosad deserves the good wishes of all lovers of reform. He has built a hall where free speech may find a platform; and the doors of this hall are thrown open without money or price to every true reformer who may choose to enter and voice the truth within him. From Wolcott I came to West Junius, where I have just concluded a course of three lectures.

I had the pleasure of standing upon the platform in the old Quaker meeting house where have stood Garrison, Douglass, Henry C. Wright, Abby Kelly, Lucy Stone, Mrs. Livermore, E. Cady Stanton, and hosts of others.

This is an old battle-field of freedom, and there remains a large measure of the spirit of their sires in the sons of the former residents of this locality. Mr. E. W. Mitchell, the gentleman with whom I am stopping, is one of the most noted among the Freethinkers of this region. He is a man of large experience and a close observer, and has reared six boys to manhood, who are intelligent, well-informed, temperate, industrious, and thoroughly Liberal. The advantages of the common-sense method in training a family are here exhibited with happy results. It will be a great step forward when this common-sense method of teaching the young becomes popular.

Sometime during the latter part of this month I shall go into Ohio, and those wishing to communicate with me in regard to lectures may address me at Wilmington, Clinton Co., Ohio, in care of H. C. Hildebrandt.

Obituary.

In Ovid, May 7, 1877, of apoplexy, Spafford Wright, aged 68 years, 5 months and 16 days. He was born in Mansfield, Windham Co., Conn. Removed to Lenawee Co., Michigan, in the year 1839, where he lived 8 years. Removed to Ovid in the year 1847, where he has since resided, having experienced many of the privations of pioneer life, as he came one-half mile by marking trees to find his home. In life he was ever ready to assist a fellow man in need, and was liberal to a fault. "Do unto others as you would that they should do unto you" was his motto, and he came as near fulfilling the text as many men do. He was a Freethinker and worker. He was a life-long Democrat from principle, being conscientious alike in all things. He was Justice of the Peace here for many years, and held many offices of trust, which he filled with satisfaction to his constituents and with honor to himself. He leaves a wife with whom he had lived forty-six years, four children, and a large circle of friends to mourn his sudden decease, as he seemed to be in perfect health, for a man of that age, fifteen months before the shock came. He lingered ten days after he was taken ill, suffering terribly for the last few days, at which time he was paralyzed. He survived the third shock sixty hours, when death came to his relief. Peace to his ashes.

My Own Temperance Society.

Located Wherever the Signer Exists.

BY J. H. HARTER, AUBURN, N. Y.

CONSTITUTION.

Article 1. This society shall be called My Own Temperance Society, and shall be composed of all the noble attributes possessed by the signer.

Article 2. The officers of this society shall consist of a President, Vice-President, Secretary, Treasurer, and twelve trustees, all of whom shall hold their respective offices until others are elected, and they shall faithfully perform the duties usually assigned to officials holding such elevated positions.

Article 3. This constitution may be altered or amended by a two-third vote of the officers present at any time.

DECLARATION OF SENTIMENTS.

First. I believe that the Apostle Paul made an important statement when he said, "That your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God.—1 Cor. 6, 19."

Second. And still again when the same author said, "That ye are the temple of God and that the spirit of God dwelleth in you.—1 Cor. 3, 16."

Third. And that "The temple of God is holy, which temple ye are.—1 Cor. 3, 17."

Fourth. I agree with the Psalmist when he said, "I had rather be a doorkeeper in the house of my God than to dwell in the tents of wickedness.—Ps. 84, 10."

OBJECT AND PLEDGE.

My object, therefore, shall be, wisely to guard and protect, as far as in me lies, my body, house or temple, in which I exist; that I may thereby be the more useful to myself and to the world of mankind, and in order that I may be the more successful, I hereby and in the presence of the officers of this society, solemnly promise, pledge and agree that I will in this manner be installed or ordained to be a faithful doorkeeper in the house of my God, which house is my body, and that I will keep the front door (my mouth) of the house, sanctuary or temple in which I exist, so guarded that nothing immodest, impure or vicious shall pass out or in, and that I will especially keep the door closed against all "intoxicating" liquors, as a beverage, and that I will not traffic in them, and that in all honorable ways, I will discountenance their use as a beverage in the community and in the world.

Signed in the presence of the following officers, viz:

REAL SELF, President.
NATURAL LAWS, Vice-President.
FAITHFUL MEMORY, Secretary.
GENERAL WELFARE, Treasurer.

TRUSTEES: Active Monitor, Daily Accountability, Self Control, Cheerful Disposition, Certain Victory, Excellent Character, Physical Culture, Intellectual Advancement, Spiritual Growth, Moral Progress, Universal Harmony, Sure Happiness.

The Mob of Believers.

Dr. J. S. Russell, a prominent citizen of Bell County, Texas, and an honest man, recently received one hundred lashes on his bare back from the hands of a mob of Christian believers for refusing his assent to Christian dogmas.

Unable to see any good in the orthodox Christian belief.

In Bell County, Texas, there stood a man who renounced it in brief;

A prominent doctor was he, and a pure honest life was his aim—

No guile ever sullied his heart—no spot ever blemished his name.

But he could not believe in the God which the Christians have placed in the van.

Nor could he assent to the creed of vicarious atonement for man;

He thought, in a plain simple way, that honest convictions were best—

That a good moral life is the safest, in search of salvation or rest.

He honestly thought the atonement, the just suffering for the unjust,

Was a dogma too hard to believe in, a doctrine too cruel to trust;

His mind thus impressed with the truth that religion as taught is untrue,

He thought it but right to set forth a rational opposite view.

He said (never dreaming of trouble) that Nature, when studied with care,

Elicited truths all-sufficient for guidance of man in this sphere;

That her manifold forces and powers, unfolded by reason to view,

Unvail a bright pathway of travel, that mortals may safely pursue.

While thus in an earnest endeavor to light up life's journey to man,

A mob of believers went for him with a raw-hide that never saw tan;

With arts they inveigled their victim, to shades in the deep silent wood;

Their purpose, they said, was to stop him from hatching an infidel brood.

They stripped him of clothing and whipped him—one hundred lashes or more;

The thongs sprinkled blood all around them, from gashes all quivering and sore;

They then set him free, giving notice—they stuck up the notice on high—

That he who denied their religion, should suffer and quiver and die;

That torture and fagot and halter were held in reserve for the man

Who dares to dispute their religion, or teach that three Gods are not one—

Who dares flash the love-light of Virtue, Humanity, Science and Sense

Right into the dungeon of Priestcraft, and shout to its victims, "Go hence!"

'Tis thus in a county of Texas, the Red Inquisition of yore

Has come to the help of believers—as a threat it is held up in store

For all who may venture to differ with mobs of believers out there,

Or all who may doubt the responses to mobs of believers at prayer!

J. A. STEWART.

FORCIBLE BAPTISM IN SPAIN.—In a village called Tznatoraf, in the province of Jean, lives a colporteur of the British and Foreign Bible Society. This man and his wife are both Protestants, and they were the centre of a small knot of co-religionists in a remote district seldom visited by clergymen of their faith. When a first child was born, they traveled miles away to get it baptized, but could not afford to do so when a second came. On the 18th ult. the wife of this colporteur was delivered of another child, and a few hours after its birth two priests came to the house and endeavored to induce the parents to allow the child to be baptized according to the rites of Rome. The father declined, and told them that he did not belong to their communion and would not allow any such interference with his family's peace. The next morning appeared the village alcalde, who came on the same mission, and took a very high tone to insist upon the child being christened as a Catholic. Again the parents resisted, and the poor mother in her bed protested several times. Before midday the alcalde returned with his "baston de mando," or insignia, his alguazil, or policeman, the two priests, and some neighbors. They actually took, not only the child, barely twenty-six hours old, but another, aged two years, and despite every entreaty, the protest of the father, and the tears of the unfortunate mother, bore them off in triumph to the parish church. There, amid a crowd of peasants and with bells ringing, the children were baptized and afterwards returned to their parents. The case has been reported to the society here and to the clergymen at the head of the congregations in Madrid, who have given full particulars to the British Minister, as the man was in the service of the British and Foreign Bible Society.

Friendly Correspondence.

A. P. HULSE, Salinas City, Cal., writes: I take pleasure in acknowledging the receipt of a copy of the "Collection." I am delighted with it. I have loaned it among my infidel friends, who speak of it in terms of the highest praise. Many will order it as soon as they can do so.

A. H. FRANK, Buffalo, N. Y., writes: In renewing my subscription for another year, permit me to say I am extremely well pleased with your paper. As soon as I read it I send it to an old friend of mine, the son of a clergyman. He is very much interested in it, and lends it to his neighbors until it is nearly worn out.

J. A. STEWART, Atlanta, Ga., writes: Your paper is taken at my house by Mr. E. L. Winham—my son-in-law—who lives with me. I am familiar with its main features and objects, and approve of them. I am sixty-five years of age and never belonged to a church or believed in special providence. I am of the faith that subjected Dr. Russell, in Bell county, Texas, to mob violence at the hands of believers. That occurrence, if true, is startling and ominous. If good men can thus be tortured with impunity to the persecutors, then what measure of protection is left for honest and conscientious investigators of the philosophy of nature? The enclosed poem is at your service in the cause of truth and liberty.

A. T. HUDSON, M. D., Stockton, Cal., writes: The Liberals hereaway have had a pleasant feast from the genial and noble Ingersoll. He delivered his two lectures here on "Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child," and on "Ghosts." His ridicule of the crooked Bible stories was so humorous and whole-souled that its pungency was not severe upon the orthodox listeners. Everybody seemed enlarged and strengthened to higher motives for future action. Many thought that the title of his lecture on ghosts was not happy—that "Superstition" would have expressed it better. I am much pleased with your discussion with Mr. Humphrey. It is an excellent method of getting at truth. Your opponent is clearly a gentleman of culture and courage. His good temper and evident fairness was admirable, and I am sure you have not been outdone in the amenities or logic that the subject demanded. I am glad Mr. Lincoln's views came into question, as it shows upon what slender threads they will hang a claim for Christianity.

H. E. BERG, Osseo, Minn., writes: I send one dollar for a copy of "Truth Seeker Collection." I have read your paper only a short time, but I think it the best paper to turn darkness into light that ever came into my hands. There are a number in our neighborhood that think going to church will not make any one fat. About a dozen of us poor sinners lately went to a camp-meeting—or monkey-show, as I think it should more appropriately be called. After praying and making faces for sometime, one of the Gospel-millers came around to us and putting his hand upon my shoulder, asked me, "Do you love Jesus?" "No," said I; "I don't believe there ever was a Jesus." "Oh, dear man! do you really mean to say there is no Jesus?" "Yes, I do. I do not believe in humbug or anything the existence of which cannot be demonstrated." Whereupon he turned around to pray, "Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing," and went on to tell how they would suffer in hell, when they would jerk each other by the collar of the coat, and say, "You are the one who caused my suffering here; you are the one who stopped me from going to camp-meeting." I don't think hell is half as hot now as it was in former times.

W. B. GOOD, Angola, Ind., writes: About two years ago I was first introduced to that now highly-prized sheet, called THE TRUTH SEEKER. But I paid but little attention to its appearance. Not over five months have elapsed since (just to try its merits), I sent one dollar for the paper for six months. I now cannot speak too highly of it. Had I complete control of this pen, and could command the voice of thunder, I would write and fairly deafen the dumb and ignorant ears of orthodoxy, with the grand truths of your valuable paper. For some time have I longed to express my own honest feelings and opinions on the subject of theology. Dear Editor, please grant me this space. I was born and raised strictly a Methodist. Until the age of twenty-two I was bound mentally, financially, and almost physically, by the above church, but to-day I consider myself free from the dogmatical and unfounded claims of any church, and shall continue in this channel of free thought and liberty as long as reason and science are in my possession. A careful perusal of that splendid production, viz., "The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion," has indelibly impressed my mind with new thoughts. With great men I can exclaim, that "my mind is my church," that "the world is my field, and to do good (with an obedience to the golden rule) is my religion." Away with that religion that tries to prevent men from speaking their honest thoughts against it. May the God of Nature grant that the orthodox churches be doomed to the lowest pit of destruction, when an honest and law-abiding citizen is hellishly seduced from his own quiet home and lashed almost to death for simply asserting his free thoughts against orthodoxy. My pen is far too weak to describe a punishment for those who would try to bring a reproach upon and blacken the character of that great and noble man, Thomas Paine, while his greatest enemies (who are not void of sense), must acknowledge that he was a great helper to the freedom we now so happily enjoy. Success be to you, Bro. Bennett, while battling against the great bulwarks of ignorance and superstition. As the icebergs disappear beneath the tropical sun, so may you be successful in purifying the religious atmosphere.

A. A. LEWIS, Lawrence, Mass., writes: Permit me to say a word through the columns of your very excellent paper. I am a reader and subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hope to so continue. I am greatly pleased with the general tone of the matter contained in it. I was brought up and whipped to believe the contents of the so-called Bible or book of books, and the teachings of the clergy and Sunday-school teachers, etc., but thanks be to common sense, human nature and science, I have come to look at this matter in a more natural way, and with all due deference to all professed believers in the divine origin of the Bible and the saving efficacy of Christ's blood, etc., I must most truthfully and positively differ with them. My arguments daily are sharp and short with my opponents. I seek to impose my views on no one, but when attacked I endeavor to maintain my rights, and usually do so. I am no Radical, neither am I a believer in the old superstitious Bible teachings, fables, wonders and dogmas of the Dark Ages. I fully endorse "What I Don't Believe," etc., as published in your excellent TRUTH SEEKER Weekly. I take your paper, and have also sent for your tracts, etc., and I hope to be able to continue to take the T.S. I am poor, but not friendless. There are hundreds here who believe as I do, but dare not come out for policy and popularity.

O. BARNES, Clay, N. Y., writes: What are your views on free agency? Many tell us we are free agents. I would like to know what constitutes an agent if it is not one who acts for another in a business or other capacity? Then, does he not do the will of the principal by obeying him and executing his orders? How can a man be free unless he can act without restraint from outside influences? Now, I hold that a man is not free who executes the will of another; consequently the term free cannot be applied to an agent. I think, friend Bennett, this free agency idea is about as consistent as the idea of a trine God. In fact, the whole orthodox system of religion is a bundle of absurdities from beginning to end. Why is the world so slow in outgrowing it, especially when we see so much light in the world? Since the advent of Spiritualism, Free thought has made rapid strides. If this continues for the next thirty years as it has for the last thirty, who can tell how much of orthodoxy will be left? One third of the believers in modern Spiritualism were once church-members. You and I do not agree as to a future state; and yet we agree to disagree. We do not occupy the same plane, and consequently cannot see alike. To me, it seems a great mistake on the part of our Creator if he intended the human race to complete its existence on this mundane sphere and then pop into nonentity. It is generally conceded that there is more misery in the world than happiness. If this is so, would it not be better to cease reproducing our kind altogether and let the human family become extinct? Spiritualism, to me, has demonstrated a life after death; hence hope, or rather knowledge, is likened unto an anchor of the soul, which buoys us up while we pass through the troubles and afflictions of this life. You are doing a mighty work for the redemption of mankind from ignorance and error. So, go on and finish the work which Providence has laid out for you to do. And when you shall have finished the task, you will enter a more spiritual field of labor. I wish to be understood—this will be after the dissolution of this body. I am satisfied you are too honest to ignore Spiritualism when you have the evidence of its truth. But the time has not come for you to abandon the work so nobly begun. I hope you will die in the harness, as John Quincy Adams did, pleading for the right of petition. What did the spirit of your father tell you through the mediumship of J. V. Mansfield? Did he not encourage you to go on with THE TRUTH SEEKER, and not slacken your zeal in well doing? Perhaps you may say it was not the spirit of your father, but some occult force in nature, that sometime in the future will be revealed to man. If you cannot see it in another light, then of course you will have to abide your time until the evidence comes; then you will wonder why you have been so slow to believe. When Harvey discovered arterial circulation of the blood, what an outcry was raised against him for adopting such an absurd idea! Now who ignores the fact? Not even a schoolboy! Take heed from the past, Brother Bennett, and be not found "fighting against God!" I am not an infidel in the common acceptance of the term, but in a limited sense I am. I do believe in an overruling power, call it what you will. I believe in an eternal and never-ending future, and that man, or that vital part which we call soul, will exist as long as our Creator. I believe our happiness in the spirit world will be meted out to us according to our development and the use we have made of this life. I believe our spirit friends take cognizance of our acts, and when conditions are favorable, strive to restrain us from evil doing. I believe we will outgrow all the imperfections of this life in the distant future, and become as near perfection as it is possible for the human mind to conceive. I also believe we will retain our individuality and identity throughout the never-ending ages of eternity.

PAYNE'S AGE OF REASON is an enterprising eight-page Liberal family paper devoted to the affairs of this world, and published in the interest of the people now on earth. Editorially, it labors to free mankind from the bondage of priestcraft and all forms of superstition. It does not believe in churches or creeds; it has no reverence for bibles or man-made gods, and it opposes all attempts to impoverish this world by laying up treasures in another.

It has a variety of departments, is chaste and pure in its tone, and in all respects aims to be a first-rate Liberal paper. It must be the best, for it is the only one of its kind on this continent.

PAYNE'S AGE OF REASON is published WEEKLY AT ONE DOLLAR A YEAR, or it will be mailed one, two, or three months on trial for ten cents per month. Christianity and Infidelity

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n, Clergyman,
OF NEW YORK, AND
D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers; and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion.

A thick 12mo volume of 560 pages, well bound sent, post-paid, to any address, for the low price of one dollar.

Heathens of the Heath;

A ROMANCE, BY WM. McDONNELL,

AUTHOR OF "EXETER HALL," ETC.

This work is rich in romantic and pathetic incidents, and exhibits with an overwhelming array of facts the atrocities committed by the Church. It shows that the purest morality exists without the Bible, and that many of the heathen philosophers were lovers of virtue. The folly of Christian ministers is fully portrayed. Hypocrisy and bigotry are clearly exposed, and the road to virtue and true happiness plainly marked out. A most pleasing romance is woven into the work, in which much opportunity is afforded the author for fine descriptions and beautiful sentiments which he so well knows how to give utterance to. The characters in the tale are invested with much interest; the hero and heroine gain the love of every reader. "On the whole, it is the work of a master hand—a work of unaffected beauty and the deepest interest." "One of the most valuable features of the work is, its positions are all proven. . . . Every thinking, enquiring mind should peruse it." 500 pp., 12mo. Price, in paper, $1.00; cloth, $1.50.

Underwood-Marples Debate.

HELD BETWEEN

B. F. UNDERWOOD

AND THE

Rev. JOHN MARPLES,

At Napanee, Ont., July, 1875. Continuing four nights.

PROPOSITIONS DISCUSSED.—First. "That Atheism, Materialism, and Modern Skepticism are illogical and contrary to Reason." Marples affirming; Underwood denying.

Second. "That the Bible, consisting of the Old and New Testament, contains evidence, beyond all other books, of its divine origin." Marples affirming; Underwood denying.

Reported by JOHN T. HAWKE, of the Toronto Leader, and revised by the disputants. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents, by mail.

MR. MARPLES writes to Mr. UNDERWOOD: "Copies of the Debate were sent me and I have looked them through, and on the whole I approve of them very much. You have done me full justice. . . . I intend to push the sale all I can."

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Author of "The Biography of Satan," and "The Bible of Bibles" (comprising a description of twenty bibles).

This wonderful and exhaustive volume by Mr. Graves will, we are certain, take high rank as a book of reference in the field which he has chosen for it. The amount of mental labor necessary to collate and compile the varied information contained in it must have been severe and arduous indeed, and now that it is in such convenient shape the student of freethought will not willingly allow it to go out of print. But the book is by no means a mere collation of views or statistics; throughout its entire course the author—as will be seen by his title-page and chapter-heads—follows a definite line of research and argument to the close, and his conclusions go, like sure arrows, to the mark.

Gems of Thought.

ETERNITY is as vast as infinity. We, fugitives in both, have but one little word for both—time.—Jean Paul.

THE saint of the future will hold his body as noble as his spirit, and of equal importance. The bravest soul is useless.—Anon.

O THAT estates, degrees, and offices were not derived corruptly! and that clear honor were purchased by the merit of the wearer!—Shakespeare.

ERRORS, however beautiful and gold-enamelled by time, must be extracted from the human mind by the archangel of Eternal Truth.—Anon.

SUPERSTITION is certainly not the characteristic of this age. Yet some men are bigoted in politics who are infidels in religion. Ridiculous credulity!—Junius.

THE best piety is to enjoy when you can. You are doing the most then to save the earth's character as an agreeable planet. And enjoyment radiates.—Exchange.

HE that loves Christianity better than truth will soon love his own sect or party better than Christianity, and will end by loving himself better than all.—Coleridge.

NEVER listen to calumnies, because if they are untrue you run the risk of being deceived, and if they be true, of hating persons not worth thinking about.—Montesquieu.

THE Church has a good stomach; she has swallowed down whole countries, and has never known a surfeit; the Church alone can digest such ill-gotten wealth.—Goethe.

CALL on a business man at business times only, and on business; transact your business and go about your business, in order to give him time to finish his business.—Duke of Wellington.

WE are born to lose and to perish, to hope and to fear, to vex ourselves and others; and there is no antidote against a common calamity but virtue; for the foundation of true joy is in the conscience.—Seneca.

THERE are beauties of character which, like the night-blooming cereus, are closed against the glare and turbulence of every-day life, and bloom only in shade and solitude, and beneath the quiet stars.—Tuckerman.

ALAS, that we should be so unwilling to listen to the still and holy yearnings of the heart! A god whispers quite softly in our breast, softly yet audibly; telling us what we ought to seek and what to shun.—Goethe.

So great is the effect of cleanliness upon man, that it extends even to his moral character. Virtue never dwelt long with filth; nor do we believe there ever was a person scrupulously attentive to cleanliness who was a consummate villain.—Rumford.

SACRED, holy day, that which follows the reconciliation of men! Love is again timid and virgin; the beloved new-born and glorified; the heart celebrates anew its May-time, and the survivors from the field of contest forget or cannot understand the cause of the war.—Jean Paul.

It is very sad for a man to make himself servant to a thing, his manhood all taken out of him by the hydraulic pressure of excessive business. I should not like to be merely a great doctor, a great lawyer, a great minister, a great politician—I should like to be also something of a man.—Theodore Parker.

O! IT is the saddest of all things that even one human soul should dimly perceive the beauty that is ever around us, "a perpetual benediction!" Nature, that great missionary of the Most High, preaches to us forever in all tones of love, and writes truth in all colors, on manuscripts illuminated with stars and flowers.—Mrs. L. M. Child.

FOR Science the volume of inspiration is the book of Nature. Confronting all, it needs no societies for its dissemination. Infinite in extent, eternal in duration, human ambition and human fanaticism have never been able to tamper with it. On the earth it is illustrated by all that is magnificent and beautiful, on the heavens its letters are suns and worlds.—Draper.

MEN say their pinnacles point to heaven. Why, so does every tree that buds, and every bird that rises as it sings. Men say their aisles are good for worship. Why, so in every mountain glen and rough sea-shore. But this they have of distinct and indisputable glory,—that their mighty walls were never raised, and never shall be, but by men who love and aid each other in their weakness.—Ruskin.

THE Earth flourishes, or is over-run with noxious weeds and brambles, as we apply or withhold the cultivating hand. So fares it with the intellectual system of man. If you are a parent, then, consider that the good or ill dispositions and principles you please to cultivate in the mind of your infants may hereafter preserve a nation in prosperity, or hang its fate on the point of the sword.—Horace Mann.

LIFE, to the man of wisdom, is the harblager of those benefits which Time's sickle cannot mow down or the chemistry of death impair; of lessons which, whether heeded and treasured up or not in our early years, are the primal causes and necessary rudiments of an eternal education. The wise man thinketh that the life of this world, like a golden harp of infinite magnitude, yieldeth to the use made of it; music floats out from its vibrating wires, or discord goes rolling and winding through the tissues of being, just as play upon it.—A. J. Davis.

Quips and Quas.

MARK TWAIN'S LATEST.

HOW AN IRREVERENT OLD SALT INTERPRETED THE STORY OF ELIJAH AND THE PROPHETS OF BAAL.—One trip the Captain had a clergyman on board, but did not know he was a clergyman, since the passenger list did not betray the fact. He took a great liking to the Rev. Mr. Peters, and talked with him a good deal; told him yarns, gave him toothsome scraps of personal history, and wove a glittering streak of profanity through his garrulous fabric that was refreshing to a spirit weary of the dull neutralities of undecorated speech. One day the Captain said, "Peters, do you ever read the Bible?"

"Well—yes."

"I judge it ain't often, by the way you say it. Now, you tackle it in dead earnest once, and you'll find it'll pay. Don't you get discouraged, but hang right on. First, you won't understand it; but by and by things will begin to clear up, and then you wouldn't lay it down to eat."

"Yes, I have heard that said."

"And it's so, too. There ain't a book that begins with it. It lays over 'em all, Peters. There's some pretty tough things in it—there ain't any getting around that—but you stick to them and think them out, and when once you get at the inside everything's plain as day."

"The miracles, too, Captain?"

"Yes, sir! the miracles, too. Every one of them. Now, there's that business with the prophets of Baal; like enough that stumped you?"

"Well, I don't know but—"

"Own up, now; it stumped you. Well, I don't wonder. You hadn't any experience in raveling such things out, and naturally it was too many for you. Would you like to have me explain that thing to you and show you how to get at the meat of these matters?"

"Indeed I would, Captain, if you don't mind."

"Then the Captain proceeded as follows: 'I'll do it with pleasure. First, you see, I read and read, and thought and thought, till I got to understand what sort of people they were in the old Bible times, and then after that it was all clear and easy. Now this was the way I put it up concerning Isaac and the prophets of Baal. There was some mighty sharp men among the public characters of that old ancient day, and Isaac was one of them. Isaac had his failings, plenty of them, too; it ain't for me to apologize for Isaac; he played it on the prophets of Baal, and like enough he was justifiable considering the odds against him. No, all I say is, 'twan't any miracle, and that I'll show you so'st you can see it yourself."

"Well, times had been getting rougher and rougher for prophets—that is, prophets of Isaac's denomination. There was four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal in the community, and only one Presbyterian—that is, if Isaac was a Presbyterian, which I reckon he was, but don't say. Naturally the prophets of Baal took all the trade. Isaac was pretty low spirited, I reckon, but he was a good deal of a man, and no doubt he went prophesying around, letting on to be doing a land office business, but 'twan't any use; he couldn't run any opposition to amount to anything. By and by things got desperate with him; he sets his head to work and thinks it all out, and then what does he do? Why, he begins to throw out hints that the other parties are this and that and 't'other—nothing very definite, may be, but just kind of undermining their reputations in a quiet way. This made talk, of course, and finally got to the King. The King asked Isaac what he meant by his talk. Says Isaac, 'Oh, nothing particular; only, can they pray fire down from heaven on an altar? It ain't much, may be, your Majesty, only, can they do it? That's the idea.' So the King was a good deal disturbed and he went to the prophets of Baal, and they said, pretty airy, that if he had an altar ready they were ready, and they intimated he'd better get insured, too."

"So next morning all the children of Israel and their parents and the other people gathered themselves together. Well, here was the great crowd of the prophets of Baal packed together on one side, and Isaac walking up and down all alone on the other, putting up his job. When time was called, Isaac let on to be comfortable and indifferent; told the other team to take the first inning. So they went at it, the whole four hundred and fifty, praying around the altar, very hopeful, and doing their level best. They prayed an hour—two hours—three hours,—and so on, plumb till noon. It wasn't any use; they hadn't took a trick. Of course they felt kind of ashamed before all those people, and well they might. Now, what would a magnanimous man do? Keep still, wouldn't he? Of course. What did Isaac do? He gray-cled the prophets of Baal every way he could think of. Says he, 'You don't speak up loud enough; your god's asleep like enough, or may be he's taking a walk; you want to holler, you know, or words to this effect; I don't recollect the exact language. Mind, I don't apologize for Isaac; he had his faults."

"Well, the prophets of Baal prayed along the best they knew how all the afternoon, and never raised a spark. At last, about sundown, they were all tuckered out, and they owned up and quit."

"What does Isaac do, now? He sleeps up and says to some friends of his there, 'Pour four barrels of water on the altar.' Everybody was astonished; but the other side had prayed at it dry, you know, and got whitewashed. They poured it on. Says he, 'Heave on four more barrels.' Then he says, 'Heave on four more.' Twelve barrels, you see, altogether. The water run all over the altar and all down the sides, and filled up a trench around it that would hold a couple of hogheads—'measures,' it says—I reckon it means about a hoghead. Some of the people were going to put on their things and go, for they allowed he was crazy. They didn't know Isaac. Isaac knelt down and began to pray; he struggled along and strung along about the heathen in distant lands, and about the sister churches, and about the state and country at large, and about those that's in authority in the government, and the usual programme, you know, till everybody had got tired and gone to thinking about something else, and then, all of a sudden, when nobody was noticing, he outs with a match and takes it on the under side of his leg, and p'f! up the whole thing blazes, like a house afire! Twelve barrels of water! Petroleum, sir, petroleum! That's what it was!"

"Petroleum, Captain?"

"Yes, sir; the country was full of it. Isaac knew all about that. You read the Bible. Don't you worry about the tough places. They ain't tough when you come to think them out and throw light on them. There ain't a thing in the Bible but what is true; all you want is to go prayerfully to work and cipher out how't was done.—Atlantic for November.

Notes and Clippings.

GREAT BRITAIN now cultivates nearly 1,000,000 fewer acres of wheat than she did twenty years ago.

WILLIAM SIMPSON, a pious temperance reformer well known in New England, has eloped with a girl of Medway, Mass.

THE directors of the Philadelphia Exhibition have determined to hold religious services on Sundays, but the clergymen have refused to officiate.

THE outflow of our surplus produce continues. The three ocean steamers that left this port yesterday took out 116,000 bushels of grain; also beef, pork, bacon, oysters, cheese, butter, canned goods, and 2,550 barrels of apples.

CHARLIE ROSS' father in his vain search for the stolen boy has spent $60,000, his entire fortune, and is now a traveling salesman for an Eastern house. He has made 300 journeys in search of his lost child, and says he shall persevere until it is found or he dies himself.

A MISGIVING is always felt when a bald-headed man passes the contribution plate, not but bald-headed men are as honest as other folks, but they look so smooth and slippery and so hard to hold on to when caught, that a shudder generally goes round with the plate.

REV. DR. WILLIAM ALVIN BARTLETT, now of Indianapolis, who was on intimate terms with Senator Morton and visited him often during his last illness, says that the Senator uniformly declined to hold religious conversation with anyone, and that he died without any change of mind on that subject.

AN Oxford professor, examining a student on Bible history, asked him why Moses was buried by the Lord in such a secret place that the Israelites could not find him. The youth replied that he supposed it was for fear they would dig his body up and stuff it. This young person was the son of a showman.

IN some churches, where the minister preaches longer than the congregation think he ought to, some of the people have a habit of snapping their watches in order to give him a hint that it is time to stop. Thus is the Scripture fulfilled: "Take ye heed, watch and pray; for ye know not when the time is" up.

THE number of Chinamen who came to San Francisco last month was only two hundred and twenty-eight while eight hundred and eighty-two returned to their native land. For the first ten months of the present year the total number of Chinese arrivals was 9,302 as against 15,370 for the corresponding months of last year. The anti-Chinese movement is beginning to show some fruit.

THE intention of the old deacon was good, but the way in which he worded his notice was infelicitous. He said: "Any members of this congregation who have left off wearing apparel are requested to contribute the same for the benefit of the poor." A quiet smile pervaded the house, and the people concluded that it would be hardly the proper thing to leave off wearing apparel in the chilly November.

BROTHER GATES and his wife had some words, and separated. Sister Gates came back and wanted to make it all up. The Chicago Methodist Conference severely reprimanded Brother Gates for refusing to make peace with the lady. Gates claimed that she wasn't in earnest with her peace propositions, and that she wanted only to vex and bother him more and more. He has "been there" and ought to know.

A BRIEF note from Des Moines, Iowa, to the Chicago Tribune, dated Nov. 7th, says: "A few weeks ago a fragment of a meteorite fell in the garden of Joseph Clark, at Monticello, Jones county. It was hissing hot when first discovered. It is covered with an ash-colored fungus growth, like grayish moss, closely resembling to the eye a vegetable growth, but, under a glass, appearing to be a crystallization. The fragment seems to be slate mixed with iron and is very dense."

COLONEL ROBERT INGERSOLL, in alluding to the story concerning his father's severity, writes: "My father was a man of great natural tenderness, and loved his children almost to insanity. The little severity he had was produced by his religion. Like most men of his time, he thought Solomon knew something about raising children. For my part, I think he should have known better than to place the least confidence in the advice of a man so utterly idiotic as to imagine he could be happy with 700 wives.

A "MUM-MEETING" is the latest church novelty in Wisconsin, where it was held in aid of the enfeebled treasury of the church at Oconomowoc. The point of the meeting was to see which of the Oconomowockers could longest keep silence. After a solemn pause of fourteen minutes, during which there had been much inaudible smiling, one good sister varied the monotony of the meeting by bursting into a loud laugh and exclaiming, "Oh! isn't it funny!" The receipts from admission fees and forfeits helped the finances of the church bravely.

A DEPUTY United States marshal arrived from St. Louis, Bollinger county, Mo., on Nov. 6th, bringing as prisoners the Rev. Peter R. Simpson, a Methodist preacher, and his wife, Lavina Simpson, who are charged with forging pension papers, and representing themselves as other parties long since deceased. The proof is said to be positive against the accused. A short time ago the prisoner's brother, the Rev. John Thompson, also a Methodist preacher, was convicted on a charge of illicit distilling, and is now serving a term in the St. Louis County Jail.

AN imperial Prince was born Sept. 23d to the Japanese Emperor by one of the twelve subordinate mothers, named Yanigara, a daughter of an ancient and influential house of the old Kioto nobility. By a traditional law of Japan the Mikado has twelve wives in addition to the legitimate empress; this is to provide for contingencies of non-succession. No disgrace attaches to the position of subordinate mother, and it is believed that the purity of the unbroken descent for nearly 2,000 years is owing to this custom. But in the present state of opinion there are many objections to the custom, and probably the system will not be continued after this reign. If the present Empress had children the custom would be abolished without delay.

THE Examiner and Chronicle, which is the leading Baptist organ in this country, is happy over the way in which it says infant baptism is going out of fashion in nearly all the churches in which the rule is to practice it, both Catholic and Protestant. In one congregational association, representing 11,000 members, no baptism of infants are recorded. In the churches represented in the Presbyterian General Assembly, and numbering 557,000 members, only 18,000 baptisms of infants are reported, while report is made of the baptism of over 13,000 grown persons. Either these people have been remiss in bringing their babes to the baptismal font, or else the number of births has wonderfully fallen off.

THE Rev. James F. Merriam has been officiating for a few months as pastor of a Congregational church in Springfield, Mass. He was liked by the congregation, and a council was called for his formal installation. He read a statement of his religious belief, as is customary, and it contained the following: "In regard to the matter of the eternal punishment of those impenitent at death, I believe the Bible does not teach it; nor do I believe that it teaches the contrary. It leaves the question an open one. Hence, in my public teaching and ministry, as a minister of the Gospel, I would teach neither the one nor the other. In my private judgment and belief I hold that future punishment, if eternal in any sense, is so in the sense that it is eternal death or annihilation." Thereupon the council voted that Mr. Merriam was theologically unsound and refused to install him.

THE Omaha Bee of the 5th inst. says: "The North Star Society, composed of Scandinavians, gave a ball at Turner Hall Saturday evening. All went well until a party of persons, men and women, who have recently become very religious, entered the hall, after purchasing their tickets, and began to pray. One of the party, a minister who had recently been converting numerous Scandinavians and who organized the praying band, commenced to make a speech urging the dancers to become converted. The committee of arrangements came up and requested him to step out. The minister then went into the hall with his companions, and there knelt down and prayed for ten minutes, creating considerable excitement and curiosity. Finally, the minister was forcibly ejected from the building, but he continued the prayer-meeting on the sidewalk for quite a long time afterward. The dance was resumed inside, and no more attention was paid to the praying band."

A "THEATRE ASSOCIATION" has been organized in Boston by a number of clergymen and other good people, prominent among whom is the Rev. W. W. Newton, who spoke at the Church Congress on amusements. This association does not intend to dictate to the theatres what plays they shall put upon the stage, but will confine its operations to warning the public against plays which it considers evil. This it proposes to do by circulars distributed at the railroad stations, so as to catch the countrymen who come to town for the express purpose of seeing shows. Of course, if these countrymen are furnished with handbills telling them not to go and see a certain play at a particular place, that play is the one they immediately determine to see, and that place is the one toward which they incline their footsteps. The managers of several of the variety theatres have expressed their willingness to furnish the handbills if the clergymen will agree to have them distributed.

THE late Mrs. Catherine Merrill, after bequeathing a few thousand dollars to relatives, willed nearly $300,000 to Cardinal McCloskey. The wealth of the Catholic Church is increasing almost with arithmetical proportion, and not a little comes in this way—pious souls leaving all they have when about to step out, for the sake of securing a first-class private box in paradise. Not a dollar of that three hundred thousand will ever help to pay the taxes necessary to keep up our government, until the laws are changed so that Church property is made to help bear the burdens of the country. This is a single one of the thousands that occur where money and property that have been taxable pass into an untaxable condition. The only remedy is to have all kinds of property equally taxed, whether sacred or profane. The Church property enjoys equal benefits of protection from the government, and there is no good reason why it should not equally help defray the expense.

THE swindling by Deacon Southworth, Treasurer of the savings bank in North Bridgewater, Mass., proves to be larger than was supposed on the first exposure soon after his death. More than three-fourths of the depositors' books show larger entries than are found on the books of the bank. The clergyman who, in the funeral sermon, eulogized the Deacon as "a model of business integrity and Christian goodness," is said to be much depressed by these unwelcome developments. As the good Deacon had all the consolations and benefits of the Christian religion in his dying hour, it is presumable that he is now running a savings bank for the benefit of those who have "laid up their treasures above," or managing a safe deposit for the safe keeping of the angels' golden harps and crowns and Jehovah's "seven golden candlesticks."

THE Russian Government treats temperance and teetotal leagues as illegal secret societies. This is because the revenue is so largely increased by liquor duties, whereby $160,000,000 are annually added to the imperial exchequer. Policemen and soldiers are instructed to flog teetotalers into drinking. The clergy are ordered to preach against the new temperance heresy. Publications on the immorality of the liquor traffic are suppressed. A Polish schoolmaster was recently put to sweeping the streets for denouncing liquor selling. With the whisky revenues and the receipts from the Red Cross Society of this city, backed by the moral support and powerful prayers of Henry Ward Beecher and Bishop Cox, together with what little assistance they will receive from the Almighty, the Christians of Russia ought to make short work of those rascally teetotalers, the infidel Turks.

Events of the Week.

THE denizens of Quebec are enjoying good sleighing. At Bismarck, Dakota, the thermometer has stood at 6° below zero.

THE Silver Bill will probably pass both the houses of Congress at the extra session. It is a good thing, and the President will do well to sign it.

THE weather for the past week has been pleasant for November, but cold frosty nights are now upon us. It takes double the fuel to keep the house warm that it did a month ago.

THE Official Journal announces the resignation of the Cabinet of France, which President MacMahon has accepted. The Ministers will serve until their successors are appointed. The new ministry was gazetted Thursday.

MR. JULIUS KIRSCHNER, a chemist of this city, cremated the body of his child in a furnace. The ashes will be preserved in a vase. The undertakers are making some stir about it, as the practice, if prevalent, would take away their business.

THE Pittsburgh, Pa., Grand Jury have made their special presentation on the subject of the July railroad riots of that city. They declare that the militia were the rioters, and severely censure the commanders and State officers, including the Governor.

THE preliminary examination of D. M. Bennett, editor of this paper, arrested at the instance of that contemptible sneak who disgraces alike the name he bears and the Government he pretends to serve, has been postponed by the U. S. Commissioner till Saturday, Dec. 1st.

THE pay of the tow-boys on the Brooklyn and Atlantic Ave. horse-car railroad was reduced to seventy-five cents a day, whereupon they struck, and amused themselves by throwing stones at the boys who took their places. Several were arrested. The Superintendent of the Company says they are a hard lot. They must be—on seventy-five cents a day.

MARTINEZ CAMPOS, Spanish Commander in Cuba, has sent a confidential order to the Commanders of Columns ordering them to shoot all prisoners of war immediately, making it appear in their reports as though killed in battle. That is Christianity, pure and undefiled, as exemplified by the Catholic Church of Spain; and these outrages are committed in the name of him at whose coming the heralds sang, "Peace on earth, good will to man."

A LARGE fire occurred in New Haven on the 17th. The extensive rubber works of L. Condee & Co. took fire in the Arctic shoe department. The flames spread with such rapidity that in two hours all that was left of the immense establishment, occupying an entire block, was a mass of ruins. The main buildings made an unbroken front over three streets, and the enclosed space was occupied with other buildings of various sizes, and including engine-house, containing a three hundred and fifty horse-power engine, nearly new, which was ruined. Six hundred hands were thrown out of employment, which, just at the beginning of winter, is a serious thing for them. It is fortunate that no lives were lost. Loss, $600,000.

BAD news comes from the Turks. Kars after a desperate resistance to a vigorous attack has fallen. The Russians acknowledge a loss of 2,700 men and claim to have captured from the Turks 10,000 men, 5,000 killed, and 300 cannon with but a small amount of booty. Gen. Count Grabbe, Gen. Belinsky and Lieut. Col. Melikoff of the Russian army were killed. About 15,000 Russians were engaged in the contest and showed themselves better soldiers than on former occasions. Since Kars has fallen the Russians are marching defiantly on Ezeroum, that being the next stronghold which stands in their way to Constantinople. The Sultan has ordered the place to be held to the last extremity. The Russians have demanded of Muktar Pasha the surrender of Ezeroum, which was pointedly refused, and doubtless heavy fighting has got to be done there. There is no special change reported in the condition of affairs at Plevna. The Turks still hold it and feel confident of being able to do so till the first of December.

BY HUDSON TUTTLE.

CHAPTER IX.

MAN'S FALL, AND THE CHRISTIAN SCHEME FOR HIS REDEMPTION.

As in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive.—BIBLE.
There is but one religion, and it can never die.—THEODORE PARKER.

THEOLOGY makes the fundamental assertion that Adam was created directly by God, pronounced perfect, and placed in a perfect world. He had the choice of good and evil, choosing the latter, alienated not only himself but the whole human race from God, corrupted absolutely and irretrievably the fountain of morality, and metamorphosed mankind into the offspring of the Devil, corrupt from the crown of their heads to the soles of their feet. "Ever since the fall of Adam, age has shaken the tree of human life, and the Devil has gathered the fruit into hell."

Man insulted the Infinite by his own free choice, and his punishment is endless death. God's eternal justice knows no mercy; and hence man must suffer the anguish and torture of fire, the gnawing tooth of the undying worm of for ever and ever.

This terrible view of the origin of sin and its portentous consequences, conjured out of the gloomy depths of a diseased and morbid imagination, requires an equally tremendous myth for the redemption of man, the fallen god, the incarnate devil. He of himself is powerless. Utterly, hopelessly depraved, he must rely on the atoning power of something outside of himself for salvation.

Creation had proved a gigantic failure. The highest effort of creative energy was an abortion; and the ultimate spirit for whom all this labor had been expended, instead of rising to the light of God, rushed madly into darkness, and became a slave to Satan, his enemy. Logically, it may be difficult to account for a perfect man in a perfect world overruled by an omnipotent and infinite God falling into sin, but theology passes this abyss on the bridge of mystery.

Man, having fallen, must be saved. The Infinite God had performed his best work, and failed. There was no alternative in this unique spiritual cosmogony but for God to sacrifice himself. An infinite sin had been committed, and an infinite sacrifice only could atone for it. The death and never-ending pain of myriads of men would be as a drop to the ocean of punishment required. God as the only Infinite Being, must suffer.

Placing the doctrine of metempsychosis and the Hebrew idea of the efficacy of animal sacrifices together, both ardently supported by the Pagan world thousands of years before Christ, the ready reception of the divine incarnation of Christ can be understood. The Infinite Spirit descended, and in the person of Christ, by martyrdom, paid the infinite debt. The ledger of Heaven by this act was balanced, and an infinite sum carried over to the credit side. "The blood of Christ," says Jerome, "quenched the flaming sword at the entrance of Paradise." The countless millions of spirits confined in the terrible underworld, or Hades, were released, and the heavens were white with the glitter of their ascending wings. Christ died for us; to him we look for salvation, and if we believe in him, even at the last hour, we are safe. The divinity of Christ reflects on his mother, and it is to be hoped that the idea of incarnation will extend to every child, that they may be regarded as incarnations of Divinity—miraculous conceptions, to mature into perfection.

In this scheme there is no choice. "Whatever is not a duty is a sin." A blind obedience is the only praiseworthy passion of human nature, which is so absolutely corrupt that there is no hope for anyone until he is sure it is dead within him. We can do nothing without sinning; but the more we surrender ourselves to God, the less sin we commit. Dreary doctrines; how they distort the soul! And yet how many think the dwarfed, starved, and pinched specimens treated by this system models of Christian virtue! So are there admirers of the distorted evergreens, trained into the forms of pyramids and animals which disfigure many a lawn, who think them more beautiful than the trees of the forest. The elasticity of the tree can be subdued; it becomes so gnarled it ceases to exist. So the mind can be cramped and stunted until it ceases to rebel; but this is a terrible condition—an imposition and a sham.

These ideas give tone and direction to Christianity. They make it a system to be endured, not of development. It is fitly represented as a grievous cross, and Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress" is the most popular, because the most correct, picture of Christian life.

If the idea of atonement for sin through the sufferings of another were not so generally received, its refutation might be considered a gratuitous task. Really no belief is so abiding, none more zealously held. Beliefs once thoroughly impressed are well-nigh indelible. The young mind finds a system ready-made, which it is taught to revere, to receive unquestioningly, and which becomes a shell, hard, indurated, impenetrable, from which it is difficult to escape, and in which it is comfortable to reside. Selfishness is strongly enlisted. We throw our transgressions on the shoulders of another, and are saved by faith. The incentives are of the basest—hope of gain and fear of suffering. Heaven is held out by the Infinite Father as a sugar-plum, and hell yawns to frighten! A strange moral government of the world! Can the Church advance out of it? Mankind assuredly can and will, but the Church cannot, for as soon as it does its character is wholly changed. There is no need of a church except to save man in this manner. And man's salvation in this manner is of doubtful benefit. The pages of heathen records present no scheme for more immoral tendency than vicarious atonement. Let the example of the great Constantine illustrate. To none does the Church turn with greater reverence. He was ordained to lead her to victory over the allied powers of the Pagan world. To him was presented the miraculous sign of the cross above the noonday sun inscribed with these words: In Hoc Signo Vinces—"By this sign shalt thou conquer,"—and to him on the following night Christ himself appeared with the same emblem and told him to inscribe it on his banners. By the Greek he is worshiped as a saint and called equal to the apostles.

Such is the glass given by the historians of a victorious party, but history truthfully recorded things in quite another light over the character of the imperial saint. The death of Maximian may be excused by the custom of tyrants, and perhaps the betrayal of the trust of Licinius, his vanquished brother-in-law, may be passed over in the same manner, cruel and dastardly though it may be, but the apologist must stand aghast over the inhuman murder of Crispus, his first son, whose only crime was too great a popularity gained in defense of his country. He presents the spectacle of a father stimulating informers against his own son, because that son was a worthy representative of Roman manhood at its best estate; a father listening, countenancing and seizing the opportunity there to assassinate his own offspring. From this frightful tragedy he ran swiftly to other scenes of unmentionable carnage and lust. After a conjugal union of twenty years he condemned his second wife, Fausta, to be suffocated in a hot bath, which had been extraordinarily heated. If so implacable with his nearest kin, that he should have raged like a ravenous beast among his friends is not a source of astonishment. He imprisoned his two nephews with the ultimate design of their assassination, a purpose which he accomplished on one, the other, Julian the Apostate, escaping afterwards to revive the old Roman religion, for a last and unsuccessful struggle against the new Christianity. He is styled the Apostate and shamefully vilified by the Church historians, though his austere life and transcendent virtues put to blush the character of one and all of the early Fathers. Educated in prison, fleeing for his life, and seeing his relatives and friends struck down by the tyrant who represented the new religion, he became disgusted at its cruelty and vindictiveness, and reverted to the grand faith and ceremonies of his ancestors.

The same year in which Constantine convened the council of Nice and sat on a low stool amidst the assembled bishops, "listening with patience and speaking with modesty," he most atrociously murdered his innocent son. The Church for which he manifested so much reverence had a sovereign panacea for sin-sick souls. By receiving the sacrament of baptism, all sins were washed away. Yet the crafty tyrant postponed the ceremony to the last. He was the champion of the Church without entering into fullest communion. He purposely omitted this ceremony that he might, at the end of his bloody career, have full atonement granted. The Bishops for whom he sent in his last illness were deeply edified with his contrition when he at last received the rite of baptism, and was fully pardoned.

The Bennett-Teed Discussion.

I.—JESUS CHRIST IS NOT ONLY DIVINE, BUT IS THE LORD GOD, CREATOR OF HEAVEN AND EARTH.

MR. BENNETT'S SECOND REPLY.

MR. CYRUS ROMULUS R. TEED, Dear Sir: Allow me first to disclaim the charge you make of misquoting you. I do not think you succeed in showing that I did. I certainly had no desire to misrepresent you or to quote your language differently from what you meant it. If I failed to quote you as fully as you may wish me to have done, I certainly did not distort what you did say, nor put words in your mouth that you did not utter.

Your suggestions and advice as to the relation I should bear toward you in this discussion I trust I accept for all they are worth. I trust, also, that I shall appreciate the arguments you adduce, from step to step, as we advance. I could wish that your positions were more tangible and understandable to the common comprehension. Doubtless your arguments are perfectly satisfactory to yourself, but allow me to say, they appear rather ethereal and metaphysical to such obtuse, matter-of-fact minds as my own.

You have considerable to say about causation, its nature, etc., and you speak of the center and circumference of its operations. Of the original cause of all existence we know nothing, and any theories we may establish in our own minds in reference to it are simply assumptions or speculations that we cannot verify or demonstrate. We know that the Universe is, that it exists, but as to its original cause we know nothing and can know nothing. It would, then, seem to be next to absurd for you to talk about the "origin of causation."

As near as I can comprehend your position, it is that the Universe at a certain time had a beginning, prior to which period it had no existence as a Universe; that the cause which brought this Universe into existence is an individual—a person—a something—which you call God, Jehovah, or rather Jesus Christ. I cannot accept such a theory. I regard the Universe as the sum total of all existences, all matter, all forces, all potencies, all possibilities—the cause of all causes, the source of all sources, the life of all life. It never was designed, it never was invented, it never had a beginning, it can never have an end. It is the great ALL IN ALL, outside of which nothing is or can be.

To my mind this position seems far more reasonable than the notion that this great Universe is the conception of a great mind and was spoken or commanded into being from nothing, and that the person or power which thus brought it into existence was Jesus Christ.

I cannot conceive how a man possessing the intelligence which you evidently do possess can entertain such an idea for a moment. You cannot think that the Universe was produced from nothing! If you do, and wish me to believe it you must convince me that such a thing was possible. Before I can believe that millions of worlds and systems of worlds could be produced from nothing, or non-existence, you must show me how one system, one world, one ton of matter, one ounce of substance, one grain, even, of something can be made from nothing. If you cannot do this you must admit the eternity and infinity of matter, with all its forces and correlates.

If I understand you, you hold that Jehovah, or Jesus Christ—or whatever you may choose to call a certain imagined personage—has existed from all eternity, and is the origin and source of everything within the Universe. You must admit that this power or personage had a limit, a locality, an entirety. Now, if, according to your own position, no effect can be greater than its cause, Jesus, or the creator of the Universe, must have changed himself into the Universe and must necessarily have lessened himself to the extent of the limitless Universe, which extends countless decillions of miles beyond the bounds even of our telescopic vision. What an extensive entity Jesus must have been, and how he must have lessened his own proportions when he resolved himself into so many billions of suns and worlds! What a Jesus he must have been indeed!

If you believe that Jesus is the source of all matter and force, is he not also the source of all space or expanse as well as of all duration or time? Or will you yield the point that space and time ever were, independent of Jesus? Now, if, for instance, you believe that space and time always were, and were not produced by Jesus, why can you not as easily conclude that matter and force in all their forms ever existed, independent of Jesus and all other individualities?

If it is true, as you hold, that the Universe is an evolution of your great First Cause, Jesus, that something cannot come from nothing, that the result cannot be greater than the cause, the original Jesus must have been immensely lessened in the production of the Universe, since which time he must have become far inferior in extent and power to what he was before so much was evolved or eliminated from him; and I would ask you if he had continued the world-making or Universe-making but little longer whether he would not necessarily have exhausted himself and ceased to exist as Jesus and become Universe only? Or do you hold that after bringing from his own existence the vast Universe which fills the limitless expanse called space he still possesses the same amount of personality and the same bulky existence that he did before he created the Universe? If this is so, then the Universe is composed of nothing. But such a conception is too absurd for any sensible mind to entertain it for a moment.

If the Universe came from the original cause and that cause is God, or Jesus, it had just as real an existence before it was Universe as since it has become so; the change from cause to Universe was only an evolution, and must necessarily have been as gradual as all the evolutions of the Universe have been in all time. In that case, it might just as well be called "Universe" all the time as "cause" part of the time and "Universe" part of the time. In either case it is more sensible to say it ever has been Universe.

The Universe, we know, exists. Millions have seen it and have formed parts of it, but the cause of it we know nothing of, and it is utterly impossible to know anything about it. The very existence of this cause is a mere theological chimera without reason or foundation. You will doubtless say this great First Cause was uncaused or had an eternal existence. If, then, it is so easy to admit that this unknown and incomprehensible something, which we cannot see and cannot know, never had a beginning, why is it not just as easy to conclude that the Universe had no beginning and has an eternal existence? To me this seems far more reasonable than to suppose that it all came from a great first cause and that that cause was without cause and is still as full and replete as ever.

If it must be accepted that a person or an individual was the cause of the Universe, I ask you to explain to me why it is not just as reasonable to set up the claim that it was Brahma, Pöhi, Ormuzd, Osiris, Jupiter-Ammon, Odin, Thor, Balder, Buddha, Christna, Apollo, or even Mohammed or Joseph Smith, as that it was Jehovah or Jesus Christ? Really the idea that the vast Universe was ever brought into existence from nothing by any person or power is probably one of the most absurd fantasies that ever entered the mind of man. The utter impossibility of creating something from nothing ought to be enough to forever sink that wild vagary into utter forgetfulness. The only rational conclusion to be arrived at is that all existing matter and force ever did exist in some form. Mutations and evolutions are the rule of the Universe and ever must be, but something never did come from nothing and never can be resolved into nothing. Matter and force may be considered correlates, but something and nothing cannot be; and the idea of a creation six years ago, six thousand years ago, twenty-four thousand years ago, or twenty-four thousand decillions of ages ago is equally absurd. Whatever is, always was in some form. Ingersoll tersely expressed the truth when he said, "Nothing, considered in the light of a raw material, is a most decided failure."

It is probably easy for you as for all other godites to think that God always existed, that he never had a beginning, and never came from nothing; but to me it is just as easy to think that the Universe has ever existed, never had a beginning, and never came from nothing. If the boundless, infinite Universe, being so replete with power, force, perfection, adaptability, and order, must needs have had a creator, a designer, equally as much so must that creator, that designer, who according to your own showing must have been equal in every particular to the work he produced, have also had a creator and designer. By that process of argument or conjecture you may go on back forever until you are bewildered and lost. If all existences must have had first causes, your God or your Jesus Christ must inevitably come under the same rule. How could they have sprung, independent, into existence any more than the Universe?

You must observe that I have but little respect for "first causes." In fact I do not believe in "first causes," whether you call them Brahm, Fot, Ormuzd, Osiris, Zeus, Jove, Jehovah, Odin, Mumbo Jumbo or Jesus Christ. If you succeed to your own satisfaction in getting back to the "first cause," you must inevitably think there was something before it. There was never a time when time began; never a time when space began; never a time when causation began; there was never a time when the Universe began. These, I repeat, have ever existed and ever must. It seems to me far easier for a rational mind to conceive that these always had an existence, than that it could be possible that they should at any time spring into existence, or be brought into being by any power.

In common with other theologians, it is doubtless easy for you to admit that God always had an existence, that there never was a time when he began to be; and I would ask you why it is not just as easy to admit that such a reality as the Universe never began to exist, and that in some form it ever had an existence? The Universe is here, as it is everywhere. Like space, it is without limit or bounds. It is easier for the mind to comprehend that it is infinite or boundless, than to imagine that there is a line or point beyond which it does not extend, and that beyond that line there is—what?

The Universe, with all its material, with all its powers and forces, is a reality, and is understandable, to some extent at least. Countless millions of human beings, as I said, have witnessed and formed minute parts of it; but God is a myth. What human being living to-day, or who has lived within the last hundred thousand years, knew the first thing about him? They have known absolutely nothing at all, and what they have thought they knew was what somebody told them, and who knew not a particle more about him than themselves.

Superstitious man for thousands of years has been busily engaged in manufacturing gods, devils, demons, hobgoblins, genii, gnomes, sprites, fairies, furies, nymphs, witches and other monstrosities of a similar character; but it is about time he discontinued the business. Light, civilization and intelligence have now advanced to that extent that it is time these vagaries were cast aside. One by one, the light of universal truth has caused these mystical creations which have in times past so preyed upon the credulity and fears of poor human beings, to retire from the front and pass into eternal forgetfulness. I will not pretend to give the order of their departure, but they have gone. There are no longer any fairies, furies, gnomes, sprites, genii or witches to afflict intelligent beings. All have gone but the gods and devils, and they are fast passing away. The latter class have become extremely diaphanous, and even now have an existence only in the minds of the most superstitious. The gods, little and big, good and bad, sons and fathers, must inevitably take the same road. They must retire to the shades of oblivion. But the Universe is left, and will ever remain. Its substance, its system of powers and forces, its causes and effects, must ever continue to exist.

Allow me to say in this connection that the superstition of gods and devils has been the grand central superstition around which all the other superstitions have clustered that have cursed the world from the earliest times down to the present. The god-superstition has been a terror that has ruled despotically over the mind of man for thousands of years. It has been the foundation on which has been built all the tyranny and oppression that have afflicted mankind. God has been the tyrant of all tyrants, and from him have all tyrants claimed to obtain their power and right to oppress their unfortunate fellow-beings. Ah, my dear Mr. Teed, the reign of the gods has been a long, dark and fearful one. The wretchedness, unhappiness and misery caused by them can never be computed. A mere glimpse at it is sufficient to appall the stoutest heart. Truthfully did Ingersoll exclaim: "There can be little liberty on earth while men worship a tyrant in heaven." But, thanks to growing science and increasing knowledge, light is seen ahead; the gods and devils are rapidly seeking the shade in the rear, and a better future awaits the race, when we shall have no use for gods nor devils nor hobgoblins of any kind.

You speak of mind and of its power over physical substance, organic and inorganic. You also picture its "successive flights up the ascending stairway, landing upon corridor after corridor," etc. This is all very nice and beautiful, but so far as you seem to regard the domain of mind as outside of matter or the physical Universe, allow me to dissent from you. Mind has not an independent realm by itself. Mind is a product of matter. I ask you to show the slightest proof of existing mind that is not the result of physical organization and the immediate emanation or evolution of material substances in the form of food, etc. The idea of a great central mind existing independent of matter and the Universe is as absurd a vagary as that of gods and demons. All the mind, I repeat, that ever had an existence was produced by a physical and mental organization—directly the result of the food digested by the stomach and carried into circulation by the arterial system. Without nutrition, digestion and assimilation the brain cannot act, no thoughts can be produced, no mind can exist.

I will not take the space now to follow the subject farther; at some future time I may do so, as well as to give you my views on Materialism and Spiritualism, to which you allude. Perhaps I am not in just the best possible condition at the present time to do justice to the subject under consideration. My mind is more or less disturbed and perturbed. Since my last reply was written I have been arrested by the authority of the United States, at the instance of its Special Mail Agent and also the representative and henchman of the Society for the Prevention of Vice and the Young Men's Christian Association, backed by immense wealth and influence—all because I had the temerity to exercise the right of an American citizen, dared to utter my honest conviction, and to address a letter of interrogatories to your powerful divinity, Jesus Christ, in a manner not wholly acceptable to my Christian fellow citizens. I should be in prison this hour had I been unable to find a friend willing to become security that I would appear at the examination before a Government Commissioner. A trial awaits me, with probable conviction and imprisonment for a term of years and the consequent destruction of my business. But I hope to meet my fate calmly and not in a cowardly manner. I am not the first one in this world who has been arrested and punished for opinion's sake. Your master, whom you hold to have created the earth, the sun, moon and all the starry worlds, is reported to have had some experience in this line. I trust I may be able to meet my fate as bravely, at least, as he did when arrested. There was no Anthony Comstock in that day to drag him before a United States Judge, but it is reported that there were spies, intriguers and dissemblers who acted in a similar capacity. I am sincerely yours,

D. M. BENNETT.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1877.

American Liberty: Is it a Sham?

This issue of our paper goes to press ere our examination before the Commissioner of the United States—for the foul crime of sending obscene and blasphemous matter through the mails—has taken place. We shall ask for a continuance of the case for a few days to enable us to secure the attendance of a gentleman from Western Pennsylvania who wrote one of the articles for the publication of which we are called to answer before that high and august tribunal, the District Court of the United States—criminal branch—but we know not yet whether our request will be granted. We wish to prove by this gentleman that the condemned article was written purely in the interest of science, that it narrates a simple but somewhat unknown fact in natural history, that it is given in scientific and proper language, and that there was not the slightest desire on the part of the writer to excite the passions or to be "obscene." If we are forced to an examination without the presence of this important witness we shall make the best defense possible with such other testimony as is at hand.

It is to be hoped that when District Attorney Stewart L. Woodford, Esq., and Gen. Foster, his assistant, (both said to be gentlemen of intelligence and fairness) come to fully understand the merits of this case, and that it was inaugurated to persecute us for opinion's sake and to squelch our honest utterance in what we believe to be the cause of truth, they will deem it unnecessary that this prosecution shall be continued and that the power and the courts of this great republic should be made the tools of sectarian bigotry, intolerance and hate to pull us down from the proud eminence we occupy, destroy the business built up by perseverance and hard labor, and immure us in a criminal prison, sentenced for a term of years to ignominious toil. If, however, they cannot take that view of the situation, and we are forced to appear as a criminal and a law-breaker before the courts of our country, we shall endeavor to make the best defense we can; but with the experience of others before our eyes we must inevitably feel that we are mercilessly forced, as it were, into the very jaws of death. It has come to be understood that there is not an exuberance of mercy in the court alluded to, and the presiding judge is not distinguished for his merciful sentences.

It is generally supposed that this is a free country and that in this favored land a man is not only allowed to worship God as he pleases, but to entertain such opinions as to him seem right, and to express them fearlessly and freely. This is a great mistake; it is nothing of the kind. The government originally was established upon the principle of perfect religious liberty, and the framers of the Constitution thought they were laying a broad foundation of mental and religious freedom that would ever be the ruling elements in the free and United States of America; they intended to guarantee to every individual the right of opinion and the freedom of conscience subject to the control of no church, sect or creed. In our Constitution no form of religious belief was prescribed; no church was designated, and no god or redeemer was recognized. Our institutions and country were declared to be equally free for Christian, Jew, Gentile, Mohammedan, Buddhist, Infidel, and the man who had no religious belief whatever. The first President of our country solemnly declared in his official capacity that this government was in no sense a Christian government and was not established upon a Christian basis.

But things have sadly changed since that time. The Christian Church has greatly increased in America within the century that has passed over the life of this nation and has become rich, powerful and intolerant. And now one Anthony Comstock has come upon the stage and has constituted himself a knight-errant to champion and defend the imperious system of religion said to have been handed down from the meek and lowly Jesus; to fight her battles, to defend her interests and crush her enemies to the earth. So long ago as he was clerk in a dry-goods store he conceived the idea of making a great man of himself and becoming the valorous defender of the dominant church. He became a member of the powerful but Jesuitical organization known as the Young Men's Christian Association, which contains many men of wealth and influence, many who are designing and cunning. He has organized "The Society for the Suppression of Vice" and become its active agent and motive power. It cannot be denied that his motives in part were good and that he has performed work that was commendable, but he has greatly overstepped the bounds of propriety and has become the persecutor and prosecutor of men as much above him in everything that is noble, honorable and honest, as the sun is above the earth.

Comstock became ambitious. He wished more power that he might be able to bring certain parties more entirely under his control, and wished the laws to be changed so as to increase the facility with which he could compel offenders to trial and punishment. As a representative of the Young Men's Christian Association and the agent of the "Society for the Suppression of Vice" he visited Washington many times and had numerous interviews with members of the Post-office Committee, Representatives, and Senators, until by persistent intrigue and finesse, in 1873, he procured the passage of a law making it an offense punishable with a fine of from $100 to $5,000 and with imprisonment at hard labor from one year to ten years, to send through the mails any book, print, or publication of any kind of an obscene or indecent character, the obscenity and indecency to be decided by the U. S. Courts and jury before whom the offender might be tried; and Anthony Comstock was appointed, with a salary, by our postal department, as special agent to watch the mails. The law was very strict in another direction. There is a certain intelligent and virtuous class of the community who believe there is such a thing as over-population, and that some people have too many children—more than is for their good and more than they are able to properly take care of—and they believe it is perfectly right to take means to prevent such too rapid increase of children—not by producing abortions or infant-killing, but simply by using such legitimate and rational means as will control the matter and place it within the power of the mother, in part at least, to govern the number of children she shall bear. There are many people who believe that information bearing upon this subject is very necessary and should be placed before the wives and mothers of our country. This Comstock law struck a heavy blow at everything of this kind. One section of it reads thus:—

"That no article or thing designed or intended for the prevention of conception, or notice of any kind in writing or print, giving information directly or indirectly, where, or how, or of whom, or by what means either of the things before mentioned may be obtained or made, shall be carried in the mail. That any person who shall knowingly deposit, or cause to be deposited, for mailing or delivery, any of the before mentioned articles or things, or any notice or paper containing advertisements relating to any place or scheme for disposing of the hereinbefore-mentioned articles or things, shall take or cause to be taken from the mail any such letter or package, shall be guilty of misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall, for every offense, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned at hard labor not less than one year, nor more than ten years, or both, in the discretion of the judge."

In the passage of these laws, which are clearly unconstitutional, and which were hurried through Congress with insufficient examination and consideration, a deadly blow was struck at the personal liberties of the American people, and there is nothing in the laws of Italy, France, Spain, or Russia that equals it. Shall an American citizen be arrested, tried, fined $5,000, and imprisoned at hard labor ten years for sending through the mail a paper or pamphlet which a bigoted court and jury may decide to be obscene, or a simple but useful article, or notice pertaining to such article or apparatus that is calculated to prevent conception and objectionable large families? Is it any worse for the mail to carry those things than for the express companies? Shall our mails be searched by officious agents like Comstock to see what one American citizen sends to another? and shall such agent have the power to immure both parties in a loathsome prison for a term of years? Has American liberty descended to this? Shall the United States ever be cursed with a censorship over our mails such as once existed in Italy, when travelers passing through the country and calling for their letters were told with perfect sans froid that they could not have them yet, as the authorities had not had time to read them? Shall this land, which was erroneously supposed to be a free country, ever be submitted to such a system of espionage as that? It is a fact that we have taken long strides towards it. We have an Anthony Comstock who pretends to be the representative of decency and morality, and who is clothed with almost unlimited power, to harass and annoy worthy citizens in mail facilities, which are one of the heritages of a free government and which ought to be preserved inviolate to the latest moment of the nation's existence.

People of America, your liberties are endangered! Your personal rights have already been taken away by the enactment and enforcement of the very laws already alluded to! Shall not the United States mails be as free to one class of citizens as to another? Shall citizens be precluded from sending and receiving through the mails such useful articles as they may wish? Shall not the people of the country be suffered to buy such books, pamphlets, and papers as they desire and pay for? Shall all citizens have equal rights to the mail facilities of the land? Shall it be established as the rule of law and justice in this free America that Christians can send their tracts, pamphlets, and books through the mails and that unbelievers in Christianity shall not have the same privilege?

This is a vital question, and takes precedence over nearly all other questions now before the American people. It is of some consequence whether church property is taxed as other property is, whether the public schools shall be conducted upon the secular principle, whether the Bible is admitted or excluded, whether God is placed in the Constitution or not; but these all shrink into insignificance by the side of the greater question whether the personal liberties of American citizens shall be overridden, whether Comstock remains in our post-offices, and whether Comstockism shall displace the Constitutional liberties of our country.

The most ineffable meanness of this whole transaction is the pretence that there is no action taken in the matter because of any anti-theological opinion we entertain but only because of the obscenity of the pamphlets, etc., we send through the mail. The truth is, we have not published an obscene word in THE TRUTH SEEKER nor in any of the tracts or pamphlets we send over the country; but we do speak rugged truths touching the system of shams and old pagan fables and dogmas called Christianity, which are exceedingly distasteful to Christian societies, the pious members of the Christian churches, and for which they would be glad to crush us into the earth. Who believes for a moment that had we "found Jesus" within the past month and had embraced the system of religion ascribed to him, Comstock would have seized us and hurried us off to the American bastille? Even now, could we use the hypocrisy to avow that we had become a convert to the doctrine that Jonah swallowed the whale, that nearly nineteen hundred years ago a child was born of a virgin and had a ghost for a father, that the father and son were of the same age, that three are one and one is three and all the rest of the beautiful dogmas of the system, it is altogether probable that the "obscenity" we are charged with would be forgiven us and we would once more be allowed to walk undisturbed among our fellow-men. But this we cannot do. We are sincere in the opinions we proclaim to the world and we doubt whether there is a man in America more honest in his convictions than we are, and we certainly will lie in prison till we rot before we will be false to them and pretend to believe that which we do not believe, or deny what we believe to be the everlasting truth.

As a proof that obscenity is not the real offense we have committed, we have only to state the fact that nearly every day our city dailies and the numerous papers of the country contain more obscenity than we have been guilty of for the more than four years that we have been publishing this sheet. On Friday of last week the Herald published an account of an interview with Sitting Bull, in which there was ten times more obscenity than is even claimed is contained in our "Open Letter to Jesus," and all other tracts we have ever issued. During the Beecher trial the papers day after day teemed with reeking filth and obscenity, of which the virtuous Comstock took no notice, fearing, doubtless, to engage with game so much above his strength that he declined the contest, but when an unpopular Infidel sheet which has the independence to speak out just what it thinks, and the Young Men's Christian Association, and the "Society for the Prevention of Vice," backed by such pious and extra virtuous men as Phelps, Dodge & Co., who voluntarily—under slight persuasion, perhaps—for some trivial irregularities, made a present to the government of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars—when such immaculate saints and worthies, we say, issue the edict that THE TRUTH SEEKER and its editor must be suppressed, the intriguing, insinuating, false-hearted Comstock immediately sets himself to work to lay his plans and to write his decoy letters, sometimes under the false name of "Bender," "Edgewell," or "Semler," as the case may be, to induce an unsuspecting man to commit what this same cheeky Comstock denominates a crime against the majesty of the laws of the United States; and when he has caught his victim in his godly trap, he pounces down upon him with all the ferocity that a ravenous wolf would exhibit towards an unsuspecting, timid fawn.

Undertaking the job, at the command of his employers, of crushing out THE TRUTH SEEKER and sending its old editor for a term of years to a miserable prison, he goes systematically at work to set a trap or snare for us to fall into. He sends his pious accomplices to look over our publications and to enquire for certain tabooed books to see if we had them on hand and would send them through the mails should the gentleman from Squan Village wish to order them. Even Comstock himself visits our rooms—without announcing that he was the swamp angel from Squan Village and the Young Men's Christian Association—and carefully looks over our list of tracts, pamphlets, etc., to see what he could find that his carnal nature could construe to be obscene. Finding our "Open Letter to Jesus Christ" and the small scientific tract, treating on the propagation of marsupials, he made up his mind that he had us in his grasp and that our destruction was certain. He betakes himself to Squan Village and writes an order for THE TRUTH SEEKER for three months and the two tracts named and a copy of Trall's "Sexual Physiology," enclosing the price for the same and sending all by registered letter. We, of course, acting in good faith, sent the book and tracts as ordered; and this saintly defender of the faith, exulting in the glorious satisfaction that he had that vile Infidel, Bennett, completely in his power, and that all he has to do to utterly annihilate this same Bennett is to issue a United States warrant against him upon the charge of obscenity and blasphemy, and to lead him for trial into the very Christian court of Judge Benedict, who, actuated and controlled by the beautiful theology of John Calvin, has never yet been known to temper his rulings and sentences with any noticeable amount of mercy, especially when a vile unbeliever in our "holy religion" is arraigned before him.

Thus far the terrible Comstock has laid his plans and executed his fell purposes; thus far he has us in his power; thus far his "mill" works to his mind and the "grinding" has commenced. Already our friends take us by the hand and say that they shall soon be called upon to bid us good-bye, for the miserable Comstock is after us, and he never misses his man; when once he gets his clutches upon a victim he never lets up till he lands him in prison. They tell us, too, that when a helpless sinner is brought into Judge Benedict's court he has never been known to escape; and with all these appalling facts staring them in the face they regard our doom for the next five years as inexorably fixed; and while, perhaps, not many tears have been shed, heartfelt sympathy has been extended to us from all. But hope has not forsaken us. We yet have some faith in the institutions of our country, and in the justice, manliness, and good sense of some of the men who help to execute its laws. It remains to be seen whether two such well-known and highly-appreciated men as District Attorney Stewart L. Woodford and his able assistant, Gen. Foster, can be manipulated by Anthony Comstock, and whether at his bidding they will turn the crank of the judicial and legal rack upon which we are to be extended for uttering our honest sentiments and daring to speak what we believe to be true! Yes, it remains to be seen whether these honorable gentleman can be made subservient to the powerful but contemptible Comstock and be induced to aid in depriving a law-abiding citizen of his constitutional right to speak and write and print as his conscience dictates, in destroying his business and in immuring him for a term of years in a horrible prison.

If we are brought into Judge Benedict's court (a branch, by the by, of the United States District Court, established during the term of the Infidel Lincoln) we shall understand that our case is not hopeful; for few of the cases Comstock takes there ever escape a merciless trial and a severe sentence. But with the unwavering conviction that we are an honest, law-abiding citizen, we shall make the best defense in our power, and if we are beaten in this court we shall make a strenuous effort to take it to the Supreme Court of the United States at Washington, where we trust the constitutionality of the law under which we are arrested will be tested, and the question decided whether personal liberty is to be taken from American citizens, and whether or not an Infidel has any rights that the Christian is bound to respect. Failing in that highest court in our land, we shall appeal directly to the American people, who are above all courts and all judges, not even excepting him who presides over the Criminal Branch of the United States Court in this district.

How did Comstock treat us? After arresting us, as he said, for the crimes of obscenity and blasphemy, he demanded all we had of the two condemned tracts; and upon our asking by what authority, he gave us a short answer and said if we did not comply with his demand at once he would get out a search warrant and go through our entire establishment and take our books, types, and presses, and everything we used in our business; and he took out a book he carried in his pocket and read a section of the United States law, authorizing him to take such steps when obscene matter is prepared or issued. And upon our hesitating a moment he started for the door, saying he would soon procure the warrant, when, conceiving that we were in the power of the man, we deemed it best to surrender the tracts he demanded.

What is the status of the case? We are nearly double the age of Comstock. We have from our earliest manhood been a peaceful, law-abiding citizen. We have co-operated with the dominant party that has ruled the country for the last sixteen years, and this since Fremont was nominated for the Presidency. Though an humble individual, we have paid into the Treasury of the United States, in the form of revenue taxes and income tax, many thousands of dollars. The contributions we have thus made to the revenues of the country doubtless assisted, though to a limited extent, to build the splendid edifice in which our trial is to take place, as well as to help pay the salaries of the officials that stand ready to try us, convict us, and send us to prison. In this point of view we think we compare favorably with the man Comstock, who has scarcely added a dollar to the revenues of the country but has been a leech to suck at the public treasury for the very questionable services he has rendered the Church and societies to which he belongs. Is it just and proper that such a man should have the power, without any sufficient cause, to cast us into prison, to destroy our business, and to crush the work in which our heart is enlisted and to which we have sacredly devoted the remainder of our life?

It is proper to state that besides getting this unjust law passed by Congress (which was done in spite of the protests of Messrs. Hoar of Mass., Chittenden of New York, Conger of Mich., and Gen. Garfield of Ohio, who opposed the bill and saw in it a covert blow at the personal liberties of the people—Congress hurriedly passing it at the instigation of the religious societies, represented by their agent, Comstock, many of the members afterwards confessing that they were really unacquainted with the tenor of the bill) the irrepressible obscenity hunter went to Albany, the capital of this State, and had similar laws enacted by the legislature. So by the intriguing, wire-working industry of this bad man the statutes of the United States and the great State of New York are disgraced by unconstitutional laws that really would be a blot upon the escutcheon of Turkey or Patagonia.

Is it a small matter that a respectable individual, as we claim to be, should be dragged as a criminal from our family upon the disgraceful charge of sending obscene publications through the mails; our property seized with the threat that if we did not yield it up quietly, all we had in the world should be forcibly taken from our possession; we be compelled to run around and send over the city to find some friend to go bail for us to keep out of prison; that in nearly all the daily papers it should be announced that the avowed Free-lover, Bennett, the publisher of a vile sheet called THE TRUTH SEEKER, had been arrested and placed under bonds for sending publications through the mails, so obscene and filthy that it was unfit to name their character; and that the same should be telegraphed to every town, village and hamlet over the entire country? Is it likely any respectable man would want to have his fair name thus traduced and blackened by such a detestable character as the agent for the Society for the Suppression of Vice and the famous Young Men's Christian Association? It is barely possible that an enquiry may be instituted, directed to the first society named, or to their illustrious agent, and possibly they may be invited to make a slight pecuniary reparation for the great wrong inflicted upon us in these most summary and unwarrantable proceedings. Somebody ought to be responsible, and the agent or his employers will be expected to make due reparation.

The scientific tract complained of (one of our Series of Scientific Tracts, as already indicated) was written strictly with the view of throwing light upon a certain fact in natural history, couched in very proper language, and was written by a gentleman who in intelligence and moral worth has scarcely a superior in the entire country. The series is a most unexceptional one and not a word of it was written with a view of exciting improper emotions, and none but a depraved nature, like Anthony Comstock's, could find in it food for lascivious thought. The "Open Letter" belongs to a series of polemic essays and articles written wholly in the interest of truth, and by no means is it calculated to arouse passion or any improper feelings. Neither of these essays are in the slightest degree obscene, nor were they written at all with the slightest view in that direction. So far as opinion is concerned, we exercised the right which every American citizen has, and which no person has a right to take from him.

It is true, we are an unbeliever in the divinity of Jesus Christ: nor do we believe he was begotten by a ghost in a manner materially unlike all other human beings; and in this respect we occupy much the same position as that formerly held by Benjamin Franklin, George Washington and Thomas Jefferson. Neither of these persons had any confidence in a man or demigod coming into the world without a natural father; and Jefferson gave utterance to this expression: "The day will come when the mythical generation of Jesus by the Supreme Being as his father, in the womb of a virgin, will be classed with the generation of Minerva in the brain of Jupiter." And again, "The hocus-pocus phantasm of a God, like another Cerberus, with one body and three heads, had its birth and growth in the blood of thousands and thousands of martyrs."

We have never said anything plainer or more radical than that; and if the author of the Declaration of Independence, and really one of the fathers of the substantial liberties in our country, could say this eighty years ago, shall it be left for a man like Anthony Comstock to cause us to be immured in a loathsome prison for uttering similar sentiments now? For at least a thousand years before Christianity had birth in the world the fable or legend of virgin and child, of demigods being begotten on the persons of virgins, had been believed in by not less than a dozen nations and talked over and adored. Is it, then, a crime deserving of punishment that we should in careful language mildly refer to it?

The Christian Comstock and his Christian employers seem to think it very criminal in us to address interrogatories to Jesus and Jehovah, but in the name of reason and common sense, have we not the same right to appeal to those individuals that other people have? and as far the larger portion of the human race that make up the inhabitants of Christendom, to wit, the Romish Church, the Greek Church and the English Church, have their prayers and invocations written and printed, have we not the same right to write and print ours? If either or both of the personages named are annoyed, insulted or offended at the questions we ask of them, is it not fair to suppose, if they are as powerful as their worshipers believe them to be, that they are abundantly able to defend themselves against our importunities and to inflict condign punishment upon us if they have the desire to do so? Think for a moment how easy it ought to be for either of them, if they possess almighty power, to paralyze our arm, to stifle our voice or to completely cut off our wind in the most summary manner. Ought they not to be able to attend to our case without the detestable interference of that man Comstock? It strikes us, if we were either Jesus or Jehovah, and that meddling, officious man should presume to attend to our business for us, that in a sonorous voice we should say, "Anthony, hold thy peace, withdraw thy hand and presume not to interfere in this vile way in our affairs, and presume not to manage those things which concern thee not, and to which, by nature and ability, thou art wholly unfitted to attend. Hie thee, young man, again to the dry-goods business, and dare not, at your peril, to meddle with our business." The hint thrown out here we ask nothing for.

We have not room in this article to give full details of Comstock's notable operations under the U. S. laws we have alluded to, the extreme severity with which he has come down upon certain well-disposed persons, but we must name a few cases that have been brought to our knowledge; we do this in order to give our readers some idea of the nature of the work Comstock has been doing and the power for evil he has been invested with by the law-making members of our government. One man was imprisoned two years for sending through the mail a print of Powers' Greek Slave, at which beautiful statue hundreds of thousands and probably millions of the most intelligent and refined people of Europe and America have gazed with innocence and pleasure.

Another unfortunate victim was kept two years in prison for selling, with the best intentions in the world, a rubber female syringe. Among the witnesses that were called in the case was Dr. Parker, of this city, who testified that the instrument was a valuable and useful one, but when the Judge put the question to him, "But, Doctor, notwithstanding it is a meritorious instrument, is it possible for it to be used for an improper or immoral purpose?" the Doctor replied, "Yes, it is possible for it to be improperly or immorally used." Whereupon the prisoner was doomed to spend two years in prison.

Mrs. Woodhull was persecuted and imprisoned on several different occasions and submitted to very heavy costs and expenses and her publishing business ruined. Even the printers and stereotypers were prosecuted and made to defray heavy expenses. At that time Comstock in part failed in his prosecution of Mrs. Woodhull and her sister, because the laws had not then been made to conform to his will, but by persistent effort and repeated visits to Washington he accomplished his purpose, since when an indictment has been equal to a conviction. Whoever he drew into his court was almost sure to leave with a heavy sentence pronounced upon his defenseless head.

The case of John A. Lant was a severe one. For publishing in his little Toledo Sun some epigrams, etc., of George Francis Train's, in which some rather plain words were used, he was thrown into prison, his paper was stopped, he was easily convicted of "obscenity," and, like a vile criminal, he was torn from his wife and poor little ones, who were left, unprovided for, to the cold charities of a selfish world; and though in feeble health, he was sentenced to eighteen months at hard labor in the Albany Penitentiary with a fine of five hundred dollars imposed upon him. Comstock followed this poor man up with ill-disguised vindictiveness and hatred, and he seemed not to rest contented till he had him in prison. When friends of the unfortunate man called upon Comstock to see if a slight impression could be made upon his unfeeling heart in favor of poor Lant, this remorseless creator and executor of the laws on the United States statute books, this beautiful specimen of a man, a member and defender of two very conspicuous Christian Associations, stated in an imperious manner that nothing could be done for Lant; that his offense had been great, and he was determined that "no such words as p-n-s or s-m-n should pass through the mails of the United States." Indeed! Have the people of the United States to ask this ex-dry-goods clerk what words and what matter may be sent through the mails of our country?

The case of George Francis Train is not forgotten; how for publishing in his paper some choice quotations from the Bible, with a few accompanying comments, he was arrested, thrown into the dark, dismal Tombs prison, where he laid about six months, and contracted thereby such diseased conditions of the system as he feared he would never recover from.

Dr. E. B. Foote's case was one of peculiar severity. He committed no offense against the laws of God or man. He simply gave in his works such instructions in physiology and medicine as his fellow-beings greatly needed. His great offense was that he imparted to mothers information that would enable them to control the number of children they should bear, and to render it possible for a mother to avoid breaking down her health and life and being overburdened with an excessively large family. This highly commendable knowledge, let it be expressly understood, had no connection with producing abortions or miscarriages. The Doctor never lent himself in that direction, and when appealed to in such cases, he peremptorily refused to have anything to do with them. He has given us his word as a man that he never used his professional skill in any thing of the kind. The information he imparted was of a preventive character and strictly moral, legitimate, and irreprehensible. But the sinister eye of Comstock rested upon it. He decided that Dr. Foote should be his game, and he brought the terrors of the American Inquisition to bear upon him. Arrest, trial before Judge Benedict, conviction, and a heavy sentence followed as a matter of course. Thousands of the Doctor's patients felt greatly grieved that so worthy a man should be persecuted by such a man as Comstock. Hundreds of letters were sent to the Judge from sympathizing friends, asking him to temper his sentence with at least a trace of mercy. Individuals approached him in person and, with tears and intercessions, begged him to extend a little mercy to an excellent citizen whose invaluable medical works have gone into nearly three hundred thousand families in all parts of the country; but the merciful sentence given by this Christian Judge and dispenser of United States justice, for committing no crime at all, was a fine of three thousand five hundred dollars on one count, reserving the other part of the sentence, five years' imprisonment at hard labor in the penitentiary, in terrorem over the prisoner and which it is understood the Judge has the power to execute at any time he takes the whim to do so. The cost of the suit to Dr. Foote was considerably over five thousand dollars, to say nothing of the excessive trouble of mind it cost his sensitive nature, and the great damage to his business by being advertised all over the country as a publisher and issuer of obscene literature. How would any man who has a character for honor and uprightness and who possesses a fine sense of right and morality, and wishes to maintain it, like to be advertised all over the land by Comstock and his aids as being a publisher and dealer in obscene literature? We insist that strict and impartial justice demands that the fine thus unjustly and cruelly wrung from Dr. Foote should be refunded to him by the Government and he be reimbursed for all the money he paid out, all the damage it was to his prosperous business, and a reasonable compensation for the disgrace and mental anxiety thus wrongfully and cruelly brought upon him by this detestable Comstock, aided and abetted by the respected, learned, and Christian Judge Benedict.

Other medical authors and physicians have suffered severely from the machinations of the dreadful Comstock, backed as he is by the laws of his own procuring. We know a physician of this city, whose name we are not at liberty to use, who has suffered excessively in pocket and in reputation by the persecutions and prosecutions of this malicious man. Dr. Abbey, of Buffalo, and Dr. Parr, of Indianapolis, both medical authors, who essayed to impart useful information to their fellow-beings, have suffered severely from arrests and persecutions from this Comstock. We hope to be able to lay the details of these cases before our readers in a future issue. The late Dr. Trall was, previous to his death, greatly alarmed at the demonstrations made against him by Comstock on account of the publication of his excellent work, "Sexual Physiology." That is one of the works that the great Comstock has set his face against. Under the name of S. Bender he ordered a copy of us, and under the name of E. Edgewell—both of Squan village—he ordered one of friend Heywood, but in the warrant in both cases he seems to have deemed it wise to omit mention of them, and he can doubtless add those two volumes to the tons of obscene matter which he annually boasts of having secured from those who issue it, and last of all, Heywood, Jesus, and ourselves bring up the rear of Comstock's unfortunate victims, and what our fate will be remains to be seen.

Comstock is particularly vindictive towards medical and physiological works which are not recognized by the "regular" medical schools and colleges of the country—those who dare to think and write outside of the recognized medical rings, medical schools and medical aristocracy. This he evinced to us while he had us under arrest, and spoke as though the works of Dr. Foote, Dr. Trall and others which were not recognized and approved by the medical colleges and institutions of our country, ought not to be tolerated nor suffered to be carried in the United States mails. "Ah!" said we, "there is just the point, you are a stickler for orthodoxy in medicine the same as in theology. Any one who presumes to think or write outside of what is prescribed by the schools of medicine and schools of sectarianism, must be crushed to the earth, and no one shall be allowed to receive these publications through the mails. This rule of intolerance you may be able to keep up and execute for a time, but your days are numbered wherein such things can be done in this country. Make the most of your time while you have it."

Comstock, in the power he commands, is insidious, ambitious and exacting. Let him crush out the free works of medicine, physiology and theology, let him succeed in crushing THE TRUTH SEEKER, and other Free Thought publications must follow suit. When these are once suppressed, such houses as the Appleton's who dare to publish the writings of Darwin, Spencer, Huxley, Tyndall, Proctor, Haeckel, Draper, Fiske and others will be summarily squelched, and no literature will be tolerated save that which bows down to all the old myths and fables of the dark past. When the principle of American liberty is destroyed, we cannot expect that any modification of free and untrammelled thought and utterance will be allowed to remain.

Friends of Liberty, we have here hurriedly held up to your view some of the traits of Anthony Comstock and some of the workings of the odious laws which he caused to be placed upon our statute books. There is much more connected with the subject which we would like to say but time and space forbid. We will recur to them again from time to time as necessity dictates. We have not aimed to say a word that is not strictly true, and only a part has been told you. You know not the oppressive evils that are hanging over and bearing down upon the people of this country. But let us not supinely sit with fetters upon our limbs and become willing and suppliant slaves. Let us arise as one man, from Maine to California, from Michigan to Texas and throw off the bondage that is crushing out the personal liberties for which our fathers fought and to preserve which our government was established.

In a few days we will draft or cause to be drafted a suitable petition to Congress for the repeal or modification of the odious and oppressive laws we have spoken of. We will print five thousand or ten thousand of them, or whatever number may be necessary, and send them into every state, every county, every town and every hamlet throughout the land, not omitting Squan Village. Let the same be signed by every liberty-loving person in the country and let them pour into Congress at Washington during the ensuing winter, and let every possible influence upon members of Congress, the Post-office Committee, etc., be exerted, and before the ides of March are upon us the detestable Comstock and these odious Comstockisms will be wiped from the statute books of our fair country. Let those petitions be forwarded to us and we will see that the same are placed where they will do the most good.

Let all who feel disposed to exert themselves to obtain signatures to petitions calling for this greatly needed reform write us and we will forward them blank petitions for the purpose. Let us give a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether, and in a few short months we will no longer be troubled with the officiousness of the pitiable Anthony Comstock in our post-offices, and he will be allowed to exercise his choice whether to return to the sale of dry-goods, or to spend his time in Association Hall in saying his prayers and chanting his own praises for his valorous zeal in suppressing obscenity.

We return our most sincere thanks to the kind friends who have so promptly come to our relief and who have shown so much sympathy in our favor and for the liberality evinced in our behalf. It is a great consolation to know that we have warm friends in all parts of the country and it gives us the assurance that despite the failings we doubtless have, on the main issue we are correct, and that we are sustained by men and women as upright and honorable, as can be found in this or any other country. We can give in this issue but a part of the sympathetic letters we have received. We again thank all our kind friends. The publication of pledges and donations will be continued in our next.

We have great reason to be pleased that the names of trial subscribers continue to come in freely. We still hope the inward flow will not cease. Let our list grow to magnificent proportions. If the trial of the United States versus Bennett comes off, it is hoped that the services of Col. Robert G. Ingersoll can be secured to defend him, in which case lively times and a full report in these columns may be expected. It is better for us to receive yearly subscribers than merely for two months, at 20 cents, and we trust those who have hearts and pockets big enough to afford the paper for a year will not be bashful about doing so. The names, however, are welcome, whether for two months or twelve.

THE first number of our neighbor, Seth Wilbur Payne's Age of Reason has made its appearance. It is gotten up neatly, is well filled with racy, interesting articles, and is withal quite a readable paper. If the Liberals of the country feel like sustaining an additional candidate for their patronage we shall be glad to see it prosper and grow in popularity. We learn that No. 2 will not appear until January.

Letters of Sympathy.

WEBSTER, MASS., Nov. 16, 1877.

DEAR BENNETT: My TRUTH SEEKER by this morning's mail is before me, and in its pages I find that you are likely to be brought into misery and privation for doing just what I myself have done. My husband and I both believe the Christian plan of salvation to be one of the greatest humbugs that was ever laid before a people, and we are a little ashamed to be allowed to run at large just as guilty as you are, while you are to be heavily fined and perhaps sent to a criminal's prison. To-day I am in better shape to fight than to offer any words of consolation. Argument, however well shaped, will never settle this question of Christian monopoly. Blood and bullets must mingle again for liberty's sake. My husband and I subscribe five dollars each to help in paying your fine when it is levied upon you. The Liberals, as a rule, are so slow and so slack that it would be foolish for me to hope for a united effort in this matter. It is so pleasant to be smiled upon by orthodox skunks that I never expect to see the Liberals all drawn up in line where they belong. I cannot willingly see any of the Liberals dragged into a fine or confined in jail, but I am so out-and-out discouraged with the way that the Liberals move in their own behalf that I have lost all terror for jail here or the orthodox hell hereafter. If I can possibly drum along and keep out of the orthodox heaven I shall try and be satisfied with my luck. Real, true, genuine happiness I would like, but I hope not to be fool enough to run my head into a hornet's nest after it. The great enemy that is on your track will of course beat you, so call upon us for the ten dollars whenever it is needed and we will forward it at once.

MRS. MARGARET FLINT.

CLAY, N. Y., Nov. 17, 1877.

BROTHER BENNETT: I see by the last TRUTH SEEKER (Nov. 17th) that the American Inquisition has at last arrested another victim. When will bigotry and superstition be satiated? Language is inadequate to express my contempt for the underhanded course that Comstock took in procuring your arrest. If he had lived in the days of the Spanish Inquisition or in Paris in 1872 at the time of the St. Bartholomew massacre he would have murdered more Protestants than any other man.

I think Bob Ingersoll is the one to help you, but I fear the result. If they have the law on their side, justice will be cast out. "Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord." Do not be frightened to death. There will be an outlet to this that will place you in a better position before the world. Persecutions always bring friends that are firm and lasting. Oh, that I had a purse as long as from here to New York, well filled with the precious metal! I would divide it with you. But poverty is my birthright.

Send me a few copies of the present issue if you have them to spare, and I will cast them by the wayside, and some of them may take root and produce an abundant harvest.

Thine in haste, ORRIS BARNES.

108 SOUTH 4TH ST., PHILADELPHIA, }
NOVEMBER 17, 1877.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: The deed is done. The first scene in the immoral farce has been acted. Do not fear; we will stand by you. Thousands will rise up to befriend you, some of whom never before had any interest in you or your paper. A great principle is at stake; a great human right is attacked, and if this is submitted to tamely where will it end? Then go to the stake unflinchingly. Let them in your case "heat the furnace seven times more than it was wont to be heated" if they choose, for you have been the chief of sinners in your onslaught upon their darling myths and gods. Do not fear. As the Spiritualists rallied around Slade in his arrest, so I believe the Liberals and common-sense element of freedom will rally around you. As the lovers of "the cup that cheers but not inebriates" threw their tea into Boston harbor in Revolutionary times, so will the clear-headed and far-seeing of these Revolutionary days sacrifice their appetites—their luxuries are not many—to fight this battle between free speech and bigotry, between Rationalism and Christianity. Do not despair. The battle has actually begun. Already we hear the clashing of arms that will lead us on to victory. Many old warriors, like myself, will harness up their arms, shoulder their guns (after laying aside their crutches), and not only show how fields were won but will rush into the thickest of the fray. I cannot afford to be ill longer and idle in this coming contest; and I do hope all Liberals will regard this as an outrage upon their rights, and will improve upon this suggestive act from our enemies to be up and doing, ready for the encounter with heart and hand, means and influence. Surely, "whom the gods destroy they first make mad," like these lunatic religionists.

ELLA E. GIBSON.

LOUDONVILLE, N. Y., Nov. 17, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT—My Dear Friend (or should I say Father, seeing that you are so much older than I?): THE TRUTH SEEKER for to-day has just reached me. When I read, some days ago, of your arrest, my feelings fairly burned with indignation at this flagrant outrage of human rights. Some one has said, "Love your enemies," but I hate Anthony Comstock, and I loathe and detest his Christianity. For the same reason that I hate bigoted coercion, the trampling on human rights, and all outrage, I hate Comstock and those whose designs he labors to carry out. How seldom is a Christian to be found who gives to Free-thinkers all the rights he claims for himself! He points with pride to the "golden rule" and calls it the grandest moral law ever "revealed" to man, and vain would have us believe that God (or his son, which is just the same, according to the Christian theology) was the author of it!—but he carries out that law à la Anthony Comstock. True, the world has progressed very much during the last two or three centuries, but the world has not yet known a race, nor even a nation, of thoroughly free people. Many of the rights of the few, if not of the many, have always been trampled upon. Did I not look forward to a time when "all wrongs shall be righted," I think I should be discouraged at times; but as it is, and believing in progressive evolution, I am not easily discouraged, and hope for the best in your case.

I hope and believe that those of your friends who are able will not see you want the means to meet the expenses of your trial. Were I able I would see to it myself that you wanted no means to secure an able defense. As it is, however, the most I am able to do at present is to enclose $2.00 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for next year. If at any time I am able to do more I will gladly do it. I hope you will be able to keep THE TRUTH SEEKER alive; if not, the money enclosed is donated to you.

F. E. ASPINWALL, M.D.

BOSTON, MASS., Nov. 18, 1877.

BRO. BENNETT: You have my sympathy. Church bloodhounds are determined to put down by law arguments they cannot meet. Let us form a Protective Association. My "little all" is on the altar for the defense of truth.

Yours, MOSES HULL.

18 Eliot St.

AUBURN, N. Y., Nov. 19th, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Esq.—Dear Sir and Brother: In reading your article under the title, "It has come at last," various and numerous were my emotions, thoughts and reflections. Being a Spiritualist, I felt the presence of different spirits, each striving for the mastery. One urged me to curse, another one to bless; one to seek revenge, another charity. But I will not enlarge. I write simply to say that I hope you will find many financial, as well as sympathetic friends. Gladly would I act with the former as well as the latter, had I the means to do so. But alas! what property I had accumulated has all gone, save the furniture in our hired house, and that is all under a chattel mortgage, even to the beds on which we sleep, and the knives and forks with which we eat our meals. Accept my sympathy, and also allow me to say that in case a fine is imposed, do not pay it, but let imprisonment follow, and then I will take your place and suffer imprisonment in your stead. This may not be in harmony with the law of the State, but it is in harmony with the popular religious views of the land, and especially in harmony with the views of the Young Men's Christian Association, by whose agent you have been arrested. They believe and advocate the doctrine of the vicarious atonement, a doctrine well calculated to encourage men in sin with the hope that "kind Jesus will settle the bill." You call Anthony Comstock an "ardent Christian." I fear he and those he represents are like the man I recently met in Western New York, who in answer to my question, "Are you a Christian?" replied, "Yes, but I do not work at it now." You say you are willing to spend your "last breath in defense of what you believe to be truth, justice and righteousness." Good! Glorious! You have the stuff martyrs are made of. Great blessings are in store for you. "Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." (Matt. v. 10.)

Yours truly, J. H. HARTER.

SALAMANCA, N. Y., Nov. 17, 1877.

BROTHER BENNETT: I am pained to read of your arrest. It can't be possible that any court can hold or punish you on the charge made, but then I forget that with bigotry, as with an orthodox God, all things are possible. I hope our Liberal friends who have money may come to your rescue. But, dear friend, remember that you are not the first and I fear, will not be the last to suffer for your honest convictions. But although it may prove a great trouble to you, the cause of universal mental liberty will be advanced in the end. "The world (still) moves." Very truly your friend,

H. L. GREEN.

434 K St. WASHINGTON, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND: We are distressed by what we learn of your trouble in your last issue. Whatever difference of opinion may exist between us, we believe in an untrammelled press and perfect liberty to discuss any subject, whatever our views on that subject. Without this freedom our boasted liberty is a farce. Cannot you get R. G. Ingersoll to defend you? Are you not personally acquainted with him? He must feel the subject and be able to take hold of it. From what I see in the papers I suppose he is in this city waiting for a mission.

M. A. B.

HARTFORD, CONN., Nov. 19, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT, Dear Sir: I see by the last TRUTH SEEKER that that devil-originated and hell-ancient persecuting cess, Comstock, has arrested you for the very privileges the Constitution of the United States has publicly declared unto every man—the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, and the right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience. If this be so, why stamp it with a lie by any outside law? The whole secret is this, and only this: Jesus Christ was an infidel to the prevailing religions of his day, and for this alone they killed him. You to-day are an infidel to the popular ring religions of the times, which are bolstered up and supported by the degraded elements of bigotry and superstition; and millions of lying, shrewd and cunning priests, who make it their sole business to deceive, enslave and degrade the mental faculties of all who are ignorant enough to believe in a personal devil, a literal hell and eternally writhing in the sulphurous fumes and flames. And as some gospel-mongers in the past have taught that all this would increase the happiness of the blessed in heaven when looking over the battlements, though a father, mother, brother or sister may be there, writhing in this seething cauldron of sulphurous flames! Oh, what a blessed doctrine this is for the worshipers of the meek and lowly Jesus, who, they claim, was all charity, love and kindness, forgiving even the woman guilty of adultery, saying, "Go and sin no more!"

This spirit has departed entirely from the modern Christs (which, I suppose, Anthony Comstock is the chief of). But, friend Bennett, go on. There are thousands to-day who know that they possess that god-given principle, Reason, and know how and dare to use it, and will reason in spite of modern Christian superstition.

Friend Bennett, continue battling for truth, freedom and justice. Truth is mighty and will prevail, though the fires of persecution and imprisonment, or even death, be the penalty to some of its votaries. We dare not and will not yield until every man and woman can utter their honest convictions in public, on the rostrum, and the highways and by-ways of this so-called free republic.

Friend Bennett, I do hope and believe there is Liberal patriotism enough left in the hearts of the truth-seeking element of this country to sustain you in this your hour of peril. Not a Liberalist in this country should give less than one dollar, and as much more as he can spare, in this emergency. I, for one, will give one dollar and make it two if needed, although I have little to spare. I also enclose in this an order for THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year and $9.50 for books, which you will please send me at your earliest convenience.

DAN'L BODIFIELD, M.D.

PAINESVILLE, OHIO, Nov. 19, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: I see by your issue of the 17th inst. that the contemptible Comstock has instigated suit against you for transmitting your publications through the mails—which, so far as I have seen, are less obscene than many parts of the Old Bible. And it is high time that a stop be put to this American Inquisition. And we infidels and unbelievers in the creeds of the day should rally to a man and protest against such unconstitutional proceedings by presenting a rousing petition to Congress to annul the law which authorizes such outrages in free America.

Enclosed please find ten dollars to aid in your defense believing as I do—that you have not violated any law—of the Nation—or of any State. If any petitions are gotten up please send me a blank or two for signatures. Hoping that liberals generally will at once come to the rescue. I remain,

Yours most truly,

J. SEDGEBER.

P. S. Also please find enclosed find two dollars to renew my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year, from February 15, 1878.

1204 CALLOWHILL ST., PHILA- }
DELPHIA, PA., Nov. 16, 1877.

BROTHER BENNETT: Having just read of your arrest upon the complaint of that sneaking tool of the Young Men's Christian Association, Anthony Comstock. I enclose you two dollars, which please use when and where you need it. I only regret that it is so small a contribution. Believe me, dear Brother, "That ever the right comes uppermost, and ever is justice done."

I feel the coming conflict,
That tests the worth of men,
When brave, true souls will rally
From mountain and from glen.

Their mighty forces gather,
As stars that gem the night;
I know the coming victory
Will be for Truth and Right!

We bide our time, HORACE M. RICHARDS.

426 CUMBERLAND ST., }
OTTAWA, NOV. 17, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: I sympathize with you in your great trial. For six long months, with the exception of a few days, I have been through the commercial depression and Christian bigotry, out of employment, and still I am so. Pressing as my difficulties have been to me, this remembrance is lost in the indignation which I feel in regard to your persecution. I regret I cannot help you substantially. On the wrapper of my TRUTH SEEKER the mailing index notifies me that my subscription has been paid up to the 1st of January next. The change has only been made a week, and is incorrect. I have only paid up to the 1st of January, 1877. Hard times have prevented me from paying up. However, no matter, I send you two dollars for the present year, which will make the tablet correct. Although the two dollars make a large hole in our ready cash, my wife and myself cheerfully pay our dues, under the impression that your misfortunes are infinitely greater than our own.

If your list of correspondents was not now large I would offer my help to relieve your literary labors during the time when your whole attention should be given to studying your defense.

Hoping that Col. R. G. Ingersoll will voluntarily defend you, I remain in the full hope that the Liberals of America and Canada will make your cause their own.

Yours truly,

JOHN T. HAWKE.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Nov. 18, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please strike the enclosed one dollar bill from my TRUTH SEEKER account as you will be likely to need all that belongs to you before long. May be that Comstock will nab this. If he does, send him to me, and we will fight it out single-handed. One thing is certain, that if our best utterances are to be suppressed through the instrumentality of an ignorant and wicked priesthood, and the thumb-screw, the gibbet and the rack are once more revived, somebody is going to be hurt on both sides this time if the thing is carried too far.

I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 17th inst. that you are calling upon your friends in the Liberal ranks to rush to your aid. God help you if your help is to come from that source! Do not you know that when men in general cast away the fear of hell and eternal damnation that they close their pocketbook at the same time? I have always found it to be so. The sectarian only gives up his cash because the devil, with his horns and long tail, hands the contribution-box. At least, he sees that awful personage in his imagination. To the infidel so called, when he rids himself of these superstitions, fear rushes to the other extreme and he gives nothing, even though his own dearest interests are at stake. I must confess that when you wrote that "Open Letter to Jesus Christ," although you said nothing but what ought to be said, and what the present ignorant state of society very much needed to enlighten their ignorant minds, yet you must have known at the time how much you were jeopardizing your own freedom by such an act. Come what may, you have done a world of good, and if the liberty-loving masses do not come to your rescue, I for one will give up the chase for a lost cause. Respectfully yours as against a priest-ridden government, J. BEAUMONT.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Nov. 17, 1877.

DEAR FRIEND: I regret to see the trouble with which you are threatened by the hired emissary of superstition, for your own sake, and in that it may, for a time, interfere with your usefulness in the promulgation of truth and free thought. Doubtless, by this oppression, the hypocritical, praying scoundrels think to accomplish that purpose. I trust they will be grievously disappointed. It is evident the same spirit that characterized the demons of the Inquisition still rankles in their midst, and their conduct shows that they would use it to torture and to foist their silly delusions if they dared.

I have no cause to trust or respect the specious pretense of the fraternity or their order, for by them I lost a little fortune of nigh $2,500 in the speculation of the Freedman's and Bank. But that aside, what concerns me all who dare think for themselves, is that the free expression of thought at present stands imperiled. I hope and trust that every Free-thinker, of whatever shade of experience will regard this cause as his own, feel an honest indignation at the outrage and a warmth of emotion in the heart to come forward with help as far as his means will permit to defend the case.

Please put me down for five dollars. Hoping you will come off with glowing colors, I am,

Yours respectfully, J. E. METHVEN.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Nov. 19, 1877.

DEAR FRIEND: I do not see how it is possible that these short-sighted bigots could have got a bill through Congress so as to put any man in jail for publishing his opinions, however blasphemous they may be, unless it was smuggled through as the silver bill of 1873 was. Congress will repeal that bill if you can get your case before them. It is too infamous in the construction given by the more infamous Comstock to stand a day's discussion. I send you five dollars to help you print a statement that it may be laid before each member. I wish I could send more, but I hope that with what others may send that five can do this. Do not spend money on lawyers; you can't afford it. Plead your own case. Never mind the legal blunders you may make, no judge or jury will commit you when they hear what you have to say. It is alarming that such men as Comstock can have any backers. Why, their own rights depend upon their sustaining that of every other one. If argument will not defend the position, they weaken it by their present course.

E. M. DAVIS.

NEW YORK, Nov. 17, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Friend: Your letter received this day. I read the account of your arrest in the Herald and THE TRUTH SEEKER. I have not power to express my sentiments of sympathy for you, or my scorn and contempt for the class legislation that gives such powers to a fanatic, that he may so oppress and deprive of liberty a fellow citizen whose only fault is the exercise of rights set forth by our Declaration of Independence.

As ever your friend,

WM. M. McLAURY, M.D.

COLEBROOK, CT., Nov. 18, 1877.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER that you have had a call from the contemptible Anthony Comstock, who seems to think that the people of the United States need a conservator over them to determine what mail matter they shall receive and what not. I will soon send you five dollars towards paying your expenses, and as much more if necessary. I hope all Liberal-minded men and women will stand by you and be liberal pecuniarily, as well as mentally.

Yours, &c.,

L. O. BASS.

E. H. Heywood's Case.

E. H. Heywood, the well-known free-love advocate, came before United States Commissioner Hallett this morning for examination on a charge of sending obscene publications through the mails. There was a large attendance of free lovers.

Anthony C. Comstock, special officer connected with the Post-office Department, who made the arrest, testified that some time in August, under the assumed name of "E. Edgewell, Squan Village, N. J.," he received from Heywood two books, of an obscene nature, entitled "Sexual Physiology" and "Cupid's Yokes."

David H. Gregory, Postmaster at Princeton, produced his list of registered letters received, and corroborated Mr. Comstock's statement in relation to sending the money for these works to Mr. Heywood, and also the mailing in Princeton of the books by Heywood. This ended the evidence for the Government.

J. F. Pickering, counsel for the defense, having no witnesses present, claimed that the books were published for the purpose of improving and elevating the present depressed moral tone of society. The words used in these books are in use in all medical books, and even the Bible, and should a court decide that these books were obscene, it would be giving the United States Government the power to exclude from the mails nearly all the newspapers published in the land, the medical works, and even the Bible and dictionary. The very systems that these books treat upon were, long before Mr. Heywood was born, preached and promulgated by the ancient philosophers, Socrates and Plato, and in every college and seminary of this country. Works on these same subjects are placed in the hands of our sons and daughters for their education. Mr. Heywood has a perfect right to promulgate his own ideas, and no society or organization has the power to take that right from him. When that right is once taken from him, a decisive blow has been struck at the right of free speech, free thought, free press, and, in fact, at freedom generally. If these books had been sent to a medical student, there would have been no impropriety in sending them by the mail, and every day there are medical books with plates in them that are a thousand times more vulgar and obscene than the works which Mr. Heywood is arraigned for sending.

The Commissioner decided the books produced by the Government as evidence in this case were obscene, and that the defendant be held in the sum of $1,000 for trial in the District Court.

Mr. Comstock, upon being interviewed, said that the statement of Mr. Heywood in relation to the manner of his arrest, as published in the Herald of Nov. 3d, is false. He (Comstock) says that he did read the warrant to Heywood, and explained to him the cause of his arrest, and that all Mr. Heywood's assertions to the contrary are false.—Boston Herald.

[Mr. Heywood, in a private letter to us, says, in regard to the reading of the warrant by Comstock, that he can prove by four witnesses that he (Comstock) did not read the warrant. Mr. Heywood is a gentleman, and those who know the two men will have no doubt as to which is correct.—Ed. T. S.]

THE ROCHESTER PLATFORM TO BE RATIFIED.—ABLE SPEAKERS TO BE ENGAGED, AND THE LIBERALS OF WESTERN NEW YORK AND WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA INVITED TO PARTICIPATE.

We the undersigned Freethought and Liberal League Committee of Cattaraugus County propose to hold a mass meeting in the village of Randolph, in said county, on the 8th and 9th days of December to ratify the platform adopted by the National Liberal League at Rochester Oct. 26th, and we cordially invite all persons residing in Western New York and Western Pennsylvania who indorse said platform to unite with us in the proposed ratification meeting.

The speakers who are to be invited to address the meeting are Hon. Judge McCormick of Franklin, Pa., Mrs. Clara Neyman of New York City, Giles B. Stebbins of Detroit, C. D. B. Mills of Syracuse, W. S. Bell of Mass., Dr. T. L. Brown of Binghamton, and others. H. L. Green, who represented our League at the Rochester Congress, will make report of the proceedings at that convention. Liberal arrangements will be made to accommodate all who attend, and, if possible, reduced railroad fares will be obtained.

Our Recent Polemical Agitation.

It was conducted in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week. The subjects discussed were as follows: Part I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty; Part II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science; Part III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true? The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers; and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion. It is one of the most thorough and exhaustive discussions of the subject, both pro and con, which has been issued from the press for a long time. While the leaning of Mr. Bennett is too much toward Materialism to receive our full commendation, we admire his fearlessness, outspoken and unmistakable advocacy of what he regards as the truth. He has by his enterprise furnished in this volume a magazine of facts and arguments, in an interesting style, which will strengthen the Freethinker and shake the faith of the religionist who ventures to peruse it. In Mr. Humphrey Mr. Bennett found no mean adversary. The orthodox side is ably presented and the best arguments possible are brought forward, sometimes, we must honestly confess, with a force and dexterity before which there is a momentary retreat. But Mr. Bennett fails not in the end to overwhelm his opponent, and at times, especially when the characters of Freethinkers and clergymen are compared, with a vigor that grinds his antagonist to dust and arouses our pity for his utter helplessness.—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

The Estimate of a Friend.

MR. EDITOR, Dear Sir: The book, "Christianity and Infidelity," which you kindly sent me, reached me some time since, but circumstances have prevented me from acknowledging your favor until this date. I had kept pace with the discussion as it appeared in weekly installments in your paper and had hoped from the beginning that you would in due time issue the complete effort in book form. I was therefore much gratified when through the columns of your paper you announced your intention to do so. The matter makes up a larger book than I supposed it would, and after looking it through I am more than ever impressed with the value of the work. I find the pros and cons of arguments so ingeniously dovetailed, so to speak, that none who read can fail to obtain a fair view of the subject from both the orthodox and liberal standpoints.

Such discussions, while they add to the interest, ought also to add to the popularity of those papers in which they are published.

I notice now running through the columns of your paper weekly sections of your lecture, "The Great Religions of the World," and I trust you will also ere long "make a book" of that. It would be a worthy acquisition to any Liberal's library.

Of these and kindred publications I have only to say to the friends of the Liberal cause, Buy and read; you cannot invest money more wisely.

With many thanks to the publisher for this readable and instructive book, "Infidelity and Christianity, I am Sincerely yours,

PAYNE'S AGE OF REASON is an enterprising eight-page Liberal family paper devoted to the affairs of this world, and published in the interest of the people now on earth.

Editorially, it labors to free mankind from the bondage of priestcraft and all forms of superstition. It does not believe in churches or creeds; it has no reverence for bibles or man-made gods, and it opposes all attempts to impoverish this world by laying up treasures in another.

It has a variety of departments, is chaste and pure in its tone, and in all respects aims to be a first-rate Liberal paper. It must be the best, for it is the only one of its kind on this continent.

PAYNE'S AGE OF REASON is published WEEKLY AT ONE DOLLAR A YEAR, or it will be mailed one, two, or three months on trial for ten cents per month. We pay the postage, and in all cases stop the paper at the expiration of the subscription. Address all communications to SETH WILBUR PAYNE, Science Hall, 141 Eighth Street (near Broadway), New York.

Christianity and Infidelity

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n. Clergyman, OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker.

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 7, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers; and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion.

Heathens of the Heath;

A ROMANCE, BY WM. McDONNELL,

AUTHOR OF "EXETER HALL," ETC.

This work is rich in romantic and pathetic incidents, and exhibits with an overwhelming array of facts the atrocities committed by the Church. It shows that the purest morality exists without the Bible, and that many of the heathen philosophers were lovers of virtue. The folly of Christian ministers is fully portrayed. Hypocrisy and bigotry are clearly exposed, and the road to virtue and true happiness plainly marked out. A most pleasing romance is woven into the work, in which much opportunity is afforded the author for fine descriptions and beautiful sentiments which he so well knows how to give utterance to. The characters in the tale are invested with much interest; the hero and heroine gain the love of every reader. "On the whole, it is the work of a master hand—a work of unaffected beauty and the deepest interest." "One of the most valuable features of the work is, its positions are all proven. . . . Every thinking, enquiring mind should peruse it." 500 pp., 12mo. Price, in paper, $1.00; cloth, $1.50.

Underwood-Marples Debate.

HELD BETWEEN

B. F. UNDERWOOD

AND THE

Rev. JOHN MARPLES,

At Napanee, Ont., July, 1875. Continuing four nights.

PROPOSITIONS DISCUSSED—First, "That Atheism, Materialism, and Modern Skepticism are illogical and contrary to Reason." Marples affirming; Underwood denying.

Second, "That the Bible, consisting of the Old and New Testament, contains evidence, beyond all other books, of its divine origin." Marples affirming; Underwood denying.

Reported by JOHN T. HAWKE, of the Toronto Leader, and revised by the disputants. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents, by mail.

MR. MARPLES writes to Mr. UNDERWOOD: "Copies of the Debate were sent me and I have looked them through, and on the whole I approve of them very much. You have done me full justice. . . . I intend to push the sale all I can."

BY KERSEY GRAVES,

Author of "The Biography of Satan," and "The Bible of Bibles," (comprising a description of twenty bibles).

This wonderful and exhaustive volume by Mr. Graves will, we are certain, take high rank as a book of reference in the field which he has chosen for it. The amount of mental labor necessary to collate and compile the varied information contained in it must have been severe and arduous indeed, and now that it is in such convenient shape the student of freethought will not willingly allow it to go out of print. But the book is by no means a mere collation of views or statistics; throughout its entire course the author—as will be seen by his title-page and chapter-heads—follows a definite line of research and argument to the close, and his conclusions go, like sure arrows, to the mark.

THE ancients tell us what is best; but we must learn of the moderns what is fittest.—Franklin.

IT is too much proved that, with devotion's visage and pious action, we do sugar over the Devil himself.—Shakespeare.

CHOOSE always the way that seems the best, however rough it may be. Custom will render it easy and agreeable.—Pythagoras.

WHEN a man dies, they who survive him ask what property he has left behind. The angel who bends over the dying man asks what good deeds he has sent before him.—Koran.

CAN there be any greater dotage in the world than for one to guide and direct his courses by the sound of a bell and not by his own judgment and discretion?—Rabelais.

I HAVE heard that death takes us away from all things, not from good. I have heard that when we pronounce the name of man we pronounce the name of immortality.—Emerson.

TRUTH comes to mortals gently, tenderly and sweetly, filling them with a peace that passeth understanding. Error clouds, affrights, angers and debases the soul. By their respective fruits we may know them.—Jarves.

WHEN fanatics and bigots are permitted to mould the religious ideas of youth, infancy must suffer, not only from spectral torments, but it must also imbibe notions of the Divinity which change him from a father to a monster.—Jarves.

WHATEVER expands the affections or enlarges the sphere of our sympathies—whatever makes us feel our relation to the Universe and all that it inherits in time and eternity, to the great and beneficent Cause of all, must unquestionably refine our nature and elevate us in the scale of being.—Channing.

MISTAKES rule the world, or very nearly so. Religion, politics, love, are alike their sport. We call the result to ourselves fate, destiny, or any other name which will assuage wounded amour propre, or our disappointment in finding out, after a long and weary travel, that we have mistaken our road for want of proper attention to the signboard.—Jarves.

IN becoming as little children we all approach the kingdom of heaven; but it is a kingdom of peace and joy within ourselves, reflected from the guilelessness of these little playmates. The strength of this nature is shown by its influence over the most worldly hardened minds. There is a power in its spirit-fibre to turn manhood back to babyhood, because there is no selfish alloy in it. As you measure out your affections they are meted to you again.—Jarves.

DON'T hang a dismal picture on the wall, and do not daub with sables and glooms in your conversation. Don't be a cynic and disconsolate preacher. Don't bewail and bemoan. Omit the negative propositions. Nerve us with incessant affirmatives. Don't waste yourself in rejection, nor bark against the bad, but chant the beauty of the good. When that is spoken which has a right to be spoken, the chatter and the criticism will stop. Set down nothing that will not help somebody.—Emerson.

DEVOTIONAL pidity will go a great way; but unless it so saturates and possesses one as to render him a fanatic he will have many cool moments in which his judgment will work according to its normal functions. Woe to religion if in such moments the objects of faith and devotion are scanned with the bold, clear eyesight used for other things. Viewed repeatedly in this way, the objects lose the glamour with which they at first beguiled the mind, and, not all at once but by degrees are retired below the surface, or else so positively rejected that their former place and power are lost to them forever.—Water.

THE cynic is one who never sees a good quality in a man, and never fails to see a bad one. He is the human owl, vigilant in darkness and blind to light, mousing for vermin, and never seeing noble game. The cynic puts all human actions into two classes,—openly bad and secretly bad. All virtue and generosity and disinterestedness are merely the appearance of good, but selfish at the bottom. He holds that no man does a good thing except for profit. The effect of his conversation upon your feelings is to chill and sear them; to send you away sour and morose. His criticisms and hints fall indiscriminately upon every lovely thing, like frost upon the flowers.—Beecher.

SHAKESPEARE, the tragical Titan, who storms the heavens, and threatens to tear the world off its hinges, who, more fruitful than Eschylus, makes our hair to stand on end and congeals our blood with horror, possesses at the same time the insinuating loveliness of the south-east poetry; he played with love like a child, and his songs are breathed out like melting sighs. He unites in his existence the utmost elevation and the utmost depth; the most foreign, and, even, apparently, the most irreconcilable properties in him subsist together. The world of spirits and of nature have laid their treasures at his feet; in strength a demi-god, in profundity of view a prophet, in all-seeing wisdom a protecting spirit of a higher order, he lowers himself to mortals as if unconscious of his superiority, and is as open and unassuming as a child.—Schlegel.

Odds and Ends.

SPELL donkey with one letter.—U.

"PAT, do you understand French?" "Yes, if it's shpoke in Irish."

THE last performance that Samson gave literally brought down the house.

TWO THINGS in this world that should not be trifled with—woman's opinion and the business end of a hornet.

"Who was the meekest man?" asked a Sunday-school teacher. "Moses." "Very well; who was the meekest woman?" "Never was any."

AN old bachelor seeing the words "families supplied" over the door of a grocery, stepped in and said he would take a wife and two children.

SUNDAY-school teacher: "Who was the strongest man?" Boy: "Jonah; because the whale couldn't hold him after he got him down."

"CLERGYMEN," remarks an exchange, "like railway brakemen, do a great deal of coupling." Ah, yes; and then the coupled ones do all the switching.

THE advertisement of a Western stone-cutter reads: "Those who buy tombstones from us look with pride and satisfaction upon the graves of their friends."

REAL-estate business is not so profitable as it used to be. The tenant is waiting for the landlord to lower the rent, while the landlord is waiting for the tenant to raise it.

"PRAY, Mr. Professor, what is a periphrasis?" "Madam, it is simply a circumlocutory cycle of oratorical sonorosity, circumscribing an atom of ideality lost in verbal profundity." "Thank you, sir."

"SILENCE in the court!" thundered a Kentucky judge, the other morning. "Half a dozen men have been convicted already without the court's having been able to hear a word of the testimony."

"DO THESE bells sound an alarm of fire?" said a stranger the other Sunday, as the church bells were calling together the worshippers. "Yes," was the reply, "but the fire is in the next world!"

A MISERLY millionaire is asked to contribute to a charitable fund, but declines to do so, whereupon the lady patroness upbraids him for his stinginess. "Ah, madame," if we rich people liked to be generous, we would be too happy. We must deny ourselves something."

"YOUR handwriting is very bad," said a gentleman to a friend more addicted to boasting than to study; "you ought to learn to write better." "Ay, ay," replied the young man, "it is all very well for you to tell me that, but if I were to write better, people would find out how I spell."

JOSH BILLINGS ON PETS.—Pets of all kinds are a nuisance. Pet a mule with a club and he is pashant, but pet him with oats and he will kick out one end of kreshun. Pet dogs are full of phleas and pet monkeys are full of the devil. All pet children are truants, and opinyuns, like second-hand clothing, are worth just what you can get for them. A pet horse learns to be frisky, and a pet servant becomes cunning at the expense of his honesty. Pet friends are the hardest to keep, and when you do lose them they turn from hunny to gaul, and pets of all kinds are fastidious. A pet krow kant tell what his next mischief will be, and of all pets none are more nasty and cross than a pet parrot. Nothing in this world was made to be petted, for nothing was made to require it. Pet hobbies are plenty and easy to mount, but hard to stick to, and the ditches all along life's turn-pike are filled with riders. A pet lam always makes a kross ram, and what has been once petted can never be happy again without it. Live pets of all kinds are sure to be lazy, and from being lazy to being sassy is but a short step, and is sure to be taken. Too much petting brings luxuriance first and then ruin. I have seen garden sass petted so much that it will run to top and to vines. Pet kate are just an insult to the kat, and next an insult to the party that pets them; and there is no more excuse for boarding a pet poodle and lugging them around than there is for boarding and totting a bed-bug.

HUMAN HAPPINESS

Vol. 4. No. 48. [PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.] New York, Saturday, December 1, 1877. [SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.] $2 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE fishmonger's oath.—Buy cod, sir.

THE dairyman's oath.—Buy cheeses, all mity.

THE number of Christian missionaries in India is said to be 600.

THERE are now 2,265 letter carriers employed in the free delivery service of the United States.

THE Church Party in Mexico is actively engaged in creating enmity towards the United States.

IN FIFTEEN years more than twelve thousand persons have lost their lives by the wrecking of English vessels.

IN THE Penitentiary at Auburn, N. Y., there are twenty-seven clergymen, forty-two lawyers, thirteen doctors and three printers.

THE Rev. Joseph Cook says that we can reach the Chinamen of the Pacific coast by baiting the gospel hook with the English alphabet.

SMITH now comes from the ministry of the Scandinavian Methodist church, and begins the establishment of a Presbyterian Church in Palo Pinto, Texas.

REV. S. L. B. SPEARE has been removed from the chaplaincy of the Massachusetts State Prison on account of his opposition to the new law permitting Roman Catholic worship in the prison.

THE Rev. Dr. Baird of Richmond, having now been acquitted by the civil court, is to have a trial by the Presbytery that deposed him. Perhaps the Presbytery may yet find that $22,000.

A THREE-ARMED child has been born in Michigan. He is supposed to be a near relative of the young man whom Mr. Gough knew who had three hands—his right, his left, and always a little behind hand.

THE State Assayer of Massachusetts bought four samples of whiskey at fashionable bars in Boston, and on analysis found, total abstinence advocates will be sorry to know, that they were all unadulterated.

THE sailor's Fourth Commandment:—Six days shalt thou labor and do all thou art able.

On the seventh, scrub deck and scrape the chain cable.

THE Dominion Churchman (Episcopalian), published at Toronto, Ont., says: "The advocates of what they call Free thought are now making most persistent and unusual efforts in Canada to propagate their system, if system that can be called which consists in little else than denial of everything."

MR. FORBES, the war correspondent of the London Daily News, in summing up his campaigning experiences for a London magazine, says that corruption, favoritism, and imbecility pervade the Russian army from top to bottom, the Czar alone excepted. Such a statement, he fears, will lose him the Russian iron cross.

THE Rev. Mr. Gates had a serious quarrel with his wife, which is a naughty thing for any one to do, but especially so for a clergyman. He had not only grace, but grit, however, for when expostulated with by his conference he stubbornly refused to make any concessions. Then the brethren gave him up and closed their exercises by singing "The Gates Ajar."

BISHOP HUNTINGTON, in his new book on "The Common Things of Divine Service," sides with the Rev. Dr. Bevan on coughing in church, and holds that people who cannot refrain from coughing ought to stay at home. He brands the church-going baby as a nuisance, and maintains that it and its mamma ought to spend Sunday almost anywhere rather than in Church.

A FRIEND, living in Brooklyn, having occasion to be out about four o'clock on a recent morning, saw a man, who saw a man, who looked like Comstock, rushing down street in his drawers, crying out in the most frantic manner, throwing his arms wildly about, "I smell something obscene; I smell obscenity." It is not known what this indicated, but it is feared some new victim is about to suffer from official surveillance.

ACCORDING to the latest statistics Rome has now 280,000 inhabitants, 347 Catholic and four Protestant churches, and 4 Jewish synagogues, 46 public schools, attended by 8,308 boys and 7,099 girls; 4 hospitals, containing altogether 3,500 beds; 1,990 hackney carriages, with one horse, and 200 with 2, besides 110 coupes, and 80 omnibuses; 3 steamboats ply on the Tiber, and there are 3,840 places of refreshment.

THE course of Mr. Waldo, the Seventh-Day Baptist of western Pennsylvania who persists in doing his work on Sunday and his worship on Saturday, still vexes some of his neighbors, who think he ought to do as they. He was several months ago acquitted in the Court of Common Pleas of Crawford county. He has again been prosecuted; the complaint this time being substantially the same as before, but slightly different in its minor particulars.

THE Lutheran church in Beaver City, Pa., has an oil well on its premises, and the flow is sufficient to pay all expenses. The congregation now sing—

There is a fountain filled with oil,
Drawn from dame Nature's veins, etc.
They are prospecting for coal, and if they find it, and also a little sulphur mine, they will have all the materials for a first-class hell of their own.

THERE is to be a lively church trial in Traquair, Scotland. The Rev. Mr. Wallace, a pastor in that place, has farmers in his congregation. He recently told them from his pulpit that he saw no reason why the hours of the Lord's Day should not be spent in gathering in the fruits of the earth when the question lay between being gathered on that day and being ruined by bad weather. Some of his brethren, rigid observers of the Fourth Commandment, are about to proceed against him.

A GLASGOW clergyman, who is much addicted to snuff-taking, was on a recent Sunday about to read from his pulpit the fourth section of the 119th Psalm, which begins, "My soul cleaveth unto the dust." After announcing the passage, he paused a moment, took from his pocket his snuff-box, and from the box with thumb and finger a generous pinch, which he put into his nostrils. Then he proceeded with the psalm, and when he said, "My soul cleaveth unto the dust," the congregation were powerless to restrain their mirth.

SOME of the members of a colored Baptist church in Louisville went to a circus. Then others who had criticised their conduct did likewise, just to see how wicked the circus was. The latter were in turn followed by more, who seem to have gone for the same purpose. The action of all was followed by an act of church discipline which resulted in turning out of the fold about half a hundred. The circus was too much for this church, for the remnant remaining after the loss of the excluded members is so weak as to be hardly able to keep together.

THE Cardinal Antonelli lawsuit has been resumed in Rome. The counsel of the brothers Antonelli strove hard to get the proceedings postponed until January. Signor Gallini, the legal adviser of the Countess Lambertini, strenuously opposed this. After a lively discussion the tribunal decided that the case would receive definite judgment on the 26th inst. On the 20th a series of documents will be published, shedding a new and startling light on the whole affair, and compromising, it is said, certain individuals who have not yet figured in the trial.

LAST spring, Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson, a lady of warm sympathy and active philanthropy, touched by the sufferings of the working people, published an offer of three prizes for the best three essays on the cause and cure of the existing labor depression. About four hundred essays were sent in response to the offer. The committee appointed to examine the essays did not consider any of them worthy of the first prize of $100. "The Labor Question," by Prof. R. Eccles, of Brooklyn, took the second prize, $75. The Rev. T. S. Cartwrightman took the third prize. The first prize was divided among the writers of the next best three essays, Miss O. A. Blodgett, Jas. A. Dean, D.D., the Rev. Charles W. Duane, Dr. Joseph Rhodes Buchanan, and an unknown writer.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, an active member of the Jesuitical society, called "The Young Men's Christian Association," in 1873 organized the Society for the Suppression of Vice, and as its Secretary and Agent procured the passage through Congress of an oppressive unconstitutional law, under which, by this same Comstock, many honorable, well-meaning and innocent persons have been made to suffer most severely. Now, it is proposed to organize another society for the suppression of Comstock, and to remove from our statute books, State and National, the odious laws he caused to be enacted, and to remove Comstockism from our post-office.

THE season has arrived and the church fair blossoms in all its glory. Prices are down, and tickets for heaven in the shape of pin cushions and raffle chance rule lower than last year. Sixpenny pin cushions, which last winter brought half a dollar apiece, are now dull of sale at a quarter. Oyster soup, calculated to put the consumer in a heavenly frame of mind by scalding the skin off the inside of his mouth and washing it down his esophagus, retails at fifteen cents per shallow dish. Sunday-school ice cream is only ten cents a plate, with two spoons to eat it with; and rag-baby dolls, stuffed with sawdust, cannot be sold with any degree of rapidity without offering chromos.

AN extremely respectable Presbyterian church about fifty miles from New York recently lost its pastor, and, as the building is a fine one with solid walls, stately steeple, and plenty of stained glass, there is no lack of candidates for the vacant pulpit. The list is large enough to keep the church in preachers for a year to come. A novelty in candidating was developed a week or two ago in connection with this church. A clergyman wrote to one of the elders for a chance to preach, and was told that there would not be any for some time, as the pulpit was supplied for weeks to come. Nothing daunted, he mailed a manuscript sermon, requesting its perusal by the official members of the church, and saying that this was a sample of what might be expected if he should become their pastor. The brother's case was dismissed with gentle smiles, and his manuscript returned by the next mail as a "rejected article."

AN Englishman named Guinness has been making an extensive tour in France in what he calls a "Bible carriage." He takes in this vehicle a great many copies of the Scriptures, some of which he sells and others he gives away. He goes to the small towns, and collects a crowd by preaching from the pulpit or desk, which is a part of the carriage. He has thus far met with great success. This is much like the plan pursued by certain vendors of quack nostrums who visit towns and cities with fine carriages, and with bells or musical instruments attract attention, and then from the carriage sell to the gaping crowd their wonderful cure-alls for all human ills. If the pious gentleman would only add a moral and religious monkey and a sacred hand-organ from which to grind a few such heavenly tunes as Old Hundred or the Mulligan Guards, the pecuniary success of his peregrinating mission would be assured.

IN a Baptist Sunday-school anniversary in this city last Sunday night one of the attractions was a converted heathen, who afforded the most sparkling sort of amusement for the children by singing a song in his native language. Such an innovation in the anniversary business is a wholesome idea. Besides the intellectual benefit which the ordinary Sunday-school scholar may derive from listening to and associating with the average heathen, it does away with the old-fashioned business of speech-making which has wearied the anniversary-going public beyond all patience. There are three classes of speakers who generally perform on such occasions; 1. The long-winded old men who come with well-worn stories that everybody has heard; 2. The fust-and-feathers orators, who indulge in moral fireworks, soapbuds, and similar sensation; 3. Men of some sense. It is just to say, however, that the latter are greatly in a minority on Sunday-school anniversary platforms. A few good heathen who can sing in almost any unintelligible language might secure a fine run of engagements during the present Sunday-school season.

Events of the Week.

MOSES GRINNELL died at the age of 75.

SENATOR BLAINE is gaining in health and strength.

THE damages by the late flood in Richmond, Va., are said to be $500,000.

THE U. S. Bonded Warehouse on Vesey street was robbed of $16,000 worth of silk by tunnelling burglars.

FORTY men are on trial at Scranton, Pa., for murder. It will take a big hanging bee to suspend them all by the neck.

THOMAS WEEKS, a scene-shifter in Brooklyn Academy of Music, dropped dead while at his work. His scene was shifted for the last time.

THREE men, indicted for tarring and feathering a woman of loose character, have been sentenced to the penitentiary for from one to ten years at Erie, Pa.

A. OAKLEY HALL, Ex-Mayor and Ex-Tourist is out on a starring lecture engagement. He commenced in Boston to a not over-crowded audience.

ANOTHER week of moderate weather, interspersed with a heavy north-eastern storm with profuse rain. The earth is well saturated with water and is ready for winter.

THE steamboat C. H. Northam, of the New Haven line, burned in the East River near Seventh st. Three of the crew perished in the flames or by suffocation in their berths.

WM. H. VANDERBILT's fast team knocked down Mathew Riley on Central ave. Morrisania, injuring him severely. That is too old a custom for the rich and powerful to be knocking down the weak and the helpless.

THE political excitement in France still runs high. McMahon finds the public waters not entirely placid. Much trouble exists in appointing a Cabinet that will at the same time please himself and all the cliques that wish to be pleased.

A GREAT storm prevailed in Eastern Virginia and the vicinity of Washington. Terrible havoc and destruction of property took place. Railroad tracks were submerged, bridges carried away and much damage done to shipping, attended with loss of life.

THE Rev. J. M. Buchanan has petitioned his church that his connection with it be discontinued, on the ground that it is so deeply in debt that it does not afford him sufficient money to support his family upon. Many churches and pastors are in the same trouble.

ANOTHER large emigration to Liberia is to be made from this country in six weeks. Between three and four thousand colored people have gone there since the war. There are said to be a quarter of a million colored men and women in the United States who are now anxious to leave for Liberia.

ROPER, alias McGhee, who attempted to outrage a young lady named Betie Templeton, was taken from jail at Columbia, Tenn., by a mob and lynched from a third story window of the Court House, in the sight of two thousand people who approved of the summary proceeding.

THE President of the fraudulent Security Life Insurance Company has been sentenced to state prison for five years. Dr. T. S. Lambert of the Popular Life Insurance Company for whose presence the court is waiting is still unable to put in an appearance. Rascality is not always successful.

CARDOZA, Ex-Treasurer of South Carolina, has been tried and sentenced to a fine of $4,000 and imprisonment for two years. Smalls for bribery, a fine of $5,000 and three years' imprisonment, Cass Carpenter, for forgery, to $1,000 and two years in jail. It is still a problem whether honesty is not the best policy.

A SAD event occurred in the sinking of the Huron, on Nov. 24th, off the Virginia coast by which one hundred and fourteen persons or more were suddenly drowned. It speaks badly for our ship building when vessels are so easily lost. Inquiries are to be instituted in this case but probably it will be found that old Nobody was to blame.

BY HUDSON TUTTLE.

CHAPTER IX.

Well has the great historian of Rome remarked: "Future tyrants were encouraged to believe that the innocent blood that they might shed, would be instantly washed away in the waters of regeneration."

If man never fell, if he is a progressive instead of a retrogressive being, the stupendous scheme is an idle tale, and with it atonement, salvation, and numberless minor dogmas become superfluous. Outside of theology or mythology there is no indication of man's fall. Science has not been consulted by bigoted votaries; her followers have pursued their thoughtful way, while the theologians have gone theirs. Theological speculation is the easiest speculation, for it does not require facts, and if incapable of demonstration, is equally invulnerable to refutation by those employing the same weapons. It has been dimly seen that science conflicts with the biblical myths of the creation, and although on one hand theology has sought to reconcile science with itself, the students of the latter have not made any such attempt, rather shrinking from the application of the facts which they well knew were in such irreconcilable opposition. Geology has proved the vast duration of the world, and more dexterous hands than have yet applied themselves to the work must gloss its revelations to make them apparently accord with the Bible.

With the extension of the age of the Earth, the introduction of man is carried into the Past. Beyond the indeterminate period of tradition, the geologist finds an indisputably authentic volume written on tablets of rock by fossil remains. Adam, as the first man, becomes a myth. Before he is said to have been placed in the Garden of Eden, man had inhabited the earth for a vast period of time. That mystic era before the beginning of history, when man existed as the rudest savage, has been divided into the Iron, Bronze, and Stone Ages. Each of these periods represent a vast epoch. Man first used stone weapons; then he discovered bronze; and, lastly, iron. An age previous to, and lower than, stone weapons has been discovered. M. Boucher de Perthes divides the Stone Age into the ground and unground. He says: "We have no knowledge of any savages at present so low that they do not sharpen their weapons by attrition, but the lowest Stone Age presents us examples of this want of sharpening. The implements found in the Post-tertiary, so far, are only chipped rudely into form; they are spear-heads, leaf-shaped instruments, flints chipped to an edge on one side and left unwrought on the other. When the Tasmanian wants an instrument for cutting wood, he takes a stone and breaks an edge, with which he at once proceeds to his work. Similar instruments are found in the drift. The instruments of the drift are less neatly formed by larger chippings than those of the Scandinavian shell heaps, or of America. Besides absence of grinding, the instruments are very rude, a character which gives them important bearing on the history of civilization." The men who used these weapons made by breaking stones to an accidental sharp edge dwelt in caves. Of them Vogt remarks: "The cave man was the rudest of savages. Perhaps there exists at present no race so low. His diet was exclusively flesh. No traces of vegetable food, nor even hooks or nets for capturing fish, have been found. He attacked his prey—like a wild animal—by cunning, speed, strength; and it seems that with his simple stone instruments he mastered the young rhinoceros. He clothed himself with the skins of animals sewed together with sinews by means of needle-shaped bones. His dwelling was a nest or hut, perhaps little better than some anthropoid apes construct. He had no domestic animals; and not until a later period did he domesticate the dog—the first animal he took under his protection." Such is a faithful picture of the European savage—the progenitor of the Anglo-Saxon.

For the last fifty years facts have been constantly produced in support of the vast antiquity of man; but so strong has been theological prejudice that they have either been strenuously denied or ignored. Human fossils have been repeatedly found in such positions and state of preservation that had they belonged to any other animal they would have been at once pronounced true fossils, but, belonging to man, they were at once cast aside as recent. Slowly and patiently scientists have labored and accumulated a mass of fact which now challenge refutation. In no province of investigation has prejudice more absolutely suppressed facts or silenced reason. Theologians make no mention of the mass of evidence daily accumulating, presuming that science and theology have no relation. They will find in the end that this, like all other questions, must be fought on the ground of positive knowledge. The discoveries bearing on man have been condensed in another volume—"Origin and Antiquity of Man," and the present pages only allow of the general statement of their results. M. Boucher de Perthes, from calculations based on the growth of peat, makes the flint arrows found in the Valley of the Somme, in France, one hundred and twenty thousand years old, and yet to this vast duration must be added the indeterminate period allowed for the formation of the gravel-bed in which they are found. Human fossils are found in Sweden; at least (estimated by Lyell's data of two feet and a half of coast elevation in a century) twenty-seven thousand five hundred years old.

The investigations of Linaut Bey in the Delta of Egypt give certain evidence that man was sufficiently civilized to fashion bricks and pottery forty-one thousand years before the building of the Pyramids. Beneath this civilized state—for man has already made a great advance when he acquires the art of making pottery—lies the savage, or Stone Age, when he possessed only stone arrows and spears, such as the Valley of the Somme has preserved. He dwelt in the midst of a dense wilderness inhabited by colossal beasts, armed only with a rudely broken flint. For what length of time he had previously existed cannot be determined, but he had advanced from the rudest state by a process slow and painful. The more enlightened a people, the more rapid their advancement. Savage tribes remain from age to age apparently without change, so extremely slow is the awakening of their intellectual powers. The period of time from the flint axe to that of bronze must be extremely long, and still more vast that which stretches into the night of time to the unarmed hairy savage—the primeval man. All this vast duration lies far below the base of the hoary pyramids, which of themselves are scarcely of historic time, reaching back, according to Lepsius's calculations, to within one hundred and twelve years of the Creation according to received chronology.*

From the brutal savage, through the interminable duration of the ages of Stone and Bronze, man advanced into the uncertain light of tradition. Constantly developing his intellectual powers, he slowly and steadily ascended into civilization. Has he ever fallen? He has been too low to fall. Could the savage, all of whose genius was comprised in the art of breaking a stone to a sharp edge, and using it in offense or defense, fall? He could not well be more savage. But when we pass from the Bronze to the Iron Age, we reach the dawn of history, which, century after century, records the accumulation of thought in unbroken advancement.

Ah, Garden of Eden! state of blissful perfection! you are myths—aspirations of the human heart retroverted into the past.

The Bennett-Teed Discussion.

L.—JESUS CHRIST IS NOT ONLY DIVINE, BUT IS THE LORD GOD, CREATOR OF HEAVEN AND EARTH.

MR. TEED'S THIRD LETTER.

MORAVIA, N. Y., Nov. 22, 1877.

MR. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I believe you to be thoroughly in earnest in the work engaging your mind and pen. While I disagree with you in regard to the conclusion to which the combinations of form and function point as manifest through law, I am in deep sympathy with you as a man, a fellow-human, fearlessly and determinedly advocating what you believe to be true. Permit me here to extend my heartfelt sympathy with you as an individual, in your apparently unfortunate complication with civil procedures, the dernier resort of an intoxicated theology about to fall into the gutter. Your seeming misfortune is one of the brightest auguries for the success of the work in which you are engaged, namely, the destruction of an adulterous theology, a corruption of Judaism and Christianity in combination with Roman paganism. You have great reason for encouragement. Your victory over modern priestcraft is insured beyond a doubt.

When the Church is compelled to have recourse to legal procedure in its extremity, in the struggle for the survival of the fittest; when every Christian hope for succor fails it, and it reaches out and clasps hands with a leprous and palsying civil power, its doom is sealed. So far, then, let me offer no regret, but rather congratulation that in your misfortune is disclosed the extremity to which the fallen Church is driven.

The old ship Babylon has struck a rock, and while the orthodox end of the vessel goes down, my desire is that before the end of the old hulk which you occupy sinks, you will see your danger, take to the life-boat, and make for land.

I have not entertained the thought that you would intentionally misrepresent me, but I am persistent in the claim that there is a grand difference between my statements and your quotations. It does make a difference whether I say, I will not sustain any system founded upon the Bible, or, I will not support a system for the simple reason that it is founded on the Bible. A system might be founded on the Bible and receive my support, not because it was founded there, but because I might deem it confirmed by the works of nature. It also makes a difference, and a grand one in my estimation, whether I assert that I will take a man's statement on his authority corroborated by other valid testimony, or the authority on his testimony without that corroboration. If I tell a man I will take his note signed by one, two, or more reliable parties, he would not say I agreed to take his note without the security named. These, however, are the least important points in the controversy.

You stated to me in your first letter that you did not wish to kick at nothing, and referred me to a serious issue of an unfortunately directed move of the kind. Allow me, as a friend to you personally, desiring your final well being, and claiming a knowledge of a department of the Universe of which you say you are ignorant, to say that mental hernia is a more serious difficulty than the physical one you mentioned. I see by your letter now before me that there is danger to be apprehended. You are so accustomed to the arguments of a warped theology that you are pursuing the very ignis fatuus you seemed to fear, as stated in your first epistle. You will persist in assuming that I am going to claim something you do not agree with, and thus you lead off and tell me what you do and what you don't believe, as if you were arguing with some resurrected orthodox clergyman that you have already annihilated and some one else has buried. My dear man, you spend too much time in substantiating my claims.

* For the facts corroborating these statements see the works of Lubbock, Steenstrup, Dr. Keller, Sir Charles Lyell, and the linguistic researches of Muller.

Matter has always existed. It is as persistent as space and time. We cannot go back beyond the time when it had no existence in "some form," and in this I go farther than you, it has always existed in a structure embodying the most perfect symmetry with the complete sum of a co-ordinating function.

The above facts are self-evident and are received by the mind intuitively, as soon as the mind is sufficiently amplified to embrace the concept. They are facts that no argument can set aside and which no argument is required to establish. If this were not true, your statement following would be false: "All the mind, I repeat, that ever had an existence was produced by a physical and mental organization, directly the result of the food digested by the stomach and carried into the circulation by the arterial system. Without nutrition, digestion, and assimilation, the brain cannot act (vice versa), no thoughts can be produced, no mind can exist." Here, then, you have made the very statement I desired to see you make. You agree with me that mental energy cannot be produced—another word for caused—except from the existence and operation of an adequate form and function, or, to use your words, "a physical and mental organization." To which I respond, Amen. That form and function are human in their highest development, that mental and physical combinations upon which depend mental production are human, and in the proposition I make the claim that the mental and physical structure capable of disseminating life to new persistent structures is Jesus Christ.

Our difference seems to be that while mental energy and a corresponding form are correlates, that is, that they do not exist independently of each other, you make the body the master and the mind the slave, while I make mind the master and the body the humble servant. I will agree with you that up to the present time, except in a very few instances, the body has been the master of the unfolding man, and it is reasonable to suppose, from your point of view, that the mind will remain subordinate to the tendencies of a corrupt and corruptible physical form even unto death. But how could you misinterpret me in regard to these points when in my letter to you I make the following plain statement: "With the same certainty I can declare that the physical or material world, with its forces, is correlated with the world of mind and thought"? How, then, can you imagine that I regard mind as an extrinsic something separated from the form upon which it is dependent unless you are ignorant of the terms I employ to express my thoughts.

You declare that all the mind that ever did or can exist is produced from a physical and mental organization—the very thing I claim in the proposition, except I go a little further and am a little more specific in my statement of the original embodiment—the mental and physical organism from which not only mental energy is derived, but from which physical substance is disseminated. Inasmuch as you assert that all mind is the product of the combination of mind and matter in a mental and physical organism, why may not Jesus be the special reincarnation of that astral center, the bright and morning star, as he declared?

If all mind is the product of a mental and physical structure—mind and matter in the relation of form and function—then we cannot go back of the time when mind did not exist. If we can go back to a time when mind did not exist, then we can go back beyond the time when mind resulted from a mental and physical organism, and your statement would be false. My arguments may not be solid in your estimation, but they appear a little solid to me, of course, naturally, you know. Now, in taking your premise, what is the conclusion? Simply that a mental and physical organic structure has ever existed: one of the claims embraced in the proposition. According to your own showing, the claim ought to begin to appear quite consistent.

If the foregoing statements, in which we agree, are true, then mind and matter are coincidental, parallel and perpetual, passing along in the course of events hand in hand, uniting in the processes of evolving and involving their never-failing products. This disposes of the question of a time first cause, beyond which there is nothing, in the claim we both make, that no such time ever existed, and carries us back to the question of a qualitative relation of first and second or higher and lower conditions. If mind and matter are perpetual and correlated; if they have always existed, as deduced from your own premise, then this part of the argument is resolved to the simple question, which is highest or first in function? We agree that they are correlates—that they are independent—that neither can exist without the other. Which, then, dominates, mind or matter? That which is finally subdominant is second in quality, while that which is finally dominant is first or highest in quality. You say that mind is the product of mind and matter. Can I not with equal propriety declare that matter is the product of mind and matter, inasmuch as neither, according to your own claim, can have priority as to time, except as highest quality produced in time-marking events?

I ask you to show the slightest proof that the supply of food by which the mind is perpetuated, through the processes of assimilation, digestion, circulation, etc., is not insured through the voluntary and involuntary operations of mind. Perhaps you will explain in your next how the food adapted to the perpetuity of a mental and physical organic structure could be procured and prepared, and then how it can be made to pass through the changes essential to the supply of the waste that the mind itself is constantly undergoing through its functional activity, except through the voluntary and involuntary operations of the mind through its organ, the human brain.

I insist that mental energy, as stated, in the will and intellect, is dominant over matter, and that when the developing human mind amplifies and asserts its royal prerogative, it will bring into subjection all force, all matter, and all law, as emanating from the highest type of mind. Mind is the most refined, the most positive, the most subtle of all energy, therefore the highest (first) in function, and consequently the all-dominating principle of all that is embraced in the Universe.

You say you are ignorant of a first cause, and yet you say that mind is the product of a physical and mental structure. I say I am not ignorant of the relation of mind and matter and the properties of mind, and I also assert that mind is the product of a great variety of changes or mutations of matter converted to mind itself, and that matter is the product of a great variety of mutations of mind itself converted to matter; or, in other words, I am consistent in the cognition of the law of evolution in admitting the fact of correlation—necessarily embracing the mutations of mind to matter and matter to mind.

When my mind perceives the law of evolution it is so peculiarly constructed that it at once complements it with the concept of involution. When I perceive the law of circulation, involving a flow from mind to matter, from function to form, my mind coördinates that concept with a perception or cognition of a counterbalancing flow. In these two concepts alone is the cognition of the law of circulation complete. This provides against our unfolding process running down, because it is complemented with an involving process that keeps the machine wound up. So you perceive that, like the Dutchman's "egg und bodate, dey go boody goot togedda, heigh?"

In your communication now before me you have enumerated a host of objections to claims you fear I will make. These assumptions, I judge, result from a peculiarly sensitive mental condition originating in your opposition to the absurd positions of a modern Church which claims to be founded upon the doctrines of the Bible. I told you, to begin with, that you need not in this case expect to contend with a disintegrating theological carcass, rotten with its adulterous and polluting intercourse with the harlot of Babylon.

Now that we begin to perceive where we stand on the question, let us enter upon the work of discussing the question of priority in regard to mind and matter. That I may clear up some points in your mind regarding my claims, I will state some minor propositions that are involved in the major one under consideration.

Something was never produced from nothing. I do not claim any such thing, neither does the Bible nor Jesus. Orthodoxy may, but you are not controverting this question with orthodoxy.

Matter and mind have existed perpetually. The Universe, including all that belongs to it, embracing mind and matter, law and force, has existed perpetually. Mind is not an extrinsic or distinct existence from the rest of the Universe, but is a part of it; and when I employ the term Universe, I embrace mind in the term. The seat of mind is within the human structure. I declare it to be prior in function, first or highest in quality, the dominating principle of being. As a qualitative product, it has its origin in matter, the second cause of being. Matter has its origin in mind, the first cause, the highest and prior in quality. Mind, as a product, being highest in quality, is first effect; while matter, the lowest in quality, posterior, is the second effect. Mind is first cause and first effect, while matter is second cause and second effect.

Mind, through voluntary and involuntary procedure is constantly transmitting its potencies and projecting them through an outward circulation to extremities. The mind is protected from exhaustion or final waste by a supply through a return circulation just as essential to the perpetuity of the mind as the flow from the mind outward is to the perpetuity of matter.

I care not how indefinite you make the number of boundaries or limitations to spaces, every quality of function emanating from a given center has its limitation or boundary, and upon it depends the law of rotation. You do not question the law of the correlation of force. You have no difficulty in perceiving the possibility of an energy starting in the condition of electric force, and passing through successive mutations, light, heat, motion, and magnetism, with all their variations of quality, and returning to the electrical status. When did light, heat, motion, or magnetism become electric force? and how? But your law of evolution involves more than this. These forces do not cease in their mutations with potential and dynamic physical energies. Matter itself is constantly being changed to force, and force as constantly to matter, and these, as you declare, to mental energy. Mind and matter, then, are reciprocal, constantly interchanging products, yet forever related as mind to matter.

You will agree with me that men, or minds, differ in quality—that there are higher and lower degrees of these combinations which go to make up or formulate mental and physical organisms. Can you not go one step further and embrace the intuition that there is a highest combination of the properties that constitute mental and physical development, and, as such, highest, first, prior, central, and originative, in the aspect of qualitative being? Why may not that astral center be Jesus, the bright and morning star, as declared by himself?

It is perfectly consistent with the law of evolution complemented with its coördinate, the law of involution, to suppose that cause, the first, prior, or highest, should successively become incarnate as effect, and through mutation complete the cycle of its change in cause. This is the doctrine of Jesus, and it is the doctrine of nature.

I would call attention to two or three slight errors in my second letter, two of which are, I think, typographical. The word "assume" in one place should be "assumes," "all-dominating" all-dominating; and where I allude to the proposition, "Let me first examine clearly its range," it should have read, "Let me first present clearly," etc. The diction of this last was my own. If I had looked it over carefully, I would have corrected it.

Respectfully yours, CYRUS ROMULUS R. TEED.

The Unconstitutional Statutes.

Subjoined we give the sections of the U. S. Revised Statutes which were passed by Congress at the instigation of St. Anthony Comstock and the Young Men's Christian Association. They are clearly subversive of the fundamental principles of personal freedom, upon which our government was founded: These unjust and unconstitutional laws were hurriedly pushed through Congress, and were voted for by many members because they understood that the Young Men's Christian Association, and many other Christians, wished their passage, and they gave their votes without understanding the real merits of the statutes to be passed.

It is a very poor commentary upon the men who are now elected to pass laws for the nation, that, after the country had continued prosperous for nearly a century under the free and equal laws and provisions of the Constitution, founded by our fathers, such a set of oppressive and liberty-destroying enactments should be forced upon the statute books of our country, as the last quarter of the nineteenth century was nearly dawning.

Congress greatly mistakes its duties when it undertakes to regulate the morals of the people. Its province is to look to the army and navy, to secure means of defense, the commerce, money of the nation, etc., but it should never lend itself to champion the dogmas or belief of any sect or creed, nor to become a police force to compel people to be moral or prayerful. Such legislation should be left for the various States to attend to. The general Government should let it alone.

It will be seen that these statutes are susceptible of being made very oppressive upon publishers, booksellers, druggists, independent physicians, medical authors, advertisers, importers, etc., etc.

TITLE XIX.—PROVISIONS APPLICABLE TO SEVERAL CLASSES OF OFFICERS.

SECTION 1785. Whoever, being an officer, agent, or employé of the Government of the United States, shall knowingly aid or abet any person engaged in any violation of any of the provisions of law, prohibiting importing, advertising, dealing in, exhibiting, or sending or receiving by mail, obscene or indecent publications, or representations, or means for preventing conception or procuring abortion, or other articles of indecent or immoral use or tendency, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall for every offense be punishable by a fine of not less than one hundred dollars, and not more than five thousand, or by imprisonment at hard labor for not less than one year nor more than ten, or both.

TITLE XXXIII.—DUTIES UPON IMPORTS.

SEC. 2491. All persons are prohibited from importing into the United States, from any foreign country, any obscene book, pamphlet, paper, writing, advertisement, circular, print, picture, drawing, or other representation, figure, or image on or of paper or other material, or any cast, instrument, or other article of an immoral nature, or any drug or medicine, or any article whatever, for the prevention of conception or for causing unlawful abortion. No invoice or package whatever, or any part of one, in which any such articles are contained, shall be admitted to entry; and all invoices and packages whereof any such articles shall compose a part, are liable to be proceeded against, seized, and forfeited by due course of law. All such prohibited articles in the course of importation, shall be detained by the officer of customs, and proceedings taken against the same as prescribed in the following section: Provided, That the drugs hereinbefore mentioned, when imported in bulk and not put up for any of the purposes hereinbefore specified, are excepted from the operation of this section.

TITLE XLVI.—THE POSTAL SERVICE.

SEC. 3893. No obscene, lewd, or lascivious book, pamphlet, picture, paper, print, or other publication of an indecent character, or any article or thing designed or intended for the prevention of conception or procuring of abortion, nor any article or thing intended or adapted for any indecent or immoral use or nature, nor any written or printed card, circular, book, pamphlet, advertisement, or notice of any kind giving information, directly or indirectly, where or how, or of whom, or by what means either of the things before mentioned may be obtained or made, nor any letter upon the envelope of which, or postal card upon which indecent or scurrilous epithets may be written or printed, shall be carried in the mail; and any person who shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited, for mailing or delivery, any of the herein before mentioned articles or things, or any notice or paper containing any advertisement relating to the aforesaid articles or things, and any person who, in pursuance of any plan or scheme for disposing of any of the herein before mentioned articles or things, shall take or cause to be taken, from the mail any such letter or package, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, for every offense, be fined not less than one hundred dollars, nor more than five thousand dollars, or imprisoned at hard labor not less than one year nor more than ten years, or both.

TITLE LXX.—CRIMES.—CHAPTER THREE.—CRIMES ARISING WITHIN THE MARITIME AND TERRITORIAL JURISDICTION OF THE UNITED STATES.

SEC. 5389. Every person who, within the District of Columbia, or any of the Territories of the United States, or other place within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, sells, or lends, or gives away, or in any manner exhibits or offers to sell, or to lend, or to give away, or in any manner to exhibit, or otherwise publishes or offers to publish in any manner, or has in his possession, for any such purpose, any obscene book, pamphlet, paper, writing, advertisement, circular, print, picture, drawing, or other representation, figure, or image on or of paper or other material, or any cast, instrument, or other article of an immoral nature, or any drug or medicine, or any article whatever, for the prevention of conception, or for causing unlawful abortion, or who advertises the same for sale, or writes or prints, or causes to be written or printed, any card, circular, book, pamphlet, advertisement, or notice of any kind, stating when, where, how, or of whom, or by what means, any of the articles in this section hereinbefore mentioned can be procured or obtained, or manufactures, draws or prints, or in anywise makes any of such articles, shall be imprisoned at hard labor in the penitentiary for not less than six months nor more than five years for each offense, or fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than two thousand dollars, with costs of court.

Our Post-Office is a splendid edifice, probably one of the finest and most desirable on the globe. It was designed to be fire-proof and stands isolated. It cost $7,000,000 or $8,000,000. It ought to be standing there in good condition one thousand years from to-day. It is enough to make an American feel proud to stand and view it. From this edifice nearly one hundred tons of mail matter daily leaves for all parts of the country and all parts of the world, and a similar amount is received from all these sources. But there is, nevertheless, a sad reflection associated with it. About one half of that grand structure is occupied by the United States District Court, with a Criminal Branch, Marshal's Offices, District Attorney's Offices, Commissioners' Offices, etc.

In that magnificent pile, which the hard earnings of the people have paid for, is a salaried court, with salaried officers of all ranks, which is emphatically an American Inquisition in which honest and deserving men have been put upon the legal rack and have been unjustly deprived of their liberty and their money. It is sad to realize that such an institution should exist in this great commercial city, and that the revenues drawn from the people should be used to sustain it—but so it is.

The Criminal Branch of the U. S. District Court here was established during the war, when there were more cases of a criminal character than the Commissioners were able to attend to. It was well enough at that time, but now there is little for it to do save Comstock's obscene work, by which men far his betters are subjected to indignity, injustice, and heavy expense. It is indeed a sad thought that so much money drawn from the pockets of the people should be paid to a class of men to persecute citizens who are far more useful and far more honest than themselves. The Criminal Branch of the N. Y. U. S. District Court has outlived its usefulness and ought to be abolished.

"THE WORLD'S SAGES, THINKERS AND REFORMERS."—We have now in press a revised and enlarged edition of this work. Several characters have been added, and it will be printed on better and larger paper, and will make a very presentable volume, containing nearly 1100 pages, crown-octavo. The price will be the same as the former edition—cloth, $3.00; colored leather, red edges, $4.00; morocco and gilt edges, $4.50. Postage included. Now is the time for orders.

BEYOND THE VEIL.—This is a Spiritualistic work purporting to be given from the spirit of Dr. Paschal Beverly Randolph through the Scribes, Mrs. Frances H. McDougall and Mrs. Luna Hutchinson. It is a curious book, giving interesting accounts of the life beyond the grave and will doubtless be highly prized by our spiritualistic friends. It will contain a steel engraving of P. B. Randolph, will be printed on heavy tinted paper, with neat letter-press, and will be neatly bound. Those who wish a copy will please send in their orders. Price $1.50, including postage. WHAT IS HUMANITY?—A Lecture by Karl Heinzer. Published by The Society for the Diffusion of Radical Principles. H. Lieber, Indianapolis. This excellent little brochure, by the widely-known editor of Der Pioneer, hews to the line and cuts to the very marrow of the vital distinction between "humanity" and inhumanity on the one hand, and between the same and pseudo-philanthropy—humanity so-called—on the other. After a terse but thorough overture on what humanity is not, to wit: neither bestiality, brutality, or non-progressiveness on the animal side, nor angelhood, religiosity, or plausible hypocrisy on the "heavenly" side, he proceeds, through the remainder of the pamphlet, to give his affirmative replies to this most vital of questions. Those replies, stripped of their valuable and suggestive exposition, are—1. Humanity is the independent, sovereign manhood [and womanhood], emancipated through thought from all superhuman authority and guidance. 2. Culture. 3. Recognition of the common nature and the equality of mankind. 4. Equal universal human right to every thing which secures, ennobles, embellishes, and makes happy this life: in other words, "freedom, prosperity, education for all." 5. Final answer: The much abused German Radicalism.

In this latter connection the author maintains that true humanity will first find its home where there are both external freedom inviting entrance, and the requisite internal freedom necessary for an abode. The first requisite is amply found in this republic of ours. But what of the second? "In no country," we are told, "do we find, in proportion, more deficiencies in thought than in 'free' and 'practical' America,—that same America, which, by its defective reasoning, places republicanism and monarchy on an equality as rightful forms of government; which lets its foreign policy be dictated by kings, and, in its domestic government, has constructed a monarchy without knowing it; which holds the overthrow of democracy to be democracy; which couples religious tyranny with religious freedom, and by religious freedom understands the freedom for religion to overthrow all freedom. With this faulty method of thinking among Americans I contrast the consistent and comprehensive method of the Germans. This, . . . joined to an idealistic tendency of mind, should be the very qualifications to make the Germans step forward preëminent as advance guards and champions of humanity under the banner of German Radicalism."

Let us now step across to Egypt, that famous land of ancient literature, science, and art, and take a very brief glance at its religion.

The Egyptians, it is probable, were the descendants of the Aryan race from Central Asia, though this, of course, is a matter more or less of conjecture. This much is known, that it was an educated land, that its people built great pyramids, temples, and obelisks nearly five thousand years ago. In architecture, in the qualities of grandeur and massive proportions, the world has not produced its equal. The largest buildings erected elsewhere by man are diminutive compared with the pyramids. They are the oldest perfect works of antiquity remaining, the beauty of whose masonry is still a marvel to the world. An obelisk of a single stone now standing in Egypt weighs three hundred tons, and the Colossus of Rameses II. weighs nearly nine hundred tons. With all the knowledge of civil engineering now in the world, it is not known how to move and place in position such immense stones. Herodotus describes a monolithic temple (a temple of one stone) which must have weighed five thousand tons; and that immense stone was carried the whole length of the Nile to the delta. There is at Karnac a roof of a doorway composed of sandstone blocks forty feet long. Sculpture and bas-reliefs are found there thirty-five hundred years old.

The Egyptians were as remarkable for their literature as for their achievements in works of art. They possessed a great fondness for making a record of all current events. Every year, every month, and every day had its record. It is claimed that there is no human history that goes back so far. They were astronomers and knew how to calculate eclipses of the sun and moon. They possessed a knowledge of geometry, chemistry, music, medicine, anatomy, designing, mining, etc.

But wonderful as was the civilization of Egypt, we are more interested in its religion. They were a religious people and paid great attention to the worship of their gods. They were considered to be more pious than any other of the ancient nations. Religious observances were so numerous and imperative that the mere common labors of life could not be performed without constant attention to some religious requirement. They were strong believers in the immortality of the soul as well as metempsychosis. They derived a great solace from the anticipations they indulged in of a continued life beyond the grave. The God Osiris and the Goddess Isis were their chief deities. They also had a grand master-spirit of evil, who presided over the inferior regions. His name was Typhon, and he was a brother of Osiris.

They believed in demigods, and by some it is held that there the conception of the virgin and child as a religious symbol originated.

They had in their religious system a multitude of priests of different grades, as chief priests, or pontiffs, prophets, judges, scribes, those who examined the victims, keepers of the robe, of the sacred animals, etc. Women also held offices in the temples and performed duties there, though not as priestesses. The priests were exempt from taxation and were provided for out of the public stores. They superintended sacrifices, processions, and funerals, and were initiated into the greater and lesser mysteries. Funeral ceremonies were most imposing. The bodies were embalmed and placed in tombs of the strongest construction. The cost of embalming and the size and strength of the tomb varied with the position and wealth of the deceased. When the seventy days of mourning had elapsed, the body in its case was ferried across the lake in front of the temple, which represented the passage of the soul over the infernal stream. Then came a dramatic representation of the trial of the soul before Osiris. The priests, in masks, represented the gods of the under world. Typhon accuses the dead man and demands his punishment. The intercessors plead for him. A large pair of scales is set up and in one scale his conduct is placed in a bottle and in the other an image of truth. These proceedings are represented on the funeral papyri.

The Egyptians placed a high estimate upon virtue and morality. Many virtues of which Christians have been in the habit of claiming a monopoly were practiced and inculcated by that ancient people. Brunsch says a thousand voices from the tombs of Egypt declare this. One inscription in Upper Egypt says, "He loved his father; he honored his mother; he loved his brethren, and never went from his house in bad temper. He never preferred the great to the low one." Another inscription at Sais runs thus: "I honored my father; I esteemed my mother; I loved my brothers; I found graves for the unburied dead; I instructed little children; I took care of the orphans as though they were my own children."

The Egyptians had forty-two volumes of their sacred writings, which were divided into five classes; but these have been mostly lost in the lapse of time and the changes of government.

In addition to the invisible gods which the Egyptians worshiped, they held large numbers of animals to be sacred, and worshiped them as gods. This would seem to be a strange peculiarity for a people so intelligent. Cows were sacred to Isis, and she was often represented in the form of a cow. The worship of Apis, the small bull of Memphis, was a popular worship. He was considered a representative of their chief god, Osiris. Their worship was eminently a Nature-worship, and for this reason it was easy for them to select animals of various kinds as personifications of deity. Much could be said of the worship of the Egyptians, including the classes into which they divided their gods. This division was elaborate and embraced a large catalogue; but wishing to say a little upon two or three other systems, we will let Egypt rest for the present.

Our Examination

Did not come off on Nov. 21st. Neither side was exactly ready for trial. Mr. Comstock, doubtless feeling that his case was not sufficiently strong, said he wished to have time to amend his complaint so as to include Dr. Trall's "Sexual Physiology" with the obscene publications that we have sent through the mails; besides he had to go to Boston on one of his angelic visits and he wished to put off this case until after thanksgiving. It is to be hoped that the roast turkey he may supply himself with upon that day may place him in such a benignant mood that it will continue for several days and dispose him to leave us a few years more of peaceful existence. We have resided a good long time in this world; we have tried to behave ourselves tolerably well, and we hope it is not reserved in the fates for Anthony Comstock to hasten us out of it.

To show how fair the gentleman is towards us and how little he wishes to oppress us for opinion's sake, we will state that the third "obscene" book for which he proposes to prosecute us for sending through the mails, is strictly a scientific work, written by as pure and unsensual a man as ever lived in this country; it has been published for fifteen years in this city; it has passed through twenty-seven editions; some forty thousand copies have been sold and it has been bought and sold by every respectable bookseller in the city and almost every one in the country. It was sold about twelve years, thousands of copies having passed through the mails, before we had ever mailed a book. Among the large number sold we have perhaps disposed of four dozen copies; a part of these have been sold to the trade, a part have been sent by express, and a few by mail. Large numbers of the book have been sent by mail from this city, and those so sending have never been annoyed nor even told they should not send it, but it appears to be reserved for us to be punished and sent to prison for daring to send to Squan Village for Comstock to look over at his leisure a book that for half a generation had been sent to all parts of the country to anybody who wanted it.

The coincidence that we have been arrested and are to be tried, and if possible heavily fined and imprisoned, and that we are a publisher of an Infidel paper and Radical books, is too striking to escape observation. Who can believe for a moment that had we been a supporter of the grand ecclesiastical system of the country, or even had only been neutral upon the subject, we would ever have been arrested and thrust into prison for selling a few copies of Trall's "Sexual Physiology"? No; it is because we have exercised the right of a freeborn American and have expressed our disbelief in and disapprobation of the system of priestcraft, of the old dogmas and fables borrowed from the older systems of pagan religions that existed in the world thousands of years earlier. Because we have exposed this state of things and have used arguments and stated facts that neither Comstock nor his backers can controvert or disprove, the attempt has been made to crush us, to squelch our paper, and to break up our business.

It remains to be seen whether this pious game shall be successful or not. It remains to be seen whether the courts of the United States and the officers appointed and salaried by the revenues paid by the people shall be made use of to crush individual effort, stifle honest conviction, and arbitrarily destroy personal liberty in our land. It remains to be seen whether the government founded upon the principle of equal rights for all, of freedom of opinion upon political, moral, social, and religious questions shall be subverted and used as an engine to work in favor of any sect or creed and to crush out the constitutional rights of any portion of the great public.

Our examination is set to come off at 2 P.M., Saturday, Dec. 1st. Some are under the impression that the Commissioner and the District Attorney will not see in the case sufficient grounds to prosecute it, and that we have not been guilty of issuing obscene matter, and that the case will be dismissed. Others think that Torquemada Comstock is perfectly indomitable; that he will rally all his forces; that his backers, the Young Men's Christian Association and the Society for the Suppression of Vice, will come to his rescue with the mighty influence they can bring to bear, and that we are not only bound to be held by the Commissioner, but to be prosecuted by the District Attorney, tried and condemned by the jury which the Marshall may summon, and sentenced by the judge who presides over this terrible tribunal; that there is just about the same chance for us in that relentless court as there was for the poor victims who were so unfortunate as to be dragged before the Grand Inquisitor in the Spanish Inquisition. If this is the true view of the case, a big fight is bound to take place between personal liberty and sectarian intolerance in which thousands will be interested. We may be defeated. It may be our fate to pass a few years of the closing part of our life in a loathsome prison, cast there by the zealots who claim to be the followers of the meek and lowly one. It matters but little, perhaps if this should be so. Truth is bound to come to the ascendant and ultimately must triumph over error of all kinds. We shall see what we shall see.

The Right of Petition.

When this government was established, it was intended that every inhabitant of the country should possess the right not only to worship God as he pleased, but also that he should have freedom of opinion and freedom of speech, as well as the freedom to print such conclusions as he had arrived at, regardless of whether they favored this or that school of theology, medicine, politics, philosophy, or what not. In the odious statutes curtailing or destroying personal liberty, which were illadvisedly placed upon the statutes of the nation in the years '72 and '73, these have been greatly interfered with and virtually destroyed. But one of the guaranteed rights reserved by the people in the incipency of the nation was the Right of Petition. This right Comstock has not yet deprived us of. It is still left us, and let the people arise in their might and exercise it so as to be effective for good.

The following petition has been drawn with much care, and is couched in careful and inoffensive language. It states the case clearly and only asks for that which the people have a perfect right to ask for. In its nature and spirit it may well deserve to be ranked with the Declaration of Independence.

It is intended to send out at least twenty thousand of these petitions, that they may go into every town and village in the country and be signed by every person opposed to those obnoxious laws remaining upon our statute books. If these are rushed into Congress early in the winter, bearing the signatures of a million freemen, they cannot be disregarded. The will of the people must prevail. The rights of personal liberty must be preserved. And it is to be hoped that the intriguing and insinuating Anthony Comstock will be allowed to search for more congenial employment than busying himself about the opinions, the conduct and the morals of his fellow citizens. Let every liberty-loving person in the United States who is disposed to present the following petition for the signatures of his neighbors and friends, send to the editor of this paper, and he shall be duly furnished with a copy. When signed they may be returned to the same, who will see that they are duly brought to the notice of Congress; or, if it be preferred, the petitions may be forwarded to the member of Congress representing the district in which the petitions are signed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress Assembled:

The Petition of the Undersigned, Citizens of the United States, residing at and near ———— respectfully shows:

1. That they are loyal and devoted supporters of the Constitution of the United States and of the Republican form of Government, and that they are so principally from the conviction that under them Personal Liberty, Freedom of Conscience, of the Press, and of the expression of opinion, together with equality before the law and the Departments of Government, had been for the first time substantially secured among men: and your Petitioners rejoiced in the belief that the rights thus guaranteed had in their own Country forever abrogated every form of political, moral and religious persecution and inquisition:—

2. That without the knowledge of your Petitioners, and, as they believe, without the knowledge of any great number of the Citizens of the United States, certain Acts were procured to be passed by Congress in 1873 (since incorporated into the U. S. Revised Statutes as §§ 1875, 3878, 3893, 5389, 2491), for the ostensible purpose of suppressing "obscene literature," &c., which reversed the policy and practice of our Government since its foundation:—

3. That in the belief of your Petitioners the Government of the United States was established under the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution for the more general purposes of Government only, and for the protection, and not for the limitation, of the rights aforesaid. That to that end, i. e., "to secure the blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our posterity," Congress was prohibited from making laws affecting Religion or Conscience, or "abridging the Freedom of the Press, or of Speech," or the right of Petition; and the People were "to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects," &c. That the true construction and meaning of these great Charters of Liberty were declared by their authors, the founders of our Government, to be, that all persons were, and by right ought to be, equal in their protection and privileges before the Law, the Courts, and all the Departments of the Government, without discrimination or question as to their social, moral, political or religious character. That the Statutes aforesaid are, in the opinion of your Petitioners, plain violation of the letter and spirit of these fundamental principles of our Government; and that they are capable of, and are, in fact, being used for the purposes of moral and religious persecution, whereby the dearest and most precious rights of the People are being grievously violated under the forms of legal inquisition, fines, forfeiture, and imprisonment:—

4. And your Petitioners further show, that they are convinced that all attempts of Civil Government, whether State or National, to enforce or to favor particular religious, social, moral, or medical opinions, or schools of thought or practice, are not only unconstitutional, but ill-advised, contrary to the spirit and progress of our age, and almost certain in the end to defeat any beneficial objects intended. The mental, moral, and physical health and safety are better secured and preserved by virtue resting upon liberty and knowledge, than upon ignorance enforced by governmental supervision. That even error may be safely left free, where truth is free to combat it. That the greatest danger to a Republic is the insidious repression of the liberties of the People. That whenever publications, pictures, articles, acts, or exhibitions, directly tending to produce crime or pauperism, are wantonly exposed to the public or obtruded upon individuals, the several States and Territories have provided, or may be safely left to provide, suitable remedies.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that the Statutes aforesaid may be repealed, or materially modified, so that they cannot be used to abridge the Freedom of the Press or of Conscience, or to destroy the liberty and equality of the People before the Law and Departments of the Government, on account of any religious, moral, political, medical or commercial grounds or pretexts whatsoever.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c., &c., &c.

"AN OPEN LETTER TO JESUS CHRIST."—This pamphlet is one of the two that Anthony Comstock is especially displeased with and for which he has secured a warrant against us for "obscenity" and breaking the laws of the United States. He not only took our person, but all the tracts of the kind we had. We felt that he acted very wrongfully toward us on both grounds, but his conduct has greatly stimulated the demand for this little pamphlet; and believing that we have a perfect right to publish it, that we break no law of our country by so doing, that no official character, no court or jury, has pronounced it illegal or obscene, as nobody has objected to our publishing it save Anthony Comstock, and as we regard him only as a man—and a very common one at that—we have seen fit to publish a new supply, and everybody who wishes to see how obscene it is can have an opportunity of doing so. We will furnish this pamphlet singly, by the dozen, by the hundred, and by the thousand, and shall exercise the right of an American citizen to send them by mail or express as desired to any post-office in the country, not even omitting Squan Village. If Mr. Comstock can use any more of them in his business let him act for once like an honest, honorable man, and order them under his own name, without stooping to the unmanly, contemptible subterfuge of writing under the false or assumed names of Bender, Edgewell, Semler, or any other of his numerous decoy names, and even he will be supplied. Price singly 5 cents; per dozen, 40 cents; per hundred, $3.00; per thousand, $25.00, including postage or expressage, as may be preferred.

The other tabooed tract, "How do Marsupials Propagate their Kind?" is one of the Series of Eight Scientific Tracts. The price of the eight is 20 cents. Thus the pamphlet containing the last named tract and the "Open Letter to Jesus Christ" will be sent for 25 cents. If ten thousand persons wish this little outfit of Mr. Comstock's "obscenity," we will supply them, till some higher authority than Anthony Comstock commands us to stop, believing we have, as an American citizen, a perfect right to do so. We apprehend that Shakspeare was nearly correct when he said:

"What better breastplate than a heart untainted?
T'rice is he armed that hath his quarrel just;
And he but naked though locked up in steel,
Whose conscience with injustice is corrupted."

Under this belief and upon this principle we shall work away for a few weeks more, at any rate. We hope Judge Benedict will be so kind as not to sentence us to prison much longer than the term of our natural life, and that, we think, will hardly be more than fifty years longer, and those will soon pass away, especially after forty-nine of them are got along with. The Judge and ourselves alike will both, one of these days, be under the necessity of crossing what our Spiritualistic friends call the "Shining River," and after that we shall be ready for the eternal psalm-singing, the infernal pyrotechnics, or whatever else may come along.

THERE are a few innocent souls who think that Anthony Comstock is a fanatic or an over-vigilant zealot in the work he is prosecuting, but he does not deserve so good a title as either. He is a mercenary, false-hearted, unprincipled persecuting bigot. He got up his society, called "The Society for the Suppression of Vice;" he procured himself to be appointed its Secretary and Chief Mogul at a salary of $4,000 a year, besides traveling expenses, hotel bills, etc., amounting to some $2,500 more. Whether he pockets the usual share of the plunder which goes to informers—one-half the fines obtained—there can be but little doubt that his income from blackmail is by no means inconsiderable. It is thought by some persons who have very good means of judging, that, including his pay that he has as special mail agent, from his Society for the Suppression of Vice and blackmail operations, his income is not less than $20,000 per year. Let it not be thought that his motives are wholly of a pious and devotional character. He is as mercenary as the next man, and will do as much meanness for a thousand dollars in cash as though he was merely a man of the world, and not a saint at all. A thousand dollars looks as big in his eyes as the thirty pieces of silver did in the eyes of Judas Iscariot.

It WILL be noticed in the sections from the U. S. Revised Statutes, given on another page, that the person who takes condemned or "obscene" matter from the U. S. mails, or causes it to be taken out, is equally as guilty and subject to the same penalties as the man who deposited it therein; besides, it must be apparent to all that he is much meaner when, by falsehood and decoy letters, he induces the first party to perform the act. In this view of the case, Comstock is a far greater criminal than ourselves. If we should be arrested, tried and fined, he should be loaded with irons and immured in a dungeon. If we should be imprisoned five years, he should be hung by the neck. There is no meaner man in the community than he who devises artifices and lays traps for the undesigning to fall into. Instead of being a saint of godliness, he is a demon of villainy.

STILL MORE ARRESTS.—Mr. Frank Rivers, of 28 School street, Boston, and his clerk, Albert S. Hapenny, have been arrested for sending obscene literature through the mails, to wit, Dr. Charles Knowlton's "Fruits of Philosophy." Whether this is one of Comstock's sweet jobs does not quite appear, but it is believed nobody else would be mean enough to engage in such unclean work, and they would be infringing upon Comstock's reserved rights to do so. Mr. Rivers avers that he intends to defend the case to the bitter end, and if necessary, to summon three hundred witnesses, and all the medical experts in the city besides. He claims there is nothing of an objectionable character in the work he sends out, it being merely a reprint of a medical work published in Boston nearly fifty years ago.

WE would notify our readers that numbers 44, 45, and 46 of THE TRUTH SEEKER are exhausted, and no more of those numbers can be furnished. The new subscribers have come in so freely that they have used up all the extra copies we had printed of them. We have plenty of No. 47 left, and all new subscribers, trial or regular, can begin with that number. We still hope to receive lots of new names to our list. We second the suggestion made by some of our correspondents that the list of TRUTH SEEKER patrons ought to be doubled in the next sixty days. When our enemies would extinguish us let our friends come to our rescue and help us out. In no way can this be more effectually done than in adding largely to the number of patrons of our paper.

THE pious and saintly Anthony Comstock finds very congenial coadjutors in the Christian and lawless Texan mob which, by subterfuge and falsehood, induced the benevolent Dr. Russell to leave his home late at night to visit a person in distress, and when they had him at a distance from his dwelling, stripped him of his clothing and beat him upon his naked flesh until it was reduced to a mere jelly. They performed this Christian deed not because the Doctor was guilty of any impropriety or had done aught that was wrong, for they declared to him that his life among them had been without fault, but they beat him within an inch of his life because he doubted the truth of the Christian religion and believed in nature rather than supernaturalism. Comstock is just such a Northern Christian Ku Klux. If he would not beat with gads and raw-hides he quite as cruelly applies the rigor of his own statutes and deprives worthy men of their time, their freedom, and their property. He is vindictive and cruel and delights in making his power felt and in inciting terror in his victims. The Christian Ku Klux of Belton county ought to elect Anthony Comstock an honorary member of their pious order. He is worthy of them. If they apply the lash and the thong, he applies odium, fines, and imprisonment. If they deprive of life, he deprives of liberty. There is a natural affinity between them. Comstock is virtually a Ku Klux and his Christian clique is a Ku Klux Klan.

AN AWKWARD mistake occurred in our main article last week. Near the close of the fourth paragraph from the end we meant to have said, "Heywood, Jones, and ourselves," but the printers made us say "Heywood, Jesus, and ourselves." We have no objection to speaking of Jesus when necessary, but in this case we meant to say Jones, meaning E. W. Jones, of Ashland, Mass., who is another of St. Anthony's unfortunate victims. Having to be absent on Comstock business, we did not have a chance to see the proof, and thus Jesus went to our readers and Jones was compelled to remain in the background.

THE RANDOLPH LIBERAL MEETING.—Attention is called to the Ratification Meeting of the Rochester Liberal League Platform that is to be held at Randolph, Cattaraugus Co., on Dec. 8 and 9. We have promised to be there if we are not in prison. We feel great hopes that the prison may not be our doom for some time yet, and we hope to meet a goodly number of our friends at that meeting. We will be very sure to have some petitions with us, for signatures and distribution, calling for the repeal of the unconstitutional and unjust laws, which by the intriguing industry of a bigoted and fanatical agent of the failing cause of ecclesiasticism, and the oversight of those who were elected to be law-makers for the country have found a place temporarily upon the pages of our National Statute Book. Let there be a good turn out at Randolph.

THE remarks of some of our Christian neighbors since our arrest have reached our ears. Some have said, "Served him right," "He ought not to be allowed to publish such a paper," "He ought not to be suffered to live." In speaking of the bail required of us they said, "It is too small." "It ought to have been $5,000, or more than he would be able to furnish, so he would be compelled to go to prison." This is the Christian spirit of New York. Is the Kingdom of Heaven composed of such?

"THE PRIEST IN ABSOLUTION."—We are sending out thousands of this No. 1. of the "Holy Cross" Series, and it is attracting great attention. Let those who wish a copy send in their orders early. Price 25 cents. Other numbers of the "Holy Cross" series will be brought out as soon as possible.

"PAINE VINDICATED."—We have in pamphlet form the attacks of the "New York Observer" on Thomas Paine, and Col. Ingersoll's replies. The First Attack and the First Reply, 10 cents a copy or 75 cents per dozen. Both the First and Second Attack and Replies, fifteen cents a copy, or $1.00 per dozen, postage included. Ours is the only edition published containing the "Observer's" attacks. Thousands of this vindication of Thomas Paine should be placed in the hands of the people.

We return our most sincere thanks to the kind friends who have so promptly come to our relief and who have shown so much sympathy in our favor and for the liberality evinced in our behalf. It is a great consolation to know that we have warm friends in all parts of the country and it gives us the assurance that despite the failings we doubtless have, on the main issue we are correct, and that we are sustained by men and women as upright and honorable as can be found in this or any other country. We can give in this issue but a part of the sympathetic letters we have received. We again thank all our kind friends. The publication of pledges and donations will be continued in our next.

Words are inadequate to express the gratitude of our heart for the kindness and sympathy manifested by our numerous friends in all parts of the country. Several times, despite our efforts to the contrary, tears have gushed from our eyes and gratitude palpitated our breast in view of the kind professions of sympathy and material aid from those who repose unflinching confidence in us and feel the needs of the case. We shall never forget the esteemed friends who have so promptly come to our aid. We have not time to write letters of thanks to them all, but wish them to accept our thanks through these columns.

We have received many kind letters which we have not room to publish this week, but will give another installment in our next.

We have had to use considerable money already in feeing counsel and meeting the expense of getting up thousands of petitions and sending them over the entire country. More money will have to be used but we shall not spend a dollar amiss. We do not like to beg nor ask our friends to be even generous to us, but every dollar sent to us shall be wisely and prudently employed.

Friends with heartfelt gratitude again we thank you.

Letters of Sympathy.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22, 1877.

OUR DEAR FRIEND: A meeting was advertised by the progressive Spiritualists to discuss your case this morning, and we attended; also Mr. Rice and H. Hollister. The attendance was not large, but the friends of Liberty were in earnest, and Judge Wolf, Judge Case and Prof. Wilcox made stirring speeches. The meeting, with seemingly one exception, were in favor of working for the repeal of the law before your case should come to trial. Judge Case wished you had knocked Comstock down before allowing him to seize your property, claiming the seizure a violation of law. He defended the law in case of real obscenity, but thought your case a misconstruction of law. All were down on the meanness of the decoy, and said Comstock himself was liable to indictment for procuring such matter to be sent through the mail, were it proved to be obscene. They favored your commencing suit against Comstock. A Committee of five were nominated to draft resolutions to confer with other Liberal societies to memorialize Congress, &c. To us the meeting was deeply interesting. It adjourned to meet at the Continental Hotel, Tuesday night, to receive the report of the Committee. We did not receive your paper yesterday and are anxious to learn of the results of the preliminary examination on Wednesday. Has your paper been stopped? Prof. Wilcox, from your city, said he took no stock in you, was a church man, but considered the law unconstitutional—could not enforce morality by the enactment of law. All he said was well said, and to the point, excepting his boast of his own clean record. He disclaimed any association with V. Woodhull or sympathy with her, further than sympathy for the unjust persecution by the same Comstock. He knew nothing of the testimony at the Beecher trial, he never read it, &c. Thinking a synopsis of the meeting would interest you, I pen this hasty line. I see from the papers Bob Ingersoll declines a foreign mission, preferring to practice law in this city; so I suppose he is here. May you get through all right! Mrs. Ricesays you will attain notoriety at least. I suppose you have correspondents here and may get a more extended account of the meeting. Judge Wolf, I think it was, said he had a letter from you. Ever your friend, particularly in misfortune,

MRS. M. A. B.

WACONDA, KAN., Nov. 21, 1877.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, My Dear Sir: Here-with you will find five dollars to help you in the defense of my principles. I am a poor man, but I have expected this from the moment I read the article complained of and made up my mind to give something to support the coming war for opinion's sake, and if more is needed I shall try again to help you. I know the nation is on the verge of anarchy, and that Infidels will be targets for orthodox sportsmen. I know also that victory will rest on the Liberal head, though it may be at the price of blood.

GEORGE W. CHAPMAN, M.D.

STREATOR, ILL., Nov. 23, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Friend: Enclosed please find P. O. money order for Five Dollars. It is to help to pay costs in your prospective prosecution, should it be needed. Please acknowledge its receipt in your next issue. At all events go ahead as you have done, and lash the Philistines, like Samson, with the jaw-bone of their Ass. The Liberals here feel, as you intimate, that this cause is not wholly yours, but the cause of the whole people to the latest generation.

Our cause is progressing here, and as it would seem everywhere. Let us persevere, though we meet with opposition. The prize we seek—freedom of thought and speech—is of priceless value. They who seek to deprive us of this are our worst enemies, the enemies of science, of truth, of liberty, for these gone, we are slaves indeed. And for what? To gratify the brutal passions of the ignorant and idle few who would fatten at the expense of those whose labors bring to light whatever has a tendency to the enlightenment and civilization of the world. Let THE TRUTH SEEKER continue as it has done, to use its best influence in this direction.

Although mine don't come to hand regularly, somebody gets it, and it may do good, after all. I do not suspect the P. M., for I believe it comes to Streator.

Should the prosecution go on, you may look for a small benefit from me from time to time to aid in helping you out. Hope your many friends—for according to the paper you have many—will do as much for you. If so, you will come out all right, in spite of the opposition of the Lord's servants.

Respectfully,
W. MARTIN BRONSON.

BOSTON, Nov. 24, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Esq., My Dear Sir: I wish to express to you my warm sympathy in your present "tribulation." Perhaps I should say, "Blessed are you when men do persecute you," for the freedom you claim and exercise to speak your mind on great subjects of human interest. But either way, whether I should sorrow for you or rejoice. I do most heartily wish I were able to be of some pecuniary assistance to you at this present time. I cannot help you now even ever so little; but you may need friendly aid for some while yet, and I may bye and bye be in a way to offer some. I hope to be and I shall then most heartily do all I can.

I have not read the works on which you have been arrested, but I am sure you are not capable of writing anything which a fair minded jury can well interpret as obscene, or—I was going to say damaging to public virtue; but I have no doubt you have written that which is damaging to what your judges may have esteemed as "virtue," namely, a belief in some of the errors and religious superstitions of the day. But still, I have a faith that they will see that that is your right, and that they must meet you with sound reasons, and not by shutting you in a jail. Till I can do better, you have my sincere regards and good wishes.

S. H. MORSE.

KNIGHTSTOWN, IND., Nov. 22, 1877.

BRO. BENNETT: We, the undersigned, hearing of your arrest and prosecution by that so-called Christian, Anthony Comstock, donate the amount set opposite our names for the purpose of aiding you in your defense and in paying your fine if one be imposed. We are not surprised that this has happened from the fact that Comstock, and hundreds and thousands of others, entertain the same feelings and doctrines as their cruel and superstitious ancestors did hundreds of years ago, and if they had the power would bring into use the same instruments of torture used by them then for the purpose of making hypocrites of honest men. We therefore appeal to every lover of liberty, man, woman or child, in the United States—yes, in the world—to make this not your fight, but theirs, and to aid in the promulgation of truth and common sense and in the dispelling of ignorance and superstition, which feed and clothe the priests and preachers of to-day. Let this be the stepping-stone in the fight for truth and freedom. Let Liberal clubs and societies be formed in every city, village and hamlet. Let us all put our shoulders to the wheel of progression and roll it to the four quarters of the globe. Let us show these hypocritical persecutors that these outrages can not be committed with impunity—show them that the people are throwing off the robe of darkness that has enshrouded and held them down for years and are stepping out into the light of justice and truth, ready to battle for its advancement. JESSE SWAIN, $5.00; JOSEPH WOODS, $5.00; J. M. WOODS, $1.00; J. H. MCGUFFIN, $1.00.

The following persons not feeling able to subscribe money, sign their names to show their approval of your course: William Lewis, Henry Schaffer, W. J. Welborn, L. V. Winston, John Caseley, John T. Caseley, Jesse Wysong, John Wysong, Peter Maithre, Moses Heller.

WILMINGTON, O., Nov. 22, 1877.

DEAR D. M.: On my arrival at this point last night, I learned of your arrest by Comstock, and although not taken wholly by surprise, yet I must say I was not a little agitated over the news. Well, I suppose it is but the beginning of a great fight. We shall have to fight for our civil liberties again, let the cost be what it may. Now is the time for Liberals to show their hands by rallying to your support. If they do not do this much, it will prove to my mind that Liberalism is all talk with by far too large a portion of that class who call themselves Freethinkers. But I hope that you will have a host of supporters and that you will come out more than victorious.

Yours truly, W. S. BELL.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 24, 1877.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Friend: Enclosed I hand you check for seven dollars. Please apply two dollars to a renewal of my subscription to the paper for one year from Jan. 1, 1878 (my present subscription being paid up to that date), and five dollars please accept as my mite in defense of the ever-glorious cause of human liberty, now freshly imperiled by the outrage on you by the representatives of bigotry, intolerance, and persecution. Language, to be discreet and decent, fails me in my attempt to vocalize the attempts of those self-styled Christians. That they are not only false to the pattern of their name but that they are reversing all that is attributed to him as excellencies, is a truth that is unquestioned; and the crimes that continue to be perpetrated in the name of the cause of Christianity are so frequent, flagrant, and so loudly applauded by the representatives of that system that the very name of Christianity is becoming a synonym for intolerance and persecution. As martyrdom ever, as yet, seems to be a necessity, in conformity with the law that there is no truth or progression except through suffering or death, let us hail this as the beginning of the end, for, "Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad." It seems as if fancied success had maddened the Comstock crew. That the suffering should fall on such a noble character as it seems destined to in this instance is a source of pain to your friends, but which to them will be obviated to some extent by the test which is making manifest that nobility, and which has its greatest and brightest illustration in the laying down of one's life in defense of the truth as it appears to one's self.

We pray that the cup, to its dregs, may be permitted to pass from you, but if not, let the world witness a grander sight than it is reported to have seen in the garden of Gethsemane, and I don't doubt but that it will, and that you will accept it cheerfully and not whiningly. Fraternally and truly yours,

RICHARD MATLOCK.

LE ROY, KANSAS.

Also, when needed, call on me for ten dollars.

Cheer up, noble Brother; though Comstock is raging;
Though judges and juries thy rights may assail;
A few campaigns more in the war thou art waging
Will cram all such Christians in Beelzebub's jail.

As ever, A. V. COFFIN.

Nov. 21, 1877.

MY DEAR BENNETT: So you are under fire—the "sacred fire"—of Saint Anthony, for the crime of sending through the mails two of your series of tracts—one theological, entitled "An Open Letter to Jesus Christ," written by yourself, and one a discussion of a curious question in natural history, "How Do Marsupial Animals Propagate their Kind?" written by A. B. Bradford. Sending these two tracts by mail to those who bought them has exposed you to the charge of blasphemy and obscenity. A member in full communion of the Presbyterian church read the "Open Letter" at my house some time ago, and found no fault with it except in the mere title, which he thought was injudicious because some people, seeing only that much, would think it irreverent. The scientific tract by Mr. Bradford I read to a company of ladies, who evinced no emotion and no shamefacedness. But they were intelligent and pure women, who would read and speak of a question like this in natural history as they would discuss the modus propagandi of plants and trees in the science of botany.

Comstock reminds me of the story of an old maid who lived in an obscure neighborhood, and late in her youthful days learned that babies were not found in onion-beds in the garden, nor in doctor's saddle-bags, but came into existence in a different way. She was so squeamish, like Comstock, that she forebore to call her immediate ancestor by the name of "father," because the word implied the wicked idea that he had had once on a time sexual intercourse with her own dear mother, and that she herself was the result of such abominable doings.

But there is a wide difference between modesty and prudishness. The late Rev. Frederick Robertson, of the Church of England, in a certain essay published among his works, speaks of cases where nothing but circumstances, and not the heart, prevented the commission of sin. He then goes on to say: "But that would convict many a prude and many a sanctimonious thing who holds up his immaculate hands in pious astonishment at that which he would gladly do, if he dared. Nay, I do believe that a secret leaning towards the sin, and a secret feeling of provocation and jealousy towards those who have enjoyed what they have not, lies at the bottom of half the censorious zeal for morality which we have. I am nearly sure it is so with women in their virulence against their own sex; they feel malice, because they envy them. There is a marvelous touch of inspiration in 'Timons of Athens.' I think, a cutting down into the marrow of truth which is perfectly startling in its knowledge of human notes. I remember that, even as a boy it set me thinking." The passage occurs in scene 3d, Act 4.

Strike me the counterfeit matron,
It is her habit only that is honest,
Herself a bawd!

I knew of a bachelor Presbyterian minister whose piety, like that of the Young Men's Christian Association, runs badly at the nose. He is a weeping Jeremiah, a real Saint Anthony in the pulpit, but keeps obscene pictures in his trunk, and glazes over them often in private—thus committing fornication unnaturally in his heart. According to the Rev. Frederick Robertson, "this sanctimonious thing" would gladly do that which is pictured, if he dared.

My wife, who is the mother of seven children, all grown up, and who has circumnavigated the globe in travels, and who has a very keen eye in her head, and who has read Mr. Bradford's tract, said, when I read her the account of your arrest for circulating blasphemy and obscenity through the mails, that Comstock was a man that had two sides to his character, and could bear watching. Moral stench must be as grateful to his olfactories as the smell of carrion is to a buzzard, or he would not be nosing around in the back alleys of New York in search of it. I have nothing to say against Comstock for legally preventing obscene books and prints going through the mails to corrupt youth. The sexual feelings in young people are naturally strong enough, heaven knows, without being stimulated by such things; and he who does so for the sake of gain is a monster of iniquity who should never see the light except through the grated window of a prison. But books on physiology, treating the whole subject of sexuality in a scientific way, should be put into the hands of youth as soon as they reach the years of puberty, for only when they are forewarned by knowledge of all that is natural in sex, are they forearmed against temptation when it arises. So true is this, that the British Government in its common school system puts into the hands of girls and boys in their teens such books as "Lessons in Elementary Physiology," by Huxley, and Carpenter's "Human Physiology," in which, and other similar works, the whole history of the ovum from the time it leaves its bed down to the birth as a human being, is not only given didactically and esoterically, but the scholars are examined on it thoroughly in their classes. I have no doubt, when sufficient time is afforded to test this policy of the educators and philanthropists of England, its wisdom will be seen in the drying up of one great source of crime and misery. I would send you some extracts from these school books to show how plain-spoken the authors are as scientific men and instructors of youth, but if I did, and Comstock should see them, I am afraid he would faint so dead that he would not recover in a week. If a discussion of the way the epossums propagate their kind, vexes his pious soul to such an extent that he persecutes you, even for sending it through the mails to your patrons who order it, what would he do if he saw one of these English school-books, in which is described the whole process, so far as it is understood, of propagating human beings from beginning to end? It would be the last of Comstock.

While I am writing this you are standing before the tribunal which is asked to punish you by fine, imprisonment, or both. I firmly believe that the judge, unless he belongs to the same school as Comstock, will, when he reads the two procuring causes of the arrest, dismiss the case with a severe rebuke to the ridiculous and super-servicable zeal of the prosecutor. But if the case goes to trial, if you are convicted, it will be time for the like of me either to emigrate to a more civilized country, or else to gird up their loins for a battle in which no quarter will be given until we reach the ground of the Constitution, and make this a secular government, and not the mere agent of a rotten church for putting down all freedom of the press and of speech. I have long been laboring in my humble way, with Mr. Abbot, in the columns of the Index, to arouse the people of this country, and get those who are free to organize and defend themselves against the Jesuitical designs of the Protestant church. But our words have seemed to them as idle tales, and they believed them not. If, however, in the language of Caiaphas in a similar case, it is expedient that one die for the people; if this prosecution of you to the bitter end is absolutely necessary to marshal the free men of this country into battle array, the war being a moral one, I hope you will be convicted and go to prison.

Sincerely your friend and well-wisher.

AMICUS.

POLK PATCH, IND., Nov. 22, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am sorry to learn that you have at last fallen into the clutches of that miscreant, Comstock.

As you say, judging from precedents, your case is a bad one; but let us hope for the best. I am a poor man, supporting a large family on a small salary, yet I would think myself remiss in my duty did I not aid you in your trouble. Set me down for $1.00 and more if necessary.

Yours for justice,

T. A. CAPEHART.

BRONSON, MICH., Nov. 24, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am very sorry to learn that you have been Comstocked, and will send my mite if it becomes necessary.

Yours,

J. FRANCIS RUGGLES.

DAVENPORT, IOWA, Nov. 23, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Seeing that you have fallen into the hands of our orthodox enemies, I consider it my duty to help you, and hope other Liberals will feel the same way. Enclosed find a draft for $10.00.

Yours,

R. MCINTOSH.

OSCEOLA, IOWA, Nov. 21, 1877.

SIR: Will send you, about the last of the week, all the funds I can make up among the Liberals here. Hoping that others are doing the same for you, I am

Yours truly, J. G. WATTS.

MUNGERVILLE, MICH., Nov. 19, 1877.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: It is with sad regret I learn of your arrest upon the charge of obscenity and blasphemy. This is simply a put-up job and no mistake, and could you lift the veil and penetrate the soul of things, you would see the priests in unholy conclave have hatched this scheme. Catholics have hissed through their shut teeth the venom boiling within for your exposure of their confessionals. And the Protestant priests do the same for the exposure in print and debates of so many brethren of the cloth. As for obscenity, it is as false as the sea is deep. If the scientific elucidation of the propagation of marsupials is obscene, then every work on anatomy, physiology, and zoology is obscene. Professor Agassiz on Zoology, from p. 1867 onward must be obscene in explanation of gambiarons and assirarous production, with illustrations, and his lectures to classes are sent by mail to thousands. Honi soit qui mal y pense. Evil be to him who evil thinks. There is no legal definition of obscenity. It may take as many forms as Proteus had shapes. Insist in your defense on a legal definition and its penalty, the same as theft or larceny and their penalties. Ah! whatever it is it must not be circulated through the mails. This is the head and front of your offending, and that by a craven-souled decoy. You might have obscenity enough in Science Hall to taint ten miles square of atmosphere and all right, especially if licensed. How many obscene places, characters, and actions in your city—amplified yoni and pole, well illuminated—red curtains—red lights—and passion-fires in the background burning up and wasting human life, and Comstock smells no bad odor there! He probably washes and perfumes his fingers before he smells. Bahl! If I believed in devils, a la Church, I would say Beelzebub had sent his best subordinate on the lowest, meanest, most contemptible, dishonorable and devilish mission a devil could concoct; one that a half-way decent devil ought to be thoroughly ashamed of.

And blasphemy! The Church will have to define that, and there they will agree about as well as on the character and number of gods. Webster defines blasphemy as "an indignity offered to God by words or writings; reproachful, contemptuous, or irreverent words uttered impiously against Jehovah." Your "Open letter to Jesus Christ" was not to God as the great positive mind of the Universe. As in the account given in the Gospels he affirms, "My father is greater than I," and "I will pray unto my father," etc., and he "could not do many mighty works there because of their unbelief," proving positively that he was not God but a fellow-man, subject to favorable conditions for success but not master of conditions, as his God was supposed to be. Bennett, defend your own case. You are capable of it. Their object is to stop your mouth, paper, and publications, as they see you are throwing them off like leaves of autumn and scattering them from Maine to California. They are afraid of you and your influence, and this is the 19th century Inquisition to snuff you out. Strike with your might, and this hemisphere will feel your blows. When the lion is boarded in his den with cowardly and unholy hands, then should come the tug of war; then the world should hear him roar. The platform of the Rochester Convention is what our nation ought to stand on to-day. Pay not much regard to legal quibbles, but plant yourself on simple justice and the rights of man and you will triumph.

If you need, call on me for five dollars.

Yours for truth and justice.

D. HIGBIE, M. D.

CAMBRIDGE, ILL., Nov. 20, 1877.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have just received THE TRUTH SEEKER containing notice of your arrest for expressing your opinions too freely to suit the old hunk. It is an outrage on any civilization—even a Christian one. I cannot express my opinion about it and do the subject justice, so I simply enclose a postal order for three dollars, two dollars for subscription for 1878 and one dollar to help you along in this time of need, and if it comes to the worst and bursts you up, you are welcome to it all. Hoping others may render assistance according to their ability, I remain

Fraternally yours, J. A. HART.

BELLEVUE, IOWA, Nov. 19, 1877.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, I see that you are arrested for publishing your honest opinions, and if we have to help you out, you may put me down for five dollars anyhow. I am a poor man, but I cannot stand to see such doings as that. I was a soldier in the late war and I am ready to go again to defend my honest rights if I have to. Go on, Brother Bennett, I think that you can raise a large army if it is necessary. Yours most truly, PATRICK PRANDY.

Mrs. D., of Vineland, N. J., writing to a friend in this city, says: I learn from the last TRUTH SEEKER that Mr. Bennett has been arrested by Comstock. The question arises,—Is there any freedom of thought under our Government? We have a despotism more despicable than the Old World can produce. But every martyrdom brings the end nearer.

(TELEGRAPH DISPATCH.)

CENTRAL CITY, COLO., Nov. 23, 1877.

AM collecting. Will remit tomorrow at least fifty dollars. Cheer up. F. KAUSE.

NEW ORLEANS, Nov. 20, 1877.

MY DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I was not more surprised than disgusted when on opening my paper this morning I found the statement of your arrest by that degeneration of orthodoxy, Anthony Comstock. When in New York a man of no mean scientific attainments told me when we were conversing together in regard to the habits of the marsupials that when an article appeared a year or more ago in the Popular Science Monthly, he told a friend certain facts in regard to these animals (the opossum), and this friend stated the same to some of the P. S. Monthly editors, whereupon they wrote to my acquaintance for his facts. Being of rather a facetious nature, he sent them, but told them at the time they would not dare publish them, for Anthony Comstock lay in wait for arresting men who sent obscene matter through the mail. Notwithstanding this was a fact vouched for by more than one party, "that in the marsupials, nature made her first effort toward a womb," it was not given, for the bare facts require plain words; and of course people who teach their daughters that they came out of rose-bushes and cabbage-beds, or are found in hollow stumps, would find facts like these a little too rough. Little did I think that any living man could ever suffer from such statements; least of all that you would. It only needs a few more years, and continued success of Mr. Comstock, before Freethinkers will again be tried by torch or rack as of old. Sympathy is a cheap commodity, and with violence on one side and fraud and injustice on the other, business here is below par. I assure you, nevertheless, we are united in a common cause. Your arrest to-day may only precede mine to-morrow, for if I do not express the sentiments in words, I feel as keenly the same hate and contempt for cowardly Anthony that fires Ingersoll.

You may count on my aid; for what I can do I will do. Christians in their zeal for Jesus, spare neither age nor sex. And if one of my ancestors died at the stake in England, she has at least one descendant who would rather die the same than yield her sacred convictions to a truckling, time-serving policy. So long as ignorance furnishes the thread for vice to weave her net, it will never lack for victims.

We who shall live to see the close of the nineteenth century will see stirring times.

I never did swear in my life, but I did feel this morning as if a good fit of it would make me feel better. I would have made the house ring with it. Oh, if I only could inspire others to come out and openly denounce the hydra-headed devil of Christianity, I would freely die to do so. Yours fraternally, Mrs. E. L. S.

233 SECOND ST., MEMPHIS, Nov. 19, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: THE TRUTH SEEKER just tells me the story of your arrest. God help and pity you, for the Christians will not! The best I can do for you is to send you subscribers, and work for you, and this I shall do to the utmost in my power. I ask no commission except an inspiration from Omnipotent Wisdom to fight a death-battle with bigoted superstition. I feel such a resentment now at this Inquisitorial injustice done you that I would like to be the cholera or plague to spread myself and weed humanity of this Christian "Canada thistle." Find enclosed in this thirteen dollars and list of subscribers Yours through the life-struggle.

MARY J. HOLMES.

PARIS, ILL., Nov. 19, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: To-day I am in receipt of your last issue, giving full account of your arrest and the cause therefor. Mr. Anthony Comstock is a Christian, the Judge before whom you are to be tried is a Christian, the law under which you are prosecuted is a Christian law, the members of the Y. M. C. A., who have plotted this thing to crush you out, are Christians. Yes, they are all Christians. Such is "Christian charity." You need hope for no mercy. Enclosed you will please find P. O. order for five dollars. Were I able I would gladly send more. Fearing the worst results, knowing in whose clutches you are, I remain

Ever your friend, CHAS. B.

P. S. Nov. 20.—I have held my letter until this morning and have been able to collect donations for you, amounting to $15.50. O. B.

[ANOTHER FROM THE SAME.]

PARIS, ILL., Nov. 20, 1877.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Since sending you the P. O. order for $15.50 at noon to-day I have received $15.00 more for you as donations, which I forward immediately by P. O. order which I enclose.

Ten dollars of this is sent by Uncle Joe Bradbury and five dollars by his wife, Sarah Bradbury.

Uncle Joe gave this so cheerfully that he would not even allow me to pay for the order. All I have sent you has been given in the same spirit, which to you is a proof that you have some poor friends, though far away, who can never forget you.

I think that before the week is ended I shall be able to send you one or two more small donations. Please acknowledge receipt of this in your paper, if you are allowed to issue it again, so they may know I have done my duty. Be of good cheer, for "Truth is mighty and will prevail" eventually.

Ever your friend, CHAS. B.

MARENGO, N. Y., Nov. 21, 1877.

MR. BENNETT, Very Dear Sir: I subscribed for your noble paper and it pleases me, it is so outspoken—just what the world needs at this time. I think I can get you some subscribers in this place. Mine is the only copy that comes to this office as yet. There are a few Liberals in this neighborhood. I showed them the account of your arrest. Every man is very anxious to help you in this noble work and will contribute for your defense. You have written one letter that has knocked the wind all out of Christianity and that's what's the matter. I am a poor horse-shoer but I will do all I can to help you. I cannot state the amount we will send, but whatever it will be we will get it there in time. Very truly yours,

CHARLES C. CHASE.

ST. JOHN'S, MICH., Nov. 20, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Enclosed you have one dollar with which to help feed God's wolves. Should you come to trial I will enlarge the contribution. M. BABCOCK.

SOUTH WOLFESBORO, N. H., Nov. 21, 1877.

DEAR BRO. BENNETT: I notice by the last TRUTH SEEKER that you have fallen into the hands of the Christians, and we know what it means; it is persecution to the death if possible, at least means bleeding as far as the law and Christ's example will let them go.

I feel that you will need every dollar you can lay hands on, and as I am not able to help you much I enclose one subscription for your paper for the year 1878 and wish I could make it more. Yours truly,

CLARENCE JOHNSON.

125 BAYVIEW ST., MILWAUKEE, Nov. 20, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I had the pleasure of sending you, a short time since, the names of a few trial subscribers which exhausted my credit with you, and as I intend to try to make some of them future patrons of the paper and do not like to send small sums of money by mail, I have thought it well to have a credit with you, so that when any of them are disposed to renew, I could apprise you of it by postal card with slight expense and no risk of remittance. I had therefore resolved to send you a postal order, and was debating with myself whether it should be for five or for ten dollars, when I yesterday got the last number of your paper with the news of your arrest, and made up my mind at once that neither amount was adequate. Please place half of the enclosed twenty dollars to my credit, to be taken in subscriptions, books, etc., and accept the balance as my good-will offering to assist you in your present strait into which you have fallen by your zeal for truth and human progress and welfare. You ought to have, and I hope will receive, the active sympathy and substantial material aid of every lover of Free thought who has red blood in his veins. Your subscription list ought to be doubled at once. It shall not be my fault if it is not.

ALMOND OWEN.

OFFICE OF THE NEWMAN INDEPENDENT, }
NEWMAN, ILLINOIS, Nov. 20, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have just received the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and feel very indignant at the action of the infamous Comstock; but as sympathy will do you no good at this time, and as money will render you more "value received," I enclose a dollar to renew my subscription. Am "hard up" at present, but if worst comes to worst I will furnish you with a little more sympathy of the same kind. Bro. O. H. Cappock and I have agreed to raise five dollars and send to you if Comstock continues his malicious prosecution.

C. V. WALLS.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., Nov. 20, 1877.

MY DEAR BENNETT: I cannot comprehend your arrest. Our Constitution plainly assures us that every citizen may speak and write his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of the right, and no law shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or the press. In all criminal prosecutions and actions for libel, the truth may be given in evidence to the jury, and if it shall appear that the matter charged as libelous is true, but was published for motives, the party shall be acquitted or exonerated. It seems as if Comstock represents Jesus Christ. Make him prove it. Set me down for two dollars.

AUGUST BUESING.

KNIGHTSTOWN, IND., Nov. 19, 1877.

MR. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Enclosed please find $10 to pay cost of persecutions; also $2 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1878; and if this is not my share in the matter, I have more for you. Please acknowledge the receipt, so I may have the satisfaction of knowing you have received it. Yours truly,

JOS. WOODS.

ASHBY'S MILLS, IND., Nov. 19, 1877.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have just received THE TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 17th, and am very sorry to hear that you are to be put to trouble and expense by the meddlesome Comstock. I herewith enclose to you the sum of ten dollars, which you will please accept as a gift from

J. H. GRANTHAM.

LINDSAY, ONT., Nov. 20, 1877.

MY DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I regret to learn by your paper received last evening, that that God-fearing detective has at last laid his hand on you. It is very proper to prevent, if possible, the circulation of obscene literature—for such can be of no use to Free thought; and while I should not select the accused tracts as suitable reading for liberal thinkers, or such as would impress outsiders in favor of our cause, yet there is nothing, in my opinion, half so bad in those, or in anything else you have published, as the lascivious, filthy and disgusting details to be found in the so-called Holy Bible, dictated by a Supreme Power "for the edification of the poor in heart," and which deluded priests and their agents are so anxious to spread to the remotest corners of the earth.

Detective Comstock is, I fear, more of a religious fanatic—a tool for an intolerant class of the clergy—than one who is prompted to action by a disgust for that which is truly obscene. Power in his hands is dangerous; and as the greatest crimes have been committed in the name of Liberty, the greatest oppression may follow from the intolerant action of such a special agent as Mr. Comstock.

Your Government on the whole is very good, but the guarantees for liberty in the United States are not yet what they ought to be.

Please accept enclosed P. O. order for ten dollars for your defense fund.

Yours very truly, WM. McDONNELL.

ANGOLA, IND., Nov. 20, 1877.

Well, truly, it has "come at last," and now is the time for the Liberal portion of American citizens to work. In the month of September last I called upon Mr. Bennett at his office, and was readily convinced that he was working for the good of the Liberal cause, and not for the aggrandizement of himself and family. The arrests of those who dare to express an honest conviction, not in harmony with Christianity, are becoming alarmingly frequent. And yet to-day I listened to something claiming to be a temperance lecture. The lady, in the course of her lecture, made the statement that we were living in a land of liberty, where all were free, "both Christian and pagan" alike. She dwelt somewhat upon the freedom of the press. She boasted of being a Christian; and several times during her lecture she showed the whites of her eyes and raised her hands clasped together with a very sanctimonious air, but did not mention the fact that to-day Christians are persecuting to the bitter end those who dare express an honest opinion in "this land of freedom." To be good and to be a Christian are two things entirely different; and I, for one, frankly admit that, in view of the shameful outrages committed by Christians for hundreds of years down to the present day, I would be ashamed to boast of bearing the name.

Friends of freedom, lovers of liberty! now is the time to work—when a leading light in the grand and glorious cause of freedom has been betrayed into the hands of scheming and cruel Christians. It is time to be up and doing, for they are never guilty of showing mercy to their victims. I hope every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER will lend a helping hand to carry our brother through this time of trial. It is hard times, and all feel it more or less; but every person that has a home and something to eat can do something in this emergency. Let us dispense with that new dress or hat or piece of furniture we had thought of purchasing, at least for the present, and contribute a little something to help our brother.

Brother Bennett will find enclosed an order for five dollars, from his friends and the friends of freedom,
SALLIE J. MINER.
MILO MINER.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Nov. 19, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: I see by your article in the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER that the delectable Comstock is after you. I have not language to express the supreme contempt that I have for him and those who back him. I think every Spiritualist and Liberal in the country ought to consider it their case as much as it is yours, and furnish the necessary means to defend it. It is hard times with me as with most others. I will try to do what I can in case you have to stand a trial. You can put me down for twenty-five dollars.

Fraternally yours, A. H. FRANK.

FOXBURG, PENN., Nov. 20, 1877.

MR. BENNETT, Dear Friend: I read the article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of your arrest. This interfering with liberty and truth I consider the outrage of outrages, and if necessary draw on me for fifty dollars and keep up your work with firmness. This agitation will do the business. Yours very truly, G. C. FINK.

LUNENBURG, MASS., Nov. 10, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hasten to endorse the communication of Messrs. Henderson & Brown in THE TRUTH SEEKER of last week, upon the subject of your arrest and approaching trial. You are indeed but the standard-bearer of the Liberals of America. Your cause is our cause. You are entitled to our sympathy and our aid; and may rely, to a certain extent, upon me for both. To begin with, you may set me down for $25; but, should the occasion require it, I can spare as much more, or even a greater amount for I shall feel that in helping you I help not only myself, but the cherished cause of Free thought.

Fraternally yours, ROBT. DAVIS.

LIVERPOOL, N. Y., Nov. 23, 1877.

MOST RESPECTED FRIEND, D. M. BENNETT: I gave away volume first of THE TRUTH SEEKER tract collection, and enclosed please find seventy-five cents for another. If you have got volume fourth, you may send it, and I will remit by mail. I want the volume which has Bob Ingersoll's lectures, which is volume one.

Well, my dear friend, since I have learned of your misfortune of being arrested for printing matter as much above what is truly obscene as heaven is above hell, my every moment nearly is seemingly occupied in thoughts of you. I am ashamed that in an age of the world where we talk with lightning and ride by steam, a man must be prohibited from directing his prayers to Christ through the medium of the pen. What folly, what ignorance, what contempt! May every Bible be stricken from the land, and the man who dares utter it an inspired work—the most corrupted work handed down from the barbarous past—be hung to a lamp post, and the liberty of man, woman and child be written in golden letters in the skies! So, with my dearest wishes, I am ever your friend.

FRANK M. TERRY.

WHITEHALL, N. Y., Nov. 21, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I see by your paper that the bloodhound Comstock has gobbled you. Now, it is my opinion he has got his foot in it, because the Liberals of this country will not always be silent and submit to the whims and fancies of the ignorant, bigoted votaries of superstition; there will be such a cry of indignation from the Liberals of this country that the government will conclude they had better call in that dog and take off his collar and turn him out to grass. I hope you will be able to secure the services of Col. R. G. Ingersoll to defend you in your approaching trial. I think he could make it hot for them, and bring you through all right. I am not rich, but I have ten dollars that I can spare to see you through, if necessary. Hoping you may get through without a scratch, and live many years laboring to free mankind from bondage and priestcraft.

I am truly yours,

A. J. CULVER.

PASSAIC, N. J., Nov. 24, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Esq., Dear sir: Had I seen your pamphlet which seems to be so displeasing to the "great" Mr. Comstock, I might not agree with its every word—but at least I would be just as earnestly opposed to any abridgment of the right of free speech, on all religious questions.

I trust you will get through your present trouble successfully.

Yours respectfully,

F. A. ANGELL.

KNOXVILLE, ILL., Nov. 21, 1877.

BELOVED FRIEND: I have made efforts to get the money I owe you and send you. I only succeeded in getting $2.00 which are herein enclosed. I need them myself. But what matters it if I have to live on water and bread a week if I thereby do my duty to you. I have this fall lost all my money for this year's work through Christian knaves and bigots. I have felt the spirit of persecution and know what it is. O that the liberals would see their danger and sustain you!

The laws in my native country (Sweden) are, I think, in publishing matters, more liberal than in the boasted America, as any one can see by reading the songs of the great poet (anti-Christian) Bellman, as well as the late edition Wadman.

Your true friend,

EVALD O. HAMMAR.

LINESVILLE, PA., Nov. 24, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: With a feeling of indignation and sorrow I learn through THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 17th inst., of your arrest. My heart goes out to you $1.00 worth which I the bard of herewith enclose.

Liberals of the United States! shall we sit like so many galley slaves until we are bound hand and foot? If we can do nothing else, we can raise at least our munny protest against such damnable tyranny. Let no Liberal fail to do his whole duty in this hour.

Friend Bennett: If I had the power ascribed to the orthodox God for just one minute Anthony Comstock would never persecute nor prosecute another Freethinker. Hoping more in your behalf than reason really sanctions, I am fervently yours,

G. W. BALDWIN.

The Voice of the Press.

Down With the Inquisition.

D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, a liberal paper published in New York, has been arrested by Anthony Comstock on the charge of sending obscene and blasphemous matter through the U. S. mails. The objectionable publications are a small tract entitled, "An Open Letter to Jesus Christ," written by Bennett, and a pamphlet by Rev. A. B. Bradford, "How do Marsupials Propagate their Kind?" written expressly for the "Popular Science Monthly."

This arrest is an outrage of the most abominable kind, and being done under the sanction of the government by one of its officers is a disgrace to the whole people, and as such ought to meet their and their representatives' immediate condemnation. Mr. Bennett is an old man. He is guilty of no crime; he has wronged no person on earth; he has, as a publisher, with as little selfishness as possible, endeavored to enlighten his readers on theological and philosophical subjects; he has battled nobly for human rights, liberty of conscience and freedom of the press; and because he has, and has come to be a considerable power for good in the land, the Young Men's Christian Association in the person of Comstock has laid its vile hand upon him in an endeavor to crush him out, root and branch, as a warning to others that a free press will no longer be tolerated.

This case is to be tried before the U. S. District Court. From its decisions there can be no appeal. The judge is a pronounced Christian and prejudiced of course against Bennett. Judging by precedents the latter will be severely and unjustly dealt with. Though possessed of an established business and an unblemished reputation he is comparatively poor, and will no doubt find it difficult to raise sufficient funds to defend his case as it ought to be defended. We therefore ask for him the sympathy and aid of all Liberals who may chance to read this article. It is their battle he is now fighting, alone and against fearful odds, and the Liberals of this country are cowardly and ungrateful indeed if they do not come to his support. We are confident they will.

We will receive and promptly forward subscriptions of all amounts. Let those who can do no more subscribe for his paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, (price $2 per year) for six months or longer. It is a weekly eight-page sheet, and is just the paper for radical, plain-spoken, thinking people to read. We know of one old, clear-headed subscriber near here who prizes each copy above all his many other Liberal papers, and keeps the paper on file as something too precious to be lost or carelessly handled. Let some of our Liberal friends take hold of the matter and get up a club of a hundred subscribers or more. That will be practical sympathy and such a club can be raised by an active canvasser in a short time, under the circumstances, we believe. In addition to his business as journalist Mr. Bennett is a publisher of books, and a maker of them as well. His list of Liberal and scientific books is a large one, and embraces works which every Freethinker should have and read. He can be aided by the purchase of books which are worth the price he asks for them, and probably patronage of this kind will be more acceptable to him than mere charitable donations. A list of these books is published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and can be seen at this office.

Things have come to a pretty pass in this country if honorable men of unimpeachable character cannot publish their honest thoughts on religious and scientific subjects, couched in modest English, without danger of arrest and imprisonment, at the instigation of secret spies of the government, acting under orders from the Y. M. C. Association. But the arrest of Bennett is evidence that they cannot.

It is time for the so-called "Infidels" of the United States to band together, as have their enemies the so-called Christians, and protect themselves from outrage at the hands of a government that should but does not shield them from persecution by bigots for opinion's sake. Congress should have the matter forced upon its attention before it closes its present session. This is not the first, the second, nor the third time the horns, hoofs and tail of that devil the Y. M. C. Association has been shown through Anthony Comstock and his persecutions, but it ought to be the last.

Let every Liberal consider Bennett's cause his own cause and proffer him substantial aid if it can be afforded. As we said before we will forward all subscriptions sent to us, or they may be addressed direct as follows: D. M. Bennett, 141 Eighth Street, New York City. Winstead (Conn.) Press.

Mr. D. M. BENNETT, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, has just been arrested in New York for sending "obscene and blasphemous publications through the mails." Now we have not a word to say about the first count in this indictment, provided it is sincerely brought and not made a cover for secret persecution of freethought; we shall simply watch and wait to see what evidences and proofs of obscenity are adduced, before making any protest on that score, since we emphatically and unqualifiedly approve of stringent legislation against the circulation of really obscene literature. But the prosecution of any man for "blasphemy" in New York city is a matter which vially concerns all Liberals alike. It is a new instance of the reviving intolerance of orthodoxy, which Liberals are very reluctant as a general thing to confess; and it warrants the most jealous susceptibility touching the freedom of the press. "Blasphemy" is just as much a purely invented crime as Sabbath-breaking or witchcraft; and it behooves all who prize the liberties of freemen to defend the press against every attempt, open or disguised, to put a gag-law in operation against the free publication of religious opinions. The fact that the prosecution of Mr. Bennett originates with Anthony Comstock, a bigoted representative of the Young Men's Christian Association, who has also just arrested in Boston Mr. E. H. Heywood, editor of the Word on a charge of circulating "obscene literature," justifies no little suspicion as to the real object of those prosecutions. Believing as we do that Orthodoxy is mustering its forces and rapidly organizing itself for a renewed employment of legal means for the suppression of freethought, we believe also that Liberals owe it to themselves and to their cause to make the National Liberal League a mighty power for the defense of their freshly endangered rights; and such startling cases of reviving persecution as these of Dr. Russell and Mr. Bennett ought to rouse a new, deep, determined resolve on the part of all who love mental liberty to join hearts and hands in the enterprise of rallying a great national party to the support of the Rochester platform. Friends, are you not yet ready?—The Index.

On our third page we announce the arrest of Mr. D. M. Bennett, the Editor of the Liberal New York TRUTH SEEKER, on the charge of circulating "blasphemous and obscene literature." The charge was preferred by Anthony Comstock, who has made himself notorious by similar conduct towards other publishers, Mr. E. H. Heywood, for instance, and, if we are not mistaken, Messrs. Train and Lant, both of whom were sent to prison, the latter for eighteen months at hard labor, besides being fined $500. Perhaps a bigoted court and jury might call Mr. Bennett's paper blasphemous and obscene, but we do not; and it is a curious fact as showing the foolishness of his prosecution that, of the two articles complained of and which he published, one was written by Rev. A. B. Bradford, and was prepared originally for the Popular Science Monthly—the other article contained some of Mr. Bennett's views on religion.

To-day (the 21st) Mr. Bennett is to have his preliminary examination. He makes a manly and earnest appeal through his paper to the Liberals of the country to assist him in his trouble. We shall cheerfully publish his appeal in our next, and as we heartily sympathize with him and shall help him all in our power, we hope the Liberals in a body will come at once to his aid and prevent, if possible, the hard fate which we are afraid is in store for him. We have only time and room now to allude thus briefly to his most unjust prosecution, and to add that it is a strange state of things, indeed, in a professedly free country, if an aged and an honest man is to be sent to prison for publishing articles on science and religion! Let us say no more of the tyranny of despotic governments, if such gross injustice is to be allowed in the American Republic.—Boston Investigator.

D. M. Bennett, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER was arrested by Comstock Nov. 12th, for "sending obscene and blasphemous matter through the mail," two tracts—"An Open Letter to Jesus Christ," written by Mr. Bennett, and "How do Marsupials Propagate their Kind?" by Rev. A. B. Bradford, a scientific essay, originally written for the Popular Science Monthly. Mr. Bennett gave bail in $1500, to appear for examination to-day, Nov. 21st, but we go to press before hearing the result. The charge is groundless and absurd; for any one having an atom of honest sense, who has seen Mr. Bennett or felt the pure and elevated tone of the man in his voluminous writings, knows that "obscenity" is impossible in his nature or purpose. "An Open Letter to Jesus Christ" is as proper and more definite than a public prayer to him; if for nothing else one ought to be written to tell him what ineffable disgrace Comstock is bringing on the Christian name. Another of his recent victims is E. W. Jones of Ashland, Mass., who is held for trial for mailing Dr. Clark's "Medical Instructor," and has retained G. A. Somerby of Boston as counsel. We have not seen the book, but unhesitatingly say that if people wish to buy and read it, it is their natural right to do so, Comstock and "laws" to the contrary notwithstanding.—Princeton Word.

MORE OF COMSTOCK.—About one week ago Mr. D. M. Bennett, the Liberal publisher, and editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, was interfered with by Comstock, taken to court, made to give bonds for in $1,500 for surety of appearance at a higher tribunal. Comstock has been looking out for our friend for some time, of which the latter has been aware. But feeling "not guilty" he has kept right on. Brother Bennett can count on much sympathy and, we hope, material aid. This arresting business is a miserably one-sided thing, as we all too well know. Mr. Bennett is not meddled with on the score of "obscenity," but because his arguments set home a little too snugly. Religious superstition, ignorance, and hate die hard. In their dying kicks they seem to have no discrimination, and thus they have struck just the wrong person this time. We can offer congratulations and what influence we can wield.—Davis's Battle-Axe.

We learn that our friend and neighbor D. M. Bennett, of THE TRUTH SEEKER, has been arrested for sending "obscene and blasphemous" literature through the mail. Dr. Bennett, we venture to say, is not guilty, and his arrest is an outrage on free speech which will receive a tremendous rebuke.—The Revolution.

PRELUDE TO THE CONFLICT.

Seize! thou, brave heart the trumpet of Reform,
And through it give one long, electric blast,
To rouse the slumbering, like a thunder-storm.
And make the foes of Progress stand aghast!
The boldest utterances are needed now.
The heaviest blows, the most heroic deeds;
For, still infatuated, millions bow
To Superstition, with its palsying creeds;
And false Tradition holds them in its chains,
And hoar Authority their reason stays,
And blind Credulity its grasp retains.
And the dead Past the living Present sways;
Then, blow the trumpet! raise the standard high!

THE DOGMA OF INFALLIBILITY.

Human Infallibility, avant!
The claim is impious wherever made;
Whether by Papist or by Protestant.
Rivals in pharisaic robes arrayed,
No one is more, and no one less, than man:
Where all are equal, who shall claim control
Over the conscience, or put under ban
The free, outspoken, independent soul?
There is no heresy in honest doubt,
Or strong dissent, where demonstration fails;
Or non-conformity, however stout;
For thus the righteous cause at last prevails,
Beware! popes, cardinals, councils, bishops, all—
Who seek to hold the human mind in thrall?

SUPERFLUOUS DEVICES.

Who but a man bereft of sense would think
To prop the sky, and thus prevent its fall?
Or stop Niagara at its very brink
By the erection of a mud-built wall?
Or stretch a chain across the boisterous sea,
To force it into slumberous repose?
Or regulate the law of gravity,
Lest chaos come all order to foreclose?
And who but one demented will contend
That Truth, unaided by external force,
Successfully her cause cannot defend,
But must to carnal weapons have recourse?
That in religion reason is no guide?
That Liberty to License is allied?

FREEDOM OF CONSCIENCE.

Oh! brave Apostle, thou hast truly said—
It is a trivial thing indeed to be Judged of man's judgment. Conscience must be free,
Nor blindly nor dogmatically led,
Either by living oracles or dead;
For truth admits of no monopoly,
And where it points each for himself must see.
Nor fears an independent path to tread.
Honor to him who speaks his honest thought
Who guards his reason as a sacred trust,
Demands the truth for every dogma taught,
And turns dissenter only when he must!
For he shall rise by whom the light is sought,
To the high plane where stand the wise and just.

The Gospel in Texas.

Practically applied to the case of "Ninfael."

The following rendition of the Christian outrage recently perpetrated on Dr. Russell in Texas is from the Rochester Democrat, and is recommended to the notice of St. Anthony Comstock and Judge Benedict of the U. S. District Court.

Some good persons in Texas recently flogged an Infidel nearly to death. We don't know what the Infidel had said or done, particularly; it was enough that he was an Infidel, whatever that may mean to be. There was a meeting precious, a regular proceedings. It was held in a corner grocery, and was participated in by all the good persons and a jug of whiskey, the remarks of the latter being absorbed from the place the cork goes in, and vociferously applauded. The speeches were off-hand and mostly in brief sentences.

"Hyar's a ninfael, is there? Wall, they's but one thing ter do. Thar can't be no ninfaels 'round these diggins. Hey? Wot?" remarked a leading citizen.

"You bet!" was the sententious response from all parts of the room. "Le's drink." "Taranfethers?" inquired a gentleman in the rear of the apartment, the word being evidently one that had belonged to the Ku-Klux literature. "Taranfethers ain't too hash, I expect. Hey? Wot?"

"Tain't hash enuff," said a gentleman whose belt was ornamented with various bowie knives. "Hand along that 'ar jug. D'y'e want the juice ter spile? Tain't hash enuff. A man as is a ninfael has no rights wotever. Revolvers 's too good for 'im; Hey? S'posen we kill the dam scoffer."

"Pistols make noise," shrewdly observed a weazen-faced person, pausing to deposit a mouthful of extract of tobacco behind the broom. "Mus' be car'ful. I hain't got no consideration for unbelievin' wretches, an' thar ain't much law about hyar; but 't don't do no harm to go slow. Is thar a cord sumwhar 'round? S'posen we hang the disgustin' sinner."

There was one person who advocated really mild means of reform. He was a person of gentle manners and an unpleasant complexion. His company had been tolerated by Texan gentlemen for but a brief period, and was even then looked upon as somewhat superfluous. "I b'long to de Mefodis' chuch myself," he said, with a conciliatory smile, "an' I's glad to see de chuch defended by de w'ite folks. What d'nomination do you b'long to, gentlemen?"

The defenders of the faith looked at each other in some surprise. "Wot's the matter with the dam fool? Hey? Wot?" they said one to another. "Wot's he a-doin' hyar, anyhow? Who said we'd jined the church, you mis'able nigger?"

"I was goin' to say, as a member of de Mefodis' church," said the bewildered outcast, "dat p'raps dis Infidel don't mean to do nothin' wrong. It's accordin to de light dat's in him, p'raps. I t'ought you b'longed to de chuch yourself, an' I was a-goin' to 'peal to you to be a little mussiful. Maybe he can't help himself. De chuch teaches us not to be too hash. Mebbe ef you b'longed to it you wouldn't be so fass. Dat's all, gen'lemen."

"Kill the dam nigger!" exclaimed each gentlemanly Texan, with touching earnestness at the same time drawing a revolver. "Wot business 's he here? Hey? Wot? It's a dam pity ef a man can't stand up for the gospil without havin' his ackshuns discussed by a copper-colored hyena. You hyar? Git!"

The member of the Methodist church disappeared in a great hurry, and got off safe, notwithstanding the fire in the rear, but his words had more effect than might have been expected. The volunteer Christians proceeded with the discussion, and finally resolved to curb their bloodthirsty desires. It was deemed best neither to hang, shoot, nor ornament with tar and feathers, but to flog the unhappy sinner very violently. At first this proposition was received with intense scorn; but at last under the ameliorating influence of the jug, it prevailed, and the gentlemanly Texans felt in their hearts that they were entitled to a great deal of credit for their mildness. The flogging was enlivened, moreover, with choice little morsels of sermons, so that the half hour's work was doubtless very profitable to the unregenerated sufferer.

"Go back on the gospil, will yer?" said one Texas gentleman savagely, between blows. "Hey? Take that!"

"Perty man you ar', ain't yer?" remarked another, pausing to take a drink and wipe the mouth of the jug with his sleeve. "Goin' around perventin' the scriptur' and stoppin' that outflow of the merralities. Wot? How's that fer a clipper?"

"Yer mussent kim 'round hyar with yer dam sciffin' at the holy promises an' things!" ejaculated another, putting the whip on in a lively manner. "This is er morril community and won't stand no nonsense. Ef we can't b'lieve in the everlastin' Scriptur' wot're we a comin' to hey? Your percedin' is a dam shame an' mus' be stopped!"

The miserable Infidel, bleeding and sick, groaning and uncomfortable in every way, was finally left tied to a tree, and the Christian Texans, with relieved consciences, went off, firing pistols and pawing the air with a vain desire to pull down more heretics.

"Clar to gracious!" declared the colored man, creeping up to the unfortunate Infidel and speedily releasing him. "It's the strangest thing that men who nebber car' for 'ligion should allays be de fust to fight for it. Dey makes mo' fus dan de elect demseffs, an' 's jis' as jealous an' mean to git along wid as a nest ob honnetts. I b'longs to de Mefodis' chuch myseff, but I'll take car' ob dis po' ninfael ef it stroy's de 'hole 'stablishment!"

THE ROCHESTER PLATFORM TO BE RATIFIED.—ABLE SPEAKERS TO BE ENGAGED.

We, the undersigned Freethought and Liberal League Committee of Cattaraugus county, N. Y., propose to hold a mass meeting in the village of Randolph, in said county, on the 8th and 9th days of December to ratify the platform adopted by the National Liberal League at Rochester, Oct. 26th, and we cordially invite all persons residing in Western New York and Pennsylvania who endorse said platform to unite with us in the proposed ratification meeting.

The speakers who are to address the meeting are Hon. Judge McCormack of Franklin, Pa., D. M. Bennett, Editor TRUTH SEEKER, of New York City, Giles B. Stebbins of Detroit, C. D. B. Mills of Syracuse, W. S. Bell of Mass., Dr. T. L. Brown of Binghamton, and others. H. L. Green, who represented our League at the Rochester Congress, will make a report of the proceedings at that convention. Liberal arrangements will be made to accommodate all who attend, and, if possible, reduced railroad fares will be obtained.

Notes and Clippings.

MR. TALMAGE is about to abandon round dances in his pulpit.

RELIGIOUS exercises have been prohibited in the New Haven public schools.

It is said that Niagara Falls are haunted by witches since the horse-shoe fell down.

SAN FRANCISCO now has bull-fights on Sunday afternoons. What would the Philadelphia clergymen say to that?

It is said that the secret of all success is hard work, but this belief receives a severe shock every time a lean and hungry sinner looks at a fat evangelist.

If those who drink are damned, let God resign.
For Christ both drank and manufactured wine.

A POPULAR clergyman in England recently gave a lecture on "Fools." The tickets of admission were inscribed, "Lecture on Fools. Admit one." There was a large audience.

It is rumored that the Great American Obscenist is drafting a law to compel all children born after next Christmas to come into the world decently clad and to bring a certificate of good moral character.

DIED—KEY.—After a very brief but not unexpected illness, on Wednesday, Nov. 28, at his residence, T. U. R. Key. The funeral services were very generally observed on Thursday the 29th all over the country.

In "The Wines of the Bible," recently published in London, the Rev. A. M. Wilson devotes sound scholarship and careful research to prove that the wines mentioned in the Bible were decidedly fermented.

"GHOST & BONES" is the queer title of a firm of Nevada saloon-keepers. The firm, being part Bones, is not wholly Ghost, though it is goblin's the earnings of the miners thereabout in exchange for bad spirits.

The Bishop of Winchester said at the Church Congress that if any one sent him a religious newspaper he put it at once in the waste paper basket. If the religious press there is what it is here he exercises sound judgment.

In Texas they have found a new-fashioned hog with undivided hoofs, like a mule. He cheweth the cud, also, and the same he doeth for the purpose of circumventing the command to the Jews, which was spoken by Leviticus the prophet.

LITTLE SAMMY went to a church fair, and spent his money on a chance in a raffle. His report on coming home was thus: "You see something and you give half a dollar to get it. Another fellow always gets it and they don't offer to give you your money back."

"NEXT Sabbath," remarked a Deadwood pastor to his congregation as the contribution box was being dealt around; "next Sabbath there will be no morning service, provided the collection to-day will warrant us in sending down to Yankton for a hundred rats and Red-nosed Bill's black-and-tan pup."

"Who's your pastor, my dear?" asked a good old lady from the country addressing her daughter who has lived in town six months. "Really, mother, I hardly know. I never saw him. He was away on a vacation all summer, and now he has started out on his lecturing tour for the winter. I may get acquainted with him next spring."

A young lady was overheard explaining to a friend as they emerged from a very fashionable ultra-high church place of worship in London a few Sundays ago, that although it was a dreadfully long way to come, she never missed a Sunday service there, because she invariably got a new idea as to a dress or bonnet.

A LADY who objects to profanity because it is both wicked and vulgar writes to know what she ought to say when a clothesline breaks and lets a week's washing fall into the mud. Perhaps she ought to say "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth," but it is very likely that she will say something entirely different.

FAITH is sometimes personified as a drenched female clinging to a sea-washed rock; but a better personification would be a bald-headed man buying a bottle of patent hair-restorer or a man depositing his surplus earnings in a religiously-offered savings bank, but a better one still would be a man trusting a plump, well-fed parson alone with his wife or daughter.

It was not a success when they took little five year old to church for the first time and told her that everybody had to be as still as a mouse. All was well until the minister began to open the services; but then the little maiden, shocked at his want of propriety in thus breaking silence, energetically shook her finger at him, saying: "See here, man what you make all that noise for?"

Among the many mysterious dispensations of Providence, R. I., are Moody and Sankey, who have reached out, taken Providence by the hand, so to speak, and putting their trust in Providence purses, have determined, with the assistance of the Almighty dollar, to provide the improvident Provisionals with a moral and theological circus, whereby it is expected that many lambs will be added to the fold.

An amateur detective in search of two cattle thieves, found them at church at White Sulphur, Ky., whereupon, pistol in hand, he informed preacher and congregation that they were all under arrest. While everybody looked astonished, he picked out his men, marched them out of the building at the muzzle of his weapon, and, turning on the step, shouted to the minister that he could go on with the benediction.

PETER DWYER exhibits his muscular Christianity by personally thrashing the rude fellows who disturb his meetings by putting pepper on the stove and by other objectionable practices. It is understood that he prays for these fellows, too. But he administers the thrashing first, and that is what makes the most marked impression. Peter is reaching a class of people not generally gathered in by the stylish and heavily mortgaged churches.

An exchange says that a Turk is obliged not only to wash his head, face, neck, ears, and feet, but also his teeth at each of his five daily calls to prayer; and how a Mussulman can be a devout Turk and still be so dirty that the dogs hold their noses and howl when he comes on their side of the street is as great a mystery as how in more civilized lands a man can be a church member and teach a Bible class of young ladies and still get away with $40,000 worth of forged paper when the time comes.

THE Philadelphia clergymen are happy over the announcement that the Permanent Exhibition will close its gates on Sunday. They have already commenced the holding of meetings and the passing of resolutions praising the managers for their action. The managers found that the people who clamored for the Sunday opening would not patronize the Exhibition in paying numbers. So they concluded to try their chance with the churchgoers, and see if they would patronize it sufficiently to warrant keeping it open.

THE Episcopal prayer book has been translated into the Sioux language. An edition has been printed interleaved with the English. The Sioux language is mellifluous, and well suited to the purposes of devotion. The responsive service of the Episcopal Church is well received by those of the Sioux who gather for worship, although the men do not very heartily unite in the responses. The squaws, however, make good their lack of devotion, and howl back their responses very satisfactorily. There is a striking similarity between squaws, red and white, so far as keeping up the interests of the Church is concerned. Were it not for the white squaws our churches, preachers, and all the rest of the system would pass into decay. It is the female influence that supports them.

THANKSGIVING REFLECTIONS.—Among the things which Fack said we had to be thankful for:—For the prevalence of a true religious feeling among our insurance presidents and bank cashiers; for the dollar of our fathers (conditional upon the receipt of the same); for having no more to kick about; for Home, Sweet Home, with variations; for a society to the prevention of crime to look after the morals of people on spec; for the increased skill and experience which now enable Mr. Beecher to cultivate true inwardness in private; for the insurance business and the legal profession (what one leaves the other gets); for Col. Ingersoll's devout and lucid commentaries on the Bible; for turkey, and for divers and sundry other things which it forgot to remember.

We don't suppose there is a syllable of truth in the talk that Anthony Comstock designs emigrating to Alaska. There is not obscenity enough there for him and the chance for mileage there is not near as good as here. But if he would go to one of the South Sea Islands, where the natives go naked, and take a good supply of red flannel shirts and drawers and take the prurient crowd of his, known as "The Society for the Prevention of Vice," with him to dress the naked Venuses and Adonises and hold their shirts on till they became ashamed to go naked, the decent people of this country would feel relieved and Anthony and his prudes would have a congenial job.

BLASPHEMY.—TO THE EDITOR OF THE SUN, Sir: Is there such a crime known to United States law as blasphemy? I was under the impression that this was not a Christian but an American nation, where the Mohammedan, the Hindoo, the Jew, and the Quaker had an equal right to their opinion. The recent earthquakes do not more surely indicate the existence of hidden forces in the earth that we cannot control, than the arrest of one of our revered citizens for blasphemy betokens the fact that the Church has already the control of the United States Government. Henceforth no citizen, male or female, knows when his or her turn may come. The familiar of an ecclesiastical inquisition is on their track, perhaps with a warrant in his pocket for their arrest by a United States Marshal, whenever the Church may indicate. For years I have sounded the alarm upon this subject. The orthodox church closed the World's Exhibition on the so-called Christian Sabbath, and kept it open on the Jewish Sabbath, the Mohammedan Sabbath, and on all the other Sabbath days of the week, for every day is a Sabbath to some one of the world's one thousand religions. I feel serious about this American darkness. Let us have light from the Sun. F. W. EVANS, Mount Lebanon, Columbia county, N. Y.

PROF. ADLER'S NEW SCHOOL.—Prof. Felix Adler's Ethical School, an outgrowth of the Society for Ethical Culture, has been opened on a small scale in Standard Hall under the management of Prof. Adler and the trustees of the society. For the present, a limited number of pupils, between the ages of 13 and 16, will be taught, but the scheme to be carried out hereafter provides for the moral education of youths from the ages of 10 up to manhood. The school is not intended to supplant the common schools, but is to supply instruction in a different branch of education. One of the trustees lately said: "It might be called an eclectic religious school, for all religions will be taught. The younger pupils will receive instruction in the history of all the leading religions—Mohammedism, Buddhism, Judaism, Christianity, &c. As they advance they will study the philosophy of religion and the principles of morality, as far as they are consistent with modern scientific research. Moral teaching in the past has been mainly based on the existence of a supreme being whose commands men obey, and on a divinely-inspired book in which the Jew and Christian world reposed implicit confidence. This is a skeptical age; by many the existence of a supreme being is doubted, and the authority of the book is questioned, if not entirely denied. It is clear that a system of moral education based on them would totter as soon as the child grows to manhood, and his faith becomes impaired. The idea of our school is to educate children in moral principles wholly independent of questions of faith." About twenty-five pupils of both sexes have been enrolled. Most of them are children of Jewish parents; one is of Catholic parentage, and some are from Protestant families. Each pupil will be charged a tuition fee sufficient to pay for the schooling of one poor student. The sessions of the school are to be held once a week. Prof. Adler will have no assistants until he has further developed his system.—Sun.

Events of the Week.

THE coal companies of the Reading and other mines in Pennsylvania are cutting down wages 30 per cent.

TWO HEAVY rains within the past week. The earth must be supplied with water enough to last all winter.

THE Board of Health of this city has pronounced cremation no crime, but permits will be required to be taken out.

SAMUEL BOWLES, editor of the Springfield Republican, has been sick unto death, but at last advice was said to be improving somewhat.

THE Sioux are raiding the Black Hills. Indian outrages have been committed in Dakota. The Indians do not seem to be altogether subdued.

WM. GARRISON, of Little Rock, Ark., walked one hundred consecutive hours at Philadelphia, but was excessively fatigued and exhausted by the effort. It is said to have been performed on a wager for $500.

THE Pope is reported very low in health and strength, and very near death's door. With all the infallibility that he may be supposed to be charged with, he keeps falling constantly, and very soon old Death will stop his breath, precisely as he would any other old man's in similar circumstances.

WM. BONNE, a night employee of the Connecticut Valley Railroad at Saybrook Point, New London, was shot on his way home on Dec. 3d, by a neighbor of his named Mahoney, and died within an hour. Mahoney is described as a quarrelsome fellow, and was under the influence of drink at the time of the murder, for which there was no provocation.

THE poor Turks do not seem to be getting along very well. The Russians are pressing them sorely at several points. At Plevna great activity prevails, and heavy fighting is expected soon. Later dispatches from the seat of war say the Turks have gained a victory. Elena has been captured and 5,000 Russians taken prisoners. Tirnova is threatened by the Turks, and they expect it to fall soon.

IT HAS been ascertained that the forgeries of Richard B. Peabody, formerly of the firm of R. E. Peabody & Co., lumber merchants of St. Johnsbury, Vt., who was arrested at midnight last Saturday, amount to over $50,000. Peabody is connected with one of the most highly respectable families in that village, and his friends are making strenuous efforts to save him from the consequences of his crime.

CHARLES SCHMITZ, jeweler, at 181 Sixth avenue, returned to his home a few evenings since from a pleasure party in Hoboken. He was with a young lady to whom he was paying his attentions. While sitting in the parlor they had a lovers' quarrel. Schmitz begged forgiveness, but was refused. Then exclaiming, "I will die! I will die!" he raised a small phial to his mouth. Soon afterward he was dead. He had swallowed cyanide of potassium.

THE regular session of Congress begun on Monday last. The President's Message was sent in, and gives general satisfaction to the party in power. He disapproves of the unlimited coinage of silver, and recommends that silver coin be used to redeem greenbacks. He advocates a firm policy with Mexico, and implies that if the Mexicans will not keep order we must keep it for them. He favors an increase of the army and navy, and opposes the repeal of the resumption act, etc., etc.

COL. ROBT. G. INGERSOLL, by the recent delivery of his lecture, "Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child," in Syracuse, Utica, and Albany has seriously disturbed our Christian friends in those cities, and the preachers are especially exasperated. A score of these, more or less, have attempted replies to him; but they were feeble compared with his masterly effort. A few in Albany who had something to do towards engaging him tried hard to excuse themselves from the odium of having done so, but the principal manager of the lecture business boldly avowed his intention to engage him again. The Colonel has been offered $500 to deliver another lecture there. The offer has been accepted and he will lecture on the evening of the 22d inst.

BY HUDSON TUTTLE.

CHAPTER X.

MAN'S POSITION—FATE, FREE-WILL, FREE-AGENCY NECESSITY, RESPONSIBILITY.

Morality is based on Anatomy and Physiology.

An individual is the representative of all the conditions by which he is evolved.

Fate is the personification of the constitution of things.

MAN is surrounded by gigantic, terrible forces, over which he has no control, and to avert which his efforts are as unavailing as those of the brutes. He is a child of the elements, an atom thrown up by their collision and concentration as a bubble arises on a stream by conflicting currents. He is more; he is a bundle of elements which thus united become a centrestance, from which causes emanate as from the elements themselves.

As the elements from which he springs are amenable to unvarying laws—the irrevocable mandate of fate—man, as the result of their union, must be a creature of fate or unchanging law. The anthropomorphic view of the Universe at once dissolves. The elements he seeks to control are masters. Man is a slave, chained, under their perpetual surveillance.

Is this a truth? Are we bound to the Achillean car, or are we free? Seemingly we are free. We are gods, willing and doing in perfect freedom. Ah! this freedom is a delusion—one of the wiles of our masters to cheat us into self-complacency. Not a leaf falls, not a hair of our heads whitens, but a myriad of ages ago it was written in the Book of Fate. Is a tree overturned by the wind? It was known before a tree existed, and every acorn counted by the recording causes. Every leaf, every insect which feeds on the leaf, every drop of rain, of dew, every flake of snow which has or will fall on those leaves, was known before the earth was evolved from the abnormal ocean.

The human being, physically and mentally matured, is the representative of every law and condition which has ever acted on him or his progenitors, ad infinitum. In him they are not only individualized; they are centrestantialized. He exists because of their action; he is as they have made him. In this sense man is a creature of circumstances. So far as these forces and conditions acted previous to his birth, he is not a free agent, nor is he in his relation to the fixed action of the great forces of Nature. But on the circumstances which surround his maturity he acts by virtue of his inherent selfhood, the resultant of all previous conditions which make up that selfhood. In this view he may be considered free; for what we call a man is nothing more nor less than the aggregate of forces and conditions, many of which we understand, and many of which we do not understand. He is free, just as his organization, representative of all previous conditions and forces, will allow. This freedom is quite distinct from the dogmatical tenet of free-agency, inasmuch as it regards man's existence as an effect becoming a cause, and not a self-existent cause.

Difference in the primordial or pre-natal conditions has greater influence than those which environ us after birth. These are integral parts of our being. The difference in these conditions makes the individuality of mankind. Were they the same, all men would be identically the same. The permutation of an infinite series of causes never repeats a number in the series. Hence one man is no more to blame for being unlike another than the oak is to blame for being different from the pine, or the leopard for being unlike the antelope on which it preys.

Character found in oak, pine, leopard, or man, alike is the expression of conditions pre-natal and environing. As the acorn treasures all the forces which have developed it into a germ capable of producing an oak, so the child is a treasure of forces which will develop a man, and such a man as this treasury compels. There is another aspect to this subject. The acorn, germinating in a barren soil, strives according to the impulse of the forces by virtue of which it is an acorn to perfect an oak; but hard as it may strive to gather sustenance from the crevices of the rocks, its knotty roots can support little more than a gnarled and blighted stem bearing dwarfish branches. What should have been a tree, lofty and gigantic, is blighted into a pitiful shrub.

The same acorn germinating in a fertile soil, watered by the same showers, refreshed by the same dew, and enjoying the same sunshine and shade, with every condition save one the same, strikes deep roots down into the earth, and on them towers a column-like stem supporting a forest of branches. So the child constantly suffering the pangs of want is dwarfed and distorted, not only physically, but to the centre of its spiritual nature. The same child surrounded by ennobling influences might astonish the world with its genius. Circumstances make the Alexanders, the Napoleons, the Platos, the Ciceros, the warriors and sages of the world, but they can do nothing without a preëxisting individuality organized in harmony with their requirements.

It was not my choice whether born a serf in Russia, a slave in the swamps of Carolina, or as I am. Had I been born a serf, so far from thinking of fate, I should have a brute instinct for my native cot, and consider my horizon the limits of the world. So of all conditions in which a human being may be placed; they are ever true to the conditions of their position. Ah! then what becomes of poor human accountability? If we are thus creatures of fate, we may make no endeavor of our own, but, like listless Turks, sit still and let the world move. This is not a necessary sequence to the doctrine of necessity. Although Nature teaches a clear lesson, it is not sufficiently clear that "those who run can read" rightly. True, an individual may become so imbued with the idea of fate as to consider exertion on his part unnecessary, and remain perfectly passive.

The idea becomes with him the moving cause. This, however, is a partial view of the subject, leaving out entirely the influence of individual exertion. Man is a centrestance as well as a circumstance. The forces concentrated in him react on surrounding conditions. The philosopher, for instance, is born with the capabilities of becoming a philosopher; he is as ignorant at first as the slave-child. In actual acquisition both children are alike; but one child has the desire for and capacity to receive knowledge—the other has not. The desire may be strong, yet obstacles oppose with stronger force, and the "mute, inglorious" Newtons fail to rise above the common level. Knowledge is an efficient circumstance of Fate, and furnishes the strongest incentive for exertion.

This question in its broad domain includes the entire doctrine of good and evil, and the measure of man's responsibility.

If we acknowledge—and it is unavoidable—the necessity for all that has been, is, and will be, we cannot stray far from a knowledge of the true position. If, on the contrary, we consider ourselves free and independent agents, with such an erroneous guide we cannot avoid going astray. Bound hand and foot by the gigantic forces of Nature, turn which way we will there is no outlet. Yet, are we not footballs, impelled hither and thither as this or that force predominates? The ball is a passive instrument, a mass of matter opposing only the resistance of gravity. Man is a football for the play of the elements, but he, by the concentration of circumstances, becomes more than a circumstance, and therefore reacts on the elemental blows.

Our existence is the resultant of forces and events reaching back to the dawn of time. These events are evolved in us—are united and individualized. Hence we are not inactive footballs. The elements strike at us; we parry the blow or bend it to our purpose.

Here lies the deception. We rush abroad in wild freedom, doing as we please; so we flatter ourselves. He is insane who doubts our free-agency. Our ships outride contending billows; the winds are our slaves; fire, fierce and insatiate, our vassal; and the red lightnings of the storm are grasped in the giant hand of man. Such is our vaunt. Is it true? Very true, but not all the truth. I draw no circle prescribing the capacity of the human mind. It is incomprehensible; its dominion is wide, and day by day extending from its pulsating centre; yet how small the area it has conquered to the vast unknown which environs it! How weak its power of resistance to the resistance it meets! Like a man beneath an avalanche, it can assert its might, but the avalanche crushes onward. Man may roll a stone, but the mountain never. The stone which he can turn and the cloud-capped mountain hold like comparison, as the realm—wherein, by virtue of his centrestantial qualities, he is free—holds to the surrounding province which rules him adamantly.

The Bennett-Teed Discussion.

I.—JESUS CHRIST IS NOT ONLY DIVINE, BUT IS THE LORD GOD, CREATOR OF HEAVEN AND EARTH.

MR. BENNETT'S THIRD REPLY.

MR. CYRUS ROMULUS R. TEED, Dear Sir: I sincerely thank you for the compliment you pay me and for the sympathy and kindness you express in view of the perils that surround me from those in power, who would be glad to stifle my utterances and would prevent me from speaking my honest convictions. While I am able to use my pen and my tongue I must write and speak what I believe to be true, though to others it may appear ever so absurd. I do not wish to shock the feelings of others, but I claim the same right to express my views that I willingly accord to them. Allow me to say that in the sympathy and toleration you evince you exhibit the noblest qualities of human nature; and the estimate you place upon current theology is, in my mind, especially correct. While it was almost unlooked for, I am nevertheless constrained to admit the soundness of your conclusions as regards the ultimate doom of priesthood and the adulterous theology you refer to. Our views on those points coincide very nearly, and I give you credit for great liberality of sentiment. You are so sound in this regard that I am disposed to extend great charity wherein you still seem to me to be at fault. When one accepts so much that is correct, I can regard with leniency the errors he still holds to. Could you, however, obtain as clear views upon all subjects as upon those alluded to, I would rejoice greatly and would feel that my humble efforts had not been in vain. It pleases me to find we harmonize on so many points, and I can only hope that your views may become as clear on all points as those upon which we agree.

You say: "Matter has always existed. It is as persistent as space and time. We cannot go back beyond the time when it had no existence in some form. . . . It has always existed in a structure embodying the most perfect symmetry with the complete sum of coördinating function." Again, you say: "These are facts that no arguments can set aside and which no argument is required to establish." Here we stand on common ground, and it is entirely unlike the ground occupied by theologians in their theory of the creation of all things. But if matter has always existed, and the most perfect symmetry and complete sum of coördinating functions have forever attended it, I cannot see the slightest necessity for your God or your Jesus Christ, or any other individual, real or imaginary, having anything to do with it, or being credited with having done anything towards setting the grand system in motion. If it has always existed it certainly would not have had to be created. If it has always possessed the most perfect symmetry with a complete sum of coördinating function—as I believe it has—I can see no necessity nor room for Jesus to add a thing to a system of such eternal self-existence and such perfection.

If we become so rational and enlightened as to admit that "matter ever existed," and "is as persistent as time or space," we cannot help coming to the conclusion that the properties of matter, motion, force, and law, must also have "ever existed." We can have no clear conception of matter without motion, without force, and without law, or its legitimate and inevitable modes. What room, then, there was for Jehovah, Jesus, or Mumbo Jumbo, is more than I can imagine. Friend Teed, take that last rationalistic step, and concede that no such meddler was necessary or possible. Such a belief is only admissible in mythology, theology, and metaphysics; and let us try to disabuse our minds of it entirely. Let us not cripple the great, grand, everlasting Universe by thinking for a moment that any being ever wound it up or ever put a single cog-wheel in its eternal, complicated, but still simple machinery. Whatever is always was, in some form, and always moved by some law; motion and force were never created any more than matter itself, and the beautiful symmetry and the complete sum of coördinating function is as eternal as any part of the system. All alike were without beginning, all alike are uncreatable. The Jehovah, Jesus, and Mumbo ideas are later conceptions, and grew entirely out of a state of ignorance and superstition, which, unfortunately, enveloped man before he reached a stage of clear, rationalistic, and scientific thought. As truth and science illumine the mental world, these myths, these mere creations of ignorant man, as I said in my last, must assuredly give way and no longer lead us astray. To my mind, you are nearly ready, and your mind sufficiently amplified, to occupy that ground.

We seem to agree very well—much better than I expected—upon the nature of mind, though you retain a few crotchets that I think you would do well to disabuse yourself of. If mind is the result of matter, it does not follow that matter is the result of mind nor that "matter," as you say, "is product of a great variety of mutations of mind, itself converted into matter." Your great mistake, I think lies in considering mind an entity the same as matter, that it is as old as matter, more powerful than matter, and that it must ultimately bring matter into far more perfect subjection than it has yet done. You speak of "the world, mind and thought" as though it had an existence independent of or antagonistic to matter. To my mind this is all wrong. Mind has no independent existence and is only a result of preëxisting organization. It is a function, not an original cause. You will have it that "mind and matter are coincidental, parallel, and perpetual," that mind is as old as matter and is equal to matter, and, in fact, superior to matter, as it is destined ultimately to dominate it. This I regard to be wrong. Mind cannot be as old as matter. It is a product and cannot be as old as the preëxisting cause which produced it. It may have existed millions of ages—just as far back as the conditions and factors were equal to its production—but as it is emphatically a product it cannot be as old as the organization which produced it, and the material of which that organization was composed.

On this globe, for instance, I can conceive that unknown ages had to pass by before there was any organized life on it, vegetable or animal, and consequently there was no mind here; but in process of time the rocks crystallized from the fluid mass, then decomposed into soil, making vegetation in all its ramifications possible and actual. Animal life, springing from the lowest germinal forms and feeding upon the vegetable kingdom, was equally the result of preëxisting, universal cause, and evolved thought or mind in perfect keeping with the character of organization, more or less perfect, as the case might be. Wherever there is life there is sensation, and where there is sensation there is thought, but not necessarily of the same grade or character. An oyster has life of a low form. It has some sensation; it has some mind. It does not soar into the realm of thought, speculation, and philosophy, but it has a low order of mind, sufficient to cause it to take its necessary food, to propagate its offspring, and to close its castle when danger approaches. Its mind is precisely in keeping with its organization. A frog has more mind than an oyster, because it has a better organization, better facilities for obtaining information, better chances for observation. It has a better organization. A dog has more mind than a frog simply because it has a better organization for the production of mind. The elephant transcends the dog in the possession of mind or intellect so far as its organization is more perfect and massive and better adapted to the production of strong mind and strong thought. Man evolves a higher degree of mind or thought than all animals below him simply because he has a more perfect mental organization and because his reasoning organs are much better developed. Mind is not a unity in the animal kingdom; it is not in the human race. No two minds are alike, because no two organizations are alike. Mind always corresponds to the organization that evolves it or produces it. This would not be the case if mind had an independent existent realm or domain in the Universe. If all minds come from one grand central mind there ought to be a general uniformity, which we see does not exist.

This mind being merely a function and purely a product of matter and organization, it is as absurd to talk about its being a correlate of matter or of its being the cause of matter or convertible into it as it would be that muscular strength, eyesight, hearing, tasting, and feeling are so convertible. These are all equally the result of organization, equally have an independent existence, realm, or domain in the Universe. It is as intelligible to talk about a great central eyesight, a world of hearing, or a great fountain of muscular strength as a great central mind, a world of intellect, or a great fountain of thought. All, as I said, are functions produced only by organization and the digestion and assimilation of food. Without these neither can have an existence. Neither existed before the organizations which produced them were by the powers of the Universe brought into existence. The power and potentiality that exist in the Universe to-day have ever existed, but the process of evolution in a given system or on a given sphere has not always been in the same advancement or perfection.

In attempting to quote me you must say that "mind is the product of mind and matter." I do not think I said that, and if I did it was an error. I do not think any thing or any quality produces itself. Mind does not absolutely produce mind any more than it produces matter. I repeat, it is a product, not a factor. Before I can admit that mind has ever produced a grain of matter I shall ask you to give proof of a single instance of the kind.

In laying down your "minor propositions" you lay some that to me seem clear and tenable, but others are so muddled or incorrect that I cannot accept them nor understand them. I will notice some of them:

1. "Something was never produced from nothing." Correct. A truer utterance never was made.

2. "Matter and mind have existed perpetually." Only partly true. Matter has existed perpetually, but mind has existed no longer than the conditions or the organizations adapted to its production have existed. How long that has been the case I will not pretend to say; but matter is assuredly older than function. The product cannot be as old as the producing cause. The result is necessarily later than the preexisting conditions.

3. "The seat of mind is within the human structure." Very true; and, you might have added, other animal life. Nothing is known about mind in any other quarter.

4. "I declare it to be prior in function, first or highest in quality, the dominating principle of being." Equally good. I hold the same view.

5. "Matter has its origin in mind, the first cause, the highest and prior in quality." Absurd! Matter has no such origin. Mind was not prior to matter and did not originate it.

6. "Mind is first cause and first effect, while matter is second cause and second effect." Untenable and untrue. Mind could not have been before matter, because matter always was; and all the mind we know anything about is the result of matter and organization, as I have said; and until some other mind is brought to our cognizance it is utter folly for us to speculate about it.

7. "Mind, through voluntary and involuntary procedure, is constantly transmitting its potencies and projecting them through an outward circulation to extremities." This may be so. I confess I know very little about it.

8. "The mind is protected from exhaustion or final waste by a supply through a return circulation just as essential to the perpetuity of the mind as the flow from the outward is to the perpetuity of matter." This is very muddled. I know nothing about it, and think my information on the subject just about as extensive as yours.

9. "Mind and matter are reciprocal, constantly interchanging product, yet forever related as mind and matter." Partly true and partly untrue. Nothing is known about mind changing to matter. Until something is positively known such assertions are mere assumptions. So far as muscular strength, eyesight, and thought are the result of assimilated food, and a waste takes place, the muscular strength and the thought, etc., may be said to be converted to matter again; but if they come from matter they are matter still, if anything, and do not have to go a very long distance to become matter again. Thus a thought, or an action of the brain, becomes matter just as a motion of the hand becomes matter—no more and no less.

10. "Men or minds differ in quality—there are higher and lower degrees of these combinations which go to make up and formulate mental and physical organisms." Very true. I will not dissent from this. The quality of men or minds is of all grades, and always in consonance with the organization, as already observed; but I am not prepared to take the further step you suggest, that there is one "highest combination," a personality (Jehovah, Jesus, or Mumbo Jumbo), who had anything to do with it in the sense of "prior," "highest," "central," or "organization," as you seem so anxious to assume.

Your platitudes about evolution and involution, the blending of matter and mind, and the interchangeability of the two through endless cycles, are a little too obscure and metaphysical for my obtuse comprehension, and I judge are wholly ideal.

As mind is always the result of organization fed by nutritious and assimilated food, if there are minds in invisible spheres, it necessarily follows that there must be organizations in those invisible spheres to produce and perpetuate those minds, and food to keep up the waste as really necessary there as here. I will not attempt to say that these organizations and these minds do not exist. If they do exist, they are necessarily material though invisible, and are governed by the laws of the Universe and are parts of it. I do not circumscribe the powers and possibilities of the Universe short of that production. Its powers and capabilities are not yet all fully understood. That there are invisible intelligences there exist very strong proofs, which I will not now take the time to examine.

An eminent French physicist, Chauvée, not a Spiritualist, recently said: "We contravene no known law of science, chemistry, physics, mechanics, etc., in admitting the evidence of an ethereal or electro-luminous organism;" and an American writer has added that "neither reason, observation, nor science is opposed to the belief that man survives the death of the body, and that, provided with organs analogous to our present ones, he may be able to manifest himself to us by means appropriate to his new sphere and subject to the laws which regulate the inter-communication." I am sincerely and fraternally yours,

D. M. BENNETT.

The Crimes and Cruelties of Christianity.

How many thousands of Jews have been put to death for their faith by the Christian religion nobody can compute. Christianity persecuted this unfortunate people from the time it obtained civil power, and it has continued to treat them with injustice down to the present time. During the Middle Ages they were objects of the most bitter and cruel persecution. During the wars of the Crusades and of the Shepherds they were massacred by thousands. Theodosius, St. Louis, and Isabella, the most pious sovereigns before the Reformation, were the most ardent persecutors of the Jews. They were separated from their fellow-men, compelled to live in certain quarters and to wear a peculiar dress. They could not eat with Christians; no Christian could employ one as a physician, nor purchase drugs of them. Intermarriage with them was a terrible crime. Queen Joanna I., in 1347, in a statute regulating the houses of ill-fame in Avignon, after providing fully and with great particularity for the accommodations of Christians, enacted that no Jew should be admitted under severe penalties. When they were executed they were separated from other criminals and were hung between dogs, head downwards. Every ecclesiastical revival, every accession of a new sovereign, was an occasion for fresh restrictions and renewed cruelties. The theologians maintained that all they possessed could be lawfully taken from them. They incited the people to plunder and rob them. They were banished from England by Edward II., from France by Charles VI. They sought refuge in Spain, and contributed by their genius and learning to the greatness of that country. "But when, in an ill-omened hour, the cross supplanted the crescent on the heights of Alhambra, this solitary refuge was destroyed, the last gleam of tolerance vanished from Spain, and the expulsion of the Jews was determined on" (Hist. Rat., vol. 2, p. 267).

In 1390, nearly a century before the conquest of Granada, the Catholics of Seville, instigated by a priest, murdered four thousand Jews. Priests directed the massacre. Similar horrors were perpetrated at Valentia, Cordova, Burgos, Toledo, and Barcelona. Soon the massacre became general. Thousands of Jews, to save their lives, turned Christians. Whenever they relapsed they were imprisoned, impaled, and burnt alive. The clergy were tireless in their efforts to secure their expulsion, and when Isabella issued the celebrated decree of banishment, she carried out the wishes of the priests and the people.

The sufferings of the Spanish Jews caused by these measures have been represented by an old historian as terrible as those of their ancestors during the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. The decree required that all unconverted Jews should leave Spanish soil in three months. They were forbidden to carry gold or silver from Spain. The pirates that infested the coast robbed multitudes of their goods, and then made them slaves. Tens of thousands died of famine, pestilence, and at the hands of the Bedouins. Eighty thousand took refuge in Portugal, having received from the king promise of protection. But the Spanish priests stirred up the Portuguese, for which purpose a mission was organized, and the king soon issued a decree more cruel than that of the Spanish queen. All adult Jews were banished from Portugal; all their children under fourteen years of age were taken from them to be educated in the Christian faith.

"Then indeed the cup of bitterness was filled to the brim; the serene fortitude with which the exiled people had borne so many and such grievous calamities gave way, and was replaced with the wildest paroxysms of despair. Piercing shrieks of anguish filled the land; women were known to fling their children into deep wells or to tear them limb from limb, rather than resign them to the Christians. When at last, childless and broken-hearted, they found that the ships had been purposely detained, and the allotted time having expired, they were reduced to slavery and baptized by force. By the merciful intervention of Rome, most of them at last regained their liberty, but their children were separated from them forever. A great peal of rejoicing filled the Peninsula and proclaimed that the triumph of the Spanish priests was complete."

"Certainly the heroism of the defenders of every other creed fades into insignificance before this martyred people's, who for thirteen centuries confronted all the evils that the fiercest fanaticism could devise, enduring obloquy and spoliation and the violation of the dearest ties, and the infliction of the most hideous sufferings rather than abandon their faith" (Hist. Rat., vol. 2, p. 270).

While thus persecuted by Christians, the Jews were treated by the Mohammedans with marked tolerance and kindness.

"To the Jews," says Milman, "the Moslem crescent was a star to soothe to peace the troubled waters on which they had been so long agitated." Throughout the dominions of the Caliphs of the East, in Africa, in Spain, and in the Byzantine Empire, we behold the Jews not only pursuing their lucrative and enterprising traffic, not merely merchants of splendor and opulence, but suddenly emerging to offices of dignity and trust; administering the finances of Christian and Mohammedan kingdoms, and traveling as ambassadors between mighty sovereigns.

The famous schism which preceded the burning of John Huss and Jerome of Prague, and the wars of the Hussites that followed, cost not fewer than one hundred and fifty thousand lives.

The massacre of St. Bartholemew is an event familiar to the common reader. Probably as many as fifty thousand Huguenots—some authorities put the number higher—were put to death. Pius V. complained that the leader of the French Catholics did not obey his command, which was to take no prisoners, but to kill instantly every heretic that fell into his hands. This terrible event was celebrated by Gregory XIII. by a solemn procession to San Luiga (Ranke).

The number of unoffending aborigines immolated to the Catholic faith by Cortez and Pizarro and their abettors can be expressed only by millions. It was men acting under the influence of this religion who, to gratify their avarice, overturned the empire of the Montezumas. The Spanish settlers were uniformly encouraged in their murderous work by priests. "The whole religious influence of Spain," says a Liberal writer, "was exerted to hasten the catastrophe which deprived 12,000,000 innocent individuals of happiness and life to add to the glory of a merciful God." "Can any one," wrote one of the missionaries to his superiors in Spain, "have the presumption to say these savage Pagans have yielded anything more than an inconsiderable recompense to their benefactors in surrendering to them a little tract of this dirty sublunary planet in exchange for a glorious inheritance in the Kingdom of Heaven?" (Irving's Hist. New York).

In the Netherlands, in the reign of Charles V., fifty thousand (Grotius estimates one hundred thousand) were put to death for their faith, and thousands more perished under the reign of his bigoted son. The ferocity of the Church at this time is apparent from the circumstance that "upon February 16, 1563, a sentence of the Holy Office condemned all the inhabitants of the Netherlands to death as heretics. From this universal doom only a few persons specially named were excepted. A proclamation of the King, dated ten days later confirmed this decree of the Inquisition, and ordered it to be carried into instant execution. . . . Three millions of people, men, women, and children, were sentenced to the scaffold in three lines" (Motley's Rise of the Dutch Republic, vol. 2, p. 155).

MEMPHIS, TENN., OCT. 23, 1877.

The President of the Ladies' Christian Association published a report of their charitable work in the daily papers in this city. In this report was set forth the number of inmates in the Home for Fallen Women, the amount expended there, and the great destitution amongst this class of unfortunate sinners. After making a strong appeal for donations to help sustain the institution, she pictures the destitution and misery she finds in the low haunts of vice, and says, "more than all this, we ask for these creatures the prayers and Christian counsel to convert these erring souls," for, she says, "I have never seen a pious, devout Christian, a member in good standing in the Church, who ever wanted for bread." "The Lord provides for his children," according to the Psalmist. "I have never seen the righteous forsaken, nor their seed begging bread." Now is this a literal fact or is it a pious Loyola lie. It certainly is easily enough to be seen that a member in good standing in the Church could hardly be in want of bread, for such a state of poverty never could approach the Church requirements of fine dress, pew rents, and priestly taxation, and therefore could not have any standing at all. Churches are for the rich—built and sustained by them. They do not want their fastidious taste offended by the sight of honest or sinning poverty, or to have their godly silks and velvets come in contact with wicked rags. However inconsistent this statement of this President may seem at first, we are compelled to admit that she is right relative to not having seen Christian Church members in good standing in actual want. When such a misfortune overtakes them, they are no longer in good standing; although not at once put out, 'tis quite as effectually done by the distant nod, cold shoulder, and cut direct, until "poor misery" finds herself de trop among the gilded godly. An honest pride forbids a stay where she is not wanted.

Right here I fail to understand the use or efficacy of prayer. When suffering and starvation have exhausted the physical foundation for a moral support, can any amount of eloquent words addressed to a far-off unknown God relieve that hungry want without the assistance of bread and money?

In the name of all honesty, how long must human suffering be taunted and aggravated by pitiless prayers? How long must God-given intelligence be insulted with such bigoted superstitious offal? 'Tis time the simplest reason of civilization should rise in indignant protest against this miserable woodooism. These Christian Association women tell of a poor, wretched woman found in an old railway car who had two small children dependent on her for support. She struggled along with scant subsistence, which every day grew alarmingly less, until her hungry little ones begged her in starving appeals for bread. The great mother-love in her soul is ready for any sacrifice, even unto death, for her children—and right here Puritan piety says she fell—sold her body to feed those she loved. If that is called a fall, it was a fall among the stars of martyrdom; and she was more exalted in that moment, in her self-abnegation, than all the rigidly righteous who spend a whole life-time in trying to pray themselves out of hell or into heaven. We have had enough and too much praying already. A little good, unselfish work will successfully bridge the chasm demanded by prayer. This pious idleness is the cesspool in God's broad acres which has tainted humanity until crimes have reached the utmost possibilities of human ingenuity.

Nothing now can redeem the world but self-sacrificing work—the extreme opposite of this prayerful mania. To attempt by prayer what must be finally accomplished by work stands scientifically related to a man trying to lift himself over the fence by his boot-straps.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1877.

The Time has Come!

Not to shrink from the work we have undertaken; not to recoil and be abashed before the enemy when he aims to strike us to the earth; not to become timid and faint-hearted because ecclesiasticism would wield its immense power to crush us and extinguish our life; not to let our voice be weak and faint because the government of the country lends the aid of its courts, the strong arm of its laws to subdue and hold us in bondage for daring to utter our honest sentiments; not to lower our standard in the face of the forces of superstition and priest-craft that oppose us on every hand; not to cease to let our voice be heard against the gross evils that oppress and afflict the poor and needy of our land; not to relax our efforts in the cause of human freedom and mental liberty because the power of the Church is raised against us and has marked us for its prey; not to relinquish the glorious work of enlightening our fellow men and showing them the snares and pitfalls which surround them on every hand because the bloodhound of the dominant and aggressive religion of the day is upon our track and seeks to chase us into prison for a term of years, to break up our business and to render us powerless to send over the land any more of our papers, tracts, pamphlets and books, that carry the light of truth to our fellow beings and show them the enemy that seeks to deprive them of their rights and their liberties and make them vassals for life; not to abandon the self-sacrificing but glorious work to which we have sacredly devoted our life, our energies and what of ability we possess, because the enemy we are opposing is rich, powerful, arrogant, tyrannical, merciless, vindictive and cruel, and would grind us into the very earth, darken our light and cause our voice to be heard no more in all the land; No, no, the time has not come for any of these things to take place, but it has come for us to increase our strength, to double our diligence, and to be more and more determined to expose the wrongs that oppress our brothers and sisters in the great family of humanity; the time has come for us to stand firmer, to walk stronger, to speak louder, to fight harder, and to let our light shine with increased brilliance mid the darkness that surrounds us; the time has come for THE TRUTH SEEKER—while the hand of the assassin is still clutching at its throat—to bravely assert its rights in the land, to increase its means for doing good and become a power which the forces of priestcraft, bigotry, fanaticism and falsehood cannot destroy. Yes, the time has come for THE TRUTH SEEKER to double the number of its pages, to double its usefulness, to double its influence for doing good, to double its capacity for spreading light and intelligence over the land and to double the number of its readers and patrons.

Yes, friends, we have decided upon this course. While the attempt is made to crush us we are determined to rise with greater strength, while our foes decide that our voice shall no longer be heard in the land we are resolved to speak louder than ever, and let our resonant tones reverberate from hill to hill all over this fair country. We will hold up the torch of truth with a stronger arm than ever, that those sitting in dark places may see it from afar and gather unto it.

On January 5th, 1878, at the beginning of Volume V, THE TRUTH SEEKER will make its appearance with sixteen pages in place of eight; the time has come to take this step and we will not defer it longer; we have long felt the necessity for taking it, but prudential reasons held us back; now we feel that we must step forward and take the position we ought to occupy. When this change is made THE TRUTH SEEKER will be the largest Liberal paper published in the world, having one third more reading matter than any similar journal published in Europe or America. We mean that its usefulness and its worth shall be in proportion to its size. While it will be the largest of its class we mean that it shall be the most worthy, if not the ablest; and we hope to have the largest number of readers. We wish not to boast of what we intend to do, but we hope what we have accomplished during the past four years, with the feeble means we had at our command will be an earnest of what we will do in the future.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, as the thousands who have weekly read its pages will acknowledge, has had many good points: it has marked out a field somewhat its own, and it has not failed to attract the attention and to enlist the approbation of a large number of friends; but it has been too small. There has not been room for the many excellent communications that have been sent us, there has not been room for such scientific matter as we have been anxious to place before our readers; there has not been space for such selections from foreign and home journals and magazines that we wished to make; and there has not been space for several departments and lines of thought that we have been anxious to present.

With our increased pages, we wish to resume Professor

Haeckel's able dissertations on Evolution and Darwinism, and to give from week to week installments of that and other first-class scientific matter of a similar character. We hope to give our readers many specimens of bold thought and advanced views from the best writers of Europe and America, as they appear in the various reviews, magazines and periodicals on the other side of the Atlantic as well as on this. We hope also to begin the publication of another charming Radical story from the pen of Mrs. Elmira D. Slenker, and which we know thousands of readers will hail with delight. We also intend to resume "What I Don't Believe, What I do Believe, Why and Wherefore," which was so acceptable to many.

Among the new features of the enlarged TRUTH SEEKER will be a department, Correspondence Extraordinary from the Infernal and Supernal Regions, consisting of a series of letters written expressly for these columns from his Satanic Majesty, Old Lucifer himself, as well as his more arrogant brother, Jehovah or Jah of the Jews, and other noted personages that have figured in the mythologies and theologies of the world, including Brahm, Osiris, Jupiter Ammon, Pluto and several others. It is expected these distinguished characters will give our readers much light upon points not hitherto very well understood among mankind, and that they will throw considerable light upon the contentions and little unpleasantnesses that have for a long time seemed to mar the harmony which should rule in such an aristocratic and high-toned family. It is not necessary for us to explain fully how these letters reach us, but we will merely state that the distance is not so great from those regions to this world that in this day of lightning speed and telephonic despatches, communications cannot reach us daily without delay or obstruction. Besides, we may state, in the greatest confidence, that we have a devil of our own in our office, and should other agencies fail, he can always be relied upon in cases of emergency. We hope none will be disposed to doubt the reliability of these dispatches, either from the Tartarean regions or the blissful altitudes of Elysian abodes. They will be prepared expressly for this paper, and that should be a satisfactory guarantee of their genuineness and authenticity. These weird dispatches and letters will probably be continued for considerable time, for there are so many of those gods and devils who wish to talk through our columns, that it will take a good while for all to be heard from and to have a chance to say what is to be said.

A striking feature of the new volume, and one which we deem especially acceptable to our readers, will be the reported sermons or rationalistic discourses of Prof. Felix Adler every Sunday at Standard Hall on Broadway. We have made arrangements with a competent reporter to take down phonographically the Professor's lucid, able, and finished utterances, and we can assure our readers that they will find them excellent reading. Professor Adler is one of the most advanced thinkers of this advanced age. It will doubtless be remembered by many of our readers, that he left a professorship in Cornell University in consequence of his advanced thought and radical views.

The Bennett-Teed Discussion will of course be continued for months to come. The first proposition is not yet completed and two more prolific questions are to follow.

With the doubling of the pages, with the doubling of the amount of reading, with the doubling of the real value of the paper, there will not be a doubling of the price. All the additional reading matter named will be furnished for one dollar a year, or three dollars altogether. THE TRUTH SEEKER will be a sheet 33x46 inches. The largest of the other Liberal and Spiritualistic journals is 28x42 inches, so any one can easily calculate the difference in size. There will thus be some seven hundred more square inches of reading matter in every number of THE TRUTH SEEKER than is contained in any Liberal or Spiritualistic weekly now published. Besides, we do not intend to use as much space for advertisements as other journals use, thus giving more room for valuable reading matter.

The increase in price of one dollar per year will not be equal to the increased expense of type-setting, paper and printing, but we hope the difference will be made up in an increased number of patrons. Our list ought to be doubled for the new volume. We request every friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER to constitute himself a committee of one to obtain as many new subscribers as possible. If an adequate effort is made in this way, our number of readers and patrons may be largely increased. May we not hope the effort will be made? At the low price at which we offer our paper it must not be expected that we can give premiums to buy subscribers, and we trust none of our old subscribers will want us to hire them to continue on with us. We trust we have given them the full value of their money, and that they will not feel like dropping us now, because we propose to give them as much matter for an additional dollar as they are now getting for two dollars. But as we are disposed to be just as generous as we possibly can be, we will make this offer: To every new subscriber who will send us five dollars we will send them the enlarged TRUTH SEEKER for a year and mail them, as they may select, a copy of the revised edition of the "World's Sages, Thinkers and Reformers," or "Lord Amberley's Analysis of Religious Belief," or "Thomas Paine's Great Works Complete," or "The Champions of the Church" as soon as it is issued from the press. To new subscribers who will send us three dollars and a half, we will send them the paper for a year and a copy of the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion," or "The Truth Seeker Collection of Forms, Hymns and Recitations," as they may wish. Postage prepaid in all cases.

Those who will send us six new names shall be entitled to an extra copy of the paper gratis.

All new subscribers for Volume V, sent in before January first, will be entitled to the five December numbers included.

Now that we have thrown our banner to the breeze with renewed vigor and earnestness, despite the oppression and persecution that would bear us down to the earth, let it be seen how much our friends are disposed to do for us. We can do nothing without the support of friends over the country; we really hope they will not fail us now, and that they will allow themselves to be placed on the record in a favorable light. Who will strike with energy for the cause of truth and justice? Who will work for Volume V. of THE TRUTH SEEKER enlarged? Friends need have no fear that the paper will be discontinued. Though Comstock should succeed in sending us to prison, the paper will be kept alive. We have assistants that will be able to conduct it ably in our absence.

Our Examination Again Deferred.

On the 1st inst. we duly presented ourselves before Commissioner Shields to answer for the high crime of sending obscene, blasphemous, and indecent matter through the mails, but our great persecutor and prosecutor failed to put in an appearance against us; and as the District Attorney, Gov. Woodford, could not conveniently be present, and as he wished to give a little more time and consideration to the case, the Commissioner laid it over for another week, or until Dec. 8th. The supposition is gaining ground that Comstock is not so anxious to prosecute the case as he thought he was at first, while others think he is only preparing to go ahead more vigorously when he gets fully ready to "show his hand." We have lost very little sleep in dread of the consequences that may follow the suit. We feel confident that we are in the right, and we still believe in the final supremacy of the eternal principles of right and justice. Though they may be suppressed for a while, they must ultimately triumph over all opposition.

Comstockism.

As Anthony Comstock has set himself up as special guardian of the morals and good behavior of the country, and as he is considered to be one of the greatest champions of the powerful and aristocratic system of Christianity that at the present time commands public attention, it is only fitting that his evident motives and his modes of doing business should be taken under consideration.

When he emerged from the chrysalis state of a clerkship in a dry-goods establishment and conceived the great idea that he had a mission to perform in assuming the guardianship of the morals of the public, he was not long in making the discovery that the laws of the state and of the nation were not quite adapted to his mode of doing business, and so, backed by "The Society for the Suppression of Vice," which was a creation of his own, and the powerful and designing Young Men's Christian Association, of which he was an active and honored member—he repeatedly visited Albany and Washington, and by the representations and the manipulations needed to effect his object he succeeded, through the apathy and lack of watchfulness in those who should have been sentinels on the watch-towers of liberty, in obtaining the passage of a set of statutes to increase his power of action, which are more odious, more oppressive to numerous interests in the country, more subversive of American liberty, and more opposed to the fundamental doctrines of personal rights upon which our Government was founded than any similar number of statutes that were ever added to the laws of our country.

Armed with these weapons which he had caused to be forged for his own use, he was able to set his Jesuitical machinery into operation, to persecute and oppress individuals far better than himself, and to subordinate the courts of the United States to serve his cherished and vindictive purposes. He became an insinuating censor and Paul Pry in the postal department, and when he espied an unfortunate individual whom he judged he could make his victim, and who would not be able to make a defense sufficiently vigorous to loosen his grasp and throw off his power, instead of going to this individual as an honorable man would, and as a good Christian ought to, and say, "My friend, you are not acting in keeping with the laws of the country; you are, by certain conduct, rendering yourself liable to arrest; let me advise you to do differently in certain respects, and thus save yourself a great deal of trouble and expense"—instead of taking this honorable, high-minded course, he acted the part of a hypocrite, a spy and a dishonorable detective. When he had selected his prey, he began at once to lay his plans to entrap him and get him within his power. He would write letters of falsehood, signing false names and using the craft and vile subterfuge of a sneak, and to win the confidence of his victim, he would write him that he was in full sympathy with him and approved of the work the victim was engaged in, and thus by the most ignominious lies succeeded in his craft and hypocrisy. This he did in Lant's case; this he did in Dr. Foote's case; this he did in Dr. Abbey's case; this he did in Heywood's case; this he did in Jones' case, and this he did in our own case, and in several other instances.

He used his detestable arts to tempt and induce unsuspecting persons within his clutches. He was capable of going to a photographer on Broadway and trying to induce him to make some lewd pictures for him. When told by the honest photographer that he made no such pictures in his gallery, the response was, "Will you not make me some if I will bring you the negatives?" thus trying to the extent of his duplicity and hypocrisy to lure the honest man within his power.

It must not be denied that Comstock has done much good in suppressing a villianous trade in lewd and indecent prints and publications that never should be allowed to circulate, but he has done it in such an underhanded and ignoble way that it has detracted greatly from the good work sought to be accomplished; and from a spirit of sectarian bigotry and intolerance he has subjected many excellent men to his cruel legal tortures, depriving them of property, liberty and in some instances almost of their lives.

In the work of capturing illegal and immoral books and pictures he has greatly detracted from the commendability of his conduct by gloating over his foul trophies, exhibiting them in the meetings of his society, keeping them on exhibition in his office, inviting his personal friends to call and look them over and in filling his carpet-bag with the choicest ones—or rather, the most abominable ones—and parading them before members of the legislature at Albany and Representatives and Senators at Washington when he wished to carry out his purposes. These are his stock in trade and on these he relies for his moral suasion and intellectual influence. It is very noticeable that the most libidinous legislators, and Congressmen who are the most sensual and delight most in looking at obscene pictures, are those in favor of the passage of the most relentless laws against everything that squints in that direction. Possibly they imagine that in that way they make amends for the indulgence of their own uncurbed desires. Anthony himself may act upon this principle, for one has only to look at him and take in his physique, organization and "make up" in order to be convinced that he is man of full average sensuality, and the fondness he evinces for his impure trophies and the pleasure he takes in showing them to his cronies confirms it. And should he in course of the present session of Congress, become aware of the danger that awaits of his pet statutes being repealed or modified, it may be confidently expected that Saint Anthony will post himself off to Washington—drawing his usual mileage, of course—with a carpet-bagful, or a trunkful of the choicest of his stock in trade, to show members of Congress, and especially members of the Post Office Committee, what a great and holy work he has accomplished and how essential it is that those delectable statutes should be retained among the laws of the United States. When the pictures, etc., have been duly inspected, the conclusion that is expected to be arrived at is that Anthony Comstock is the grayer matter of obscenity that the world ever produced and that it is better that forty innocent men should suffer than that one such saint should be curtailed in the great work of adding more pictures to his museum and new trophies to his vast cabinet of indecent curiosities. "To the pure all things are pure," and per contra to the impure all things are impure.

We have said something in a previous article about the yearly profits that Anthony makes out of his saintly business; $4,000 salary to begin with, besides liberal allowances for witness' fees, hotel bills, etc., etc., etc. We are informed he is allowed by the U. S. Government, as prosecuting witness' mileage at the rate of ten cents per mile. As he very frequently makes business trips to Boston, Buffalo, Chicago, Indianapolis, Cincinnati and numerous other places, flying from one to another, making according to his own reports, some 25,000 miles per year, the $2,500 thus obtained from the Government comes in very nicely, especially as he is in the habit of "dead-heading" it over the various roads leading from this city, traveling on annual passes which his church connections enable him to obtain. Of course it is all right in the estimation of a man engaged in such a holy work to get ten cents a mile for his traveling and pay nothing for it, or in some cases, at the most, three cents per mile.

It is not easy to tell how much he makes by black-mailing his victims, but it may well be supposed to be considerable. He is fond of money and is not supposed to be wholly beyond its influence and charm. Parties have been arrested by him and thrown into prison with a heavy charge or a warrant issued against them and all at once they were set at liberty and no prosecution conducted against them. There is little question but what money passed from criminal No. 1 to criminal No. 2. Many men would prefer to pay out when arrested on a charge of obscenity rather than be disgraced by the affair getting into the papers and they be subjected to the enormous expense of defending a suit in the United States District Court. A thousand dollars would be but a trifle for a man of a sensitive nature to hand out rather than to have his reputation blackened, with a good chance of having a heavy fine to pay and to be imprisoned for a term of years; for it must be remembered that is but the smallest number of the obscenity cases in the criminal branch of the U. S. District Court, in this city that escape. A trial is almost equal to a conviction.

Had we plenty of money we could better have afforded to give the Christian Comstock one thousand dollars as "hush money" than to be arrested upon a damaging charge of issuing obscene publications; to have it published in nearly all the city papers under the heading "A Free Lover in Trouble," etc.; that we had been arrested for sending through the mails obscene matter too indecent to be mentioned—and this telegraphed to every town and village throughout the land—to say nothing of the cost of defending a suit, with a first-rate chance of being heavily sentenced. Many men would require several thousand dollars in hand paid to induce them to pass through such an ordeal. But this kind of thing is exactly in Comstock's line. He is a somewhat spicy correspondent, and delights in striking a man when he gets him down. When Dr. Foote was in trouble, it pleased the good Comstock to occasionally insert a notice in our dailies beginning, "An Abortionist Thwarted," etc. It is hardly presumable that a really good and honorable man would stoop to the mean and villainous conduct of basely traducing an unfortunate man he had already grossly injured. Advertising us as a free lover was contemptibly mean. From the time Comstock was a small boy we have lived faithfully with the wife of our bosom, and we have never, either in public or in private, advocated the doctrines of free love. But Mr. Comstock, after pouncing upon his victim, goes to work to blacken his good name so that the public will condemn him even before he has a trial, and that a conviction may be easy.

A friend of ours was approached by a Comstockian emissary and told that a U. S. warrant was soon to be issued against him, and an indictment would be found, but that a few hundred dollars would hush the case up and prevent exposure. This is a fact. It is hard to estimate the terror and the power that Comstock wields in this community. Of all the mean men in the world, a blackmailer is probably the meanest.

Comstock is sustained not only by the orthodox in religion, but by the orthodox in medicine. His heavy blows are dealt exclusively to the heretical portion of the community, who dare to read and think outside the regular and aristocratic schools. If any physician not numbered in one of the allopathic colleges presumes to write a work on physiology, the diseases of women, on spermatorrhoea, or on the relations of the sexes, Comstock will be after him with "a sharp stick." It is a settled thing in his estimation that any medical author who dares to write a book that is not approved by the regular old school—the same as in theology, if a man presumes to dissent from the regular theological authorities—should be put down and degraded. For this reason the old-school physicians and the old-school theologians to a man stand up for Comstock.

In view of all this, when we see that the services of such a man is needed to sustain the expensive and corrupt monopolies—the decaying systems of medicine and theology—what is to be thought of them? They must be bad in themselves to employ such a miserable prop to hold them up. An enlightened people may in time conclude to let these systems and their prop go together, while they look to reason, justice, and good common sense.

REV. O. B. FROTHINGHAM in his discourse last Sunday made allusion to Comstock's late arrest of the editor of this paper, in language much like the following. "The Church has recently laid its arbitrary hand upon a pure, sincere, aged editor, for sending blasphemous publications through the mail. Who in this age of knowledge shall decide what is blasphemous in Liberal literature and what is obscene in scientific publications? The victim of the Church this time is a conscientious, honest man of superior talent and purity of thought and who is struggling hard to elevate the race to a higher knowledge and nobler manhood and a purer womanhood. The honest and earnest effort of his life is to free humanity from the bane of ignorance, the scourge of superstition and the lash of the priesthood."

We profoundly thank Mr. Frothingham for his good opinion of us. It is worth the labor of a life-time to gain such approbation. We shall aim to be worthy of the favorable appreciation of so excellent, learned and worthy a man as Mr. Frothingham.

We hope the effort to obtain new subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER will be zealously continued. We like yearly subscribers best but will be glad to still send the papers to trial subscribers, two months for twenty cents. We would like about a thousand more of the trial subscribers and a thousand more of the yearly ones. There are thousands of persons who are not taking this paper who ought to patronize it. Our lists will hold many more names. It affords us pleasure to add to them. If so slight an effort on the part of our friends makes us happy why should we not be happy?

WHEN about a fourth part of the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER was printed, half of the form was thrown from the press and four pages pried upon the floor. A printer can easily understand the "fix" we were in. It took ten men about fourteen hours to get it right again, but after losing a day in giving thanks this put us so far back that a large portion of our subscribers were late in getting their paper. Accidents will sometimes happen in the best regulated families.

WE HAVE received a small paper called The Herald, or the Messenger of the New Covenant, edited by our friend and opponent, Cyrus Romulus R. Teed. It appears to be designed to prepare the public mind for a grand step forward of the human race in recognition of the principle of community life and celibacy. Would it not be well for Mr Teed to join the Shakers? They believe in community of interest, a life of celibacy, and in prophecy. Why should he not become one of them? As the paper is free, no one can complain of the price. His address is Moravia, N. Y.

Language is scarcely adequate to express to our many friends the lively sense of gratitude we feel for their great kindness. We hope to ever prove worthy of their confidence and esteem.

We have been compelled already, in preparing for our defense, to use a large share of the funds that have been so kindly sent us. The balance will be more than used in sending out the 20,000 petitions and accompanying documents to almost every town and village in the country. In this way hope we are not only effectually defending our own case, but we trust we are taking the proper steps to have the odious Comstock laws removed from the statutes of our country. If those who have pledged various amounts feel like sending in a part of what they have promised, the same shall be judiciously used in this manner.

Letters of Sympathy.

NEW ORLEANS, NOV., 25th, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: My arm is bad but my tongue is sound. I made a stirring appeal for you before the Spiritual Association to-day, and four subscribers for one year volunteered, and five for six months. I think the issue is to be fought out on the Liberal ground, and Atheists, Spiritualists and Freethinkers will have to unite on one common ground. Two subscribers did not hand me the money, two for one year did, and one for six months. I will send the other as soon as I get it. I enclose five dollars of it in this let me hear if it comes right. Did you get my letter last week, on receipt of yours and the papers? I was so provoked at the arrest I forgot the letter. I will write again soon. I enclose the names and directions. Send to each address the two papers containing Ingersoll's defense of Paine, and the one containing the notice of your arrest. Come at Last.

Your ardent well wisher, E. L. SAXON.

NEW HAVEN, CT., Nov. 30, 1877.

BROTHER BENNETT: Your liberal friends in New Haven deeply sympathize with you in your trouble in prospect, and will, no doubt lend their material aid. As an assurance of this, please set to my name as pledged for your support, ten dollars. I only wish I could make it one thousand times as much. Yours fraternally,

L. F. JOHNSON.

BRO. BENNETT: Feeling that your cause is our cause and knowing that you have not offended any law that is in harmony with the Constitution, I am brought to think that as a Truth Seeker and a lover of truth it behooves all as such to lend all the aid we can.

Although weak in financial affairs, I am strong in the cause. I pledge you five dollars to aid in your defense.

I would like to give more, but as I am only getting a salary of thirty dollars a month, I have done my best.

Wishing you success over error and wrong, I remain, respectfully yours,

F. H. SHERWOOD.

LYNCHBURG, O., Nov. 27, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am indeed sorry that you have been arrested but hope you may be acquitted. Am also sorry that I am financially unable to do much for you. One proselyte I have made says if $500.00 will assist you when it becomes necessary to help you the money will be placed at your disposal.

If possible, have Col. Ingersoll to assist you. I thought probably he would volunteer his services, but have not yet seen any account of it.

Free country this!!!

When you get blank petitions ready please send me one or two.

Were I able to live for a few years without labor, I would devote my entire attention to the destruction of Christianity. What a shame that the rising generation should be surrounded with such diabolical influences as are extant in these United States. It is suprising to observe the amount of ignorance and superstition still prevalent. Mr. Teed surely must be a little crazed or else has a curious way of manifesting his science. I think he has not had hold of many Liberals yet. When he gets through with you he will have learned some things of which he is now ignorant.

Success to you. Yours &c.,

THOMAS D. ARCHER, M. D.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., Nov. 27, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Enclosed find $2 which credit me on subscription to TRUTH SEEKER to March next.

I have been stirred with indignation by the infamous proceedings of that bigoted fanatic, Comstock. Having served as Postmaster a few years ago, I learned something of the bad use which was made of mail facilities, and was disposed to look favorably upon the avowed object for which Comstock was appointed. But I am overwhelmed with astonishment that he should be permitted to prostitute his office as he has done. If it is to be thus abused, or if the law recognizes such inquisitorial proceedings, let the law be forthwith abolished. Send me a few blank petitions and I will see that they are filled. Truly yours,

JAMES K. MAZIE.

NORTH HANNIBAL, NOV. 25, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: We were not so much surprised, as vexed at hearing of your arrest, for we understand Comstock's business to be in reality an effort to crush and blot out the opposers of the Church, but in this locality it is having the opposite effect. Although it is a hardship for you, still in the end we hope there may be a good result. It will have the effect here, we think, to more than double the subscription to your paper, besides some orders for books.

Already three new subscribers have been obtained and one order for a book, and the order is only withheld now in hopes to get more, but will be sent sometime this week with such additions as we are able to make. If the Liberal people throughout the U. S. understand this to be an attack upon free thought and mental liberty rather than the punishment of an offense, and see the need of aiding you in making your defense as they seem to see it here, Mr. Comstock's attempt to crush THE TRUTH SEEKER will result in more than doubling your subscription list.

My devotional exercises for the past week have consisted mainly in short prayers in which Comstock is made the object, nor have I been alone, "two or three have agreed as touching one thing," namely, Damn Comstock's intrigue! W. J. BRADT.

COLCHESTER, NOV. 27, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: My name to you is a stranger but let me assure you that yours has been an old acquaintance of mine for some time as I have been reading your works and your spicy paper for the last two or three years.

Your arrest by that famous rascal Comstock gave me quite a shock. Is it possible for them to put you in prison? No! We cannot spare you one moment from the ranks of the Liberals of America, and I feel it to be my duty and the duty of every Freethinker who loves truth to aid you in this trying ordeal if within his power.

I want Ingersoll to defend you and I only hope that he will offer his services gratis, as it should be his fight as well as yours. It should be our fight; a fight for freedom for our rights and for truth.

As I am not able to give anything at present I ask you to receive my pledge for Two Dollars if you should need it. I do wish that I could give you more, and which I would should circumstances permit.

Hoping that right will triumph over Christian persecution. I remain yours in truth,

HORACE E. SHERWOOD.

BRO. BENNETT: Concurring in the above, allow me to pledge two dollars to assist in your defense. Yours truly,

D. H. HOWELL.

OSCEOLA, IOWA, Nov. 26, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Having noticed your arrest by ignorance and superstition, I thought I would do what I could among our friends here to assist you. I have obtained almost every subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER that has been sent you from this locality, and many others besides. I send you the enclosed paper, with the names and amount paid by each—in all ten dollars—to assist in defraying the expenses that we know you will be put to.

Hoping that you may come out victorious over our common enemy,

We remain your sincere friends,

J. G. WATTS AND OTHERS.

FORT LEAVENWORTH,)

KAN., Nov. 27, 1877. }

BRO. BENNETT: The "jackal," Comstock, has another victim over whom he gloats, upon whom to satiate his diabolical spite. Another black and damning crime has been perpetrated by the minions of the fiendish Christian Church, another malign subversion of American liberties has been consummated by the bloody-minded, ruthless demon, Christianity! Do the Liberals of the country intend to quietly submit to such diabolical indignities, such hideous mockeries of the name of Justice? Perhaps, brother, this crowning stroke of Christian malevolence may serve to rouse up the Liberals to a full sense of the urgent needs of the hour, and to prompt united action on their part to resist all further encroachments upon their inherent rights and privileges.

I have, consequent upon your arrest, sent to the Banner of Light and the Investigator a forcible, stirring "Appeal to the Liberals of America!" embodying a scathing review of truculent Christianity's nefarious deeds from Jesus Christ to Comstock, and urging upon the Liberals to immediate vigorous action, to prompt, decisive work, in vindication of their dearest, holiest rights, ere it be too late; ere we, through apathy and inaction, find ourselves manacled hand and foot, prostrate at the fell tyrant's feet.

It seems to me that Col. Ingersoll should volunteer in your defense, that such is his bounden duty in the case. His own rights, as well as the rights of us all, are bound up in those of yourself, in this coming trial.

When printed, please send me some copies of the petition for the repeal of the present iniquitous laws. Fraternally,

WM. EMMETTE COLEMAN.

BROOKFIELD, Mo., Nov. 20, 1877.

DEAR BENNETT: I have just finished reading of the persecution and ignominious yet brave death of Edward Underhill, and was about congratulating myself on having the happy privilege of living in an age when men could freely think on religious subjects, and speak their honest convictions without being arrested by fanatic priests or religious bigots. Being young myself, I hoped that I might speak my thoughts freely, when they injured no one; but I know that such is not the case, for I have heard of your arrest by the watch-dog of religious superstition, Anthony Comstock, and in that act I see the same old spirit of intolerance and hatred that was manifested by the popish priests in the murder of Underhill—they only lack the power. If Comstock had the power to-day, he would, without a shudder, tie you to the stake, place the fagot around your body, and without flinching light the fire, and watch with joy and satisfaction your suffering and death. Does he, or his young Christian men (I am not one of them), think by this act to stop the spread of truth or extinguish the lights of Infidelity? Vain attempt! By the eternal! every spark of Freedom fanned by your persecution will blaze out and so illuminathe dark caverns of orthodoxy, that the old hulk, standing as it does on the dry dock of ignorance, will ignite, and when it has burned entirely, and the last vestige faded out of the human mind, then, and not till then, will we be free; but never so long as men believe in some Ignis fatuus that can be flattered by worship or pacified by the persecution of men, will we be free. Obscenity I am opposed to, but to me it is evident that the charge of obscenity is to color and make appear lawful—the real object being to satiate the hatred he bears for the Infidel to superstitions of the past. The Constitution of the United States says, "Congress shall make no law respecting an established religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abrogating the freedom of the Press." Question—Is the Constitution of the United States or Anthony Comstock the supreme power of the land?

Of the articles he has elected to stand on, one is a scientific physiological production, the other a purely Christian and godly piece. If men cannot, under penalty of law, discuss such questions, then the production, growth, etc. of animal life (or physiology) will be of little benefit, and if men cannot ask questions of Christ or direct open letters to him, then let Comstock shut the mouths of our Christian friends. But let me stop; orthodoxy will lose by this act. It will bring out timid Infidels, and every effort to smother a truth only makes it shine brighter and more firmly established.

With the very best desire for your success in defeating the schemes of our enemies, and that all true liberals will at the proper time assist you in fighting them to the bitter end, I am your obedient servant and brother,

MONT. M. CRANDALL.

BLACK HAWK, COI., Nov. 23, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: To cheer you up, and for the information of your friends, we telegraphed you last night what we were doing, and that we would remit to-day, and $87.50 left here for your defense at 5 P. M. Have not seen all the friends of equal rights we expect to, and knowing that you will need all that can be had, intend to keep moving in your behalf.

In doing so, we expect a good deal, aside from a reward hereafter; we expect the press to aid in defending virtue, and to arouse and prepare the sleeping public for any danger near at hand. We expect more than a political wrangle, more than a Chicago fire or a Peruvian earthquake; we expect Ingersoll to defend you! Not in a common way, but in a manner heretofore unknown, the eloquence and force of which will reach every true heart of the nation, to be remembered by all, and to form part of history for all time to come.

Knowing that you will not blame us for being proud, hopeful and independent, I remain as ever, Yours truly,

P. C. JOHNSON.

MILWAUKEE, Nov. 27, 1877.

MY FRIEND BENNETT: I am really sorry about your trouble, which the bigoted Comstock caused, but I hope good will come of it, then the Americans will awake from their slumbers and see the dangers that await the country. I cannot send you at present but a little money, but if it should be needed I will do my best. At present I send you P. O. order for $5.00. Two dollars for one copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER for '78; one dollar for "Christianity and Infidelity," and the balance to add to your trial fund.

Your friend,

A. MINSKI.

OTUMWA, IOWA, Nov. 27, 1877.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: I hope you will not think that I am tardy in giving expression to my feelings of sympathy for yourself, or of indignation and wrathful vengeance on account of the infamous, diabolical and fiendish inquisitorial persecution which the fanatical lunatic Comstock in behalf of the Christian pirates has commenced against yourself in particular, and all unbelievers in general. I cannot find language in which to express my abhorrence, detestation and burning wrath at this infamously piratical crusade against decency, respectability, virtue and common sense. I find myself totally unable to give adequate expression to my withering contempt for the laws and institutions of my country, for that Hospital of Incurables, that Insane Asylum, known as the American Congress, as well as for mankind in general, for whom I entertain the same kindly feelings of amity that I have for rattlesnakes, Modocs and Nez Percés. Indeed, I don't feel much like expressing sympathy in the present case. It looks too much like saying, I am glad I am not in your situation. I am decidedly on the war path, and feel much like buckling on my sword and a brace of "Colts improved" and coming to New York to deliver the only argument that Christian imbeciles have ever yet learned to comprehend.

I have been anxiously awaiting the result of the preliminary examination, and if it terminates unfavorably, I expect then to express my sympathy and that of this community, by raising for you a subscription of a hundred dollars if it lies within the bounds of possibilities. This community is red hot in sympathy and vengeance, but I fear that many will cool off suddenly when a subscription paper is presented to them. Don't fail to send me some blank petitions for the repeal of the infamous law under which you are indicted, or will be.

JNO. B. WINGATE.

MORRILL, KAN., Nov. 24, 1877.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Our holy orthodox inquisition has grabbed you at last. Well, that is what you get by not being a good Christian. If you had gotten up Bible illustrations, such as David with Bathsheba, Absalom with his father's concubine, etc., they might possibly have allowed you to illustrate Beecher and Elizabeth, providing you did it in the name of the Lord. It is delightful to see our Government cater to orthodoxy; to see it strangle on a little possum and swallow Bible, whale, church, debaucheries, swindles and immorality of every description.

Which is the most obscene or the most beneficial in a scientific point of view, that letter about marsupials propagating their kind, or old Lot debauching his daughters? I suppose they would be shocked beyond measure to hear a lecture on anatomy, or on the propagation of our species, but could sit for hours and be greatly edified to read out of that precious book of the debaucheries of Abraham, Lot, David, Solomon, and a host of other Bible pets.

No, friend Bennett, you ought to have got license by joining the Church, then you could have published anything from propagating a toad down to as mean a thing as Anthony Comstock. What a buzzard's beak he has! I wonder if it would not be a good idea to gorge him with holy writ from such passages as above referred to, with old Ezekiel's bill of fare, etc. I think if four or five thousand Infidels would give him a dish seasoned with Amnon's love for his sister and the amorous songs of Solomon, we could fill his maw to repletion. If the Inquisition is to be revived, let them bring it back in all its pristine vigor. For my part, I'd rather submit to the most severe torture than to be sentenced to a term of years in one of our unhealthy prisons by a bigoted judge and jury. No, it is not obscenity they are trying to squash, but free thought, and they will find it a sharp thorn in the side of Christianity, and the more they disturb it, the more it will scratch. I can't do much, but that little I will do cheerfully. I will send you, if needed, four dollars, and more if I can. Produce is very low and money hard to get.

I subscribe myself your friend,

J. W. SCOTT.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS., Nov. 27, 1877.

Please send me four or five of your blank petitions as soon as issued. You have my hearty sympathy. We are going to make a good fight in the East over Heywood's case, and if you do the same in New York, Comstock will have his hands full. Perhaps I shall be the next victim. Very truly yours,

BENJ. R. TUCKER.

HARTFORD, Nov. 27, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: The books and your postal received this morning. Very much pleased with books and tracts, and pray to God that you may not be interrupted in your glorious work. You are teaching a head religion—that which cannot help to make men and women better, for it teaches them self-reliance, individuality, integrity, industry, and common sense; while the heart religion of the Christian Church makes a menial, submissive slave and hypocrite who is ready to do the dirty work of his masters, even to persecution and murder. But go on, Brother Bennett, and may God bless you. Send me a few petitions as soon as you can and I will do the best I can.

Yours, &c.,

D. BODIFIELD, M. D.

LOUISVILLE, KY., Nov. 29, 1877.

DEAR UNCLE BENNETT: I received your kind letter of Nov. 11th and would have answered it last week, but waited until I should receive my paper and thereby ascertain your fate at the hands of Comstock & Co. As yet I do not learn what they have done in the way of injustice towards you, but let it be what it may, I know that you are a brave, true man and will not shrink in moral cowardice if the worst comes to the worst. In every battle some must fall, but it would be a great blow to the Liberals for one of our greatest leaders to be taken from us now. "Hope on; hope ever" is my motto, and one that is well adapted to this case. Dear uncle Bennett, it will be a sad blow to hear of ill-fortune to you, and I sincerely wish that I could help you fight the battle—could stand by your side and help you defend yourself from the foe, not only for your sake individually, but for the sake of justice and liberty of speech.

They may crush us down, but a real convert to Liberalism and common sense—which is rather an uncommon article—of which, thanks to your efforts, there are many, can never be won back to the Bible and Christianity. That is a glorious thought to cheer you, and remember that every one of those real converts are going to quietly spread the truth and dispel superstition. I see many friendly letters in the last issue of the paper, which must be very encouraging to you. Uncle Bennett, let us hope for the best, and I shall not despair until the last hope is gone. I am trying to be as liberal as possible, therefore I make no ill wishes, use no harsh names, and make no threats toward Anthony Comstock. His conduct does not appear either honorable or Christianlike to us; but I drop the veil of charity between him and myself. Remember that many hearts are now throbbing for you in the United States, and many will be "leal and true" to you and our common cause. I like Ella Gibson's letter; there is the ing-of true metal in it, and it sounds like a clear, silvery bugle calling to arms—to be up and doing. Send me a blank petition and I will work for the cause by obtaining every signer that I can. I remain

Your loving niece,
WINNIE.

INNERKIP, ONT., Nov., 27, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: I see by the T. S. that you have got into trouble. You have need of some one to pray for you; and as Comstock & Co. are praying folks, they will be likely to bear you in mind when they next approach the throne of grace. Do you suppose that they will ask the Lord to be merciful to D. M. Bennett? Not much. But rather ask the Lord to "Shake him o'er the mouth of hell,

And let him hinc and roar and yell,
Wi' hideous din.
And if he offers to rebel
Just heave him in."

And of course you will be sure to rebel, and to hell you must go. And in a few more years Comstock will expect to be sitting on one side of that great gulf and you on the other. You will have time then to chat over these matters. You will be asking Comstock to send some one to suppress that TRUTH SEEKER establishment, and he will tell you the Y. M. C. A. will attend to that. I can't help thinking how he'll twit you with your Infidel doctrines when he sees you "over there."

The trouble is, "the lines have not fallen to you in pleasant places." You have not a "goodly heritage." You are badly organized. You have too much brains, and they are of a wretched bad quality. You seem to be unable to accept for truth what other folks tell you to believe. You will keep questioning things that you ought to accept without examination.

I fancy if Fowler had hold of your cranium he would say: "This is an unfortunate head. It will be very hard for the owner of this head to keep out of jail. A brain like this should never be educated. If this gentleman can read and write he will get to know too much, and he will be sure to tell what he knows. And folks won't stand that in this age of the world?" He would most likely go on to say, that if you had less in the front of the head and more in the back, you would stand better with the Christian societies in the world. So much brain in front causes a waste of food. It escapes in thinking and reasoning, which are not needed; our forefathers have done all that for us. What is wanted now is lots of children, and for that it is all the better to have a large back brain and a good thick neck, etc. I trust you will see the source of your difficulties. You are not to blame. Your crime is the outflow of certain conditions, the effect of a certain cause. If you had been born an idiot you would not have had this trouble. If you had been so constituted that you could "come to Jesus" you would have had no trouble. The time may come for such as you to exist, but it is not yet in the United States, at all events.

There was a man, they say, something like you, who lived a long time ago. He also gave the officials of the nation offense. He would not fall down and worship the image that the king had set up. So they put him into the den of lions. (This is no new game that is being played on you, Bennett.) Well, this man belonged to the Y. M. C. A., and they were in the minority at that time and not able to hold their own very well. So God had to help. They say he shut the mouths of the lions so they did not hurt him. But you need not expect any help of this kind. You are on the wrong side. Now, although this man was a good deal like yourself, it was principally in having a mind of his own and a determination to stick to what he believed was right. But since that man lived times have changed. The Y. M. C. A. have become strong, and don't need any divine aid. Comstock & Co. can manage all that kind of thing.

Right or wrong, you have my sympathy.
F. MALCOLM.

ANGOLA, STEUBEN CO.,
MD., Nov. 27, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Esq.: Enclosed please find five dollars, contributed by Martha Gale, also five dollars by the undersigned, which sums you will apply in such manner as you may deem proper in relieving yourself from the Gospel snare set by Comstock. These persecutions date far back in the early times of the Christian Church. Galileo for holding and propagating opinions not sanctioned by the Church was compelled to retract and deny the truth of the grandest scientific discovery of that or any other age. Servetus atoned for his heretical opinions at the stake at the hands of that great Christian reformer, John Calvin.

To the Christian Church we are indebted for the introduction of the thumb-screw, the rack, and other methods of torture devised and applied by its adherents to correct heretical opinions.

The descendants of the pilgrims, at the bidding of the Church, cruelly tortured the Quakers and burned the witches.

Can the stream be purer than the fountain whence it flows? Then why should we expect a United States mail, or a Constitution, or a court (that the church has found it can corrupt and use for its own base purposes) to guard the rights and minister to the wants of the people? The spies and emissaries of the Church are busy everywhere striking down the liberties of the people, and on their ruins planting the creeds and dogmas of the Church.

Hoping that your arrest and persecution will have the effect to awaken the American public to the danger now threatening the freedom of thought and speech, I remain, truly yours,
A. W. HENDRY.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 3, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Esq., Dear Sir: I send you the official action of the Liberal League of the District of Columbia. In addition to the passage of the resolutions enclosed for publication, I, as President, have been requested by a vote of the League to appoint a committee of three to secure the abrogation of the palpably unconstitutional law by which you are being persecuted. I shall appoint on that committee the greatest of living orators on this continent, and two others who have seen long service in Congress, and the law will be repealed and Comstock will find himself in trouble before he is ready for it.

The following are the resolutions passed:

WHEREAS, The Constitution of the United States provides that no law shall be made, State or National, respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or press, and also provides that the people shall be secure in their persons and property against unreasonable search and seizure; and

WHEREAS, The law relating to the transmitting of mail matter (Revised Statutes, pp. 671-3), prohibiting the circulation of obscene and other immoral matter through the mails of the United States is in violation of the intent and spirit of the Federal Constitution, and by reason of the vagueness and ambiguity of its terms is liable to be and has been made the instrument of great abuses against liberty of conscience, personal liberty and private property; and

WHEREAS, The said obnoxious law was smuggled through the Congress of the United States at or near the close of the session, without due consideration or debate, without public demand or necessity, without precedent, and at the instance of one Anthony Comstock and a few fanatics of his class, for the purpose of gratifying private malice and making it the instrument of religious intolerance, bigotry and persecution for opinion's sake; and

WHEREAS, Said Comstock has procured himself to be appointed the chief agent for the enforcement of the possibilities of this palpably unconstitutional and invidious law and the accomplishment of his personal aims and ends, and in that capacity, at the excessive cost and on the semblance of authority, has instituted a modern Inquisition and adopted a nefarious system of decoy detection, disgraceful to the Government he pretentiously represents and in violation of the terms of the law itself, whereby he has dishonorably inveigled unsuspecting persons into the perpetration of acts which he (Comstock) construes to be violations of the law, and has caused numerous persons to be incarcerated for acts clearly and positively not criminal, and also not contemplated in the law, and has without due process of law unreasonably demanded, seized and carried away private property; and

WHEREAS, The recent arrest of D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, of New York City, for sending alleged obscene and blasphemous printed matter through the mails, and the unlawful and insulting seizure of his private personal property is a direct blow at the rights of conscience, liberty of speech, pen and press and the right of private property of every citizen who may dissent from the views of the ignorant fanatic who now uses the sovereignty of the general Government to execute the behests of charlatans in morality and bigots in religion; and

WHEREAS, The incarceration, for eighteen months, of John A. Lant, a man harmless in his nature, devoted to the amelioration of the condition of his fellow-beings, even to martyrdom—for sending through the mail, in answer to decoy letters, forged and sent by the aforesaid Comstock, copies of an obsolete newspaper, containing chiefly vulgar and obscene extracts from the Bible—is an insult to the progressive intelligence of the age, an assault on personal liberty and rights of conscience, and prophetic of what we must expect in the near future if such monsters as Comstock are allowed to dictate and execute laws worthy only of the dark ages of vice, corruption, superstition, and ignorance, and such laws, it is shameful to relate, are permitted to remain on our Statute Books; and

WHEREAS, Numerous other persons, by this same unworthy, unwarranted and unconstitutional means have been deprived of their liberty and property, under pretexts the most malicious and frivolous, and the United States has been cheated and defrauded out of enormous sums, ostensibly in costs for maintaining able prosecutors, and all without adequate returns in the sum of the results of inquisitorial persecutions; and

WHEREAS, The law in itself, from its ambiguity, may at any time be made the instrument of tortures and persecutions for opinion's sake by such fiendish creatures as Comstock; therefore,

Resolved, That the said obnoxious and odious law should be at once repealed or so amended as to make it an impossibility for bigots and fanatics to use the name or the authority of the United States for the invasion of conscience or property; and

Resolved, That Congress should immediately institute a rigid and searching investigation into the practical working of this law, the methods used by Comstock, and the cost of his operations;

Resolved, That Congress should make ample restitution to the persons who have been improperly and wickedly persecuted under cover of this odious semblance of law;

Resolved, That the arrest of D. M. Bennett for the matter and in the manner alleged is a high-handed and villainous outrage demanding marked and emphatic public rebuke; that our sympathies and substantial aid are due him and all innocent victims of this foul conspiracy against freedom of conscience in the name of common morality and decency; and finally,

Resolved, That all good citizens are bound by all the obligations of life, liberty and happiness to resist to the utmost of their ability the enforcement of this law as now interpreted by Comstock and inhumanly enforced by Judge Benedict of New York City.

The above resolutions were unanimously adopted by the Liberal League of the District of Columbia at its regular meeting on the second day of December, 1877.

This League is one of the oldest and largest in the United States, having a membership of over two hundred, embracing ladies and gentlemen of cultivated minds from every State in the Union, and many of the gentlemen holding responsible and influential positions under Government, many many of the lady members occupying the highest positions in the social circles of Washington society, and several enjoying national reputations in the arts, sciences and literature.

J. WEED COREY,
Pres. Liberal League, D. of C.

For publication by a vote of the League, and commended to the kind consideration and attention of both the liberal and the secular press throughout the United States and the Canadas.
J. WEED COREY.

OTTAWA, O., Nov. 26, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please find within five dollars. Should you need it in defense of the liberties of an American citizen against the modern Jesuitism—the Young Men's Christian Association—use it and draw on me for more. Should you not need it in the defense, you may give me credit for the same.

Send out blank petitions to every Liberal in this broad land, with a true statement of the cases you have on file, showing how the liberties of the people are assailed by this modern Moloch. Point them to Spain and other priest-ruled countries for examples of persecution. Show them we are fast drifting upon the rocks which wrecked a Grecian and Roman republic and for more than a thousand years wrapped a world in superstition and darkness. The time has come, in my opinion, for the American people to arise in their mighty strength and once more strike for the liberties which were guaranteed to us by our forefathers.

"Give us liberty or give us death."

Yours, etc.,
DR. ED. BEARDSLEY.

MR. BENNETT: Comstock is the proper man to be arrested instead of yourself—you not knowing that your documents were obscene—while he knowingly caused what he considered obscene to be deposited for mailing and delivery, and knowingly caused such to be taken from the mail; not for the purity of the mail but for the filthy lucre that will flow into his pocket through this Christian scheme. Save for this species of swindling, no such moral suasion would be brought to bear for the protection of the mail any more than is now for private transfer.

"To the pure all things are pure," and purity is an article foreign to Comstock, who can have no appreciative idea of its merits. Nor can there be a more obscene man in the nation than he who takes the lead in such an enterprise—making what he claims to be obscene his chief stock in trade, advertising his business in the courts and the public prints.

How would the world and the nation suffer were there no such men to do the dirty work? People in the East have been starving in untold numbers, the result mainly, it is said, of excessive population. It is far more reprehensible, degrading, and obscene to, by any means, induce such a state of things as that than to by any possible means avoid it. It would have been much more sensible and humane for Congress to pass a law to disseminate all useful information tending to such a result rather than the existing law. It would have been done, too, did the increase of population visit man with the severity that it visits woman.

Comstock would have served as readily with an income of $20,000, more or less, never dreaming of obscenity; while as now, if Comstock is not arrested it seems as though the marsupials ought to be.

Respectfully,
M. U. F.

DAVENPORT, IOWA, Nov. 24, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir—Your shameful arrest I believe will warm up the Liberals of the country. They will now see that there is great cause for action and for uniting into societies. I do not doubt that your friends, or better, the friends of the great cause will contribute the money you may be fined, but should you also be compelled to endure imprisonment—which your friends cannot obviate—then bear the torture with the courage of a lion. I do not believe that much good will come from such arrests by Comstock; it will tell what Christians tolerated in the nineteenth century.

My thoughts are much engaged with your situation, hoping that your business will continue even should you have to bear the worst.
Most respectfully,
G. H. KRUSCHKE.

BALTIMORE, Nov. 25, 1877.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir—The Free Religious Discussion Society of Baltimore, believing that the principle of religious freedom and toleration is endangered through your arrest by the agents of the Young Men's Christian Association, for sending through the mails, what they, through bigotry, are pleased to call "obscene matter," has this day passed the resolutions, that a voluntary contribution be taken for four successive Sundays, to defray the expenses of your trial.

Therefore please accept the enclosed amount of $7.00, this day's collection, with the sympathy of the Association.
F. FRIEDENRICH, Treasurer.

CHARLES CITY, IOWA, Nov., 25, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: I see by the last TRUTH SEEKER that you have been arrested by that spy of the Y. M. C. A., and he appears to be capable of doing all they ask him to. I hope you will come out ahead. You have been pretty out-spoken, and you must be stopped in some way, if not by argument, by force, as Servetus was by Calvin. Friends out here say they will contribute to your defense what they are able, for they consider it is an attack on them as well as you, and your defense is theirs also. Herein you will find a draft for ten dollars, five from Mrs. A. B. Mahara, my wife, and five from myself toward defending you. If you have no need of it for that purpose you may give us credit and we will take the amount in books when we need them. Hoping this will find you at liberty and free from the trouble of litigation, I remain,

Your sincere friend,
JOHN MAHARA.

CENTRAL CITY, COLORADO, Nov. 23, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Respected Sir—Enclosed find draft for $67.50. The credit for the exertions in your behalf is mainly due to Mr. Peter C. Johnson of this City. The different amounts were contributed in part as donations to help defray the expenses of your coming trial, with the best wishes of the donors as to the ultimate results, and in part as subscriptions for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Yours, etc.,
F. KRAUSE.

BALTIMORE, MD., Nov. 26, 1877.

MR. D. M. BENNETT AND LOVERS OF LIBERTY: Accept my mite towards aiding the great interest which is at stake. The cause of Bennett is our own. Some may regret that the tracts were published, but regrets are of no avail now.

These are the times that try men's souls—and pocketbooks. The summer subscriber and sunshine reader will at this crisis shrink from the service of his cause; but he who stands it now deserves the thanks of man and woman. Comstock, like hell, is not easily overcome, but we have this consolation: the greater the struggle the more glorious the victory.

The inevitable crisis has come, and it behooves us to boldly face the enemy. If we lose, we at least have the satisfaction of knowing we did our honest duty. But if we win, we can then be happy in the thought of having rendered some one assistance. I can hardly agree with our friend from Philadelphia, Mr. Beaumont, that "when we cast away the fear of hell we close our pocketbooks at the same time." The gentleman has given up the chase as a lost cause. Let him remember that truth and justice are never lost. They may be ignored, trodden down, or carelessly misplaced, but never lost. No doubt Liberals will not contribute toward the darkness and dreariness of superstition, but they will to open wide the portals of truth and reason.

Sincerely yours,
GEO. F. KESSLER.

NEW YORK, Nov. 16, 1877.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Friend: Regarding and esteeming you from a poor man's point of view as the champion of universal liberty and freethought, the defender of right and justice, the denouncer of oppression and tyranny, and the standard-bearer of love and equality, I cheerfully send $1.00 (regretting my inability to send more) to use as you see fit in the cause of universal liberty.

My sympathies are deeply yours as a lover of liberty.

Thousands of poor men would willingly respond to your call were they acquainted with your paper.
Your Friend,
EDWARD C. SWANN.

PATCH GROVE, WIS., Nov. 22, 1877.

BRO. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Yesterday I received your last No. of the T. S., and was pained to learn that the Protestant Inquisition had you in its clutches.

Yes, you shall have my contribution of $10, in a few days, or as soon as I can get to an order office, and ten more as soon as it is needed for expenses. This money is not a personal donation to you, but as you are one of the color bearers of the Mental Liberty element of the country, and now personally in distress, I through you, aid in the protection of my rights and my fellow Liberals' rights, as well as yours.

Supineness, indifference and want of care for our rights are the dangerous grounds on which we may be wrecked. My dear brother Liberals, shall this be the cause of our ruin?

A little money will help, but let your personal influence be felt in every direction—on courts, Senators, Representatives in Congress, on church-members, lay and clerical. Our liberties are in danger; our turn will come soon. This obnoxious law under which the base Inquisitor Comstock acts must be wiped out or modified so as not to endanger freedom of speech and press. It can be done if all of you will work for it with determination. I am now near three score and ten. May I not hope to see my country freer and better than I found it, before I make my final exit?

Yours for justice, though churches fall and end in general ruin,
J. WARREN.

DETROIT, MICH., Nov. 26, 1877.

DEAR BRO. BENNETT: Your last paper is now before me, and I have just read your article, "American Liberty," and think you lay out Comstockism in excellent style. I am very sorry that this thing has happened; but never mind; it will come out all right in the end. Don't be too much exercised over the matter; remember that the people will look upon the interest of the articles published, and will at once discover the cause of all this mischief, and will set themselves at work to remedy the evil. The matter certainly needs a little agitation, and I think, like so many of our brethren that "Bob" is the man to do the agitating. sincerely hope he will volunteer to "carry you through." You know as well as I do that there has been a large amount of literature carried through the mails that is obscene and calculated to arouse the animal passions beyond the control of many persons whose intellects have not been properly cultivated; and for the good of the community it is well to have such works suppressed. The great trouble in all such cases is to draw the dividing line. What is obscenity? This is the great question for this court to decide. "To the pure in heart all things are pure," though by logical reasoning.

to the depraved all things are vile; and this, no doubt, accounts for Comstock's manner of procedure. I read with a great deal of interest the "Open Letter" and "How do Marsupials Propagate," and I never thought of obscenity. It seems to me that a man must be only a beast, almost as low as the marsupial itself, to construe a purely scientific subject like this as to make it obscene. If this is obscene, then all works upon physiology used in our common schools are obscene. I have faith to believe that the court will at once see that this whole transaction is simply a mean advantage taken by this detestable and idiotic Comstock, under a law intended by the people for good, to persecute and ruin those who happen to entertain views differing from his. And this is wherein the danger lies. Will the religious views entertained by the Judge so blind him to the sense of right as to cater to the interests of a sect instead of the whole people? We know what has been done in the past; but let us all hope that the world does move; let us hope that the world has seen the last of the holy inquisition, and that the history of Galileo and his discoveries may be a vivid light before this court, and his Honor see to it that he is not making history that will be viewed with the same contempt as that. If I had money or influence I would use them both in your behalf. But I have not much, if any, of either. I claim to be an honest man, and, you know, at the present time such stand but a very small chance. But let us hope and press on, believing that if the time has not already arrived, it will, sooner or later, when we shall be appreciated and somebody's children will rise up and call us blessed. Fraternally yours,

GRANVILLE WOOD.

NEW HARMONY, IND., Nov. 26, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: We cannot better express our indignation against the condition under which you are indicted than by sending you a check for $25.00. Yours respectfully, JOHN CHAPPELSMITH.

MARGARET CHAPPELSMITH.

NEW YORK, Nov. 30, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: Unlike most of your correspondents or readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I am neither pained nor regretful because of the notoriety which the proceedings of Anthony Comstock will give you. The position you have heretofore taken, and which has won its way to favor by its honest, straightforward simplicity and common sense, will, with undoubted certainty, be the more rapidly felt and believed for this outrageous tyranny; and the obloquy and persecution you may encounter will in time embalm your memory in the grateful hearts of thousands.

You have this advantage: you are no hypocrite, are honest and act up to your highest convictions of right.

This Guardian of Morality—Custos Morum—and three-fourths of the Church he represents are cowards, and dare not speak what they honestly believe.

I will add my mite toward defraying the expenses of your trial by placing at your disposal one hundred pictures of Ingersoll.

Yours for truth and justice, C. A. N. SMITH.

MILL BROOK, CT., Nov. 26, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: I cannot find words to express my indignation at the intolerable outrage committed upon you by that detestable character Anthony Comstock. My very blood boiled when I read its announcement in your columns, and old though I am, I felt like throwing away the staff and shouldering the musket. Such feelings, I think, are excusable under the circumstances. It almost seems as if we were drifting back to the times of puritanism and blue-laws. Can it be, that in the last part of the nineteenth century, in this our boasted land of liberty, such things are tolerated. Land of liberty!—bah!—may it never be spoken while such an intolerable law hangs frowning over us. Words alone don't amount to much, and yet, if the people should hold their peace and keep silent, it seems to me the very stones would cry out. We (myself and wife) have been Spiritualists for a quarter of a century, but we are readers and admirers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I think Spiritualists throughout the land should make common cause with Materialists and all Liberals in this matter. Religious intolerance unrestrained, knows no bounds, as we have seen in the past, and the Spiritualists' turn may yet come to feel its venomous fangs. This hydra-headed monster is now raising its last head (the others have been lopped off) and thrusting out its forked and venomous tongue in the form of Anthony Comstock.

May not D. M. Bennett be the Hercules to give a final quietus to the monster?

Will not the liberal-minded, and liberal-hearted ladies of our country join in the contest? They are denied the ballot, but not the right of petition, so send your petitions for signatures broadcast over the land, and let us give a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether and rest not until this execrable law is numbered among the dishonored things of the past.

Myself and wife pledge ourselves for ten dollars to the defense fund. Yours truly,

HARVEY W. PINNEY.

BURR OAK, Nov. 26, 1877.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT—Yes, more than brother do I esteem you, and sympathize with you in view of the prosecution and expense inflicted upon you by the bulldogs of superstition, bigotry and spite. And for the cause of truth, liberty and justice, which you so ably defend and promulgate, my heart and soul are with you; and if you are thrust into prison they will be with you there. I hope and trust THE TRUTH SEEKER will be published as usual and continue to shed light and reason through the land. I herewith contribute my mite to the support of the Gospel of Truth by sending you herein enclosed ten dollars, not as a donation (which I sincerely wish I was able to make.)

but only for the profits you may make on the enclosed list of books. Since your arrest I have been enabled to procure four subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER that I was not able to get before, and I think I can get others to subscribe soon. So you see there is no great evil or loss but works some good or gain.

Yours in sympathy, M. P. THURSTON.

ROCKLAND, ME., Nov. 27, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Enclosed find one dollar to be credited on my subscription, and two dollars as a donation from A. M. Austin. When a man cannot write or speak his honest sentiments it is about time thinking men should be looking about to see what we are coming to. Send me a blank petition to sign for the repeal of Comstock's infamous law.

Yours truly, F. W. SMITH.

BOSTON, Nov. 29, 1877.

MY DEAR BENNETT: I have been so encompassed with my own immediate trouble that it has been an utter impossibility for me to write you during the interim since your most outrageous arrest.

You have my deepest sympathy and I hope that you will fight them to the utmost.

When will bigotry and superstition be satiated? Language is inadequate to express my contempt for the underhanded course that has been practiced upon you by the self-conceited inquisitors of the 19th century in the means they adopted to procure your arrest.

Oh, had I but the purse to equal my will, how much I would do for you in this your hour of need!

I was myself arrested last week with all connected with my place of business. My stock was all seized. I am to have my trial next week, Wednesday, Dec. 5th. I am arrested under the Mass. State law and think that I can beat them, but of course there is an uncertainty in courts and juries.

Hoping and believing that justice will triumph, I am Truly yours, FRANK RIVERS.

DOVER, N. H., Nov. 28, 1877.

MY DEAR MR. BENNETT: Is the vilest obscenity even more demoralizing than the idea and teachings of a vain, partial, unjust, deceitful, revengeful God.

"An honest God is the noblest work of man."

When our illustrious Darwin on Saturday last received the degree of doctor of civil laws which developed men have considered him entitled to long ago, and an effigy of a monkey with the legend "The Missing Link," on it came down from the gallery, what an appropriate and regular gradation it would have been. If the Pope and his crew, Moody and Sankey, Josephus F. Cook, Anthony Comstock, with all their co-workers could have followed, and discussed their unchaste and irrational question about the immaculate conception, and at last men who could have treated with Mr. Darwin the truly chaste, rational and important question regarding the regulation of propagation.

If Anthony Comstock and his co-operators can reconcile the using of another man's name, and conceding his so-called Christian name, with justice and true religion, Benedict Arnold must be their archangel. Can we wonder that such persons halloo for a Savior? Cheer up; truth and justice must prevail, and in this land we have at least a better chance to develop liberty than in any other, and we hope there are thinking men and women enough to guard against the fangs and hypocritical machinations of such beings. Co-operation as it is so well commenced by the Liberal League will erase from the statute books, such miserable pharisaic laws. Please send me some of the petitions to Congress. I enclose my mite to defray expenses; it is all I can spare now, because I paid my taxes to-day, which I always willingly do, except that part which we have to pay for foxy transactions and for institutions where the mind is perverted. Yours for truth, CARL H. HORSCH.

Cupid Abroad.

BUCHANAN, MICH., Nov. 15, 1877.

MR. EDITOR: Liberal principles are certainly on the increase, as you will see from the following notice:

MARRIED—At the residence of the bride's father, in Berrien county, Mich., Monday evening, Nov. 12, 1877, by themselves, Mr. R. H. Coveney to Miss Alma L. Beach; all of Berrien county, Mich.

The marriage ceremony was performed by themselves, and the form chosen was "Form 1st" of "The Truth Seeker Collection." At the close of the ceremony appropriate remarks were made by myself from "Form 2" of the same Collection.

The bridegroom is the son of Joseph Coveney, the veteran advocate of Freethought in this county. The parents of the bride are members of the Methodist church, and the fact that they sanctioned this greatly improved form of solemnizing marriage, shows that they at least are not so bigoted as many of the ministers of that denomination.

The affair has created quite a sensation among church members in this vicinity, and especially among the clergy, who can see that their large revenues in this direction are slipping slowly but surely from their grasp, and that in the near future priestly bigots will not be called upon to consummate this great event in the life of people—the matrimonial contract.

This is the first marriage I believe under the new form given in "The Truth Seeker Collection," and as our young friends start out on their venture with a clear sky and prospects bright, we hope that the future also will have naught in store for them but happiness and a prosperous voyage through life. May they ever stand by the noble cause they have espoused, and by a life of usefulness help to advance the principles of mental freedom!

GEORGE W. REESE.

Gems of Thought.

As you cannot avoid your own company make it as good as possible.—Roe.

I look upon death to be as necessary to our constitution as sleep. We shall rise refreshed in the morning.—Franklin.

Trust him little who smilingly praises all alike, him less who sneeringly censures all alike, him least who is coldly indifferent to all alike.—Lawater.

CULLEN whispered in his last moments; "I wish I had the power of writing or speaking, for then I would describe to you how pleasant a thing it is to die."—Dr. Derby.

THERE is so much trouble in coming into the world, and so much more, as well as meanness, in going out of it, that it is hardly worth while to be here at all.—Lord Botolphclaydon.

That seeking for a God there, and not here; everywhere outwardly in physical Nature, and inwardly in our own soul, where alone he is to be found by us—begins to get wearisome.—Carlyle.

THERE is nothing more to be esteemed than a manly firmness and decision of character. I like a person who knows his own mind and sticks to it; who sees at once what is to be done in given circumstances and does it.—Hazlitt.

THERE is philosophy in the remark that every man has in his own life follies enough, in the performance of his duty deficiencies enough, in his own mind trouble enough, without being curious after the affairs of others.—Dibdin.

EVERY discovery made in physical science is a step the importance of which cannot be measured at the time. Such a step may lead into a pass which will open upon vast fields of undiscovered truth, and unveiling of principles of the greatest worth to the race.—London Spiritual Magazine.

ACCOUNT for it as we can, we know that a community composed entirely of men would be a community of sheer barbarians. In a large degree woman has subdued this rough speech, and checked this fierce selfishness, and converted man from an Arab or sea-king, to the methods and amenities of a gentleman.—Chapin.

A HIGHER and holier world than the world of ideas, or the world of beauty, lies around us, and we find ourselves endued with susceptibilities which affiliate us to all its purity and its perfectness. The laws of nature are sublime, but there is a moral sublimity before which the highest intelligence must kneel and adore.—Horace Mann.

SOME men make a complaint that it is a great misfortune to die before our time. I would ask what time? Is it that of Nature? But she, indeed, has lent us life, as we do a sum of money, only on certain day is fixed for payment. What reason, then, to complain if she demands it at pleasure, since it was on this condition you received it?—Cicero.

NOTHING is our own; we hold our pleasures Just a little while ere they are fled; One by one life robs us of our treasures; Nothing is our own except our dead. They are ours, and hold in faithful keeping. Safe forever, all they took away. Cruel life can never stir the sleeping. Cruel time can never seize that prey. —Miss Proctor.

ENRICH and embellish the Universe as you will, it is only a fit temple for the heart that loves truth with a supreme love. Inanimate vastness excites wonder; knowledge kindles admiration; but love enraptures the soul. Scientific truth is marvelous, but moral truth is divine; and whatever breathes its air and walks by its light, has found the lost paradise. For him a new heaven and a new earth have already been created. His home is a holy of holies.—Horace Mann.

THERE is nothing magnanimous in bearing disappointment with fortitude when the whole world is looking on. Men in such circumstances act bravely from motives of vanity; but he who in the vale of obscurity, can brave adversity; who, without friends to encourage, acquaintances to pity, without even a hope to alleviate his misfortune, can behave with tranquility, is truly great; and whether peasant or courtier, deserves admiration, and should be held up for our imitation and respect.—Roe.

TRUTH will never die; the stars will grow dim, the sun will pale his glory; but truth will be ever young. Integrity, uprightness, honesty, love, goodness, these are all imperishable. No grave can ever entomb these immortal principles. They have been in prison, but they have been freer than before; those who enshrined them in their hearts have been burned at the stake; but out of their ashes other witnesses have arisen. No sea can drown, no storm can wreck, no abyss can swallow up the everliving truth. You cannot kill goodness, and truth, and integrity, and righteousness; the way that is consistent with these must be a way everlasting.—Spurgeon.

LOOK over the world and watch one generation from the womb to the tomb. Its infancy is weakness, its maturity is frailty, its old age is disease. It is born in suffering, it lives by struggle, and is buried in sorrow and tears. Who can voluntarily add to its decay, augment its sufferings or embitter its sorrows, and be criminally guiltless? But what of frailty and disease, pain and sorrow, blight and premature death, may be inflicted upon a single generation by no means measures the crime against the race; for "race" embraces our humanity for all time, and what of evil it embodies overleaps the graves of the generations, and perpetually renewed, curses forevermore. Dr. Sara B. Chase.

Odds and Ends.

A PARIS paper puts it thus: Russian to Turk who receives a bayonet thrust—"But, my poor Turk, you don't seem to object!" Turk—"It is the first time in eight days that anything has gone into my stomach."

A PICKPOCKET seeing an old Scotch clergyman gazing at him intently, said: "Well, old fellow, what do you make out of me?" "Why, I'm thinking," mildly replied the venerable man, "that if there never has been any change in your heart, your face proclaims ye a most terrible rogue."

A WIFE asked her husband for a new dress. He replied, "Times are hard, my dear—so hard I can hardly keep my nose above water." Whereupon she retorted, "You can keep your nose above water easy enough, if you've a mind to; but the trouble is that you keep it too much above brandy."

CHARLES LAMB, one afternoon, in returning from a dinner-party, took his seat in a crowded omnibus, when a stout gentleman subsequently looked in and politely asked, "All full inside?" "I don't know how it may be, sir, with the other passengers," answered Lamb, "but that last piece of pie did the business for me."

A CAMP-MEETING HYMN.

Oh, whar shall we go when de great day comes Wid de blowin' of de trumps an' de bangin' ob de guns?

How many poor sinners 'll be catched out late, An' fin' no latch to de golden gate?

No use fer ter wait till ter morrer; De sun mus'n' set on yer sorrer; Sin's as sharp as a bamboo briar— O Lord! fetch de mo'ners up higher.

When de nations of de earf is a stannin' all aroun'

Who's a-gwine ter be chosen fer ter wear de glory crown?

Who's a-gwine fer ter stan' stiff-kneed an' bol' An' ans'er to deir name at de callin' ob de roll? You'd better come now if yer comin'; Ole Satan am loose an' a-bummin' De wheel's of destruction is a-bummin' Oh, come 'long, sinner, if yer comin'.

De song of salvation is a mighty sweet song, And de Paradise win' blow fur an' blow strong; An' Abraham's buzzum is safe an' it's wide, An' dat's de place whar desinner oughter hide.

No use to be stoppin' an' a-lookin'; If you fool wid Satan you'll get took in; You'll hang on de edge an' get shook in If you keep on stoppin' an' a-lookin'.

De time is right now an' dis here's de place; Let de salvation sun shine squar in yer face. Fight de battles of de Lord, fight soon an' fight late.

An' you'll always fin' a latch on de golden gate. No use fer ter wait till ter morrer;

De sun mus'n' set on yer sorrer; Sin's as sharp as a bamboo briar— Ax de Lord fer ter fetch you up higher.

A TELEPHONIC EXPERIENCE.—How a WORTHY MINISTER WAS SHOCKED BY A SUPPOSED COMMUNICATION FROM THE DEVIL.

A worthy and elderly divine from the rural regions, who had zealously labored for a number of years in his calling in the true spirit of meek and innocent simplicity, came to the city a few days ago. His visits to the city are not very frequent, and they occur at great intervals. He had not quite so much followed the world's progress in scientific advancements and discoveries as he is interested in the wayward trials and vicissitudes of his own little band of sinners in the rural fields.

He dropped in at the office of a companion of his youth, the chief of a large and extended manufacturing establishment. They had a quiet, pleasant chat in the elegant, cosily furnished apartment. One of the novelties in the room is a telephone connecting it with the factory a dozen miles off. Our friend the chief is suddenly called out; the reverend gentleman remains alone in the room. He pulls out the latest tract, adjusts his specs, nestles down in the fauteuil and begins to read.

"Elo!" in sepulchral tones. Looks up. Thinks it is outside.

"E-lo!" Wake up old boy."

Our divine starts up and gazes around.

"Why the devil don't you answer?"

"I—I—beg—your—"

"What in hell are you doing?" continues the telephone.

"Really—my dear—dear sir," gasps our kind sir, swaying unsteadily through the room.

"Order down two car loads of coke and a barrel of brimstone."

"Lord have mercy on their souls!" mumbles the preacher, in panic-stricken terror.

"Send down a new pack, a box of cigars, and a half-dozen bottles of Joe Munch's best."

This was too much. The elderly divine bolts through the door, flies down the street, boards the first train homeward, and never gets over his excitement until he has landed safely in the parsonage in his rural domain.

A few days after, our worthy friend, the manufacturing chief, receives a long, kind epistle, offering earnest prayers for the salvation of his soul, and that God may finally purge him from all the sins and great wickedness with which he is surrounded.—Cleveland Herald.

Notes and Clippings.

THE French papers speak of Moody and Sankey as having instituted a new religion in the United States.

"THERE is no allusion to old maids in the Bible."—Pittsburg Gazette. "And yet they were men-shunned just as much as ever."—Graphic.

An ecclesiastical authority estimates that in round numbers there are now in England and Wales 13,500 church benefices, and that their annual net value is $15,000,000.

"Yes, brodding; we stay away from dis praeceitin' widout no reasonable reason. We'd ought to find in dis sacred place a magnet to dror us wid its irresistible contraction."

We have had a baby show in this city lasting two weeks, but the anxious mothers are very much dissatisfied with the result. The promised premiums are not forthcoming, and the mothers are clamoring for remuneration for being shut up so long.

ANOTHER step toward the civilization of Africa has been made by England, the King of Lucalla, a district lying to the southeast of St. Paul de Loanda, having been induced to enter into an engagement to put a stop to all human sacrifices among his people.

THE World says the phrase "A Merry Christmas" is only a corruption of "A Myrrhy Christmas," alluding to the offerings of myrrh. Very likely. And probably the phrase "A Happy New Year" is only a corruption of "A Hoppy New Year," alluding to the offerings of beer.—Graphic.

NEARLY $20,000 was raised by the special collection taken in the Catholic churches of the Archbishop of New York to help on with the finishing of the new cathedral on Fifth avenue. Nearly $80,000 more will be needed to put the building in condition for dedication, and $500,000 to finish it completely.

A MISS GERTRUDE JACKSON is Deputy City Clerk of New Albany, Ind., and her tax-book is said to be one of the best ever made in that city. The mass of figures, names, and descriptions is not only thoroughly correct but beautifully executed as regards calligraphy. The city appears to be proud of the lady and her work.

DIVORCE does not exist in France, but there is what is called separation de corps. Of this the Marquis de Oaux availed himself. The report of the Keeper of the Seals to Marshal MacMahon shows that in 1876 there were 3,946 separations de corps cases, of which 2,997 only were judged; 2,585 of these were heard on the demand of husbands, and 412 only on the part of wives.

RUSSIA leather is made in Connecticut, Bordeaux wine is manufactured in California, French lace is woven in New York, Italian marble is dug in Kentucky, Marseilles linen is produced in Massachusetts, English cashmere is made in New Hampshire, Parian art work comes from a shop in Boston, Spanish Mackerel are caught on the New Jersey coast, Havana cigars are rolled by the million in Chicago, and Lucifer matches are made in Heaven.

THE Enquirer and Chronicle calls the Family Bible a "venerable humbug." That paper stated the truth in that remark. Few objects in existence have been so over-estimated and over-venerated as that antique volume. Scarcely a book in it was written by the person or at the time claimed for it. It was written by a very ordinary class of men, while it bears the alleged honor of having God for its author. It is a "venerable humbug" indeed!

BROTHER Jeremiah Beulah Murray's Church in Brooklyn has just been indulging in a "cake walk," which was kept up nearly all night, and made a great deal of noise in the neighborhood. When one of the deacon's presented the prize cake to the winning pedestrian, who was a young African, he remarked to him that he hoped he might be equally successful in winning in some heavenly "cake walk," provided they indulged in such amusements in heaven and the pedestrian was fortunate enough to go there. The residents in the vicinity of Murray's Zion wish he would secure rooms on Barren Island, or somewhere out of ear-shot. And yet his church seems to prosper and to draw large crowds of people, both to hear the preaching and to participate in the "cake walks," and other ecclesiastical festivities.

TALMAGE remarked, in the course of his last Sunday performance, "That we should all be clad in proven by the opening of the first wardrobe in Paradise." That settles it. A load is lifted from our mind. Night after night have we laid awake and wrestled with the problem: "Is it Scriptural to wear clothing," and day after day have we risen from our couch and shivered as we lighted the fire and feared there was no authority for dressing. That little fig-leaf of Eve's brings rest to our weary brain. Brother Talmage, God bless you!

WE LEARN from trustworthy sources that the Jesuits have already entered into a treaty for the purchase of Mount Zion, Jerusalem, whereon they intend to build a magnificent palace for the coming Pope, and where to it is proposed to convey all the rich treasures of the Vatican. They are at least disgusted with Rome, Italy and European complications; and they will do their best to rally around this Holiest of Holy Places, the devoted love and service of all Catholic Christendom. But perhaps the Russians will have something to say in the matter.

GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN recently tested his powers of resolution and self-command by abstaining entirely from food for six days—which is about five and a half days longer than we should wish to fast—but he has been thrown completely in the shade by H. S. Tanner, M.D., of St. Paul, Minn., who, according to the testimony of A. Moyer, M.D., did not eat anything for forty-two days. It has usually been supposed that a man would in ordinary circumstances die of starvation in nine days, but Dr. Tanner has proved the falsity of this belief; for at the end of forty-two days' fast he was still apparently far from death, and resumed with great moderation the life-long habit of eating.

WILLIAM E. COLEMAN, a contributor to the Religio-Philosophical Journal, and author of a series of well-written articles in defense of Darwinism, replying to those Spiritualists who imagine it is a part of their work to rail against Darwin and his class of thinkers, says: "Instead, therefore, of snarling at Darwin, Huxley, Spencer and other scientists of the day, for failure to take cognizance of the unseen realm of extra-physical causation, Spiritualists should cordially co-operate with them, extending to them their heartfelt thanks for the incalculable benefit conferred by them upon mankind, in the emancipation of the human mind, both in the scientific world and among the masses, from the dwarfing bondage of slavish subjection to the credal myths of the ages; and such pseudo-scientific vagaries as special creations, immutability of species, coupled with the demonstration of the supremacy of law in universal nature, free from all things miraculous or supernatural."

A CANDIDATE for the vacant pulpit of a New Jersey Baptist church, wrote a long letter to the clerk, giving reasons why he should be chosen pastor, among other things saying: "I am a young man and a stranger to you, and you will naturally class me with average young men. It is justice to me that you should know my qualifications. I have preached a good deal as a supply ever since I began my course of study. I always preach without notes. It is acknowledged by all who have heard me that I have great talents as a writer and a speaker. I am also a great reader. I am acquainted with the best literature of all ages and countries. My teachers have given me the highest recommendations, and I have received very complimentary notices from the press in places where I have preached. The want of organization among Baptists and the poor means of information as to churches and ministers sometimes justify one in speaking of himself." It seems strange that a man of such rare gifts should have been passed by in making the selection.

THE Rev. Joseph Cook was half an hour late on Friday evening in Association Hall, where he lectured on the "Certainties of Religion," a topic that drew from Dr. Armitage the observation that the greatest certainty of religion is its uncertainty. Mr. Cook's certainties were that we cannot escape from ourselves, we cannot escape from God, and we cannot escape from our record; that, since we all must die, and desire to part in peace, we shall be most certain of a happy future if we recognize the fact that the perfect man cannot go hence in peace, unless, in the words of Herbert Spencer, "he becomes harmonized with his environment." Had Joseph included among his certainties that the present dominant religious system of the country was wholly borrowed from old pagan systems, and not a shred of its dogmas, creeds, rites, or ceremonies is original, and is at best a system of falsehoods and shams, he would certainly have told the truth. Had he said, too, that the professed believers in the prevailing religion and the professed worshippers at our most fashionable churches are as great hypocrites, swindlers, liars and thieves as can be found in the world, he would certainly have spoken the truth.

THIS matter of false hair once on a time became a serious ecclesiastical problem. Clement of Alexandria raised the vexed question, which might not be wholly inapplicable in these days. When the priest puts his hand in blessing on your head, who receives the blessing, you or the person who owned the hair which you are wearing? Better to be bald headed than be cheated out of your benediction in that way. Who knows how many blessings which you had hoped to appropriate, but which you have somehow missed, may have lodged in your wig or chignon, and are waiting for some one to claim them? The severe logic of the Fathers brought about another catastrophe. They asserted that the custom of dying the hair is not only an infidel practice, but in direct contravention of Scripture, which distinctly declares that a man cannot make one hair white or black. It was also asserted that wearing wigs by men and top knots by women was as good as giving the lie to that passage which tells us that no man can add anything to his stature.

THE Itale of Rome publishes a remarkable account of the reception of French pilgrims from Carcassonne by the Pope. The visitors had been previously requested not to manifest their devotedness to the Holy Father by cries or applause, as any clamor might be prejudicial to his health. Pius IX., who was brought on a chair by four porters, raised his hand with difficulty and blessed the audience. The head of his Holiness was covered with a velvet cap trimmed with ermine, and he wore the red Papal mantle on his shoulders. He has greatly changed in appearance since June last. He is no longer the hale old man whom no one would suppose to be eighty-four years of age. He now looks as if ten years had since passed over his head. He is pale and depressed; his under lip is pendent, and his tongue is constantly hanging from his mouth. The smile which constantly played on his lip has vanished. In fine, the Pope is now a broken-down old man, and not the Pius IX. known to all Catholic Rome. He coughed painfully three or four times, and uttered some words. He speaks in French, but with a certain difficulty, frequently stops, and repeats his words.

THE Trustees of the British Museum have secured a copy of a very rare Chinese encyclopedia, entitled "Koo kin too shoo tseih ching," or, "A Complete Collection of Ancient and Modern Books, with Illustrations." During the reign of Emperor Kang-he (1661-1721), it occurred to that monarch that, in view of the alterations which were being introduced into the text of works of value, it would be advisable to reprint such from the old editions. He therefore appointed a commission and directed them to reprint, in one huge collection, all such works as they might deem worthy of preservation. A complete set of copper type was cast for the undertaking, and the commissioners were able to lay before the Emperor a compilation consisting of 6,109 volumes. The contents they divided under thirty-four heads, embracing works on every subject contained in the national literature. Only a small edition was printed, and before long the Government, yielding to the necessities of a severe crisis, ordered the copper type employed to print it to be melted down for cash. Thus only a few copies of the first edition are in existence, and it is but rarely that one finds its way into the market.

Events of the Week.

THE coal companies are combining to raise the price of coal.

WE are having mild and beautiful winter weather. No snow yet in this locality.

THE silver bill is attracting great attention, and its friends are increasing in number and influence.

A DISASTROUS fire occurred at Bethel, Vt. Many business houses and dwellings burned out. Loss heavy.

WAGES are being reduced in the Pennsylvania coal mines. In some places ten per cent., and in others as high as thirty.

A VIGOROUS war is being waged against the retail liquor dealers of this city. A large number of arrests have been made.

FANNY DAVENPORT was injured in Detroit by a fall on the stage, and was compelled to relinquish her engagement for a time.

THE City of Berlin, which was feared to have been lost, has arrived safely in port with a broken shaft, which caused her delay.

FEARS are entertained on the part of some alarmists that we are to be forced into a war with Mexico, or rather Mexico with us.

BONNER'S $5,000 team ran away in Central Park a few days ago. There was said to be a good deal of money flying around on the occasion.

A COLLISION of railroad trains, one a freight and the other a passenger, occurred near Shelby, O. Two cars were completely smashed, but fortunately nobody was seriously injured.

THE excitement in France between President MacMahon and the Republicans and branches of the National Legislature still continues. A violent interruption in the Government is imminent.

A HEAVY fire occurred in Louisville, Ky. Three large stores, one of them filled with hundreds of barrels of whiskey was destroyed. The burning whiskey flowed in solid streams of liquid fire from the burning building. Loss, $350,000.

ON Sunday last one of the bravest defenses of modern times was closed and Plevna was surrendered to the Russian forces by the Turkish Commander, Osman Pasha. The commanders of the other divisions of the Turkish army, from inability or indifference, failed to come to his relief, and with his army freezing, starving, and suffering with disease, he tried first to obtain reasonable terms of capitulation. These being denied him, he made one last desperate effort to cut through the Russian line, but failed, with a loss of 3,000 men. In this engagement Osman Pasha was himself dangerously wounded. After this, no fight was left but an unconditional surrender. 40,000 men and 400 guns were surrendered. This is the greatest victory Russia has yet gained, and correspondingly the heaviest blow to Turkey. Final submission must follow soon.

SUSPICIOUS KISSING.—At 37 minutes past 7 o'clock Saturday evening, Dec. 8th, the planet Venus passed behind the moon in what astronomers call its occultation. In other language, it is called Venus kissing the moon. The attention of St. Anthony Comstock is called to this kissing business; he may be able to detect immorality in it. Kissing sometimes leads to bad ends, and should only be indulged in by ministers of the Gospel, members of the Young Men's Christian Association, and others who can exercise moral and religious self-restraint sufficient to confine themselves strictly to the osculation. If St. Anthony could only cause the arrest of the moon and Venus he might get his name up with Joshua, who is said to have arrested the sun and moon. As, however, Venus and the moon are both feminine, St. Anthony may conclude that it is a perfectly moral amusement for them to kiss each other once in a while. It will be very kind in his Highness not to interfere with the pastime they occasionally engage in, but he must not forget that the lovers of morality in other people expect him to keep his eyes open. There is a bare possibility that some wrong may take place.

In this small realm, wherein we are apparently free, lies the fallacy of our free-agency. Here, too, originated the primitive conception of our responsibility for our actions. This we know: free or not, we are held responsible. Whether we act from choice or direct compulsion, knowingly or unknowingly, we bear the consequences. Is this doubted?

Take an individual at random from the mass. He is as he is, not from his own choice. He is the culmination of a line of progenitors, of the infinite number of conditions in which it is possible for him to be placed. Let us take extremes—one very good, one very bad. Born with an inharmonious organization, possessing depraved passions and insatiate lusts cultivated by his ancestors and poured down to him in a corrupting sewer of slimy filth, he matures not into manhood, but into a beast. All the noble qualities of his mind are crushed and blighted, and he lives only for sensual pleasures. A born robber or murderer, he has all the ferocity and cunning of the wild beast. Miscreated are such; cast into the world like rude, half-finished pottery. As much to blame the wind for blowing, as much sinful the tiger devouring the kid, as they. Yet Nature holds them to account, and compels rendition of the last farthing. As inexorable as the artificial law which gibbets the felon, she hangs the offender in the scorching deserts of passion, there to await until appetite has consumed itself by its own fires. Then the higher nature awakes, and guides the torn offender to paths of peace.

The harmoniously born, inheriting from noble ancestors all the qualities the heart cherishes, mature to manhood, and live to perform works of goodness. Blessings fall on such in a perfect stream and are received by them, that thereby better work may be accomplished and still greater blessings fall.

It is glorious to be rightly born; terrible to be otherwise, and held to the rack for the faults of others. Yet the greater part of man's transgressions are ancestral. Circumstances over which we have as little control as over our unconsulted birth impart new directions. Born in a den of vice and infamy, the individual may, by inherent qualities or central impetus, burst the restraints of villainy, and burn a pure star of light over a sea of corruption. If deficient in these qualities, then the central fires and the external burn in unison, and the lowest Stygian depths of perversion or depravity are reached. Surroundings may correct a disordered organization. If we trace our most evanescent thoughts, we find that they are evoked by surroundings. Fate casts us into the world, caring not whether we awake in a palace or a manger—with a silver spoon or a wooden platter, or without platter or provender at all. Stern, inexorable mother, she forces existence upon us, and then rings the terrible mandate in our ears: "You cannot die; you can suffer; you can enjoy—work."

We are from our germinal beginning strained to this rack of iron, and throughout our existence force sustains the empire thus early usurped. Forced into existence and forced to die, of the limited space between these events how little our control! We cannot command our senses, or prevent the brain from receiving the impressions which they convey.

Man's distribution on the globe holds him under check of iron law. The Southern hemisphere and the Northern torrid zone, or the whole globe south of the tropic of Cancer, has yielded no grand civilization, neither has the Arctic Circle. A narrow belt of country along the Mediterranean Sea, across Europe, and extending into the same latitudes of North America, is the whole area of history. Man outside of this little blot on the map of the globe has done nothing worthy of record. Why, unless mentality is amenable to physical laws? And here we approach the gulf said to separate the moral from the physical man. A careful study will show that no such gulf exists. Physical conditions affect morality and intellect in the measure they do the body. The heat of the torrid enervates; the cold of the frigid produces torpidity. The two extremes are equalized in the temperate. Man having acquired the control of forces, supplying himself with light and heat, breaks the fetters with which Nature binds him. Being enabled to carry the heat and light of the sun with him by means of his knowledge of fire, he penetrates the frozen North. He invents clothing and dwellings, devoting almost his entire energies in overcoming the antagonism of surrounding Nature. If he has free-will, it is in this combat; but even here he engages in the same manner as animals do, there being only a difference in degree. He is as irresistibly impelled as they by motives which originate in his environment or that of his ancestors. Man realizes the feasibility of a dam across a river, and constructs it. He is actuated by motives of advantage; so is the beaver. There is this difference: shut the beaver in a room, and it will construct a dam across one corner, out of whatever material it can find; man must realize the advantage to be gained by so doing. The beaver is impelled by blind desire inherited from progenitors; man, by equally blind thirst for property and power, also inherited from ancestors.

Nationalities are moulded by their geography, and it is not left to individual choice to select race or locality. No choice of Lapp or Finn that they were driven to the most inhospitable climate of Europe, and have become degraded by their stern surroundings; no fault of the Irish that by oppression they have sunk from the rank of a leading Celtic people to such wretchedness; or of the Red Indians that they melt away before a more civilized race. "Scientific physiology has no better ascertained fact than that man possesses no innate resistance to change. The moment he leaves his accustomed place of abode to encounter new physical conditions and altered modes of life, that moment his structure commences slowly to change."

Any system of reasoning which severs the constitution of man, placing the dismembered parts under the control of separate systems of government, is fundamentally false. Man, physically, intellectually, and morally, is an indivisible unit, and to be understood correctly must be studied as such.

From a thousand grand paternal sources the stream of our being flows and bends. We sleep when drowsy; we eat when hungry; we drink when thirsty. For a moment we may will contrary to the desire, but the next moment the will is paralyzed, and the desire becomes paramount to everything else. Will against sleep closing the eyelids, the gnawings of hunger, the burnings of thirst? Pretty free-agents are we!

So far Destiny is supreme. We die. Can we control the event? The suicide is the tool of motives. Thales said life and death were the same; and when asked why, then, he did not kill himself, he replied that, as living and dying were the same, he had no motive for so doing. Does fever burn us in its furnace, consumption prey on our vitals, or miasm rankle in our veins—can we will them away? We may acquire a knowledge of their laws, and avert their penalties.

"The only way to govern Nature is to obey her laws." The forces of the external world move in certain channels, in which, if we are placed, we are certainly and directly impelled, but we must not cross the lines. As soon as we depart a hair's-breadth, we meet the rude buffet of the elements. We are bound to this rack of existence until death. Until death? We cannot die. The soul, like the elements which gave it birth, is immortal.

We readily admit that the elements and the vegetable and animal worlds are impelled by these masters with definite and undeviating certainty; but we hesitate to admit that we, with our apparently independent will, are thus controlled. In a moment of egotism we ask: "Are we not capable of doing as we please, and are we not responsible for the consequences? Are we not, like the gods, capable of willing and doing? Have we not vast and unavoidable responsibilities?" Pleasing questions to vanity are these, but they apply to the grasshopper as well as the man.

But we arrive at moral considerations. Is there a province here outside of and unamenable to law? Shall we apply law everywhere else, and leave this province to the wild caprice of the individual? The statistics of the world show the unflinching supremacy of order here as elsewhere. The number and atrocity of crimes vary with the season, and the age of the criminals, with mathematical certainty. The seeming irregularity of individual phenomena confuses the superficial gaze. We cannot say of an individual that he will commit a crime, but we know that of a certain number of individuals one each year will commit a given crime; for, extended over a sufficient length of time, the force impelling to crime is an invariable quantity.

Even the mistakes of men are controlled by laws dimly seen in gathered statistics.

To the grand sum of Nature our individualities are nothing. To obtain the truth we must look to the eternal, and not to the evanescent flashes of the hour. Human pleasures, passions, wants, emotions, are fleeting expressions, and valueless except as they direct us to the constant, the inexorable law.

Of the brute we expect brute actions. What shall we expect of the man with the organization of the brute? We cannot avoid the conclusion that, whatever be the relations of spirit and brain, the manifestations of mind are dependent on organization. Anatomists have remarked the approach of the idiotic brain to that of the lower animals. The brains of savage peoples—Indians, negroes, &c.—approach those of the Caucasian infants. These facts point unerringly to the supremacy of law in the moral and intellectual worlds. We are accountable, but not in the manner we are to artificial laws. We are accountable to laws which form an integral part of our constitution, and to none other. We cannot move in channels other than those marked out by the laws of our nature without pain.

By the possession of intellect we are removed above the realm of brutal desires.

CHAPTER XI.

DUTIES AND OBLIGATIONS OF MAN TO GOD AND TO HIMSELF.

I am satisfied that Cambryses was deprived of his reason; he would not otherwise have disturbed the sanctity of the temples or of established customs.—HERODOTUS.

THEOLOGY claims certain duties which man owes to God. The requirements made at different times have been extremely variable and almost endless. In the early and savage age, man fancied God to be like himself, only more savage and demoniac. His anger was to be appeased; not his goodness trusted. The best of the harvest and of the flock was set apart for him. The smoke of incense arose from his altars, and the blood of slaughtered victims—too often human—stained his shrine. By this method these child-men believed they best pleased their child-God. After a time the sacrifice is found to become more personal and of higher tone. Whatever is held dear is yielded to the selfishness of God. The world becomes a serpent's den of temptation. God demands everything, and everything must be yielded up to him. He created man for his sole pleasure and profit, and it is man's duty to obey. If he knew the law—as recorded and interpreted by the priest—was God's law, things would be different. Always the priest must stand between us and God. We must drink the water as it percolates through finite channels, often reeking with corruption.

The priest has said: "Thus saith the Lord," and men have run gladly to death. However united they have been in crushing mankind in ignorance, they have been inconsistent in their interpretation of God's demands. He requires of the Catholic, fasts, feasts, and holy days innumerable; of the Puritan, rest on Sunday; of the Jew, rest on Saturday, and circumcision; of the Moslem, pilgrimages to Mecca; of the Hindoo widow, the burning of herself on her husband's funeral pyre; of the devotee, to plunge into the holy Ganges; of the South Sea islander, to knock out a front tooth or cut off a finger; of a modern Christian, to build churches and make prayers at stated seasons.

To review the various opinions of the different peoples of the world—to see the craft and cunning, the villainy and arrogance of the priesthood, and the ignorance and folly of of the many, presents a sickening picture, from which we turn with disgust. If God has made any revelation of his will regarding the duties man owes to him, he has made it in such a manner that there can be no mistake, nor need of any class of men to act as interpreters.

God knows what man wants, quite as well as the priests, however well educated they may be. With astonishing audacity they place themselves between God and man to make plain what He had not power to render intelligible. God's laws need no special interpretation, but are as far-reaching as space, and ubiquitous in their operation. If He makes demands, the mortal need not fear the demand will be unsatisfied. We can do nothing for God. As finite beings, the sum of all our efforts would count as nought to the Infinite. Ten thousand roasting lambs or ten thousand crucified Christs are all the same to him. He must from his very nature remain the same—impassive and immovable. Our duty performed or neglected only affects ourselves. We can dash ourselves to pieces against a mountain, but the mountain remains unmoved.

Let us at once free ourselves from the old idea that God directly interests himself in mortal affairs and can be reached by prayer. A verbal prayer may seem to refresh the heart, but goes no further. God will not turn aside though the whole world cry "Turn." The supposition that He will is a superstition descended from Fædora's dancing savages. We come in direct contact with the Infinite, swerving and adamant. They prescribe our duties, and is implicit obedience. All outside and extravagant ceremonies are absolute folly. When the law has been given, with duty has been done. No fasting, prayer, or sermon is required.

The Bennett-Teed Discussion.

1.—JESUS CHRIST IS NOT ONLY DIVINE, BUT IS THE LORD GOD, CREATOR OF HEAVEN AND EARTH.

MR. TEED'S FOURTH LETTER.

MORAVIA, Dec. 6th, 1877.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Your third letter is now in hand. Permit me, to begin with, to call your attention to two typographical errors in my last communication. In the second column and next to the last paragraph you have made me say, "We agree that they are correlates—that they are independent." The statement I made was that "they are interdependent" (mutually dependent). In next to last line on the same column the words "as stated" should read "as seated in the will," etc. You well deserve my compliments concerning the general correctness of your type, it being more accurate than could be expected, considering the rawness of my manuscript, and the fact that my chirography is new to your printers.

In your second reply you say, "All the mind, I repeat, that ever had an existence was produced by a physical and mental organization—directly the result of the food digested," etc. I concluded that the statement was the clear and honest expression of a truthful conviction of your mind. I took this for granted for two reasons. First, because it is in agreement with one shift of all your philosophy, and secondly, because it is the common ground of all material or physical scientists. If this is your statement, of course I know just where to find you. If it is not your permanent position, please take the other horn of the dilemma. It matters not to me which you choose. I conclude, notwithstanding your denial, it is sometimes your position, from the fact that you repeat it in substance in your last communication, and I concede that it is not always your ground from the fact that you flatly contradict it in the same.

"Matter has always existed. It is as persistent as space and time. We cannot go back beyond the time when it had no existence in some form. It has always existed in a structure embodying the most perfect symmetry with the complete sum of a coordinating function. These are facts that no arguments can set aside, and which no argument is required to establish." To the above statement you reply, "Here we stand on common ground." There might be left a loop-hole in that word function were it not for the fact that in two instances in your last letter you make the statement that mind is function. The complete sum of the coordinating function embraces all mind. In admitting my statement you agree with me that mind is coexistent and coextensive with matter. I must therefore conclude that you mean what you say when you assert that mind is the product of a physical and mental organization, and that no mind ever existed that was not the product of such a combination. I must take you, then, on your own premise, and shall hold you there till you squarely, emphatically and clearly deny it, if you choose to do so, rather than admit the conclusion to which your statement leads. If you see fit to make the denial, it will give you the other horn of the dilemma, which will be equally favorable to my case. If you think you can better sustain yourself by letting go of this and taking the other horn for a little while, try that. I suppose you mean the same that I do.

by a physical and mental structure—namely, an organism composed of mind and matter. I cannot conceive of anything else you can possibly mean. If I am correct in the supposition, it follows that you believed a physical and mental organism has had a perpetual being. You cannot go back beyond its existence. If it were possible to do so, I repeat, your statement is false. Because, if there was a time when a mental and physical organism had no existence, your lowest type of mind, which you assert had a beginning, was a product of something else than the combination, in an organic structure, of matter and mind.

You tell me that I speak of the world of mind and thought as if it had an existence independent of or antagonistic to matter. This is untrue. I everywhere, in all my statements, correlate it and coördinate it with matter, and matter formulated at that. Mind cannot exist separate from form, and the highest type of mind must be coördinated with the highest type of form, because form is the habitation of mind.

You think my great mistake lies in considering mind an entity the same as matter, that it is as old as matter, more powerful, that it must ultimately bring matter into far more perfect subjection than it has yet done. Why don't you state what you know, and not say what you think? Because your sympathizers will take your think for overwhelming logic, just as they do your affirmations and negations.

In the first place, I do not consider mind an entity the same as matter, but I know it to be an entity differing from matter, but coördinated with it. It is functional, while matter is its habitation, its investing power.

That mind is as old as matter, you assert yourself in your own statement and in the admission of mine, and then, again, you deny it. From your contradictions, I conclude you do not know, but, as you assert, you only "think." Of course, I do not take that as a very weighty argument. Mind can never bring matter into any more perfect subjection than it is already. But the unfolding or developing mind will rise higher and higher in its sovereignty, subdominating matter with its attendant laws and forces, till it has generated, begotten of the Eternal mind and will have reached the fountain-head, the

Mr. B. existence. Not its origin in duration, but its high-hat, its birthright, and universal and eternal. The only Lord Jesus Christ, the beginning and the end, the first and the last, the alpha and omega.

But from your statements and their conformity to the evolutionists who, like yourself, are ignorant of the complementary and coördinating law, involution, I must conclude that you believe something of form or organization was produced from nothing of form or organization—that all the symmetry, harmony and design we behold is the product of the operation of a homogeneous mass of matter primarily destitute of operation, an idea equally as absurd as to think something was produced from nothing.

Now, mind is either something or nothing. If it is something and not matter, it is substance in a condition differing from matter. We both believe that the substance of which the Universe is composed can neither be increased nor diminished. You say mind is the product of matter (in one statement), and I am led to infer that you believe all substance to be matter. It follows that you believe that matter can neither be increased nor diminished. If matter cannot be increased nor diminished, and mind is something, and the product of matter, then mind must give as much as it takes. In taking substance in the condition of matter and converting it to mind, which is the waste of matter and supply of mind, it must precipitate as much of mind to be converted to matter, as it receives—this is the waste of mind and supply of matter. In this would obtain the law of compensation, it would render them coördinate, interdependent (mutually dependent). If such a relation of mind and matter does not obtain, then mind as you affirm is no-thing. The product of a thing is what the thing produces. If mind is not an entity, as you state, it is a non-entity, and your great something has groaned and travelled and come to the birth and brought forth no-thing—a non-entity. The product of your producer is a non-entity, and you are destined to see a great struggle in your attempt to give it the signs of vitality and perpetuity.

We are bound to conclude, according to your logic, that something can bring forth no-thing, but that nothing cannot bring forth something. We agree as to the absurdity of the latter thought. Will you be kind enough to show me in your next some good reason for not rejecting the other idea as equally absurd?

Mind is a substance. It is not matter. The terms matter and mind is the nomenclature by which substance in these diverse conditions are designated and distinguished.

To my statement, "Matter and mind have existed perpetually," you say only partly true, matter has existed perpetually. But you will not pretend to say how long conditions have been favorable to the production of mind. If you can give credence to your own statements (probably you begin to lose confidence in them owing to their contradictions), you know that has been co-extensive with matter.

Let me show you your consistency. First, you say mind, which you concede to be function, is the product of a physical and mental organization; that no mind ever existed that was not the product of such a relation of mind and matter. Then you declare matter to be older than function. Of course you believe there were some qualities of function existing before the quality you call mind. You contradict your first statement when you affirm that matter is older than function, but you do even worse than this if possible, because you declare that matter and function are insepar-ably connected, and that both are essential to reach your non-entity, the product you call mind. If matter is older than function, then function operated before it had an existence. You know that matter would be inert if not associated with its forces and laws with which you affirm it is inseparably connected. The laws and forces of the physical Universe in their relation to matter constitute the function of matter.

You contradict yourself when you accuse me falsely of separating mind and matter, and then separate them yourself, and declare them separate and distinct in your struggle to extricate yourself from the dilemma you have fallen into. In these contradictions you invalidate your affirmations with which your letters copiously abound. To minor proposition No. 1, you say, "A truer utterance never was made." To proposition 4, you say, "Equally good. I hold the same view." No. 4 agrees with and is the corollary of the preceding, and is as follows: "I declare it to be prior in function, first or highest in quality, the dominating principle of being." You both accept and deny this proposition in your letter. You will not need to look it over carefully to make the discovery. To the next, which agrees with it, you respond, "absurd," and proceed to deny what you have previously conceded. Affirming that matter has no such origin, mind was not prior to matter and did not originate it.

"Mind is first cause and first effect, while matter is second cause and second effect." You reply, "Untenable and untrue (a mere assertion); mind could not have been before matter, because matter always was." I never have claimed that mind was before matter in time. But on the contrary, I affirm they are co-existent and co-extensive. I do claim that mind is (not was) prior in function qualitatively. It is the dominating condition of substance. It is prior, first, or highest in quality. This you both affirm and deny. I state that mind, through voluntary and involuntary operations, is constantly transmitting its potencies, etc. You reply you don't know very much about it. If you have any reasoning faculties, you ought to be able very soon to assure yourself of this fact, because nature everywhere and in every operation declares and confirms this truth. In it is the law of compensation.

"The mind is protected from exhaustion or final waste by a supply," etc. This you assert is very muddled, that you know nothing about it (the conclusion to which your statements naturally lead), and then you say you think your information on the subject about as extensive as mine.

First you know nothing about it, and then you think something, which of course does not go far as argument after you declare your entire ignorance.

You agree with me that minds differ in quality. You acknowledge the fact of a lowest quality, but deny the fact of a highest quality. I can tell you the reason of this. Your mind, as you affirm, is material in its tendencies. It looks downward to earth, without looking correspondingly upward to the realm of function—the domain of thought. Your head is in the ground while your feet are in the ether (you declare me to be the other side up, the head more ethereal). You see more that is beneath you than what is above you. In this you conform in your determination to the basic or alkaline element of a galvanic battery, tending toward the negative pole of the great battery of existence, the pole where perpetual disintegration obtains. Your mind differs from that which corresponds to the ascetic or resinous principle which determines toward the positive pole, which is perpetually integrative in its determination.

The manner in which you refer to my true idea of the processes of law, involution and evolution, shows your consciousness of inability to meet it; and your plan of alluding to it does not go far as argument, except with those who entertain and enjoy views agreeable to your own.

You have had a good deal to say about metaphysics. You want something solid and tangible. So do I; and I have concluded to ask you if you will send to me, if not too expensive, a little protoplasm. I want the real genuine "scientific" article. I have sometimes thought the idea a little metaphysical, a sort of vagary of the mind, and particularly as the term is contradictory to your conclusions in the statements given in your communications, I ask this favor. Of course you know a good deal about protoplasm, and can obtain it without difficulty, and can send it securely protected from the weather, etc. I am quite anxious about that protoplasm, for if I should see some, no knowing what concessions I might be induced to make.

You seem to think the existing variety of minds an objection to a central and common origin of humanity. When I find myself forced into the contingency of meeting so flimsy a position, I must confess I feel a little ashamed, and I should feel like backing out were it not for the fact that you offer many strong points of attack. If that is an objection, then the variegated colors of the solar spectrum is an argument against their emanation from a common centre as a common spectrum. One apple-seed will unfold millions of diverse qualities of seeds. The same of grapes and other fruit. Facts will stand alone; they require no argument for their support.

Your theory of evolution supposes that all the variety existing in the Universe sprang from a homogeneous mass of formless substance. Your objection, then, rests with the same weight against your own idea of evolution as against one central mind being the eternal focus of outflow and inflow, the central pivot of the Universe of mind and matter.

The question of the relative dominance of mind and matter I shall now dismiss. I am satisfied to submit this point to the decision of those who run and read. I shall next proceed to define and locate the center, spaces and circumferences.

When I reverse your tendency and cause you to float upon the ascetic current of being toward the great positive pole of existence, I will be fraternally, as I am now
Respectfully yours, CYRUS ROMULUS R. TRED.

The Crimes and Cruelties of Christianity.

According to Llorente, who, during the occupation of the French, had free access to all its secret papers, and who is the highest authority on the subject, thirty-one thousand persons were burnt, and two hundred and ninety thousand condemned to other kinds of punishment by the Spanish Inquisition. How many perished by the branches of the Inquisition in Mexico, Lima, Cartagena, the Indies, Sicily, Sardinia, Oran, and Malta can never be known. Of the power it exerted in Spain, some idea may be formed from the statement of a Catholic historian, Paramo, who says: "Had not the Inquisition taken care in time, the Protestant religion would have run through Spain like wildfire" (Quoted in Owen's Debatable Land). The best men, of course, were usually the victims of this cruel institution. "In Spain alone," says Darwin, "some of the best men, those who doubted—and without doubting there can be no progress—were eliminated during three centuries at the rate of a thousand a year" (Descent of Man, vol. i, p. 172).

At every royal marriage in Spain once the burning of heretics was a part of the festivities. Four hundred unhappy beings on such occasions were led to the flames, covered with pictures of horrible devils, and the spectators contemplated with pleasure the sufferings of these poor victims of religious hate (See Lecky's Hist. Rat., vol. 2, p. 45).

How many tens of thousands perished for the imaginary crimes of witchcraft and sorcery can never be computed. We find it stated that seven thousand were burned at Treves by the Bishop of Bamberg alone, and eight hundred in one year at Wurtzburg. In all the principal cities of France, multitudes perished. At Toulouse four hundred were put to death at one time. One judge boasted that he had executed eight hundred witches in sixteen years. One writer says that the number put to death in Paris in a few months "was almost infinite." In the single province of Como, Italy, one thousand perished in a year. In Geneva five hundred witches were put to death in three months. These are but a comparatively few of that immense number that were sacrificed by the Catholic Church for merely an imaginary crime (See Lecky's Hist. Rat., vol. 1, p. 29-31).

"That the Church of Rome," says Lecky, "has shed more innocent blood than any other institution that has ever existed among mankind will be questioned by no Protestant who has a competent knowledge of history. The memorials indeed of many of her persecutions are now so scanty that it is impossible to form a complete conception of the multitude of her victims, and it is quite certain that no powers of imagination can adequately realize their sufferings" (Hist. Rat., vol. 2, p. 40).

Protestantism, although it has inflicted less suffering on mankind than the Catholic Church, has persecuted whenever she has been able to, and to the full extent of her power.

"In Germany, at the time of the protestation of Spain, when the name of Protestant was assumed, the Lutheran princes absolutely prohibited the celebration of mass within their dominions. In England a similar measure was passed as early as Edward VI. On the accession of Elizabeth, and before the Catholics had given any sign of discontent, a law was made prohibiting any religious service other than the prayer book, the penalty for the third offense being imprisonment for life, while another law imposed a fine on any one who abstained from Anglican service. The Presbyterians through a long succession of reigns were imprisoned, branded, mutilated, scourged, and exposed in the pillory. Many Catholics and false heretics were tortured and hung. Anabaptists and Arians were burnt alive. In Ireland the religion of the immense majority of the people was banned and proscribed, and when in 1826 the Government manifested some slight wish to grant it partial relief, nearly all the Irish Protestant Bishops under the Presidency of Usher assembled to protest, in solemn resolution, against the indulgence. 'The religion of the Papists,' they said, 'is superstition, their faith and doctrines erroneous and heretical, their church in respect of both, apostatical. To give them, therefore, a toleration and to consent that they may freely exercise their religion and profess their faith, is a grievous sin.' In Scotland during almost the whole period that the Stuarts were on the throne of England, a persecution rivaling in atrocity almost any on record was directed by the English Government, at the instigation of the Scotch bishop and with the approbation of the English Church, against all who repudiated Episcopacy. If a conventicle was held in a house the preacher was liable to be put to death. If it was held in the open air, both minister and people incurred the same fate. The Presbyterians were hunted like criminals over the mountains. Their ears were torn from their roots. They were branded with hot irons. Their fingers were wrenched asunder by thumbkins. The bones of their legs were shattered by their boots. Women were scourged publicly through the streets. Multitudes were transported to Barbadoes. An infuriated soldiery was let loose upon them to exercise all their ingenuity in torturing them. Nor was it only the British Government, or the zealous advocates of Episcopacy who manifested this spirit. When the reformation triumphed in Scotland, one of its first fruits was a law prohibiting any priest from celebrating or any worshiper from hearing mass, under pain of the confiscation of his goods for the first offense, of exile for the second, and of death for the third. That the Queen of Scotland should be permitted to hear mass in her own chapel, was denounced as an intolerable evil. 'One mass,' exclaimed Knox, 'is more fearful to me than if ten thousand armed enemies were landed in any part of the realm.' In France, when the government of certain towns was conceded to the Protestants, they immediately employed their power to suppress absolutely the Catholic worship, to prohibit any Protestant marriage or a funeral that was celebrated by a priest, to put down all mixed marriages, and to persecute to the full extent of their power those who had abandoned their creed. In Sweden, all who dissented from any article of the Confession of Augsburg were at once banished. In Protestant Switzerland numerous Anabaptists perished by drowning; the Freethinker, Gentilis, by the axe; Servetus and a convert to Judaism, by the flames" (Hist. Rat. vol. 2, pp. 47-9).

The Truth Seeker.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY, AT TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1877.

Another Continuance.

On Saturday last we presented ourselves for examination for the third time before U. S. Commissioner Shields to answer to the terrible charge of sending obscene and blasphemous matter through the mail. But again the prosecutors were not prepared to go on with the examination, not having taken time enough to study the case up as much as they wished to, and again they deferred the examination for another week, or until Saturday the 15th inst.

The inference to be drawn from these repeated postponements is a little difficult to determine. Some think it indicates an early dismissal of the case, while others think the prosecution is only taking this time to better prepare themselves to give the independent, outspoken Infidel a strong and persistent fight. Time, of course, will tell.

Christian Intolerance.

Since we were arrested as a felon by Anthony Comstock, who in some sense acts as an agent for the United States Government and who by force took our property and removed it beyond our possession, we have received a large number of letters of condolence—far more than we have had room to print—couched in language sympathizing and almost affectionate, which have been very dear to us and have many times caused the tears to flow from our eyes, and among them we have received a limited number of a somewhat different character. The first were from the heathen portion of the community, the unbelievers in the truth and super-excellence of Christianity. The latter class were eminently Christian and breathed the same spirit of intolerance that has actuated the Christian Church for many hundred years. The following is a very fair specimen of this class of letters and is one we received a few days ago. The person who wrote it had not the honor and frankness to sign his name to it, but preferred as a thief would under the same circumstances, not to have his name known. He also neglected to give his residence, but the envelope bears the post office stamp of Lansingville, N. Y. There can be no doubt but what the writer is a genuine Christian of the Comstock type. We give the letter:

I have just read your TRUTH SEEKER, as you falsely term it, dated Nov. 24th. If for nothing else, the law ought to take hold of you for publishing such a blasphemous sheet. Society, to say nothing of religion, has reason to rejoice that you are on the road to your just deserts. Justice, truth and common decency consign your paper, your establishment, and all the books represented in your catalogues to oblivion, and yourself and your sympathizers to a felon's doom, for there is no doubt but that you and your whole school are vile wretches, as Thomas Paine and others of the same class before you were—a curse to humanity—and it is only a question of time as to the certainty and terrible of your doom. Yea, you have only to take an introspection of your own moral being to find a hell, the full measure of which will be understood by you when you appear before him whose name you blaspheme. Your own sympathizers, as your paper states, offer but very small sums for you, doubtless because at heart they consider you not worth much, which is a fact, or else they are so poor and miserable themselves, forsaken of God and man, that they have but little or nothing to give, as I personally know one of your sympathizers to be, viz.:

* of —, and he doubtless is an average example as to character and reputation of your whole school—the scum of society. Thank God for Anthony Comstock to suppress such vile publications and their vile publishers.

I shall rejoice with society generally to learn that you are behind the grates—the best school that you could have for a term of years. With some thorough religious teacher and the Bible, you might be brought where you would come to believe in Jesus Christ and thereby become a blessing to the world instead of a curse. Begin, sir, to pray, as did one of your own belief—or disbelief—"Oh, God, if there is a God, have mercy on my soul, if I have a soul," and you will find help out of your darkness as did he. Please publish this in your next issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours, &c.

Here we see the true Christian spirit breathed forth, and we must confess we do not like it as well as the heathen or infidel spirit shown in the hundreds of letters we have received, and which belong to the other class. For exercising the right of opinion and the freedom of speech, this man, who is ashamed to give his name, rejoices that we are in trouble and hopes that we will be placed behind the grates and bars, entirely deprived of liberty and happiness. He seems to be unable to comprehend that an Infidel can be just as honest in his views as a Christian and that under the Constitution of our country he has precisely the same right to maintain them.

In fact, as a rule, the Infidel is far more honest and sincere than the average Christian. It is fashionable and popular to be a Christian, and it is a passport to what is called good society to be a member of some church and to be a contributor to its support and the support of its pastor. If a man is a merchant he can safely calculate to sell more goods by being a professed Christian. If he wishes to run for office he will get far more votes if he is a member in good standing in some orthodox church. If he is a young man and wants to associate with the young ladies with a view of finding a companion for life he succeeds far better if he acknowledges the dogmas of Christianity and professes to believe its borrowed creed. Yes, it is popular to be a Christian and this is the reason why the churches are so full of skeptics who do not really believe their doctrines and often disbelieve them in toto, but it is so much better for them to move along through life under the approving smiles of Mrs. Grundy by being in the Christian fold that they find it pays to do so. They profess to be believers in Christianity, when in fact they scarcely believe it at all.

But when a man avows himself an Infidel he does it from honest conviction. He knows by doing so he brings upon himself the odium of shallow-pated, intolerant, hypocritical Christians like the person who wrote the above letter. He is fully aware that he places himself at great disadvantage in following the various pursuits of life and to a certain extent almost every man's hand is against him. He is aware that he is taking the unpopular side and that all the superficial people and those who regard only fashion and position in society will disfellowship him in business and social life and turn the cold shoulder toward him. If he is looking for work, or customers, or a wife, his chance is far inferior to the Christian's. The doors of society are virtually closed in his face, the right hand of fellowship is withdrawn from him, often he is shunned and despised by those who in the social and mental scale are far inferior to him. Yes, it costs something to be an Infidel, and the man who is independent enough and honest enough to avow himself one may expect odium and ostracism. In addition, this sneaking Christian of Lansingville would deprive him of liberty and thrust him into prisons and dungeons! What a worthy compeer he is of Anthony Comstock. What glorious times they would have had in the days of Torquemada! How happily they could have worked in concert! In our mind's eye we fancy we can now see spy-Anthony entering ladies' bed-chambers in a stealthy manner at the hour of midnight and in the most brutal manner arresting the father and mother of a family for some conceived offense—obscenity probably—and dragging them, manacled and bound, before the Grand Inquisitor, when the rack, the thumb-screw and the pulleys are soon put in operation. We fancy, too, that we see that pious saint of Lansingville devotedly turning the rack and the wheel, while joint after joint of the poor victims is torn asunder, and bone after bone is broken. We see him and Anthony standing there in perfect ecstasy while the heart-rending cries of the dying sufferers reverberate from wall to wall of those gloomy chambers where so many before them have died in agony unutterable. As the death throes are being made and the death-rattle is heard in the throat, we can almost hear the great Anthony cry out in his most dulcet tones, "We will teach you to be obscene," while the saint of Lansingville without name, says "I rejoice that you are brought to feel death in this horrible manner. It is the best school you could have."

And shall it be in this last quarter of the nineteenth century that because a poor mortal cannot believe that Christianity—whose every dogma and sacrament is borrowed from old paganism—is the most beneficent system of religion that has ever been devised; who cannot believe the old mythical fable of a God being born of a virgin—a fable a thousand years older than Christianity; who cannot believe that a being can beget himself, and that a son is as old as his father; who cannot believe that three are one and one is three; and all the rest that the name of Christianity implies, he shall be deprived of his liberty, thrown into prison, and his property wrested from him by force? If this is the lovely religion of Christianity, every good man must wish its reign soon to be over. If the example of the humble itinerant reformer of Judea leads to such abominable conduct as this, it would have been well had the example never been set.

The difference in the spirit governing Christians and Infidels is marked. While the pious, zealous Christian wishes to imprison, stretch, and burn those who conscientiously cannot believe their monstrous dogmas, Infidels do not wish to burn nor oppress those who do not believe as they do. By this criterion, the Infidel practice is as much superior to that of the Christian as his doctrines are more correct and his philosophy more true.

Our unknown critic assumes to mourn or rejoice because larger numbers of our friends have not responded and in larger sums. We hope he will not make himself uneasy about it. We think we have good grounds to congratulate ourselves upon the kindness and sympathy of our numerous friends, and we fear we never can be thankful enough for the same.

If that sneaking Christian of Lansingville sees fit again to write a letter to be published in these columns, we hope he will for once depart from his Christian principles and not try to stab in the dark but be manly enough to sign his name to it, so we all may know who he is.

SPIRITUAL MAGAZINE.—We have received from the editor and publisher, Samuel Watson of Memphis, a bound copy of this sprightly magazine for the present year. It makes a very presentable volume and will answer well for the holidays. It contains 384 large pages and is sent by mail for $1.50. Address Samuel Watson, Memphis, Tenn.

The American Inquisition.

At the meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club on Friday evening, Dec. 7th, Prof. R. W. Hume delivered an able and impressive lecture upon this subject. He painted in lively colors the danger the people of this country are in of having some of their choicest liberties taken away. His remarks in connection with the Young Men's Christian Association and with regard to the uncalled for arrest of the editor of this paper were just and scathing.

Mrs. S. Myra Hall read a well written paper on the same subject. The wrongs done the people by the Government were exposed in unmistakable language.

Mr. Daniel Walford made some very forcible remarks and described the working of the American Inquisition as prosecuted by Comstock and as brought to his own knowledge. Mr. Walford is an active member of two temperance organizations in this city, and wishing last Spring to get up an entertainment, or a kind of sociable, for the pleasure of the members of the societies, he engaged an elderly gentleman in the Bowery, who makes stereopticons, etc., for a livelihood, to be present and to show the operation of the instrument and a set of beautiful views and pictures. It was not the gentleman's business to exhibit his pictures or instruments, as he was simply a manufacturer, but in this case he consented to attend upon the wishes of the societies. The great majority of the ladies and gentlemen present were highly pleased with the pictures, and there was nothing among them of an improper character. There were, however, some representations of classical statuary, and these, it occurred to a brother of one of Comstock's detectives who was present, would afford material for a case of obscenity if properly worked up. He accordingly told his brother about the great indecency of the pictures, who thereupon, in the spirit of his master, St. Anthony, went to the shop of the manufacturer of stereopticons and said to the proprietor that he had understood he had given a very interesting exhibition before a temperance society a few evenings previous, and he wished to look over his pictures and engage him to exhibit them before a club of which he was a member. The old gentleman replied that he had given an exhibition of his instruments except before a temperance meeting, where he went without remuneration. "O, we will pay you liberally if you will come," replied the detective. The old gentleman, thinking that in this way he might add a little to his slender income, replied that if he was paid for his time he would have no objections to accommodating him. "Now," said the detective, "the pictures you exhibited the other night are, by the by, rather too tame, for our club are young men and want something more attractive and fancy." The honest manufacturer told him that fancy pictures were not in his line, and he would have nothing to do with them. "But, my friend," said the detective, "we are willing to pay you liberally if you will get something to please us. Can you not make an effort to find something of the style we want?" "Well, yes, maybe so," answered the old man, weakening, perhaps, at the thought of turning an extra penny. "I will try and see what I can do for you." The Christian detective said he would call again.

In a short time the detective called again and looked over the addition the manufacturer had made to his stock, with which he pronounced himself well pleased. He then renewed the engagement for their exhibition before his club to take place on a certain night.

Then the vigilant detective reported to his chief, the veritable Comstock, how successfully he had roped in the old man and how he had induced him to procure pictures that might be called obscene. Anthony soon put in an appearance at the old man's shop and asked to see the pictures, saying he was one of the club before whom he was to exhibit. When this agent of the Christian Association had piously inspected the pictures the unsuspecting old man had and which his hypocritical tool had persuaded him to procure, and which he never would have procured save for such persuasion, he, like a fiend, turned upon the innocent old man and said, "Now I have you. You are my prisoner. Accompany me at once."

The old man was working at his lathe in his shirt-sleeves, slippers and with his apron on. He said, "If I have to go with you, let me at least put on my coat and boots and not be compelled to go through the streets in this way." "No," replied Comstock, imperiously; "come along at once or I will prefer the additional charge against you of resisting an officer of the Government," and thus that inoffensive old man of sixty-four years was, on a cold day in last April, compelled by Comstock to march along the streets of this city without his coat or his boots, and when one of his employees followed with his coat, Comstock would not allow the old man to stop and put it on; and not until he had reached the police station and was placed in the charge of a policeman was a kind word spoken to him or was he allowed to put on his coat to keep out the cold.

The arrest was made late in the afternoon, and when he had been examined before the proper authorities it was too late to procure bail, and the old man was compelled to pass the night in the Oak Street station prison. There was nothing in his cell to sleep upon save a hard plank, and in his perturbed state of mind at the sudden change in his fortunes, he trod his narrow cell all night without a wink of sleep coming to his eyelids. This was purposely planned by the bright agent of the Young Men's Christian Association; and, as it turned out, the unhappy old man had to pass the second night in this dismal cell before acceptable bail could be procured.

The case was ultimately placed before the Grand Jury, and a bill was found against him. The result was that the affair is still unsettled, after having cost the old man a good deal of money, a great amount of anxiety, injuring his reputation, and nearly breaking up his business. It is still held in terror over his head and nearly destroys his happiness. When Mr. Walford, his wife, and other prominent members of the temperance organization, went to Mr. Comstock with the endeavor to soften his severity towards the poor, unfortunate man, and said that they had persuaded him to exhibit his pictures before their society, that he had charged nothing, and that there was not the slightest impropriety in the exhibition, and that both gentlemen and ladies were highly pleased with them, they found this protector of all our American decency and morality implacable and unyielding, and he seemed determined to pursue the harmless old man to the very death for committing what he—Comstock—was pleased to consider a crime, and which the old man would never have thought of committing had he not been persuaded into it by Comstock's own directions and by one of his own lackeys.

This is the true character of the man to whom the Government has given remarkable power to annoy, oppress, and drive to desperation and ruin citizens as much superior to him in moral worth and purity of character as the sun is above the earth.

Mr. Oscanion followed with a brief and appropriate address touching the intolerance that was sought to be inflicted for opinion's sake.

The editor of this paper made a few remarks relative to the nature of the espionage and oppression that was being exercised and of the necessity of the people struggling for the personal rights that had been wrested from them. He expressed determination to exercise freedom of thought and freedom of speech so long as life remained. If shut up in a prison, he would still exercise those rights to the extent of his ability.

Mr. Boucher spoke a few minutes in condemnation of the high-handed operations of Comstock & Co.

The only person who had anything to say on the opposite side was Mr. Herman H. Shook, who is either a member of the Y. M. C. A. or an ardent sympathizer with them. He thought the laws were right as they are; that any person who could write such a production as the "Open Letter to Jesus Christ" deserved little consideration or leniency. He was very much shocked at it, and avowed his determination not to sign the petition asking for a modification of the laws complained of.

T. B. Wakeman made the closing speech and the best one of the evening. He showed wherein the laws were vague and indefinite, leaving a construction to be placed upon them by Judges, District Attorneys, and Juries before whom a condemned person might be brought. He also made it clear to the audience what an oppressive thing it is for a man to be arraigned before a United States Court. The object of the Commissioner in the first place was to hold every party brought before him, against whom a charge is made; the purpose of the District Attorney is to convict, and the Judge in many cases rules with marked severity. And the Jury, how are they obtained? They are summoned by the officers of the court, and none appear in the jury box except such as they want. Under such circumstances a conviction is the easiest thing in the world. But if the unfortunate victim is not convicted, it costs a small fortune to be defended, and the annoyances and inflictions a victim is subjected to are numerous indeed. An arraigned man stands but little chance for impartial justice. He recommended the signing of the petitions, gotten up to memorialize Congress for the modification of the laws complained of.

The audience was large and sympathizing, and at the close of the meeting many signed the petition, copies of which were present.

GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN.—It will be noticed that on another page we commence a series of articles bearing upon Comstock's cases from the pen of this pungent, epigrammatic and humorous writer. We doubt not that our readers will be interested in what he has to say upon this subject. He remarks that he has understood that we do not take much stock in him, and he is indifferent whether we do or not. Possibly he has been wrongly informed. We think we are inclined to take some stock in him. We regard him as a man of marked ability. He excels in his peculiar line, and may be called a decided genius. We have, however, sometimes thought we detected a faint trace of egotism in his writings. At all events, he is thoroughly posted in the dark intricacies of Anthony Comstock, and we are glad he has decided to give our readers the benefit of his knowledge. By the abbreviation "P. E." he means Psychologic Era, beginning with his birth.

Comstock is taking a good deal of work on his hands about these days. Besides Heywood's of Princeton, Jones of Ashfield, and our own case, he has caused the arrest of and conviction of Timothy P. Ide of Providence, R. I., for sending obscene matter through the mail and sentenced to two years imprisonment in the state prison and of Doctors Neil Matheson, Clark Whittier, and Charles A. Bohannon of St. Louis, who have not yet had their trials. They are authors of medical works not recognized by the regular schools or advertising physicians for curing specialties who always provoke the ire of the regular M. D.'s and Comstock is very zealous in their interest. He goes strong for the old style theology and the old style practice of medicine and everybody who presumes to differ from them he is in favor of shutting up in states prison for a term of years at hard labor. The farther away his cases are located the better it is for him, for the mileage amounts to so much more. "Go it Anthony while you're young, for it may be when you get old you can't."

We would again urge our friends to exert themselves to increase the number of readers and patrons of THE TRUTH SEEKER as much as possible. Now is a good time to induce persons to subscribe for the new enlarged volume to begin with the ensuing year. Remember it is to contain sixteen pages in place of eight, and the price is to be increased but one half. It will contain some seven hundred more square inches of reading matter than any Liberal or Spiritualistic journal published in the world, and we trust the quality of the matter will not be surpassed. Just think of it, if every subscriber would interest himself to get one additional subscriber, what an effect it would have upon our list, and such as can send in two, four, six or more new names, will produce a still greater effect. Let us all see what we can do. Price of the enlarged paper, including the present month, $3.00 to new subscribers. For six copies sent, an extra copy will be added. Let thousands of names be added to our list.

Those who send in for corrections or changes to be made in the direction of their paper will do us a favor by stating whether they are a regular or trial subscriber. We have two lists and if we know which one to look to, it saves much labor. We still want a thousand more trial subscribers, 20 cents for two months.

LET our readers bear in mind that we have now in press a second and revised edition of "The World's Sages, Thinkers and Reformers." It will be ready to send out in a very few days. Let those who want a copy of this enlarged volume send their orders in at once.

PROF. J. R. BUCHANAN, M. D. of Louisville, Ky., has honored us by calling at our sanctum. He is in good health. The cares and labors of life seem to bear lightly upon him and he carries his years well. He fills a chair the present winter in the Eclectic College of this city.

ELDER D. R. LUCAS, of Des Moines, Iowa, and W. F. Jamieson, of 172 & 174 Clark street, Chicago, Ill., debated in Osceola, Iowa, Dec. 4, 5, 6 and 7.

B. F. UNDERWOOD spoke at Fairfield, Iowa, Dec. 8 to 12; will be at Red Oak, Iowa, Dec. 13 to 20; at Lincoln, Neb., Dec. 23.

Again we want to assure our many kind friends that we feel very grateful for their renewed proofs of trust and sympathy, and we hope we may ever prove worthy of the confidence so kindly bestowed. We have been using the funds that have been sent us in making the best defense that our judgment dictates—the sending out of thousands of blank petitions for signatures in all parts of the country. As before remarked, we shall send out nearly 20,000, the postage alone on which will be almost $200. If these are generally signed and are presented to Congress in bulk, they will have a marked effect upon that body. We hope our friends must all sign and persuade as many others of their friends to do the same as possible. Let us make a strong and united attack upon the enemy's works.

Friends, again we thank you, and please be not offended because we cannot take the time to write separately to all, acknowledging your kindness.

THROUGH ROME ON: A Memoir of Christian and Extra-Christian experience. By Nathaniel Ramsay Waters. New York: Charles P. Somerby, 139 Eighth St. 1877. A queer book but a most excellent one, written by one who has been through the theological mill and thoroughly understands whereof he writes. The queerness lies in the style in which it is gotten up. It has no index, contents-table, nor chapter-headings, and it seems strange that even the title-page was not dispensed with; but as the contents are equally good throughout, the reader will not miss the lacking parts. The experiences of the author during his progress from Protestantism through Catholicism to Infidelity take up the first 200 pages; the remainder, about 150 pages, being occupied by notes, criticisms and short essays. There are two roads from Protestantism to Infidelity: the easy and gradual descent through the pleasant valley of Unitarianism, and the more difficult path over that crumbling mountain of superstition, Catholicism, and the jump from its summit to the level of common sense. Mr. Waters followed the latter road. He says:

"What is one to do when the food provided by the Church has become first chaff and then poison to him? Must he go on chewing and sickening and sinking under it, for fear God will be angry with him if he leave off? I could not put out or seal up my eyes so as to avoid seeing that the Church was not supernaturally kept from going wrong but did just what one would expect of a natural human organization—blundered and misled its followers in some cases, though it conducted them aright in others. It requires immense faith to hold to the Church in spite of everything—with natural probability and accomplished facts both against her. I had not, when it came to the last resort, such faith in me. I could not retrace my steps and return to the Protestant quagmire. I had to go, and I went, out of the other door."

Whatever the author believed in, he believed with a hearty good will; and it was only after a long course of careful and conscientious study and reflection, and by a severe mental struggle, that he finally succeeded in shaking off the chains that had bound him so long. While he was a Catholic, he was a sincere, devout, and pious one. His Catholicism was ideal, but it had to give way to his reason. His description of the various phases of his transition are graphic, and will at once enlist the sympathies of those of his readers who have traveled the same road.

Letters of Sympathy.

LAWRENCE, MASS., Nov. 26, 1877.

BRO. BENNETT: I have just finished reading my dear little TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 24th, and I must say that its contents are the greatest eye opener that has been issued for a long time. I appreciate those friendly letters to you. They will encourage you, and if that Comstock sees them he will feel rather mean. There are some good Liberals here who are just getting aroused, and who say they will send you some money if needed to defeat the Y. M. C. A. I am glad to see so many sympathizing friends. It shows Anthony that he has a large job on his hands. I think, Bro. Bennett, that if you can talk as well in court as you write in THE TRUTH SEEKER, you will do well to defend your own case. They would get more than they bargained for.

The way you lay the law down in your replies to Teed is a caution to old folks.

But I must be careful what I write to you, as Comstock might get it, and have me arrested too. You recollect I sent you a letter last spring containing $1.75. Perhaps he stole it from the post-office, as you say you did not get it. I think we have got altogether too many thieves in high positions for the public good, and they are all Christians.

I see you have got good courage—no back down to you. That is just what I like to see, and I am with you there. Go ahead and smash their old idols. You are right, and it is better to be right than be President. I will get signers to your petitions, and do anything else I can for you. Please give J. F. Freese credit for $2.00 instead of $1.00, as is printed in your paper.

Hoping that your enemies will be vanquished, and that you will reap good from their bad sowing, I remain

Yours truly, BENJ. GRIFFIN.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Dec. 3, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: The following conversation took place in a bar-room between two well-known "gentlemen," the other afternoon:

"Say, Toney, from what I read in the Herald every Monday morning, it looks to me as though people were beginning to disbelieve the story of hell and the devil, for I very often see an extract from some sermon, headed, 'Is there a personal devil?' or something of that sort." "Well, Mike, I'll have the paper snatched for sending blasphemy through the mails." "If I was you, Toney, I would do so at once, for the next question will surely be, 'If there is no hell, what good did it do for God to come here and die?'" and then they resumed their game of bluff, and everything was quiet.

Thinking, perhaps, it will be of some consolation for you to know that one of the leading newspapers will be, before long, in the same trap that caught you, I remain,

Yours truly, PROF. LYNN C. DOYLE.

PITTSFORD, N. Y., Nov. 26, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Although I am a poor mechanic with a family to support, I would not miss the honor of contributing a small amount to help defray the expenses of your trial, if such it may be called. From my point of view, I look upon Comstock's proceeding as "pure cussedness." Friend Bennett, it is not about time that all classes of free thinkers in our land awake to a realizing sense of their danger, and organize for a mighty resistance? Enclosed find one dollar. I wish I could make it five hundred. Respectfully, W. H. SADDEN.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Nov. 21, 1877.

DEAR FRIEND: It grieves me very much to hear of your arrest, but I do hope the jury will be enlightened enough to see the designing intrigues of Inquisitor-General Comstock, and acquit you. Has America yet to fight for that liberty of thought and speech which "freemen" alone know how to appreciate? Sorry to say neither 13 nor 15 Somerset St., have yet received last week's paper; please see to it. Yours truly, W. F. PORTER.

AN APPEAL.

DEAR FRIENDS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: We have each and all encouraged, aided and abetted our best beloved champion, D. M. Bennett, in his indefatigable labors to elevate reason and common sense to the position now usurped by bigotry and superstition, and as he has been pitched upon by Anthony Comstock, to suffer vicarious atonement for our transgressions (?) equally with his own, the very least we can do is to furnish for him "the sinews of war," with which he may be enabled to carry on the great battle which is to determine whether right or might shall be conqueror and victor. With Bennett as our standard-bearer and THE TRUTH SEEKER as our flag, we will "hold the fort" till our brave leader wins the day against tyranny, wrong and oppression. To do all this requires money; and, hard as times are, we must raise it. It is our DUTY to do it, and when DUTY demands, who will fail? No true Liberal, I am sure.

I haven't had a dollar in months, but scarce as money is in Dixie, I mean to raise one now if I have to scour the town for it. "Where there's a will there's a way," you know. I think Comstock has the "right man in the right place" now, and if we all pull together, Bennett will accomplish a work that we shall be proud of. He is one who will "fight the great fight" and be certain to come out conqueror and king, Lord of lords, Pope of popes, and the Almighty one of all. Hasten, then, each and every one, enroll yourselves under his banner by sending in the needful, little or much as you can afford it. Now is the accepted time to put your shoulder to the wheel and "show your faith by your works."

Hopefully and earnestly,

ELMINA D. SLENNER.

MEAFORD, ONT., CANADA, Nov. 23, 1877.

MY DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I was both sorry and surprised in looking in THE TRUTH SEEKER this week, to see that you had been pounced upon by the slaves and tools of a bigoted and tyrannical religion. I hope every Liberal in Canada and in the United States will come forward nobly in defense by sending funds in immediately for that purpose. As it is not D. M. Bennett alone that is wronged and insulted, but every liberal-minded man and woman on this continent, I hope to see the manly and fraternal spirit manifested here by the Liberals of America, that was shown by our Freethought brethren and sisters across the Atlantic to that nobleman of nature, Chas. Bradlaugh, and his co-sufferer, Mrs. Annie Besant. The names of D. M. Bennett and Charles Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant will live in the fond memory of thousands when that of Anthony Comstock and his hypocritical employers will be dead and forgotten.

Yours fraternally, JOHN GROOM.

MOMENCE, ILL., 1877.

BRO. BENNETT: The excitement caused by your arrest by this virtuous Comstock is wonderful among the Liberals. Some say that they are ready to shoulder the musket if they are successful in this suit. I cannot believe that they will prosecute this suit any further, as the charges are entirely too thin for the 19th century.

Get some one to write to Comstock for a Bible. Have him send it through the mail, and arrest him for sending obscene literature by mail. Then read the 23d chapter of Ezekiel. This chapter ought to condemn any man under the present law. I have offered ministers of the gospel $5 many times to read this chapter before their congregations, but none of them had courage enough to do it. I dare not write it for I think such language as we read in the Bible would disgrace a Hottentot.

Send out your petitions. Send me ten or a dozen and I will send them where they will do the most good.

Enclosed you will find twenty dollars: Charles Witte, $10.00; J. Stoddard, $5.00; H. S. Hall, $5.00. Yours truly,

H. S. HALL.

FRANKLIN, PA., Dec. 3, 1877.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: At the peril of being held as an accessory after the fact to the publication of the articles for which you have been arrested (although I have not read them), I will take your paper for a year. Enclosed please find two dollars for that purpose. Your arrest has made me a subscriber. Be kind enough to send me back numbers so that my year shall commence with the number containing an account of the beginning of the persecution. Indignantly yours,

W. C. RHEEM.

MUNGERVILLE, Dec. 5, 1877.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Brother: Please send on at your earliest convenience the "Open Letter to Jesus Christ," and the one "How do Marsupials propagate." I have most of the other Scientific Series. Enclosed find 10 cents in stamps. Send by mail. This morning I saw a man from Ohio who had seen an Opossum in all stages of growth and was acquainted with their mode of procreation and fully confirms Mr. Bradford's statements. If some should write and print the scientific facts in regard to the mode in which queen bees copulate and produce their kind and send it through the mails, and Comstock should find and read it, it would produce paralysis of his moral faculties, if he has any, or some terrible convulsion or epizootic or dropping of the nerves into the pizzeria or some other cataclysm or catastrophe. If I should tell him that within so many days from the queen's emerging from her cell she starts on her bridal tour—a grand flight abroad—the drone finds her and copulates on the wing, and before he can extricate himself leaves attached to her his entire sexual organ and the drone dies as a consequence—the queen returning to the hive and the bees removing the unsightly appendage, she being fertilized for life, wouldn't he go into fits! Every skillful apiarian knows this. Send three or four blank petitions. I will send some away for names. Yours,

D. HIGBIE, M.D.

SMITH CENTRE, KAN., Nov. 30, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT: I wish I could send you a thousand full subscribers. You are ultra in some of your writings, and I sometimes think you are rather too severe, but when I contemplate the great services rendered by that good old Infidel Thomas Paine, and the infinite mass of calumny that has been hurled at him ever since his body was laid away; and then reflect that it is only such cowardly hounds as have attacked his untarnished character, and made it appear like a daub of infamy, that you are striving so hard to check in their mad career, I feel like shouting for you that we have a few such men as Bennett.

I deeply sympathize with you in your present trouble with "our glorious free government." I have read both of the tracts that you were arrested for circulating and can remember nothing in either near so obscene as the story of the conception of our Lord and Savior. As for the one "How do Marsupials propagate," if it is correct it is a work to be highly esteemed by all people who wish to be intelligent. If it were merely an idle piece of bosh, like dozens of the Bible stories, you ought to be prosecuted for circulating it, if it is justice to prosecute a man for attempting to defraud the public, by teaching what is false.

Thine for the right, WM. A. GARRETTSON.

EDINBURG, IND., Dec. 3d, 1877.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Friend: THE TRUTH SEEKER was placed in my hands for the first time almost a year ago. I have been a devoted reader ever since; the result has been the dropping away of the scales of superstition which at that time wholly blinded me, until I now feel that I stand in the broad sunlight of Freethought. My last paper brings the first cloud to shadow this sunlight when it tells of your arrest by that contemptible bigot Comstock. Your request for aid shall not pass unheard. I am reminded that I am somewhat in arrears for my paper and enclose you five dollars, square my account and with the balance left do as your judgment decides for the best. If you can the better fight the agents of the American Inquisition by accepting it as a donation do so, or if you will you may place it to my credit and continue my name on your subscription list, at any rate don't deprive me of your paper. Yours truly,

D. C. MARSH.

BALTIMORE, Nov. 19, 1877.

MR. EDITOR: I have learned with profound regret of your arrest for circulating obscene literature, a charge which I do not believe they can prove to the satisfaction of any liberal-minded man. A friend of mine loaned me the "Open Letter to Jesus Christ," and for the life of me I could not see any obscenity in it, at least not the tenth part of obscenity that the Bible contains. As lip sympathy, however, is of no account to you in your present circumstances, and as you say sending for books and pamphlets will aid you in the approaching storm, I enclose one dollar for the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion." Yours very truly,

CHAS. W. HECK.

BALTIMORE, MD., Dec. 3, 1877.

DEAR DOCTOR: Truly, "It has come at last," and the coming has made me sick—the more especially because I cannot have an interview of short duration with the saintly hypocrite who has interfered with you and your business. At present I can only offer moral support and a P. O. order for renewal of subscription, wishing that it were ten thousand. Be a man, and I'll be with you should it cost all even life. Let the petitions come. LOUIS K. MARSHALL.

HART, MICH., Dec. 4, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Esq., Dear Sir: Enclosed please find P. O. money order for $10, five for myself and five for E. D. Richmond, two dollars of each to be applied on subscription for TRUTH SEEKER, and the balance—three dollars for each—is donated to you in the defense of human liberty. We deeply sympathize with you in your troubles, and render all the assistance we are able to at present. If you will send me a blank petition for the repeal of that odious law, I will do all I can to get signatures. I would like to write a longer letter, and express my indignation at the infamous proceedings against you, but have not time just now.

Very truly your friend, W. H. GALE.

I endorse the above, E. D. RICHMOND.

N. HANNIBAL, N. Y., Dec. 5, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: Enclosed please find $4.40 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for myself and friends. I am ashamed to say that I have been a reader of your paper without being a subscriber or paying for it; but hearing of your difficulties, I resolved to do so no more. I feel that the truth is to be greatly advanced by your persecution. There will be more thought and investigation and doubts in regard to the popular "plan of salvation" than would have been had all passed along smoothly. I feel the same spirit stirring within me that was stirred when John Brown was martyred. I hope all liberty-loving people will stand by you and help you with their money as well as their sympathy.

Your friend, ERWIN SHUTTS.

CENTRAL, S. C., Nov. 27, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Brother: Enclosed please find $10.00. Place $5.00 to my credit and the other five to the credit of my son, O. W. Casey, and receive our deepest sympathy in this, perhaps the gloomiest, period of your life. In THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 17th I read the startling account of your arrest, and it would be impossible for me to describe my feelings at that time. It was truly the saddest intelligence that ever met my eyes. A thousand thoughts rushed through my mind with the rapidity of lightning. I wanted to do something—wanted to do everything—for you in a moment, but, alas, could do nothing! At that time I had not a single dollar I could call my own; but, thanks to divine circumstance, I have succeeded in raising five dollars. I have long been in arrears with you, but it is my misfortune and not my fault, I have often looked at the little tab on my paper and felt my face burn with shame and my heart throb with grief because I could not pay for a paper I love too dearly to give up; now I feel better since I am able to liquidate at a time when it is so much needed.

This remittance takes my last nickel, but it goes free as air; and if I had ten thousand dollars at my command to-night, I would lay the last cent down to free you from the clutches of that detestable villain, Anthony Comstock. Oh! if the Liberals of America would look this affair square in the face, it would raise an infidel element and a Freethought tempest that would soon dethrone all such men as this modern Torquemada—the jackal Comstock—whose business it is to hunt prey for the bloodhounds of superstition. I hope the Liberals of the entire country will wake up to a proper realization of our condition, and that every one will contribute something in your behalf. I fully believe I am the poorest man on THE TRUTH SEEKER subscription list, and I can do something; and if all will put their shoulders to the wheel, you will not suffer and THE TRUTH SEEKER will still go forth on its iconoclastic work. It is now midnight. I am writing this by the bedside of my sick wife, who joins me in sympathy for you. I bid you fraternally

Good-night, R. M. CASEY.

ANGOLA, IND., Nov. 24, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Please find enclosed $1.00 for the Humphrey-Bennett discussion entitled "Christianity and Infidelity." Through the kindness of a friend of mine in this place (O. A. Crockett), I was permitted to read the discussion, published in your excellent paper, as it progressed, and was very much interested and pleased with it, and more especially with your able, scholarly, convincing and irrefutable replies to the (in most instances) learned arguments of your able opponent. The work deserves a careful reading by both "saint and sinner." It is at once fascinating and instructive, and will well pay for the time spent in its careful perusal; and permit me to say it does credit to yourself and Mr. Humphrey, and contains more solid information in less space than any work I have had the pleasure of reading, and must have a tendency to open the eyes of many who are now bound down by the iron grasp of priestcraft and church, if they can only be induced to read it. Friend Bennett, you certainly have the best of Mr. Humphrey in the discussion, and, in my opinion, completely demolished his old worn out dogmas—dogmas which may do to preach to a superstitious and credulous class of people who never think for themselves, but wait for the clergy to think for them, and with gaping mouths listen to and swallow without a question all the ministers tell them and the Bible says, no matter how absurd it may be, and then hold up their hands in holy horror at every thinking man and woman in the land who dares investigate for themselves and publicly speak their honest convictions in opposition to the pre-conceived notion of bigoted superstition—in fact, that class of people would, were it in their power, crucify every Freethinker in the land who dares oppose their notions, as they crucified Christ, not because the Freethinking people have in any manner wronged any of their fellow-creatures, or violated the laws of the country, but because they differ with them in their religious belief, as the case of Dr. Russell of Texas fully demonstrates—what they cannot meet with fair, sound argument, they determine to meet with force. However, we can expect but little else from a set of religious fanatics to whom history accords for upwards of a thousand years, the most relentless, fiendish, bloody, and cruel wars and tortures ever prosecuted and invented since the human family sprang into existence upon this terrestrial globe. But, thanks to science and scientific men, they are fast losing their hold on the people, and the sandy foundation upon which they rest their structure is surely and steadily giving way and will not bear investigation. "Truth is mighty and must prevail" over fiction and superstition. That there are many honest men and women in the churches who really believe what they have been taught from their infancy and profess, cannot be denied, but their bias and prejudice, which have become a second nature, will not allow them to investigate for themselves, and makes them subservient to the powers that be.

I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER that you have been arrested by the United States authorities for sending through the mails "obscene and blasphemous matter," and that the arrest was made through the instrumentality of one of the minions of the so-called Young Men's Christian Association. Are these young and unfledged birds of paradise attempting to exhume and bring to life the old "blue laws" of Connecticut? What has become of "free press and free speech," so much boasted of by us as American citizens as one of the corner-stones upon which our forefathers founded this great republic? How many outrages and how much misery and bloodshed has been and is being perpetrated upon poor humanity by the votaries of Jesus and in his name; and yet they style themselves "the followers of the meek and lowly Jesus"! Oh, for one spark of consistency! I was a soldier in the army of the Union, but little did I think at that time that the strong arm of the Government I was defending would ever become subservient to a set of bigots, to aid them in their efforts to suppress liberty, truth, and science.

You have my heartfelt sympathy in your trouble, and I would make it more substantial, but am unable to do so owing to the depressed condition of my finances.

I am with respect,

Yours truly, JOHN K. MORROW.

MARENGO, Dec. 1, 1877.

MR. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Seeing an account of your arrest in your TRUTH SEEKER of the 17th inst., it made me mad all over, and I am not the only one either. There are persons in this place and vicinity who are ready to shoulder their guns, if necessary, and no wonder, for it is the greatest outrage on the constitution and free speech that has ever been perpetrated since the foundation of the government. Excitement ran very high in this place after your arrest was known. The religious people hung their heads when there was anything said about it, and well they might for shame if they have got any. Religion is very popular in this country, but if they don't succeed in this it won't be so popular. Any way, that is my opinion. I hope to God—if there is one—that Anthony Comstock and the Young Men's Christian Association will get all the opposition they want. Bro. Bennett, you have my sympathy, and whatever I can do for you I will do willingly, for I think this religion is all a sham and a humbug, and if any unprejudiced religious person will look at both sides alike, I think he will say I am right. It is my opinion that one half of the people that belong to the churches belong to them only for popularity's sake. They don't believe in Christianity more than I do. You may think this is rather strong language, but it is my honest opinion. I have never taken your paper, but I will join the trial club at this place. Yours truly,

ADELBERT J. STEVENS.

RARITAN, ILL., Dec. 4, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT, Dear Sir: Enclosed you will find $5.00, to be used in defense of liberty. I think it is high time every Liberal in the country should awaken to the danger that is upon us. Let every one do a little, and if possible, test this matter in the Supreme Court, that we may know whether this great free government that we have boasted so much about is a sham or a reality. This law under which you were arrested brings to mind the old infamous Fugitive Slave law (which it bears a strong resemblance to), when men and women were dragged into slavery without an opportunity to have their freedom. What damnable things have been done in the name of liberty! You have my earnest sympathy. Send me blank petition. Yours truly,

WESLEY MILLIKEN.

MY DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Upon learning that your sanctum sanctorum had been desecrated by that seeming abortion, Anthony Comstock, my heart's deepest sympathies went out to you, that you should have been the victim of such an outrageous indignity. Judging from his proceedings, I think there must be a close resemblance as regards intelligence at least in this select mouth-piece of the Young Men's Christian Association, and the mouth-piece through which the Christian's God, in days of yore, saw fit to address Balaam.

Judging by the many expressions of condolence, and the more substantial contributions forwarded and guaranteed from earnest friends and liberty-loving citizens, the aforesaid nondescript must have well-nigh reached the end of his tether. Were he anything other than an insane man, an idiot, or an ignoramus he must have seen that by this last encroachment on the rights of American freemen, he was insuring his own doom. In the first place, I think if you have committed any legal crime by sending specified articles through the mails, he is as guilty for instigating you to do so, and is as liable to the penalty of the law. The contemptible meanness of his procedure to entrap his victims is utterly detestable and would disgrace even a brute. I believe his charges of obscenity and blasphemy cannot be substantiated, and under the circumstances I think you have much the stronger case for prosecuting him. That every Liberal throughout the length and breadth of the land may espouse your cause, which is equally theirs, is my heartfelt wish. With full confidence that for once this supercilious and infatuated bigot will get his just deserts, and the cause of liberty and Liberalism a glorious triumph, I wish to add my mite toward securing this grand result. You may draw on me for ten dollars at any time for this purpose. In deepest sympathy, I remain ever your friend.

HENRY A. STONE.

GIRARD, KAN., Dec. 1, 1877.

MY DEAR FRIEND: So the dirty confidence game, played by Comstock & Co., has come off again, and you are its victim. What a pity that we cannot even expect justice for you—and all because you have dared to speak independently your honest thoughts! Alas for the boasted freedom of this "Land of the free, and home of the brave!"

Free? Humph! This would be quite a joke if it wasn't so serious.

My wife joins me in sending our mite and sympathy to help bear you through. Here is a little account of the way our Kansas judges treat Government confidence chaps. This happened over in Labette Co., under Judge H. G. Webb.

The prosecuting attorney found it very difficult to prove the guilt of the accused, therefore the very learned Attorney for the State employed a New York detective to pump a confession out of the accused, to accomplish which, the "gentleman from New York" had himself arrested on a fictitious complaint and lodged in jail, in the same cell with the accused, for some ten days.

When the trial came off this same detective was put upon the witness-stand in behalf of the prosecution to testify as to what the accused had told him in jail. After the usual preliminary questions were asked, he stated that he resided in New York City; occupation a detective; was acquainted with the accused; got acquainted with him in the cell, where he was placed for the purpose of getting a confession from the accused. At this stage of the testimony, Judge Webb said to the detective, "Stand aside, Sir; no professional liar can testify in my court." The prosecuting attorney stated to the court that he knew of no authority to sanction his Honor's ruling in this case and that he never knew or heard of a precedent for such ruling. The Judge remarked that if there was no precedent for his ruling, it was time there was, and he would now make one. The detective stepped from the witness-stand and the prosecution failed to convict.

We think if this was applied to Comstock it would settle him. Hope you may have a court where "no professional liars can testify." Of course you must have our "Bob" Ingersoll. He'll make it interesting for them. We have several Spiritualists and other Liberals here, and all join in sympathy for you and condemnation of Comstock. Enclosed find P. O. Order for $5.00—$2.00 of this from myself and wife to assist in the expense of the prosecution, $1.00 for my nephew, J. H. McCoy, for same purpose, and the remaining $2.00 credit to my account on TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours for freedom, A. M. SIDWELL.

DENVER, COL., Dec. 6, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have been authorized by J. S. McCool to say that he will contribute $100.00 towards your defense providing you can procure Robt. G. Ingersoll to defend you—in any case he will contribute something, but on the above conditions will he give the hundred dollars. Mr. C. Roth sends greeting and says that although he can't do much financially, he will try and induce others that are able to do something to aid in your defense. In truth I remain Yours, etc., JOHN G. JENKINS.

NEW HAVEN, Dec. 10, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: Feeling interested in your cause and in the cause of truth and freedom in general, I thought I would just call on some of the lovers of Free thought and see what could be done to help our champion in his time of need. Enclosed you will find the result, $25.50. You will please me if you will send a copy of your paper with the acknowledgment of this to each and every name on this list. I intend to renew my subscription soon, and am in hopes to send you some new names. Hoping that the sun of truth and justice may shine upon us, I remain Yours,

JOHN H. BARLOW.

In order to give a partial expression of our sentiments of sympathy with our friend D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who has been so oppressed and deprived of liberty by an agent of a bigoted and superstitious class legislation, while his only accusation is that he has exercised the right and privilege the Constitution of the United States has publicly declared unto every man, the freedom of speech, of the press, and the right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, we, the undersigned, do freely contribute the amounts affixed to our names, hoping that the right will prevail. J. H. Barlow, $2.00; J. D. Stebbins, $2.00; Alwin Payne, $2.00; John S. Shennan, $2.00; J. B. Haines, $2.00; John D. Eager, $1.00; Oscar H. Stever, 50 cents; Herman Lauffer, $1.00; Hugo Schneeloch, $1.00; Alfred Rich, $1.00; M. V. B. Hill, $1.00; C. W. Corey, $1.00; Cash, $1.00; C. E. Howd, $1.00; Charles S. Doune, $1.00; Jeff S. Law, 50 cts.; George Leheen, 50 cts.; H. A. Topliff, $1.00; S. Taylor, 50 cts.; William Coffey, $1.00; Morris Steinvitz, $1.00; E. H. Bennett, $1.00; W. H. Young, 50 cts.

COSHOCOTON, OHIO, Dec. 6, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I went to Newark (35 miles) yesterday, where I knew there was a liberal element, only needing effort, to get up a circulation for THE TRUTH SEEKER. As a nucleus, I send you two dollars for one subscriber, who has agreed to see that you begin the new year with more subscribers there. I shall go down there again in a few weeks and will stir them up. It is a nice town of six or seven thousand inhabitants. I intend that your list shall be kept good for the next year, whether you are in jail or out. The effort of Comstock, the Y. C. pimp, ought to more than double your circulation. In the mean time I, and doubtless many other Liberals, who are sincere endorsers of the reform policy and administration of President Hayes, shall begin to inquire why the Government sanctions the insidious measures to undermine the foundation of our liberties, and the freedom of the press, by keeping Comstock in power and allowing him in the name of the Government to commit such outrages upon personal liberty, for the mere purpose of building up or protecting a bigoted and sectarian creed. Can the administration afford to use Comstock as an agent to suppress free thought and a free press, in the interests of any creed that has shed rivers of blood and produced legions of the most corrupt, dishonest, and licentious hypocrites, in clerical and lay garbs, upon the thin pretext that scientific works are obscene, or that free thought is dangerous to the growth of the Christian religion? The people are not going to stand this kind of thing much longer without rising above party. Send me two or three blank petitions. Yours, W. S. WOOD.

PARIS, ILL., Dec. 7, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: Your friends are all getting anxious about the result of your trial. The news is slow getting here. We eagerly scan the dailies for information, but fail to find it, and have to content ourselves with a hope of a happy termination in your favor, and wait patiently for your own fearless paper.

I have been able to make one more small collection of one dollar as a donation, which is from Brother J. A. Wathall. I also send you two dollars as a subscription for your paper from Mahlon Hockett. He says that although he sometime ago stopped taking your paper, it was not through any ill feeling toward you or your paper, nor through any change in his Liberal belief or opinion; but feeling that he can do no longer without it, and knowing if there was ever a time you needed subscriptions it is now, he therefore gladly sends the amount.

Uncle Joe Bradbury says if it is necessary he will give $100 more. As soon as you have printed any of your petitions to Congress, you will please forward me whatever number you think I can use to profit and advantage. Ever your friend, CHAS. B.

GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN TO THE RESCUE!

A FRIENDLY VOICE FROM MADISON SQUARE.

LANT'S CASE APROPOS TO THE TRUTH SEEKER'S.—'TIS CONGRESS, NOT COMSTOCK.—THE CATHOLIC AND PROTESTANT JESUITS UNITED.—MR. TRAIN MAKES REPRESENTATIVES EAT THEIR OWN WORDS.—HE BELIEVES IN LAMP-POST LAW.—INTEREST OR FEAR IS HIS MOTTO.

The following letter speaks for itself. Although apparently silent with his birds and babes in Madison Square, Mr. Train's ears are wide open, and his eyes point out the signs of the times.

MADISON SQUARE, DEC. 4, P. E. 48.

CITIZEN D. M. BENNETT, Comstock's Last Victim:

The case of George Francis Train is not forgotten; how for publishing in his paper some choice quotations from the Bible, with a few accompanying comments, he was arrested and thrown into the dark, dismal Tombs prison, where he lay about six months, and contracted thereby such diseased conditions of the system as he feared he would never recover from.—THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Disease! That's so, by George! You hit it square. When I got out I weighed 228 pounds naked.—To-day but 178, having lost 15 pounds during my late six days' fast.

The 50 pounds lost was all disease sponged out of that Black Hole of Calcutta—the Tombs—where they will try and send you—where now, to-day, 500 prisoners are packed in cells intended for only 130! To get me out, the Legislature passed a law to tear down the Tombs; and when they habeas corpus me out, without a trial, they repealed the law.

I have been told you do not take much stock in me. What of that? Who cares? My shares are not in the market. I only do what amuses me, independent of "Duty," "Humanity," "Sympathy," and the "Damp-fools" they call "The People," who would let you starve rather than resist tyranny. I am, however, astonished to see them come forward with dollars. You evidently have friends. If you don't like me it is because you don't know me; but as I don't care whether you like me or not, and may never see you, that does not prevent me from writing you this letter, because I see you mean business and intend to die game. There is no white flag in the number of THE TRUTH SEEKER that Lant has just brought me in the Square.

But why fight Comstock? He is only a bread-and-butter fanatic. Better strike the law rather than the policeman. Why fight the Marshal instead of the Judge? Let me make a few extracts from the paper published by Wilson (Tom Scott's victim), now six months in Camden jail on his third trial:

From G. F. T. Paper, last January.

MAIL ESPIONAGE.

Editor—Congress. I see, declares its right to overhaul the telegraphic dispatches. Mr. Train—Talk about Mexicanizing America! Already it is worse than that. It was Africanized, Asiaticized, Europeanized long ago. The English Star Chamber (secret in everything), Russian Knout, (Delaware whipping post), Austrian Spy system, (secret service department), Spanish Inquisition, (where two doctors can rob a man of his liberty). Congress will by and by legislate to examine our pants, investigate our cook, overhaul our under-clothing, and enter our bed-chamber. Who wonders now that the lunatics I thought me insane! Apropos to this order I sent General Garfield this reminder:

NEW YORK, Dec. 21, P. E. 47.

DEAR GEN. GARFIELD, Member of Congress: Your indignant comments on Hewitt's overhauling telegrams show that you fear the mails may be outraged. Have you forgotten your former debate where you dismissed the bill permitting Comstock to snoop the post-office for "obscene literature?" Does not that infamous act of Congress give this secret tribune the power to read private letters on the plea of protecting the public morals? The young man Lant, from Toledo, whom you referred to, is still in prison, slowly dying from repeated hemorrhages in the Albany jail. He is a citizen of your own State. Have you not time to open the cell door and let this young Ohioan free to support his family, who are facing this hard winter all alone? He is too brave to beg a pardon, having committed no crime, but a word from you to General Grant would set him at liberty.

GEO. FRANCIS TRAIN.

To make sure of striking the proper quarter, I wrote Cox:

From G. F. T. Paper, Jan. '77.

OPENING PRIVATE LETTERS.

Editor—Washington is really getting excited over the outrage on Hewitt?

Mr. Train—Nothing but fire creates smoke. Some rat is in trouble or the squealing would not be so loud. I am curious to see what notices will be taken of my note to Cox. He ignores me altogether. Is he afraid, too?

MR. TRAIN TO MR. COX.

NEW YORK, Dec. 22, P. E. 47.

DEAR MR. COX: Garfield's and Hale's indignation at the alleged outrage on the press, and Hewitt's anxiety to exonerate Postmaster James, show that Republicans and Democrats alike are oblivious to the fact that Congress passed a bill permitting the very thing they ask you to investigate. All you have to do is to subpoena Comstock and the Society for the Suppression of Vice, and you will discover the rat-hole under the thin disguise of protecting public morals. Noah Davis, Osgood, Bliss, and Davenport can use this man Comstock as readily as Bliss and Babcock used the secret service department in the whiskey and safe burglary frauds. Subpoena Postmaster James and the Comstock Ring, and you will discover that this moral act was only a political blind to overhaul the mail matter of prominent Democrats, as another string to their European spy system, in order to more securely work out the secret conspiracy to perpetuate their power by every means possible on Comstock's ipse dixit. Postmaster James allowed this Government Agent to open and overhaul the mail of John A. Lant, editor of the Toledo Star, who is now dying in Albany jail, while his family are left penniless, where he was sent by Judge Benedict for publishing my prayer for Henry Ward Beecher!

General Garfield, who examined the papers, stated in the Congressional debate, that there was not a word "obscene," although it might be considered blasphemous. Chittenden in the same discussion, gave an instance of a similar post-office outrage to this Hewitt's affair. As you were in Congress at the time, all you have to do is to refer to the record. After what you have witnessed in South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana, how far would you have to stretch a point to assume that Chandler, Morton and Cameron, in their anxiety to count in Hayes on the anything-to-beat-Tilden platform, might use this bill for the Suppression of Vice to look into Hewitt's private letters?

According to General Garfield, Lant is incarcerated for my "blasphemy," not his "obscenity." Is it not singular that Congress and the Press have forgotten this evangelical letter-opening bill of the Y. M. C. A.? Otherwise, why do they ignore this outrage on individual rights and constitutional liberty in Lant's case?

GEO. FRANCIS TRAIN.

Here is the letter where I caught Hewitt napping. Both parties are united in their attack on liberty. They have sown the wind and will soon reap the whirlwind: This is the note to "Tilden's Corn-Popper!"

From G. F. T. Paper, No. 1.

AFTER THE RAT IN HEWITT'S MAIL BAG.

NEW YORK, Dec. 30, P. E. 47.

Hon. Abram S. Hewitt, Member of Congress, Washington:

The Post-office has deceived you. Where spies and informers, private or public, can penetrate into every household, is it likely that their Star-Chamber system would spare the public mails?

Your friends Godwin, Cooper and Hale were right. Your mail has no doubt been tampered with. How could there be such a yell unless somebody has been hit? But under the sanction of an act of Congress passed during your membership, called An Act for the Suppression of Vice, Chittenden, Hoar and Garfield all fought it, but the Y. M. C. A., the Union League—Swan, Winslow, Cook—defaulting school were all-powerful. You will find the debate about January 27th, last year. Just what has happened in your case was then anticipated. Under the thin disguise of protecting public morals, the conspirators have overhauled your private letters. Did they not open your private telegrams in Indianapolis? After what has taken place in the disputed States and the tamper of the radical press, can you doubt that the defeat of Tilden, in their estimation, would come under this bill?

Had I supposed that Mr. Cox would have suppressed my letter and refused to subpoena the secret agents of this society, I would have given you the hint before that would have chased the fox into his hole. Neither has General Garfield answered my note. As you are the third and most interested member to whom I have written, it remains to be seen if the evangelical glamour can also cloud your vision to this infamous bill, as it seems to theirs.

GEO. FRANCIS TRAIN.

This shows you that you can get no redress from these Congressmen, who use Comstock as their "pimp" to cover up their own frauds. You must strike for bigger game than this "mongrel dog" of the Young Men's Concubine Association. Why stop to kill gophers and polecats when lions and tigers are in the jungle?

Heywood has written me. I write to you as both cases are similar to mine, Lant's, and your own.

You have a big thing on hand, and if you show yourself game, I will turn my Psychologic force into the court, as I did at Camden, the other day, when I burst Judge, jury, and Tom Scott's $800,000,000 of packed cards and loaded dice. Comstock has a great mission. Don't abuse him. He will never stop till the people burn the Bible (as an obscene book, as I proved it to be in the Train Lique, a paper that none of your so-called Liberals ever dared to quote and would not now publish, though only Bible quotations) in the public square, and hang God in effigy! But I evolved out of this old battle when I dropped the Anno Domini chronology for the Psychologic Era. But here is the letter that burst open Lant's cell, and was sold at Washington, Inauguration Day, by thousands:

From G. F. T. Paper, No. 5.

AN IMPORTANT LETTER FROM MR. TRAIN TO CONGRESS.

NEW YORK, March 3, P. E. 47.

To The Senate and House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Before you rattle the dirt on the coffin containing what is left of the corpse of the American Republic, I want to ask you the favor of carefully reading this digest of a debate in Congress on Espionage in the United States Mails.

It seems strange when appointing the Cox Investigating Committee that you should have entirely forgotten this Bill.

Mr. Cannon, Rep., Ill., reported a Bill to provide penalties for sending obscene matter through the mails.

Mr. Conger, Rep., Mich., criticised it as being too sweeping, in that it would apply to newspapers in which an offensive advertisement might be inserted.

Mr. Cannon defended the Bill, claiming that it did not apply to advertisements unless published in pursuance of a scheme to disseminate offensive literature.

Mr. Conger withdrew his objections.

Mr. Hoar, Rep., Mass., criticised one of the descriptions of prohibited matter used in the Bill. "Things adapted for any indecent or immoral purposes," as being too broad. He recalled the time when anti-slavery newspapers were thrown out of the mails as immoral publications.

Gen. Garfield, Rep., Ohio, said that the House ought to be very careful in this class of legislation. He recalled as an evidence of its dangerous character the fact that a few years ago the publisher of a New York paper was sent to the penitentiary for three years for publishing a contribution from Geo. Francis Train, wholly illogical in its character, deriding the ordinary received notions of the Trinity, but in which not an obscene or scurrilous word was used. The Judge, however, charged the jury that the paper was blasphemous in the highest degree, and the jury found the publisher guilty. If the language of the law is liable to constructions of that sort, really Congress would enter the domain of theological opinion and bring down upon men the odium theologium, which was worse even than political odium.

Mr. Chittenden, Ind., N. Y., moved the recommendation of the bill. He expressed his desire to go before the Committee in order that he might show by a recent transaction that occurred in Brooklyn the impropriety of such a law. He pledged himself to show a special case of oppression against an honorable and innocent man that required an amendment to the law, but in a very different way from that proposed.

Mr. Bland, Dem., Mo., suggested that such a law would exclude from the mails the newspapers containing reports of the Beecher trial.

Mr. Cannon avowed himself to be in favor of excluding from the mails newspapers or books circulating the reports of trials of an obscene character, or of a character calculated to corrupt the morals of the country.

Mr. Hoar, Rep., Mass., said that quite recently the press of the country has been thrown into a state of intense excitement by the bill reported by Mr. Poland, which provided for the trial in the District of Columbia of the publishers of newspapers printed elsewhere which should contain libel. In his judgment the press was quite right in its opposition to that law, which was entirely contrary to sound principles; but this Bill very clearly exposes the press to a danger a hundredfold greater than the one contained in Mr. Poland's Bill.

Unless Congress takes up this matter, your agent will lie himself out of the dilemma and escape justice. It was not the mail robbers that opened Hewitt's letters. The Post-office made a great hue and cry over this to throw the public off the Comstock scent. As the Committee held its investigation in New York, why did they not subpoena this public informer and find out really what power you gave him over the mail bags as Special Agent of the Post-office? Will you please ask Mr. Hewitt and Mr. Cox why they put their heads together not to subpoena Comstock, who was the real spy in the Post-office?

Gen. Garfield takes the matter very coolly, although he was somewhat hot in the debate.

ONLY AN EDITOR; LET HIM DIE!

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 12, 1877.
Geo. Francis Train, Esq., Lexington Avenue, N. Y., Dear Sir:

Yours of the 11th inst. is received, and its contents are noted. Your former letter also came to hand; but in the pressure of my work I have not been able to respond sooner. The only relief for the case is the President's power of pardon; and a petition addressed to him or to the Attorney-General will bring up the subject for consideration.

Very Truly Yours, J. A. GARFIELD.

(Mr. Train's telegram.)

General Garfield, Member Congress, Washington;

All Right—Let Lant die in prison. He is only an outraged editor. Has Congress no individual rights?
GEO. FRANCIS TRAIN.

I sent with this a special messenger to Washington with letters to Senators and Members to ask as an American citizen these plain questions of Congress:

1. Why has the editor of the Toledo Sun been over sixteen months in a felon's cell for publishing the Beecher trial which was printed by every journal in the land?

2. Why did Congress appoint an Investigating Committee to see who was tampering with the mails when it had passed an act authorizing such espionage? Why did said Committee refuse to subpoena Comstock after I notified Mr. Cox about the rat in the mail-bags?

3. Why Congress passed a Bill which is unconstitutional under this clause of the organic law: "Article of Amendments to the Constitution of the United States: Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech or press?"

The stupid blunder of Congress in passing an unconstitutional act is not so surprising as the astounding apathy of the Press at this outrage on its Constitutional rights, to say nothing of its ignorance in not knowing that

Comstock in overhauling Hewitt's letters, or any letters, acted on the authority that you gave him after a contested and warning debate of coming danger. I do not beg your attention to this matter, but demand in the name of the whole people that you repeal this illegal measure immediately and as publicly liberate this young editor as you have publicly tried to disgrace him.

By voting yearly supplies this infamous defective system born in the war has been so firmly grafted on our Government as to blind you to the fact that some Pinkerton-Comstock espionage watches your actions. In short, without your knowing it, you enact laws, appoint agents, vote money to outrage public rights and cover up public wrongs; you arrest editors, Bastille citizens, outrage liberty, legislate national bankruptcy by substituting dead coin for live greenbacks, and yet have the impudence to assume that you absorb all the wisdom of the land.

The Caesarism that will soon Cromwellize your infamous breach of trust in organizing public poverty and private despair will not come from individual despots who divide with you the spoils, but the maddened uprising of the whole people against their servants who have so cruelly betrayed them.

GEO. FRANCIS TRAIN.

This postscript was in the second edition.

The Train Lique and Toledo Sun suppressed by the Beecher-Comstock-Noah Davis-Osborn-Bless-Hammond-Jesuit-Young M(en)s (Con-cubine) Association squad!

Eccles. xi. 2. Give a portion to seven and also to eight, for thou knowest not what evil shall be upon the earth.

POSTSCRIPT.

THANK YOU FOR NOTHING.

Ed.—Grant-ism dies in its infamy. Lant-ism lives in its manhood. The two thousand papers, No. 5, sold by Mr. Wilson Inauguration day in Washington produced this diapahet:

ALBANY, N. Y.

G. F. T. Kissed the earth after many months in a felon's cell, and looked the bright sun in the face to-day. Pardon at the end of term.

Mr. T.—All right. Interest or fear, my power is acknowledged. Object accomplished, but the end is not yet. The suppressed Train-Lique-Toledo-Sun-Beecher prayer will soon be published.

These extracts all bear on your case; and if you use them I will give you another bombshell next week.

All you have to do (if it amuses me) is just to say the word, and I will shut off the Psychologic tap, which immediately sets the Demonological force a-going, that will hang all these "Kusses" as high as Haman!

Having just kicked Death in the face in my starvation diet, where I exposed the frauds of the Brahmins, monks, and churches, you can imagine how little I fear their judges, jails, or bayonets.

If you are sufficiently advanced in evolution to print this Psychologic letter, you are safe; for once enlisted, I am booked for the whole war, and they would rather see a thousand devils on their track than one.

G. F. T.

[From the Saugamo Daily Times, Dec. 7.]

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, CENSOR.—The recent arrest of D. M. Bennett, the editor of a "Liberal thought" newspaper in New York, calls up what we think could best be settled by revising a few United States laws and relegating Anthony Comstock to the retirement of private life. Comstock was placed in office at the request of the Young Men's Christian Association with the ostensible mission to prevent the use of the United States mails for immoral purposes, and he has undoubtedly done much good work in seizing and destroying large quantities of obscene literature. Lately, however, Mr. Comstock has gone to unreasonable lengths, and has prepared the way for his own dismissal from office, and a re-enactment of new and more liberal laws than those hastily constructed and too sweeping instruments under which wrong is now being wrought. The special agent appointed to suppress vice has transformed himself into an evangelizer and a tolerably bold expression of what is understood as liberal thought incurs his anger, and the writer is sure soon after to suffer imprisonment and fine. It is true that some Liberal writers have been very liberal in their expressions and not tender of the susceptibilities of those who regard infidelity as a rank and atrocious crime. Christians have feelings, and feelings, too, that are outraged when their creed is assailed; but their tenderness in this regard comes from a deep religious respect for, and a grand devotion to their creed. They are entitled to protection from scoffers, and will always have it. But they, in their turn, should be willing to accord to those who sincerely believe an opposite creed, freedom to believe as their convictions lead and immunity from persecution. Comstock's recent acts are arbitrary and cruel, and should not be countenanced. The recent arrest of Mr. Bennett, above referred to, will, we think, have the effect of putting the quietus on Anthony Comstock, and induce the exercise of some deliberate thought in the construction of laws devised to exercise a censorship over the press of the United States.

A CHURCH INCIDENT.—During a church revival at Mount Washington, Bullitt Co., Ky., while Mr. Thomas, an officer of the church, was passing the contribution box among the audience, a Mr. Burkhead made some familiar remarks in relation to the contents of the box and whether he was compelled to place anything in it or not. A few angry words passed, whereupon Thomas laid down the contribution box, drew his revolver from his pocket, and shot Burkhead dead as he sat in his pew. After performing this deed, the murderer did not tarry to join in prayer, but flourishing his pistol and threatening to shoot down any person who interfered with him rushed from the church and made his escape.

Virtue shines in native colors, purer and brighter than pearl or diamond or prism can reflect. Arabian gardens in their bloom can exhale no such sweetness as charity diffuses. Beneficence is god-like, and he who does most good to his fellow-men is the master of masters and has learned the art of arts.—Horace Mann.

THE pen is mightier than the sword. What the sword of physical strength conquers, the pen and the intellect strive to increase and retain. The undying truths of science are indelibly written in the archives of the world, and are fast driving the false and the unstable to the wall. We hear the music of a nobler, grander, and mightier future softly stealing down the stream of time, making the air fragrant with its perfume and the skies rosy with its light.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

THE ocean of life may present a calm, unbroken surface to the eye, the very picture of repose, while beneath the dark and turbid currents are surging to and fro, black and angry as they toss and leap against one another. The sky may smile without a cloud as its blue depths are bathed in a flood of sunshine, and yet the lightning be heating its red bolts and the storm troops marshalling for the onset. The human countenance may be as calm as that ocean, as bright with sunshine as that sky unclouded, and yet the fierce tempest be sweeping across the soul, or the echoes of sorrow's wall be lingering amid the ruins of hopes that have been destroyed.—Dr. Sara B. Chase.

THE more married men you have the fewer crimes there will be. Marriage renders a man more virtuous and wise. An unmarried man is but half a perfect being, and it requires the other half to make things right; and it cannot be expected that in this imperfect state he can keep a straight path of rectitude any more than a boat with one oar can keep a straight course. In nine cases out of ten, where men become drunkards, or where they commit crimes against the peace of the community, these acts were laid while in a single state, or where the wife is, as is sometimes the case, an unsuitable match. Marriage gives him a centre for his thoughts, his affection and his acts. Here is a home for the entire man, and the counsel, the affections, the example, and the interest of his "better half" keeps him from erratic courses, and from falling into a thousand temptations, to which he would otherwise be exposed.—Voltaire.

Odas and Enas.

WHAT language does an Arabian child speak before it cuts its teeth? Gum-Arable, unquestionably.

"WHAT are you doing?" said a father to his son, who was tinkering an old watch. "Improving my time, sir."

"POOR but respectable" people are common enough; but what we now want is a few who are rich and respectable.

ADAM and Eve, we suppose, were the first to start "turning over new leaves." They did it to keep up with the fashions.

"TIME flies," suggested she. "Yes," he answered sadly, taking a dark object out of the cream, "time flies were gone."

A CORRESPONDENT, whose colored servant asks for frequent leaves of absence, says she is the most inveterate Dinah out he ever knew.

A LITTLE girl sent out to hunt eggs came back unsuccessful, complaining that "there were lots of hens standing round doing nothing."

WHEN a Kentuckian talks cattle he confines himself to short-horns, but when he invites you to "take something" he has long horns in his mind's eye.

THE melon-cholic days have fled; No more we fear their ills; Into the beauteous fall we're sped To get shook up with chills.

WE've seen people who could kick a man's hat off without touching his head, but kicking will never be considered perfection until a man can kick another's head off without touching his hat.

A YOUNG damsel sent twenty-five cents and a postage-stamp in reply to an advertisement that appeared in an Eastern paper of "how to make an impression," and got for her answer: "Sit down in a pan of dough."

A YOUNG man met a rival who was somewhat advanced in years, and wishing to annoy him, inquired how old he was. "I can't exactly tell," replied the other, "but I can inform you that an ass is older at twenty than a man at sixty."

A CLERGYMAN says that, while visiting a colored school in the South, he asked a tiny darkey what he studied for, and what was his object in attending school. Hesitating for a moment or two, the little fellow answered: "To git off."

RECENTLY a newly-married couple were in a store on Main street looking for suitable ornaments to adorn their rooms. The young wife was quite pleased with the picture entitled "Suffer little children to come unto me," which they bought.

PY SHIMINY; ISH DOT SO?—There is doubtless such a thing as excessive promptness in emergencies. Presence of mind and determination are admirable qualities in themselves, but it sometimes happens that a decision made upon the spur of the moment is regretted upon a more deliberate survey of the field. This remorse seems to have lately overtaken a worthy Dutchman of Anoka county, Minnesota. The Dutchman was seeking to reach a town at some distance from Saak Centre, and to accomplish this must drive over the prairie from the latter town. He was unaccustomed to the road and night overtook him with his vehicle fast in a slough and no town in sight. He sought the solitary farm house visible and asked permission to stay till morning, the farmer telling the traveler, however, that it would be necessary for him to sleep with the children or the farmer himself, as their accommodations were limited. Quick as lightning the Dutchman expressed his resolution not to sleep with the "hodderration children," so he slept with the farmer. The rest of the story may be given in his own language:

"Vell, in der mornin', ven we comes mit der stairs down, den I see two girls about seventeen and nineteen years old, and I ask der old man, 'Pees dem girls de shildren you told me about?' and he say, 'Yaw, dem is mine only shildren,' and I says to myself, 'Py shiminy! Ish dot so?'"

THE NAKED TRUTH.—A policeman found a boy bathing in a slip, near the foot of Randolph street, and he called to the lad to come out and be arrested like a man for breaking the ordinance.

"Is it agin the ordinance for a boy to fall into the river?" queried the bather.

"No, sir; but you are naked."

"Does the law say that a boy has got to have his clothes on when he falls in?"

"The law prohibits bathing here, and now you come out."

"Is it bathing when a feller cuts his foot on a piece of tin, knocks his head agin a beam, and swallows four catfish and a gob of mud?"

"I want you!" called the officer.

"What for?" asked the boy.

"I command you to come out!"

"I can't come," sorrowfully answered the bather. "The real truth is, I jumped in here to rescue a drowning female, but her hair pulled off and she's at the bottom. As I have no witness I don't go to trial."

"I'll bring you out!" growled the officer as he made for a boat; but the boy disappeared and was seen no more. While the officer was looking under the wharf the half of a good-sized sand pile suddenly slid down the back of his neck and into his boots, and a musical, familiar voice was heard saying:

"My shirt's on hind side afore, my breeches turned around, and this vest is wrong end up, but I feel as clean as a new stamp from the post-office, and what an appetite I've got for pop-corn balls."—Detroit Free Press.

QUICKSILVER.—The nimble sixpence.

"Nothing" is defined as a hole without anything round it.

The Rev. Mr. Skewes was mobbed out in Utah. The outrage is inextinguishable.

If Theodore Tilton makes up with his wife, ought he not to apologize to Beecher?

A MODERN writer has changed a well-known quotation to "No pent-up pew-taker contracts our powers."

It is asked, "If the night air is unhealthy, how about the longevity of owls and the healthfulness of Thomas cats?"

TALK about the patience and forbearance of Job! Was he ever arrested for blasphemy by Anthony Commonstock?

A CHAIRMAN at a public meeting in a Western city recently introduced Col. Ingersoll to the audience as "the rising young Atheist."

In the sentence "John strikes William," what is the object of strikes? "Higher wages and less work," is the prompt answer of the intelligent pupil.

LAST winter's ulsters are being worn again this winter, which calls to our mind the fact that we are wearing the overcoat we bought four years ago.

COL. INGERSOLL says that one thing that helped to make him an Infidel was because Noah took bedbugs into the ark. It was a mean thing in Noah.

"GO UP HIGHER; or, Religion in Common Life," is the title of a recently issued religious book. Case and Gilman have studied it diligently and gone up—to Sing Sing.

"DIED of a visitation, by God, in a natural way or otherwise," was the seemingly profane verdict of a coroner's jury in Malone, N. Y. God's visits are more to be dreaded than those of the average mother-in-law.

THE subject of the Rev. Dr. Tyng's lecture to young men last Sunday was, "How to Repair the Breaches." A good lecture for ladies that should be, though they are pretty well posted on Tyngker's their youngsters' breaches.

SEVERAL of the Old Catholic priests of Germany have married recently. Celibacy has lost its charms for them under the strict German laws. If all the young Catholic priests would follow their example, they would do wisely.

THOMPSON, the grocer on Third avenue, will hereafter write his name Thomson. Reason, the immaculate agent of the Y. M. C. A. threatened to arrest him under the obscenity laws if he did not change the orthography of his name or pay $1,000 hush money.

THE sun comes up and the sun goes down, and day and night are the same as one; the grass grows green and the grass grows brown, and what is it all when all is done? At the end of time half of humanity will swear that Daniel Webster didn't write the Dictionary.

THE influential church-members and savings bank directors who are active in the great temperance movement are determined not to falter in their high and holy mission while one of their number remains at liberty. They mean to keep pegging away until each of them has done his little defalcate and gone to join Case and Gilman.

Puck says, "It is all very well to read the glowing accounts of the success of revival meetings, vouched for by the prominent men of the locality, but what we want to find is a square, old-fashioned minister who will strike an honest balance-sheet and own up just how many suspender buttons he winnows out of the hat at every collection."

A VENERABLE collector for a religious benevolent society failing to get any money from a citizen of comfortable means, intimated that the individual could carry no wealth to heaven. "Heaven!" retorted the intended victim, "the place where all tract and bible society agents go? Why, if a man went there with five cents in his pocket, they would worry the life out of him in less than a week."

THE regular weekly clerical scandal has taken place in Davenport, Iowa. This time he borrowed money, forged checks, said his prayers regularly, and absconded. But, notwithstanding the prevailing opinion to the contrary, there are some honest clergymen left, though it is hoped that proof will not be required of us for this statement.

WHERE will this thing stop? Parson McGhee has been imprisoned for murder; Bishop Onderdonk was deposed for lechery; Cardinal Antonelli left an illegitimate daughter, and now the Lord himself is on trial in Rochester for conspiracy. His name is George D. Lord, and he cries, "Good jury deliver me; for I am the Lord. Selah. Whoopi!"

We trust that Mr. Hayes has not been scared out of appointing Bob Ingersoll minister to Germany by the cries that have gone up from believers in "Christian statesmen." We haven't Christians enough like Pomeroy, Colfax, and Shellabarger to go round. It will not be hurtful to piece out with Bob for Germany. Bob is a little heterodox, but he is square.—Cincinnati Saturday Night.

COMSTOCK thinks of introducing a bill into Congress, this winter, for the passage of a law making it a misdemeanor punishable with ten years in the State prison at hard labor to speak of a frog as a bull-frog. If a prefix is wanted, he insists that it shall be altered to steer-frog, because of the superior morality of the word. The Young Men's Christian Association have taken the matter into consideration and promises to lend the whole weight of its influence to have the law placed upon the Statute Books of the United States.

AMONG the many remarkable rumors which gain great circulation by their strangeness and very little belief because of their incredible nature, comes the report that Anthony Gunstock, the Obscenist, being shocked at the idea of anything appearing in the garb of nature, is anxious to have it become a law of our country that horses and dogs shall be clothed hereafter to avoid exposing their persons to the guileless and corruptible like himself. Knowing the character of the man goes far to convince us of the truth of this strange story, which would otherwise pass unnoticed, or be looked upon as simply a base canard.

THE question, "Will revivalism pay," is attracting public attention. It is brought out that Moody made a failure in getting along in the world previous to his engaging in the evangelical business, which he has found to be remunerative. He is now, through the munificent presents of the pious souls who think by giving to him they are lending to the Lord, who will repay them with compound interest and give them a front seat in the very amphitheatre of heaven, is living in princely style at the home he has been able to build with the money he has made at preaching the Gospel of blood. Hammond, Whittle, Mrs. Van Oott, and Murphy are all doing extremely well, as money pours into their coffers freely. This is the great secret of their continued labors. If there was no money in the business they would soon do as other unpaid clergymen do—stop preaching. None of them care enough about the souls of the poor sinner to give their life and strength to save them if they are not paid well for their trouble. "No pay no preach" is the rule they all act upon. If by loud preaching and praying they are able to dress well, feed well, be looked up to with veneration, and make a thousand dollars or a few thousands per year, they are going to stick to the business; but when it ceases to pay they will drop it as rats leave a sinking ship, and they will go into the life-insurance business, sewing machines, lightning-rods, patent weather-strips, and the like, at which they can make a comfortable living. Souls may go to hell and be damned, or God can save his own unfortunate offspring for all they will do in the matter unless well paid for their services. Prayers are cheap but it takes money to save souls.

MR. BEECHER'S ORTHODOXY.—Mr. Beecher's text last Sunday morning was the ninth verse of the first chapter of Ephesians, and the theme of his discourse was the background of mystery which surrounds, or rather obscures, all attempts to teach or understand the attributes and nature of God. Men must learn these things by their own experience, and, in illustrating the difference between God and man, he said that man's essential faculties are precisely similar to those of God, and differ only in degree, just as the child of four years, sitting on his father's knee, has the same powers of reasoning as his father, only that power in the father is matured, while in the child it is weak and obscure. A man would not hold a candle out of the window and say it was sunrise, and yet the same light and the same warmth exist in the candle that exist in the sun, though in an immensely different degree. Speaking of the Trinity, Mr. Beecher said that he believed there were three persons united in one Godhead, but if any one should ask him why he believed it, he should tell him frankly that he did not know anything about it, only that it was easier to believe that which he thought coincided with the doctrine of the New Testament than to contradict it. But he did not attempt to explain it. Orthodox says men must believe in the Trinity or they cannot come into the Church. That is called orthodoxy, but he called it heathenism. It is not an easy thing, said Mr. Beecher, for an honest, conscientious man to know just what to preach and what not to preach. A man who values morality, and who has the good of his fellow-man at heart, cannot be careless as to the things he ought to teach. His own head had often reeled, and his mind had been greatly troubled, when he reflected upon his responsibility in this matter. It was no easy matter to remove the rotten timbers and replace them with sound ones, and not stop the voyage of the ship. It was said that Adam was created perfect. It was also said that Adam sinned, and that in consequence of that sin the whole human race fell. The human race had existed on the earth for thousands and thousands of years, and had gone on propagating and multiplying, until all the waves of the ocean which had rolled in upon the shore during those centuries did not contain drops enough, nor the sands of the sea particles enough, nor all the figures of the arithmetic numbers enough, to compute the preface, to say nothing of the body, of the great history of the human race. The numbers of the human race were actually beyond computation, and for thousands and thousands and thousands of years they had been born into the world, had lived, and struggled, and finally died, and gone—where? "If you tell me that they have all gone to heaven, my answer will be that such a sweeping of mud into heaven would defile its purity, and I cannot accept that. If you tell me that they have gone to hell, then I swear by the Lord Jesus Christ, whom I have sworn to worship forever, that you will make an Infidel of me. The doctrine that God has been for thousands of years peopling this earth with human beings, during a period three-fourths of which was not illuminated by an altar or a church, and when in places a vast proportion of those people are yet without that light, is to transform the Almighty into a monster more hideous than Satan himself; and I swear by all that is sacred that I will never worship Satan, though he should appear dressed in royal robes and seated on the throne of Jehovah. Men may say, 'You will not go to heaven.' A heaven presided over by such a demon as that, who has been peopling this world with millions of human beings, and then sweeping them off into hell, not like dead flies, but without taking the trouble even to kill them, and gloating and laughing over their eternal misery is not such a heaven as I want to go to. The doctrine is too horrible. I cannot believe it and I won't. They say the saints in heaven are so happy that they do not mind the torments of the damned in hell; but what sort of saints must they be who could be happy while looking down upon the horrors of the bottomless pit? They don't mind—they're safe—they're happy! What would the mother think of the sixteen-year old daughter who, when her infant was lying dead in the house, should come dancing and singing into the parlor, and exclaim, 'Oh! I'm so happy, mother! I don't care for the dead baby in the coffin!' Would she not be shocked? And so with this doctrine; and by the blood of Christ I denounce it; by the wounds in his hands and his side, I abhor it; by his groans and agony, I abhor and denounce it as the most hideous nightmare of theology."

Events of the Week.

TWO HUNDRED cats and seventy-nine negro babies are on exhibition in this city.

BURGERS entered the house of Hugh Boyle, at Spencerville, Ont., and frightened him to death.

THE work on the Third avenue elevated railroad rapid transit line is being pushed vigorously.

SIXTEEN hundred and thirty-eight persons have visited the loan exhibition in the Academy of Design.

ANOTHER week of mild weather for winter. No snow yet in this locality. As we go to press, however, the appearances indicate storm.

THE warfare on the liquor dealers of the city is kept up at a lively heat. The dealers in rum are disposed to show fight and which side will conquer is not yet decided.

PHILADELPHIA Baptist ministers suggest prayer as a remedy for the hard times, but some faithless soul said it would be of no use so long as Congress was in session.

FILIBUSTERING and raiding appear to be all the rage on the Mexican and Texan border. Those rash fellows will probably keep on fooling until they involve the countries in a war.

THREE hundred canal men in Montreal struck against the demand of contractors that they should work for less than one dollar per day. They attacked the contractor's office. Persons inside fired upon the mob, and several were injured.

THE Republicans of France have gained a decided victory over MacMahon and the Jesuits. He has been compelled to choose a cabinet from the Republicans—the class he wished to ignore. Presidents and Emperors cannot always do as they wish.

THE Rev. Mr. Kimball is doing a land-office business in persuading churches to pay off their debts. In the church of the Holy Trinity, however, he met with a failure. When he gets the millions thus owing paid up, how would it do for him to try his arts on individual, municipal, and the national debts?

SENATORS Conkling and Gordon came near having an unpleasantness. Both are imperious and sensitive, and at one time a duel seemed to be the most probable result. Both, however, will return home to keep the holidays, after which it is hoped they will go back to business like good little boys, remembering that "dogs delight to bark and bite," etc.

THE trial of Dr. T. S. Lambert, ex-President of the defunct Popular Life Insurance Company, has been on trial for several days for perjury in making false returns as to the assets of the company. He has been very facetious during the trial, and more laughter has been interspersed with the evidence than is usually the case. The verdict has not been rendered as yet.

MAYOR ELY is about discharging the Police Commissioners for neglecting duty so far as street cleaning is concerned and over-officiousness so far as the liquor traffic is concerned. Two thousand dollars per day is paid for street cleaning and nothing scarcely done at it. The Commissioners are taking upon themselves to decide how the State laws shall be administered with regard to the sale of liquors. The quarrel bids fair to be a lively one.

THE Turks are very anxious to close the war, and the Sultan has expressed a desire for some of the nations of Europe to act as moderators between his government and that of Russia, but as yet none of them seem inclined to accept the office. Russia demands that the Dardanelles shall be open, but Turkey thinks she will fight more before she accepts that humiliation. England is opposed to it, and may interfere in that direction. Reports have been received that the great Turkish General, Osman Pasha, committed suicide, then the report came that he didn't. We are very sure one or the other is true, but we do not know yet which it is. One thing is very sure, and that is that the Turks are in a bad way, and they want to go home. The Russian soldiers probably feel in a similar vein.

BY HUDSON TUTTLE.

CHAPTER XI.—CONTINUED.

Duty to God, in the sense taught by the priesthood, is meaningless, except as it gives them an interpreter's position and pay. Ceremonies, observances, and customs made and kept because God is supposed to demand them, are worse than follies—they are infantile stupidities.

Duty! In that one name more crime has been committed, more misery created, than in any other. All the persecutions of the world have been carried forward to compel man to obey God. Jesus was nailed to the cross that the Jews might not fail in their time-honored temple-worship; and the petty churches of to-day wrangle and would crucify each other remorselessly for rejection of their peculiar views. Little cares the Infinite whether a mortal is sprinkled in the face, plunged in the water, or neither sprinkled nor plunged; whether he works on Saturday or Sunday; whether he circumcises, knocks out a tooth, cuts off a finger, or says grace.

Obedience to God can only mean observance of the laws of our being. The only duty we owe is such obedience; and it is time we cast aside the trappings, the ceremonies, and observances which mislead and divert. Here we cannot mistake our duty. We stand face to face with these laws, and need no priest between them and us. If we obey, we at once reap the reward; if we fail, we at once incur the penalty. If in our extremity our lips utter a prayer, it is from habit acquired in childish days, which we know to be as valueless to help us as the breath which gives it sound. Our obligations to God are not prayer or praise, but the fulfilling of the laws which created and sustains us.

By such conduct shall we please him? The Christian world answers, "No. God is pleased with lofty spires grandly towering above a vain and thoughtless world, with regular attendance at church, long prayers, and sanctimonious face. He wishes man to do everything for His glory and love of Christ, and He bestows salvation, not because deserved, but as a special favor." In olden times He was pleased with the fattened calf, the firstlings of the flock, and the fragrance of smoking blood and roasting offal.

The discrepancy of the priesthood is equalled by their arrogance. They assume to be the only interpreters of God's will, which cannot be written, and can only be learned by contact with Nature. His will is expressed by the term Law, and is co-eternal with matter. There can be no law foreign and unwrought into the constitution of the world, nor can man be held amenable to laws which are not a part and portion of himself. Obedience is from necessity, and not for the "glory of God." Is this church God an Asiatic monarch so jealous that we must bow before his throne servilely to gain his approval? A God making such a botch of creation that we, his misbegotten, abortive creations, creep to his feet to ask his pardon for his having thus shamed us, of all others is the most loathsome.

"No," cries the soul; "you please not God by long prayers or ghastly faces, sepulchral tones, or sermons beneath lofty steeples. The Infinite breathes through all Nature, and obedience to his will is our ultimate necessity. The world is beautiful, and man walks therein a beautiful spirit. God is not pleased to have that spirit become a bleary-eyed bigot, or this beautiful world viewed through the muddy waters of Fanaticism stirred by the craft and arrogance of a self-nominated priesthood. He is pleased with a well-ordered life."

While it is claimed that religion necessarily embraces morality, morality by no means embraces religion. A man may clearly observe the distinction between right and wrong, walk uprightly, deal honestly, act benevolently, and have an unblemished moral character; but if all this does not result from a sense of love and dependence on God, he is not religious. Doing right because right, and avoiding wrong because wrong, is not sufficient. The action must be based on love and dependence on God. If man possessed an absolute and complete revelation from God for his guidance there would be no reason for disobeying or question of dependence; but, fortunately, the Bible, as interpreted by the thousand wrangling sects it has originated, furnishes no such criterion; and Nature makes no revelation except as yielded by closest research and patient investigation.

Having discovered such laws, it may be asked whether man should obey them because such is the constitution of things, or because of his dependence on God. If from the first cause, he is only moral; if from the latter, he is religious. Here is an entirely artificial distinction. Does God demand servile dependence? If so, is it not strange that only a privileged class have learned this lesson? They, never having come in contact with God, assume to tell what He demands, what will please and what displease Him, and the form of religion He prescribes. If God has made a revelation, it is in harmony with the laws of the world. They, as expressions of his unchanging purpose, are finalities. What more can be required than obedience to them?

We come in contact with fire, and are burned. Henceforth, understanding its nature, we avoid it. Shall we do so to please God, or because of our own preservation? Shall we do right for God's sake or our own—for Christ's sake or for humanity's?

Through trial and suffering we gain an understanding of our physical, intellectual, and moral relations. If a human father should write a code for the guidance of his children, would he not be better pleased if obedience were given because they considered it right, than because it was his will, to which they servilely yielded? But, it is said in reply, "God's ways are not man's ways." Why, then, attempt to reason about our relations to him? Unless God's reason is like our reason we can know nothing about his demands. The human father would say, "My son, there is no honor in servile obedience. I am not to be considered. Do right because it is right, and you will please me more than by the most slavish submission simply because it is your father's will."

Has God more self-consciousness and vanity than man? Can He be flattered by the "sense of dependence" on man?

The value of this "sense of dependence" and the true position of the "religious element inherent in man" have been shown in the first chapter, and are proved to be as varying as the geographical locality or color of the race. Salvation is not a gift bestowed out of favor. If we do right, we earn and command it.

Shall we live for the glory of God? Nay, for our own. The Infinite cannot be glorified.

If the order of Nature is unchangeable, of what avail is prayer? Apollonius, who was not enlightened by the mysteries of Christian revelation, truthfully said of prayer: "A man may worship the Deity far more truly than other mortals, though he neither sacrifice animals nor consecrate any outward thing to that God whom we call the First."

Pure spirit, the most beautiful portion of our being, has no need of external organs to make itself understood by the Omnipresent Essence." Porphyry says of prayer: "It produces a sort of union between the gods and the just, who resemble them." Prayer—the earnest desire of the heart—the prophecy of possibilities—is quite different from the spoken verbiage which a parrot may learn as well. The child, too young to understand the meaning of words, is taught that there is efficacy in a little prayer lisped on retiring. What does it know of the Infinite? Is there not a striking similarity between the situation of the child lisping a prayer it does not comprehend—addressed to a Being it does not know—and the grave deacon repeating in church-meeting a memorized formula for the thousandth time, praising the forbearance of that unknown Being, and demeaning his sinful self? How far removed is the pompous preacher reciting his well-learned lesson beseeching God's mercy by rote? They all think they are doing what is best for them—what their religious education requires; and are equally self-satisfied as the Red Indian who prays to Quahootze, or the Chinese bowing to his Joss-stick. In some countries written prayers are attached to a wheel turned by water-power, and every minute of the day a prayer is presented to the sky. Who can say that the praying wheel is not as efficacious as the praying parson? The requirements of prejudice are fulfilled by their several methods. Some striving soul may have found relief in formulated prayer, and thus it came into general use. Some may yet find in it relief. It has become a part of religion. Family service is as essential as church-going, and is the means whereby the theological crust is formed around the young mind, in after years to harden and press out its spiritual energies.

We change nothing by prayer but ourselves. We cannot in the least affect external Nature. If a ship were freighted with a thousand saints, their united prayers would not keep her afloat if there was a plank torn from her side. The Divine Power moves on as heedless of our demands as a locomotive of the school-boy's cry.

If prayer gives us strength and courage, it is well; but far better the self-reliance of the strong soul depending on no external power.

Nature has no especially holy days, for with her all days are sacred. The learned and exceedingly pious Neander says that "The celebration of Sunday—like that of every festival—was a human institution. Far was it from the Apostles to treat it as a divine command; far from them and from the first Apostolic Church to transfer the laws of the Sabbath to Sunday." Sunday was a Pagan festive day and was adopted by the Christians on that account. The Romans, according to a very ancient custom, named the days of the week after their various deities. The first day was Dies Solis, or the Sun's Day. As Apollo became more popular, the day of his worship was held in greater esteem. Constantine early adopted the Sun as his emblem and Apollo as his protector, and until fifty years of age strictly adhered to their worship. When he was converted to Christianity he would not renounce the day he had always held sacred, and one of the first acts of his reign was to compel its observance. No allusion was made to Christianity in the edict which was prompted by a lingering love of the old religion of the hero gods. The courts were closed on that day except for the manumission of slaves, and military exercises forbidden. The Christian bishops, who saw in the Emperor an incarnate divinity, adopted the day to please their Roman converts. It is a Pagan day devoted to Apollo, or the Sun, and they who keep it in no sense fulfil the command—"Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy."

There is no command in the Bible to observe the first day of the week. The old Jewish Fetishism is transferred from the Sabbath to Sunday, and the church-goers of the present think the day far more sacred than any other. Even their house used on that day is sacred. They meet God there more directly than anywhere else. They do not believe the old Pagan notion that He loves incense and the smoke of burnt offerings, but they do believe that He enjoys their praises of him and depreciation of their own worm-like selves. The day is holy, and so strong is this prejudice that the laws for its observance form one of the few instances where religion interferes with affairs of American State. Nature has no Sabbath. The winds blow, the waters run, it rains and is calm, the leaves and flowers expand, the birds sing, on Sunday as well as on all other days. What is wrong on Sunday is wrong on week-days; and not until the processes of Nature point out the day of rest should legal enactment seek to make it holy. Until then, Sunday laws are a scandal on civil liberty.

Of faith, it is said it transcends knowledge, and is the only means whereby man's relations to God can be made known. Far more correct to say that faith, the acceptance of authority, has cursed mankind. The more unreasonable and absurd the statement, the more loudly has the receiving faith been extolled. The salvation of the soul has been made to depend on faith, as opposed to reason. Belief depending on reason can be caused only by sufficiency of evidence; it cannot be coerced nor gained by the will. The faith which receives the improbable is attained by narcotizing the reason. But it is claimed that man's eternal welfare depends on his acceptance of certain doctrines. He must believe in God, in Christ, the resurrection, and many other minor dogmas, else he will assuredly be damned.

If he cannot believe, what then? Believing or non-believing is involuntary. One man may have an all-receiving faith without reason to trouble him, while another's reasoning powers are so active that he receives nothing without the closest scrutiny. Is one more blameable than the other? Faith is a blind guide, and is no criterion of truth. It has, in their time, received a stone, a garlic, a cloud, a bull Apis for gods. The myths of the Olympian Court; the fables of the Incarnation of Brahma in Christna; the revelations of Zoroaster, of Moses, of Mohammed; all religious systems, the world over—unlike in everything else—agree in this; the faith, or, in other words, blind, unquestioning belief of their devotees. When Abelard began to prove theology by reason, he was hushed by the priests, who said if he proved the reasonable by reason, he would reject the unreasonable by the same, and this was by no means admissible.

If Christianity had always made the same demands on faith, it might at least plead consistency. It has not. Forced onward by the growth of the race, it has from age to age been compelled to change its ground. It has required acceptance of miracles, a personal God and Devil, witchcraft, the real presence, eternal punishment, predestination, total depravity, infant damnation, and countless other dogmas which have lived their day, been outgrown, and sunk into oblivion. Yet in the day of each, salvation was made to depend on their acceptance. As faith can only be possessed at the expense of reason, it must always be pernicious, baleful, and blasting. The belief in its necessity, united with the dogma of free-will and free-agency, has worked untold misery and ruin.

Science on the contrary, demands impartial statements, leaving the judgment free. When mankind reach this firm ground, and are able to give a reason for their beliefs, no doubts will cloud their clear sky, nor will they apostatize. Then they will arrive at an understanding of true holiness and purity, and find the theological standard only a caricature. Not the observance of formulated ceremonies, the saying of long prayers, the keeping of saint's days, makes man holy. The devotee who performs weary pilgrimages to the Ganges to wash away his sins is none the better for his pains. The convert to Christianity goes down into the water for like motives, but comes out none the better. Holiness is nearness and likeness to God—in other words, to perfection. None of these forms bridge the profound gulf. They may have been helps to those who first used them, but are dry and soulless to those who follow. The Stylite, the hermit, the Flagellant, devoutly sought holiness in their various ways—unwisely sought by faith. The world moved on, and in a better age said of them: "Not, O Stylite, on your pillar's windy summit; not, O hermit, in your lonely cave; not, O Flagellant, in the pangs of lacerated flesh, is the perfection sought by you attained. Beautiful to the eye of Infinite Cause is the pure essence of spiritual life; but equally beautiful the bonds of flesh which hold it to earth. It loves the earthly clay as well as spiritual life."

Holiness and purity begin with the body. Gall in the stomach creates gall in the mind, and the demons of persecution have many a time been unleashed by the fever of indigestion. The olden saint was a crucified wretch, suffering unutterable misery. He had but to show his neck cut to the bone by his hair-cloth shirt to be recognized. Thorns pierced his brow; the lash tore his back; hunger gnawed at his vitals; the world itself sank into indefinite proportions; and the demons of hell ever howled around the soul that thus endeavored to escape.

Purity has been sought by renouncing the world and retiring from its allurements. The rocky cavern, the cell of the monastery, the solitude of forest and desert, all have had their fanatical devotees, who, unable to conquer themselves in the world, voluntarily banished themselves out of it. An individual may preserve himself unsullied in the darkness of a cavern simply because untempted. He is no better or worse for that. It is not what a man does, but what he is. Doing is only a revelation of the inner life.

The spirit touches the material world through and by means of the physical body. Hence physical purity is a condition of spiritual growth, and its perfection the rhythmic harmony of all physical and spiritual functions. It is not bestowed by miracle. The waters of the Ganges or the church fount yield it not. It is an acquirement of struggle. It is the serene calm of a life-time of spiritual dictatorship, wherein all the untoward promptings of menial desires have been subdued by the supreme power of reason.

Holiness is only attainable by obedience to the laws of our being. The Anchorite is as reprehensible as the debauchee. The command is: not crush, but govern; the proper subjection of the physical and spiritual by harmonious action.

The saint of the past was known by the marks of self-inflicted physical torture; the saint of the present believes a long face, interminable prayers, and self-sacrifice acceptable to God, entirely forgetful of his body, which may be a whitened sepulchre reeking with corruption. The saint of the future will hold his body as noble as his spirit, and of equal importance. The bravest soul is useless in a corrupted body.

Science resolves faith into accurate knowledge—duty into obedience. Piety, which in its lowest stage is servile reverence and love of God, is exalted to a willing obedience—not because demanded by a Superior Being, but because the requirement of the constitution of things. Religion, if in this new sense that term may be employed, is the ceaseless effort for purity and integrity of being, and harmony with the order of the world.

The Bennett-Teed Discussion.

I.—JESUS CHRIST IS NOT ONLY DIVINE, BUT IS THE LORD GOD, CREATOR OF HEAVEN AND EARTH.

MR. BENNETT'S FOURTH REPLY.

MR. CYRUS ROMULUS R. TEED, Dear Sir: Upon reading your fourth letter, the thought irresistibly takes possession of my mind, "What a labored, persistent, and ingenious effort Friend Teed is making to prepare a place in the great Universe to put his little Jesus in!" You will have it that mind is an ever-existent form of substance, as old as matter, a coördinating function, and that that function is Jesus. I must, of course, believe you sincere in your positions, but allow me to say, it is a marvel to me how a man with the intelligence you certainly possess can arrive at any such conclusion. The worshiper of Mumbo Jumbo on the coast of Africa feels the same necessity, in his conception of the Universe and the origin of everything, to make the same provision for his favorite deity.

You have a good deal to say about my contradictions; more, I think, than you have just grounds for. I have not contradicted myself at all, unless, in accepting some of your positions, I have not fully understood you. I assure you that I have not meant to contradict myself. If I have failed to catch your exact meaning, I certainly have not been alone in that misfortune. Several persons who have thus far followed us have written me that they were unable to comprehend you, and have asked me to give them an inkling of what you are really driving at. Whether it is a superabundance of transcendentalism, mysticism, etherealism, or metaphysics, on your part, or obtuseness and want of intelligence on our part, I will not pretend to say.

Because I accepted your proposition that matter, with its coördinating functions, has ever existed, you wish to make it appear that I have confessed that mind has ever existed, because I too called mind a function. The difficulty seems to rest on the word function. I endeavored to use it in the sense in which Webster uses it—"the act of executing or performing, activity, duty, office or calling, performance; the action of any special organ or part of an organization, as the function of the heart or the limbs," etc., while you seem to regard it as peculiar substance or form of substance, not matter, but that has ever permeated it or coördinated with it. If I adopt Webster's definition of function instead of your own, I hope you will not condemn me.

By the eternal existence of the functions of matter, I mean the powers and potencies and modes by which matter does all that is accomplished. These are as old as matter itself, and have always been in operation, but thought or mind are not in this class of forces. I do not mean that the organizations producing mind or thoughts have always existed on this globe of ours, for instance, but that the possibility of producing this class of phenomena has ever existed in all parts of the Universe when the conditions were favorable to such production. Because I assert this self-evident truth, your endeavor to show that I have admitted that mind is an ever-existent factor in the Universe, or that I have contradicted myself, is unjust to me.

I regret that I have not been able to impart to you a clear conception of my views of matter and mind, but that you and our readers need not remain in error upon the subject, let me again state, crudely, perhaps, what my positions are: Matter and its inherent forces and potencies have ever existed, and have ever been in active operation. Mind is not one of these forces, but is always and in every case the product of an organization adapted to producing it and capable of producing it. The brain and the nervous system are alone the organs which can produce thought or mind. Thinking is the function of the brain, as forcing the blood through the system is the function of the heart, the secretion of bile the function of the liver, the oxygenating of the air the function of the lungs, the digesting of food the function of the stomach, the conducting of the forces from the system the function of the bowels, perspiration the function of the skin, the production of sight the function of the eye and the optic nerves, the sense of hearing the function of the ear, smelling the function of the nose, tasting the function of the tongue and palate, feeling the function of the nerves, the movement of the body the function of the muscles, walking the function of the legs and motor muscles, etc., etc., all sustained by digested and assimilated food. Now, thought is produced by its organs, as all these other functions are produced by their respective organs, and is a function precisely in the same sense that all these other operations are functions; and it would be just as reasonable to insist that any or all of them had ever existed with matter, and as function coördinating with it, as to say that mind has.

It is doubtless true that thousands and perhaps millions of years passed by and there was no form of organized life on this globe, during which time there could have been no mind nor any of the other functions pertaining to such organized life. The power and potency to produce them existed in the matter forming the solar system, but the conditions favorable for their production had not arrived. I hope I make myself clear.

These being the facts, the Universe containing all the substances and all the forces that have an existence, every result necessarily having a natural cause to produce it, natural causes eternally existing and operating without any exterior or ulterior agents or motives, the Universe is complete in itself, and wholly independent of any Brahm, Zeus, Jupiter Ammon, Jehovah, Jesus, or Mumbo Jumbo.

We see the organizations that now exist on the earth; we see that organs exist for the production of the various functions performed; we see the brain does the thinking the same as the eye does the seeing; but I ask you to prove to me and to our readers that there is any sight without the optic apparatus or any thought or mind in existence without the brain and nervous system. We see that matter exists; we see the organs that exist; we see the services they perform, but we know no mind without a brain. If it is a form of substance that ever existed and will ultimately dominate matter, you certainly ought to be able to point it out as other forces in the Universe are pointed out; and I call upon you to show me this mind and to tell me where and what it is. If you fail to do this, I cannot allow you to assume its independent existence. Prove that existence or make no more assumptions in reference to it. The Universe, I repeat, is here; matter is here; force is here; we see and feel them; but independent, self-existent mind is not here; it is not anywhere. It does not exist. Or, at least, so I believe; and if I am mistaken, I call upon you to prove it. Point out the mind that exists independent of organized matter. Will you not send me a few ounces or a few slices of this independent mind of yours, carefully bottled or packed in tinfoil, so as not to be contaminated by surrounding influences? Perhaps it would be as well to forward it by express, as if it should come by the mail, Comstock might confiscate it as not being legal mail-matter.

By "a mental organization" I do not mean an organization composed of mind, or your original form of substance but still not matter; but I mean an organization adapted to the production of thoughts or mental phenomena. The organization is not composed of mentality, but is capable of producing mentality. I will say, too, that I consider all matter is substance and that all substance is matter. I cannot understand that there is a form of substance that is not matter, that is independent of it, yet has eternally coördinated with it and is destined ultimately to dominate it. I cannot conceive the possibility of such a form of substance. I recognize all the forces that exist or that have thus far been discovered. They are inseparable qualities of matter and cannot exist independent of it. That all the forces pertaining to matter have been discovered and all properly understood I will not pretend to say. We have much yet to learn in that direction. We cannot set bounds to the possibilities of the Universe nor estimate the sum total of its wonderful laws. Many of the phenomena of nature are yet mysteries to us and we must necessarily study still a long time before we can know all.

Let me say, too, in connection with this branch of the subject, that the theory of evolution or the philosophy that seems probable to me does not necessarily presuppose that the Universe was originally formless matter in a state of chaos. Form is one of the inherent qualities of matter, and it has never been without it. Matter has doubtless ever been in the form of the Universe, constituting constellations, systems, suns, and worlds. Any given system may not ever have existed in its present form. A certain number of thousands of billions of years ago it may have evolved from some preëxisting form or forms, and in thousands of billions of years more it may evolve into other forms or conditions, thus to move in endless cycles forever and forever. To my view it seems more reasonable that the cosmos has ever been passing through these vast epochs and changes rather than that it originally was a shapeless mass of formless matter without the order and symmetry it now possesses, and that from this crude, inert state it took up the forces that gave it the power to attain to the condition it has now reached. The Universe ever possessed the capabilities that it possesses to-day, and its laws were ever in operation as they are in operation now. It never lay in a state of motionless stupor without form and life, and it never will. As not a grain of matter can be created or destroyed, so not a scintilla of force can be produced from nothing, nor can it be wasted or utterly destroyed. Matter and force have ever existed together and they ever must exist together. The theory of evolution, as I understand it, does not militate against this view of the infinite, ever-existent cosmos.

You say, "Mind is something or nothing." It is not matter; it is not substance. A thought is less substantial than the breath. It is a motion of the brain, as seeing an object is an action of the eye, or as a motion of the hand is the action of the muscles. It requires substance or matter to produce these, but neither is a form of substance and neither had an eternal existence. The power and potency for producing thoughts and other motions always existed in the Universe and always produced them when the conditions were favorable. I will repeat, they are the results of substance and form, but are themselves neither substance nor form. There is necessarily an apparent waste in matter or form in every motion that takes place, whether of the brain or muscles, but still nothing is lost; it is only a change of form. Not a particle of substance or force is absolutely wasted, but everything in the grand economy of the Universe is conserved to be used over and over again interminably countless millions of times in ever-varying forms and conditions. Your play upon the words "something" and "nothing," and of their bringing each other forth will do as play, but I see no special point in the way you use them. Matter precedes motion, and whatever waste for the time being is involved in the operation assumes other forms and, I repeat, cannot be lost.

Your remarks about my "head being in the ground and my feet in the ether," I presume, is more of your facetiousness, and possibly it is very good; but my "conforming in my determination to the basic or alkaline elements of a galvanic battery tending toward the negative pole of the great battery of existence, the pole where perpetual disintegration obtains, and that mind differs from that which corresponds to the ascetic or resinous principle which determines toward the positive pole, which is perpetually integrative in its determination," I confess, is rather too deep for my comprehension. It is doubtless very funny, but I fail to grasp it. It may be that when my mind gets more "resinous" I shall be better able to appreciate your jokes.

I cannot help commiserating with you in the shame you feel at being forced to meet a position "so flimsy" as the one I advanced about minds being like the grand central mind of which they are composed; and if in consequence of your shame you should "feel like backing out" of this discussion, my regret will know no bounds. I am sure you mean no discourtesy nor disrespect to me in some of the expressions in your last touching my numerous alleged contradictions, the various horns of the dilemma I vain would cling to, my ignorance of the laws of involution, my "overwhelming logic," my "weighty arguments," the questioning of my having credence in my own statements, and my trying to extricate myself from the dilemmas I have fallen into, etc., etc. I call to mind the fact that my head is in the ground and my feet in the ether, and can readily understand how you so easily arrive at the want of the ascetic or resinous quality of my mind, and the justice of your criticism immediately becomes apparent.

I regret exceedingly that I cannot accommodate you in the matter of protoplasm, for I do not happen to have an ounce of the genuine article on hand. A very wide range of commodities is sold in this city, but I am not acquainted with a single druggist or grocer who keeps protoplasm for sale. It is believed to have figured very conspicuously in the affairs of the past, but the art of reproduction is now so well understood on this planet that there seems not to be as much necessity for the article as heretofore. The next best thing to sending you a few pounds of the compound is to give you the formula for its composition, which is according to Professor Haeckel of the University of Jena, Germany, and also as given in the Am. Cyclopaedia. The article is believed to vary somewhat according to locality and conditions, but this is a good average formula:—Carbon 50 to 55 per cent, Hydrogen 6 to 8, Nitrogen 15 to 17, Oxygen 20 to 22, Sulphur 1 to 2 per cent. These constituents are all real and tangible substances and much unlike your substance of original coördinating mind, which has never been seen, tasted, smelt, felt, weighed, or tested in any way. This compound is judged to be the material of which all organic life is composed.

It is needless for me to tell you that protoplasm is a slimy, colloid form of matter, produced by light, heat, moisture, electricity, and other forces acting upon various substances, and that it possesses the power of reaction and is the very lowest form of animal life. It is found in cells composing the organisms of the Protozoans, Rhizopods, Radiates, etc.; and probably you can find no better specimen of protoplasm than in the jelly-fish, to which I most respectfully refer you.

Very sincerely yours,

D. M. BENNETT.

The Condemned Book.

"TRALL'S SEXUAL PHYSIOLOGY."

For eleven years this book has been on the market—it was published by Messrs. Wood & Holbrook of New York, an old and highly respectable firm. Hundreds of copies have been sold over the retail counters of the Religio-Philosophical Publishing House. The book, now in its twenty-seventh edition, is one that should be in every household, and much of its contents familiar to youth of both sexes before reaching puberty. A thorough familiarity with the knowledge contained in the three hundred pages of this work would do more to prevent vice and immorality than all the Sunday-school books ever written, and we make this assertion, too, with all due respect. What can be of greater importance to the people than instruction upon a subject which affects their life and happiness here and hereafter as nothing else can? Yet this book has been pronounced by the Government Scavenger Comstock to be obscene and immoral. This cowardly fellow, though backed by the whole power of the United States Government, it seems dares not meddle with Messrs. Wood & Holbrook, the publishers of the work. No, indeed, he must seek some poverty-stricken, helpless victim; he therefore puts up a job on a poor old fellow in Massachusetts, and proves that he (Comstock) bought a copy of the work of him, and gets a U. S. Commissioner to bind over the poor old man for trial. We have the most profound respect for the proprieties of life, and believe that such books as the one under consideration are calculated to increase the respect of the masses for themselves and to ameliorate their condition immeasurably. We have no doubt the publishers of "Sexual Physiology" will soon need to publish a new edition to meet the demand, and we certainly shall continue to fill all orders for the work, and Comstock can have a copy sent him through the mail from our book room without resorting to the subterfuge of ordering it under a fictitious name, as has been his custom heretofore.—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

The Truth Seeker.

D. M. BENNETT, Editor.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY, AT TWO DOLLARS PER YEAR.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1877.

No Examination Yet.

We have been informed that our case has again been put off two weeks. It is doubtless proper that we should inform our readers that we have had an interview with Gov. Stewart L. Woodford, the very gentlemanly District-Attorney in the United States Court of this district. He received us with marks of respect and consideration. He informed us that our case had been before the Grand Jury, and that that body had found a bill against us without the least difficulty, and that with such a jury as could easily be secured, he had not the slightest doubt that we could be convicted under the laws as they now stand. But he said he had read our essays and polemic discussions—meaning our volume entitled “Thirty Discussions,” etc., containing besides thirty other essays, lectures, etc., our “Open Letter to Jesus Christ,” as well as the pamphlet of “Eight Scientific Tracts,” containing the one, “How do Marsupials Propagate their Kind?” which were the two which Comstock caused us to be arrested for sending through the mails upon the ground that they were obscene, indecent, immoral, and blasphemous—and he [Woodford] had become convinced that we had intended to violate no law, and that while some of our writings were such as he would not wish to place before his daughter, fifteen years of age, he had no doubt but that we were honest in our convictions, and he found that our arguments were strong and our logic unanswerable. He recognized our right to enjoy our own views and to promulgate them the same as every other citizen in the country, and in this view of the case he did not conscientiously believe this was such a case as ought to be prosecuted under the law for obscenity, and though he should probably act in opposition to the sentiments of nine out of ten in the community, he could not believe it to be his duty to prosecute this case, and he had informed the Grand Jury that it would not answer to push it, for by doing so a wrong would be done to an individual who had not intended to violate a law of the land.

He asked us to make no promises and to give no pledges, but left it to our consideration whether in the conduct of our polemic discussions and essays and our scientific discussions, it would not be better to use such language and adjectives as would not be offensive to the general reader. By doing so, he did not think we would weaken our argument or lessen the force of our remarks. At the close of the conversation, we were told the case would be laid over for two weeks.

We were most favorably impressed with Gov. Woodford, and saw at once that he was a gentleman of intelligence and kindness of heart. He is not such a man as would wish to unjustly prosecute a person because he was unable to gauge his views by another person's scale. We consider it most fortunate for us that such a man as Gov. Woodford fills the position of District-Attorney in this court. Had he been such a man as Anthony Comstock or Judge Benedict, there can be no question but that a very different course would have been taken with us. We would have been prosecuted with the utmost rigor, and there could be very little doubt of a summary conviction; and five years' imprisonment, with a fine of five thousand dollars is about as mild a sentence as we could have expected from Calvinistic Judge Benedict. So, if we are discharged at the end of two weeks, we shall feel as though we had made a remarkable escape from the clutches of the minions of an oppressive, odious, and unjust law.

However, with Col. Ingersoll to defend us, the merits of the case would have been fully gone into, and the animus of a prosecution against us for opinion's sake would have been shown up in a masterly manner. With a jury of reasonable men, or containing even a few reasonable men, under Ingersoll's powerful rhetoric and scathing denunciation of the great wrong of stifling the honest utterances of a man's views by process of law, it would have been hard for them to convict us. Should they do so in spite of right and justice, great efforts would be made to take the case to the U. S. Supreme Court at Washington, where the constitutionality of the law would have been ably argued, and where strong hopes could be indulged that the rulings and decisions of Judge Benedict would be reversed. It would doubtless be a lively fight between Christianity and intolerance on the one hand and Rationalism and personal rights on the other, and if in the contest we had lain in prison a few months more or less, it is not at all unlikely that Christianity, our intolerant foe and oppressor, would have been greatly injured in the contest, and the cause of Liberalism and freedom of thought and speech would have gained a decided victory.

At the close of the interview Gov. Woodford again complimented us for our honesty, and said he doubted not it was greater than his own, as he was more or less a politician. We remarked that it took an honest man to be an infidel than a Christian, and one with more moral courage and bravery; that it was easy enough for any man to float along with the general current in the fashionable throng, but to come out in opposition to the general belief and to denounce the wrongs and the falsehoods of the dominant class and the ruling creed, thereby subjecting himself to the odium and ostracism of Mrs. Grundy and her entire household, required far more moral bravery and honesty than to passively submit to the governing and ruling class. In course of the conversation the governor pleasantly remarked that he did not think it would quite do to make a martyr of us. Another thing he said was worthy of notice, and that was that many persons had called to see him upon the subject of our arrest, and all had expressed themselves as clear in the belief that we had meant to violate no law. “Why,” said the governor, “I did not know that you had so many friends and that there were so many who believe as you do.” We replied, “Yes, there are a great number in the country who have escaped from the theological trammels of the Church and have resolved to be free-minded men and women.”

The more we have looked into the matter connected with our arrest, the more and more we have become convinced that a great wrong was done the people of this country in the passage of those statutes known as the “Comstock laws,” and that the deed was performed without due consideration and without the people of the country being at all apprised of the great injustice that was being done them. The enactment was brought about by a designing zealot in the interest of the old school of theology and the old school of medicine, the purpose of both of which is to break down all opposition and to allow no man to avow any sentiments or belief in opposition to their views, their orthodoxy, their schools and their power, and whose object is to crush everything that opposes them. The bad man, backed by the great influence of the Y. M. C. A. and the Christian Church generally, was also moved by the ulterior design of making money. He saw that by oppressing under these enactments various interests and persons, and by the system of black-mailing, he would be able to pursue with all the perquisites and etceteras he would be able to control, and that he would not only gain fame as a champion of godliness and morality, but also be able to place very handsome sums of money in his pocket. This latter incentive has doubtless been the strongest that has actuated the vile Connecticut bigot and persecutor.

An appalling fact that has struck us with more and more force as this case has developed is the fear of Comstock under which almost everybody appears to be laboring. In our intercourse with various parties in connection with the efforts we are making to have these odious laws repealed or greatly modified, we find that a general fear or apprehension of Comstock's power seems to hang like a terrible nightmare over the entire community. Publishers are afraid of him, and dare hardly have their names used in connection with the movement for the repeal of the laws. Druggists are afraid of him, and almost tremble lest he pounce down upon them. The publishers of the daily papers seem to be in fear of him, and dare not open their columns to a word of criticism on his rascality. We have tried some of them and know whereof we speak. They were ready enough to traduce us as a “Freelover,” and to say to their readers that we had been arrested for sending out obscene and indecent books, but they were not willing to make the proper correction, or to print a word in opposition to Comstock. Even Postmaster James appears to be afraid of Comstock, and when asked to issue an order to admit certain books through the mail, he declined, saying: “You had better see Comstock; I don't like to interfere.” Hundreds of people are afraid to sign the petition to Congress, fearing that Comstock might not like it and might get after them, perhaps after they had gone to bed. Even some of our Liberal papers, and especially those of the Spiritualistic persuasion, are troubled with the same fear and trembling, or else they are afflicted with an over amount of respectability. Although nearly six weeks have passed since we were arrested in a high-handed manner, they have not yet found courage enough to mention the fact in their columns, nor to denounce this outrage upon Freethought and the freedom of the press.

Can it be possible that the entire country is under the thumb of Anthony Comstock, and that nobody dares speak above his breath lest Anthony gets after him and sends him to prison for five years? Is he really the God Almighty that rules this fair land? or is he the Diabolus that curses the country—the demon whose power it is to make every man and woman tremble with fear and stand aghast like cringing slaves? However it may be with others, we are not afraid of him nor of all he can do. We know he has the Y. M. C. A., the aristocratic Society for the Suppression of Vice, all the regular schools of medicine, and the entire Christian world to back him, and that the judge who presides over the United States District Court in this city works in connection and rules with severity upon the cases that Comstock brings before him; but that makes no difference to us. We have resolved to be a free-man despite all the power that Comstock is able to wield; and though we have good reason to think it has been deemed advisable not to prosecute us and send us to prison, we feel the same necessity of opposing the unconstitutional laws that have been passed, and under which many innocent and law-abiding citizens have been arrested, prosecuted, and persecuted by this viler than Torquemada, as though the heavy hand of power had not been lifted from us. We have barely made our escape, and we see the great necessity of firm and concerted action being taken to remove this foul stain upon the fair name and honor of this glorious country.

We are still sending out thousands of blank petitions to all parts of the country, and we are getting cheering news about their being signed pretty freely, and some are already being returned well signed. Some friends write us they are obtaining thirty signatures per day and that they will be able to get hundreds of them. With thousands of these petitions laid before Congress, backed by the efforts that will be made by persons of influence, with an exhibit of the dastardly and villainous conduct of special agent and representative of the Y. M. C. A. Anthony Comstock, we have reason to believe that he will not only be not suffered to continue his high-handed reign of terror, but that he will be allowed to step down and out and to retire to private life, so far as the public mails of this country are concerned. If we are able to help bring about this state of things and can live to see it accomplished, we shall feel that we have not lived in vain.

We are free and glad to admit the great help that has been afforded us in our peril by our kind friends in all parts of the country. The way they have responded to our appeals and the way they have unhesitatingly spoken out has made a very favorable impression upon those who meant us ill. They did not know we had so many friends, and they knew not that such numbers would send in their money to help us fight the battle that was forced upon us. The moral effect of all this has been good, and we feel grateful to the many friends who have stepped forward to help us. We have felt that we would be content to be prosecuted and even sent to prison if sustained so nobly by such a large band of true and devoted friends. One would even die for such friends, if necessary. We thank them from the bottom of our heart for their kindness, and only hope that we may always be worthy of their confidence, esteem, and love.

The End of the Volume.

One more number of THE TRUTH SEEKER closes 1877 and volume IV. After that time the paper, as has been announced, will be enlarged to twice its present size, containing sixteen pages in place of eight. As the additional eight pages will be furnished for half the price of the present eight, it will be seen at a glance that the enlarged paper will be furnished twenty-five per cent cheaper than now.

We trust it is the purpose of all our patrons to continue on with us, and we earnestly hope to have still many new ones. The enlargement will double our expenses, and we need also to double the number of our patrons. We wish every friend of the paper and every friend of the cause of truth and mental freedom to exert himself or herself to send us the names of new subscribers. Does not almost every reader know some person who does not take this paper, but ought to, and can be induced to subscribe? Oh, that every one would make a determined effort in this direction! Much may be accomplished if the effort is generally made.

If there are those who do not wish to take the paper in 1878, we ask them to be kind enough to notify us before the end of the year. This may be done by postal card or by returning a paper with name and address upon it, or they can get their postmaster to notify us. We wish to send our paper to every friend who is willing to pay for it, but do not want to crowd it upon any one. So if those few who do not want it longer will inform us of the fact, we shall be better able to get our list arranged for the New Year. Those who are trial subscribers will please say so when they write, whether they write to continue the paper or to stop it.

Among the many new features of the enlarged paper will be:

First. More Scientific Matter.

Second. Choice selections from English and American Reviews, Magazines, etc.

Third. Reports of O. B. Frothingham's and Prof. Felix Adler's Sunday Sermons.

Fourth. A new Radical Story by Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

Fifth. Correspondence Extraordinary from, the Infernal and Supernal Regions, being familiar and spicy letters, by spiritual telephone, or otherwise, from old Lucifer, his brother Jehovah, Brahm, Fohi, Osiris, Jupiter Ammon, Pluto, and many more of those old worthies in whom men have so extensively believed. We propose to keep a place open to them, and it is expected that they will all have something to say.

Sixth. A department of answers to inquiries on all subjects.

Seventh. A selection, for every week, of valuable recipes for the kitchen and for general family use.

Besides these, every week will be served up “Gems of Thought,” “Odds and Ends,” “Friendly Correspondence,” “Notes and Clippings,” and “Events of the Week,” as at present. “Interrogatories to Jehovah” will soon be completed, when “What I Don't Believe,” etc., will be resumed. We hope also to have more room for correspondents and communications, as well as choice selections of poetry.

Who shall say, then, that THE TRUTH SEEKER, containing seven hundred square inches more reading matter than any other Liberal or Spiritualistic paper published in the world, will not be well worth every cent we ask for it? And what liberal-minded person in the land ought to be without it?

Most papers require the amount of postage to be added to the subscription price. We do not. $3.00 covers everything.

We hope friends will be prepared to renew promptly.

The paper will appear in January largely in a new dress, and we shall have much new type to purchase.

To new subscribers, for $5.00, we will send the enlarged TRUTH SEEKER one year and a copy of either "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," Lord Amberley's "Analysis of Religious Belief," "Thomas Paine's Great Works," (in one volume), or "The Champions of the Church," as soon as out. To new subscribers, for $3.50, we will send the paper one year and a copy of "The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion" or "The Truth Seeker Collection," volumes of 550 pages each. To every six new names an extra copy will be added.

We wish to send out thousands of copies of the initial number of the new volume. Will not friends send us names of such persons as they think will like such a paper? If they feel like sending five cents, or so, for each party to whom the paper is to be sent, it will help us to bear the expense and pay the postage. Is not a word to the wise sufficient? and may we not expect a good response from our numerous friends?

WE hope friends will not slacken their diligence in obtaining signatures to the petition to Congress for the repeal of the odious Comstock laws. It is necessary to make a formidable impression upon Congress early in January when it reassembles. Those wishing copies of the petition will please notify us and they shall be forwarded at once. The petitions when signed should be forwarded to us immediately after New Years. Let us, friends, show that some things can be done as well as others.

COL. J. C. BUNDY, of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, has been passing a few days in this city on business. He called upon us three or four times. We are glad to see him looking so well and feeling in such good spirits. He is an excellent, genial brother. May he live long on this side of the river and prosper to his heart's content.

J. W. STILLMAN will, on the evening of Saturday the 22d inst., deliver his lecture upon the subject of "God and the Origin of Life" before the N. Y. Liberal Club at Republican Hall on 38d St.

B. F. UNDERWOOD will be at Lincoln, Neb., Dec. 23; Norborne, Mo., 25 to 30. Engagements follow at Marysville and Pleasant Hill, Mo., Independence, Kan., Brighton and Nora Springs, Iowa, Toronto, Lindsay, Meaford, and Owen Sound, Ontario, commencing in Canada Jan. 20, and Springfield, Riverton, Streator, LaSalle, Peru, and Gardner, Ill.

W. F. JAMIESON spoke before the Spiritual Society in Springfield, Mo., Dec. 16th, and will speak again on the 23d, and 30th. His address is 172 and 174 Clark St., Chicago, Ill.

Incidents in the Life and Public Acts of Anthony Comstock.

BY ONE WHO KNOWS HIM.

This infamous person—fit representative of the Y. M. C. A., Secretary and agent for the N. Y. Society for the Suppression of Vice, and special mail agent of the United States Government—who is now imitating the career which brought the notorious Jonathan Wild to the gallows more than a century ago, is supposed by the majority of people to be a religious fanatic, but he is in reality a hypocritical fraud, as will be clearly shown in the following brief statement of facts.

Comstock was born and raised in New Britain, Connecticut, where his father, who was postmaster of that place many years ago, came to grief, it is said, for helping himself to other people's money by pilfering from letters intrusted to his care. If this is true, the hopeful son of a worthy father seems to have come honestly by his disposition to interfere with and intercept other people's mail matter. The worthy son was always known in boyhood as a sneak and an informer and one who, under the pretence of piety, would do the meanest actions for the sake of a few pennies; and this trait is now the most prominent one in his character.

During the late war between the Northern and Southern States, Comstock was acting as sutler's clerk to a Connecticut regiment, from which position he was ignominiously expelled in consequence of being caught cheating the soldiers and robbing his employers. At the close of the war he earned a precarious living by peddling various articles whose quality and value he could misrepresent to his unwary customers; and in the year 1872 we find him in the employ of Messrs. Cochran & McLean, dry-goods merchants, 464 Broadway. This firm, who at first were not aware of the character of Comstock, got rid of him as soon as they discovered what kind of a man he was.

While in the employ of this firm, Comstock conceived the brilliant idea of distinguishing himself and making fine sums of money by breaking up the trade in obscene literature and possibly monopolizing the business all to himself. This he readily accomplished through the aid of the Young Men's Christian Association, who indorsed all his propositions and sent him on to Washington, where, through the instrumentality of the pious hypocrite, Schuyler Colfax, Vice-President, a very stringent law was passed by Congress, making it criminal to use the U. S. mails for any purpose that might be construed to be immoral or indecent.

Grant, who then occupied the White House, gave his word never to pardon any individual convicted by Comstock, and he never did, although it is well known that any Government thief could get pardoned for stealing by approaching Grant in the right way. [He nevertheless did pardon John A. Lant on the last day of his official term. Ed. T. S.]

Having had this law passed, without publicity, by Congress, Comstock set to work laying traps for his victims, who were all ignorant of the passage of any such law until they found themselves behind the prison bars. Comstock boasted in print, through the columns of the New York Times that he had seized over sixty tons of "immorality," in the shape of type, plates, prints, books, pictures, etc., and had captured over one hundred persons engaged in the obscene publication business, "several* of whom," says this pious man, "have since died, and their friends call me their murderer; but be that as it may, I glory in it, for the world is better off without them." Truly a nice sentiment for a professed Christian to utter, and this is but a mild expression in comparison with some that this profane hypocrite has given utterance to since he began to run his religious muck through the States of this Union; for although he can pray like a saint when in church, he can curse like a sailor when he is out on a carousal.

Comstock's sole object in this world is to make money. At the present time he owns property at 354 Grand avenue Brooklyn, and at Squan Beach, New Jersey. He is, or was, in receipt of twenty-five hundred yearly, as post-office agent, and liberal donations from the Y. M. C. A., $4,000 for acting as Secretary to the Society for the Suppression of Vice, besides picking up a large amount of money annually in the way of blackmail, and by his share of the profits from his partners who are in the obscene literature business with his connivance. By these nefarious means Comstock has succeeded in realizing a handsome little fortune in five years, for he was as poor as Job's turkey in 1872.

I shall now endeavor to give a faithful account of several cases which came under my notice since the advent of this hypocritical upstart.

DAVID MASSEY'S CASE.

Mr. Massey was a St. Louis merchant, who, having failed in business, came to New York and accepted a clerkship with the firm of Rogers & Co., 737 Broadway, New York, in 1872. Comstock sent a decoy letter containing money to the firm, requesting them to send him some obscene pictures. Mr. Massey sent a letter containing some pictures which were not in the least degree obscene, but Comstock having a stock on hand, substituted vulgar pictures for those which Massey had sent, and then arrested and convicted him of violating the mail laws. Massey was sent to Ludlow-street jail for one year with a fine of five hundred dollars.

In this case Comstock had to perjure himself in order to convict Massey. Rogers & Co., knowing that no mercy or justice would be shown them by Judge Benedict, wisely kept out of the way and gave a power of attorney to Dr. Seiden, who endeavored to get the mail matter belonging to them, but could not succeed, as the Superintendent at Station D told him that the letters (some seven or eight hundred in number, and containing as many dollars) had been sent down to the general Post-Office. There the Dr. was informed that the letters had been sent to the dead letter office at Washington, but this was denied by Postmaster-General Cresswell. The letters were never recovered, and there is no doubt whatever that they were opened and destroyed, after their contents had been stolen, by Comstock and his thieving associates.

Poor Massey made an effort to obtain a pardon on the intercession of his sister with Mrs. Grant, with whom she was a school girl companion in St. Louis some thirty years ago, but her entreaties were disregarded, and she died from the effects of the cruel disgrace which had been cast upon her brother by the mercenary and perjured Comstock.

There are large numbers of other cases which we will relate in the chapters to follow.

We can only say to our many friends that we are grateful for their kindness, and we shall cherish their memory in our heart so long as we have a heart or mind to cherish with. We are proud of such friends and will ever delight to serve them faithfully. Every dollar donated shall be used to defend ourselves and our dear country against unjust laws.

The Randolph Ratification Meeting.

A GRAND SUCCESS.—ABLE SPEECHES.—A "YOUNG INGERSOLL."—A LARGE INTELLIGENT AUDIENCE AND RESOLUTIONS FOR FREEDOM.—A GREAT CELEBRATION TO BE HELD AT LINESVILLE, PA.

MR. EDITOR: The Liberal League Ratification Meeting at Randolph last Saturday and Sunday was a grand success. I never attended a more earnest and interesting Liberal gathering. Everybody deeply regretted your absence, but the fact that you were kept away by the strong arm of the law wielded by Anthony Comstock, the agent of that Protestant Jesuitical Society, known as the Y. M. C. Association of America, gave inspiration to every speaker and was a convincing argument in favor of the necessity of the Liberal League movement. Though in New York, under bonds, you spoke to our meeting in a manner that carried conviction to every heart. You will see the three last, and in fact all of the resolutions passed, are a declaration of independence. And the spirit manifested there evinced a determination that that declaration shall be maintained.

I will not attempt to give a report of the speeches delivered, but will say that better ones I never heard in favor of equal religious and political rights; and since the meeting I am more than ever satisfied that the Liberal League is a necessity and should be heartily supported by every Liberal and by every Liberal journal in this country, and that no town should be without its well-organized local Liberal League. We had two days' meeting of three sessions a day. There was a free conference Saturday morning and Sunday morning and during these conferences some most grand speeches were delivered. An able and remarkable speech was made on Sunday morning by that veteran Freethinker of Randolph, N. Y., Samuel Ewing, Esq., who is over ninety years of age, and is said to be one of the most scholarly men in Western New York. At its close, Elder Evans moved that the audience rise to their feet, out of respect to the venerable philosopher. Esq. Ewing has always been so modest a man that he has not gained extensive notoriety, but in the vicinity of his home he has the respect of all his neighbors without regard to party or sect.

And as I have just mentioned the name of Elder Evans, allow me to say of him, that he did himself great credit at this meeting. At the Rochester meeting I was much pleased with the Elder, but your arrest put new fire into him and he spoke like an apostle of liberty, which he is. His address delivered Sunday evening was the most terrible indictment of the orthodox Christian Church, both Catholic and Protestant, I ever listened to. The Liberals cheered it to the echo, until it became so severe that our sympathies became to a degree enlisted with the few orthodox church members present. Speaking of your arrest, he said, "I do not know but I may be arrested myself before this meeting is through for 'blasphemy,' for if I have not uttered 'blasphemy' already in this address, I shall before I get through."

As the lecture appears in the Albany Express to day and also I learn in one of the Buffalo papers, I hope you may find a place for it in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Another speaker that appeared at the meeting whom I desire to introduce to your readers is Rev. S. W. Sample, a young man only twenty-two years of age, a recent graduate of the Unitarian Theological School at Meadville, Pa.

He spoke first in the free conference meeting Saturday morning, and his very first utterances attracted the attention and admiration of every one present. Then in the afternoon he spoke in defense of Woman Suffrage, and it was the best argument I think I ever heard on that question. Sunday afternoon he delivered another address in favor of the principles of the Liberal League, which was an eloquent and able argument. I heard this remark from many: "That young man is a young Ingersoll and will be heard from in the future." While at the meeting he received a number of invitations to lecture, and the Liberal League should keep him constantly in the field. It is very encouraging to Liberals to see such a promising young man coming upon the Liberal platform. Let him be encouraged.

Mrs. Clara Neyman, of your city, gave two very interesting lectures, fully equal to, if not superior to the one she gave at the Rochester Congress. This eloquent lady is to speak in Groton, N. Y., to-morrow evening, and probably before the Tompkins County League at Ithaca, N. Y., next week. I think the unanimous opinion of her hearers was that she has few superiors among lady speakers in this country. "Infidelity" has a noble and charming advocate in this learned and cultivated lady. She is doing much for our cause in her efforts to unite the American and German Liberals, and to acquaint them with each other. She is another lecturer that should be kept in the field.

Judge McCormick spoke twice. Both of his lectures were able. The last one was a scholarly argument in favor of the proposition "That matter and motion, governed by inherent law, created all things." And he gave very convincing evidence of his position.

At the opening of the meeting Sunday afternoon, Mr. A. L. Brannard, a young man from Salamanca, read an interesting poem in favor of Freethought, which I hope may appear in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The hall in which the meeting was held was the largest in town, and will seat some five hundred persons, and after the first session was nearly full at every meeting, and the audience was a remarkably intelligent one.

The Committee on Resolutions, of which Hon. Joseph E. Wheden, late member of the Legislature, was Chairman, reported the following ones, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That we cordially endorse the political platform of the National Liberal League adopted at Rochester, Oct. 26, 1877, and we urge the Liberals everywhere to organize local Liberal leagues in accordance with the doctrines and principles enunciated in the National Liberal League Constitution, in order to establish a public opinion which shall be powerful in the maintenance of those doctrines and in disseminating the principles of the platform connected therewith.

Resolved, That we protest, and we do most solemnly, sincerely and firmly protest, against any law or the enactment of any law authorizing the arrest and punishment of any person for presenting to the public what such person shall deem essential to the public welfare, when the matters so presented do not violate, in language or idea, the acknowledged rules of decorum; and we demand that all laws against obscenity be so clear, explicit and well defined, that none but actual offenses can be punished, and that no one can be arrested without probable cause; and that such laws should in no case be used to arrest, imprison or persecute individuals for the expression of religious opinions, whatever those opinions may be, nor for expressing opinions in repudiation of any particular religion.

Resolved, That under the laws of the United States, there should be no such crime as blasphemy, and that all laws creating or sustaining such a doctrine, should at once be repealed.

Resolved, That the freedom of speech and of the Press is one of the fundamental principles of our Republic, and that the same should be guarded with the utmost care as being essential to the enjoyment of political and religious liberty.

As I was copying the above resolutions, I received a postal card from G. W. Baldwin, Esq., the earnest Freethinker of Linesville, Pa., and a member of the National Executive Committee of the N. L. L., informing me that the Liberal League of Linesville will celebrate the one hundred and forty-first birthday of Thomas Paine by holding a grand mass-meeting in that place on the 27th, 28th, and 29th of January, 1878. There are to be engaged a number of the ablest Liberal speakers in America to address the meeting. I shall expect to see hundreds of people at that celebration. The Linesville League is made up of good Liberal material, and what they undertake will be well carried out.

So the good work is going on, Bro. Bennett. Let the word "forward" be heard all along the Liberal lines, and the Comstock crew will ere long call on the rocks to hide them from the indignation of an aroused Liberal party that may put a Col. Ingersoll into the Presidential chair, and make Elizabeth Cady Stanton President of the United States Senate, with Elder Evans as "chaplain," if we must have one. I think his prayers would be for justice, and would be heard.

H. L. GREEN.

Paine Memorial Hall.

From the Boston Investigator.

In the Investigator of Nov. 28, on the last page we gave a fac simile of the Paine Memorial scrip which we have issued, and on which we ask our friends to loan sufficient means to pay the mortgage ($50,000) now on the elegant building which was erected in commemoration of the eminent services of Thomas Paine, and a permanent home for the Boston Investigator, a platform for free speech and dissemination of advanced Liberal or Infidel ideas. The sums loaned to be paid back, without interest, as fast as the funds accumulate after the mortgage has been paid. This, we think, can be accomplished by the 29th of January, 1879, if all who are interested in Liberal sentiments will do what they can to aid us in our last effort to save Paine Memorial to the cause of Free Speech and Freethought. In erecting the Building, the committee were unable to raise more than $50,000 from outside sources, and in order to meet the demands upon them in completing the structure, we loaned on a second mortgage $12,000, on which we have never yet received any interest. This, together with the interest on the first mortgage, taxes, and law claims which we have paid, make the money advanced by us to amount to over $20,000.

At the last meeting held by the Trustees it was voted to let the Building be sold, and on their recommendation, in order to prevent the money advanced from being sacrificed, we bought the Memorial in, but without assistance from the Liberal public we cannot long hold Paine Memorial. Unless we have the support in which we had so confidently trusted when we loaned our means to the movement, it must soon pass from our possession. All our available means have been exhausted in our zeal to advance the Liberal cause, and unless we soon receive that aid on which we have relied, not without reason, not only Paine Memorial, but the Investigator too, that for nearly fifty years has stood, the champion of Free Speech, will be sacrificed, and Paine Memorial, which was to be the home of the Boston Investigator, may soon become its grave. To prevent any such disaster, we appeal to Liberals all over the land to assist us by sending their names and taking Scrip, in order that as soon as possible we may be relieved from the anxiety and uncertainty under which we now labor; or will they allow the Building to be lost to the cause, and by so doing be instrumental in driving us to poverty in our old age? Can we rely on our friends, or will they desert us in this our time of need?

HORACE SEAVER.

Boston, Dec. 5, 1877.

Thanksgiving.

It is the wont in this our glorious land, Where Freedom offers all a welcome hand, To render thanks ere Autumn breathes its last.

For benefits and blessings of the past. Once more we hail this glorious day of thanks;

But, as we look among our crowded ranks, Does not one question sore distress the brain, And fill the heart, that would be glad, with pain?

Give thanks—for what? For months of dire distress,

Unlightened by one hour of happiness?

Give thanks for bread we have no coin to buy?

Give thanks for Life, while Death is lurking nigh?

Can mortal heart be taught to feel delight,

Obedient to the hour that makes it right?

A day for thanks! Ah, well, perhaps that day

Will dawn indeed! We truly hope it may.

When in one vast and undivided throng

All voices shall be heard in grateful song!

When clouds shall vanish that now hover murky,

And all mankind shall have its slice of turkey.

Letters of Sympathy.

SIGOURNEY, IOWA, Nov. 20, 1877.

Since your arrest our sympathies are with you—we (wife and I), denying ourselves coffee to be able to buy your books.

Respectfully, J. C. BAIRD.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Dec. 4, 1877.

DEAR FRIEND: I have just heard that the Comstock hounds have arrested you. Good! One more nail in the coffin in which the damnable religious farce will be buried so deep that neither the thunders of Jove nor the mighty toot-horn of Gabriel will be able to resurrect it. You have my mental prayers, and should have a "million for defense" if I had it. Send the Comstock dogs this way, and we will hurl them into the Pacific.

BOYER.

CAWKER CITY, KAN., Nov. 25, 1877.

MY DEAR AND LONG-ESTEEMED FRIEND: The astounding notice in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 17th, that you have fallen a victim to the tyrannous rule of Christian Jesuits and unconstitutional law, has wrung my very soul with fear and agony at the inquisitorial action by which it seems our Government has so degraded our Constitutional rights and liberties, that our right of free thought, free speech, and free action are wholly annihilated in the ignorant superstition of a creedal law. Has it come to this, that our sages and philosophers who are grading the path of truth with the glorious teachings of science, reason, and natural laws, must be guarded by a monster empowered to destroy liberty of thought and speech, and from the depths of a Jesuit inquisition and hell go forth like a destroying upas and manacle and bind an earnest mind that never gave just grounds for offense, but one whose every effort has been for the advancement of the race? Supposing you did write an "Open Letter to Jesus Christ," or supposing you wrote an open letter to Hercules, or Jupiter, or Apollo, or to all the gods and goddesses, I am sure your correspondence with Jesus H. Christ is just as mythical as that with all the gods of Olympus. Supposing you did publish the physiology of the marsupials, what harm was there in that? Where was the obscenity? I presume Anthony Comstock is a species of the marsupial, and grew upon a teat, and yet abhors the idea of having the matter known. He prefers to be a jack-asinorum, as he truly is, and the lion-skin he robes himself in does not conceal his bray.

I would like to refer the minion of despotism to the obscenity of the Word of God. There is no show for starvation there. You may begin where Adam knew Eve, and she conceived, and so on to the end of Revelations, and if the Word of God, the Christian idol, is not the most positively obscene book in print, I am no judge. The Beecher-Tilton reports that were daily issued through the crammed columns of the New York dailies were small fry comparing them with the "Word of God."

What a stir it has made among us all! And perhaps it is all for the best. Let us hope it will arouse the luke-warm blood of those Liberals whose apathy arises from their pecuniary interests. Nothing but persecution will stir their blood. O how I wish

I could remove this injustice, which that bad man has brought upon you! I can only wish for you, and shed tears for the trial so meanly brought about.

Good night. May kind Nature's laws protect you from the fiend of Christianity.

Yours faithfully and hopefully,
MARIE M. DE FORD.

BURTON, WIS., Dec. 1, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, My Dear Old Friend: From your own showing, they have got you in limbo. Well, I regret it, as you have not time nor money to war the combined orthodox Church. But if they force the issue upon us, I hope every Liberal in the land will come to the front and lend his moral, material, and, if required, his physical aid—even to the knife, and that to the hilt. I had rather die warring for full freedom and the rights of man than submit to their cursed tyranny. I was pleased with the ready response of Henderson & Brown. I will forward to you the same amount ($25.00) as soon as I go down to Dunleith. I am anxiously waiting for your next paper, which I expect this evening. Our mails are slow. It is a burning disgrace to this model republic, that its peaceful, law-abiding citizens cannot utter or publish what they please so long as they harm no one, without having this damnable system of censorship and inquisition held over them.

For myself the scene is about closed, the curtain will soon fall, and I shall go to my everlasting dreamless sleep. When I am freed again from this dizziness that I am now suffering (and you will have a faint idea of its intensity, when I tell you that I have been obliged to stop three times since I commenced this letter), I shall go out into the tall timber and do a large job of swearing at all connected with this trouble of yours, and calling on the gods for the speedy death of Comstock and all that may aid or abet him in his hellish proceedings.

I have just received and finished reading your paper of Nov. 24th, and feel heart-sick at the condition the priest-ridden Government of our Revolutionary fathers has fallen to, and would be pleased to die if I could but bring back the spirit to the dead letter of the Constitution. At the downfall of chattel slavery, I felt proud of the title of American citizen, and that we had wiped out the foul stain, the quintessence and scum of all villainy, though the sacrifices had reached to almost superhuman efforts. How disheartening now to be met by this insidious creature of that Government we supported to the extent of our ability, and who is sapping the liberties of those who gave him power!

I believe in the truth of your utterances. I also believe that it is necessary for the elevation and happiness of humanity that you be supported in the enunciation of those truths, be the consequences what they may to the cursed superstition that enslaves, robs, and imprisons those who dare reject and spurn her vile and false teachings!

That you may the better understand my feelings at this time, I will mention some of the sacrifices I have made in support of the Government and Constitution of our country. At the breaking out of the Rebellion I hired three men not liable to the draft to enlist during the war. I gave $1,000 as bounty for raising volunteers, and paid in addition my proportion as assessed to our county of $60,000.

I now repeat that as soon as I can reach a draft or post-office order, will I forward the $25.00, to be applied in your defense in using your most sacred right. Be not disheartened, my dear friend; unless I misjudge the spirit and honor of the Liberals of the "home of the free and the land of the brave," they will stand by you and consider your cause the cause of every American citizen which it is their duty to support and defend. Very respectfully and fraternally your friend and brother.

D. R. BURT.

DUNLEITH, ILL., Dec. 13, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, My Dear Friend and Brother: Please accept the enclosed post-office order for $25.00 to aid you in defending the most sacred and blood-bought right of every true American citizen.

It is not only your cause, but the cause of every lover of freedom whose duty clearly calls him to aid in crushing out this tyranny and more firmly securing his rights for the future. Should the Liberals fail to respond properly, which I hope for their honor and the cause they will not, I will forward another $25.00.

Truly and fraternally your friend and brother,

D. R. BURT.

P. S. I hope that noble and gifted man, R. G. Ingersoll, as pure and bright a gem as adorns humanity, will be secured to defend you and the cause.

D. R. B.

BERLIN HEIGHTS, O., Dec. 10, 1877.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I shall come in with my sympathy at the eleventh hour, but I know you will not consider it less heartfelt. Really I have not felt that you were in any great danger, if you bravely stood your ground as I knew you would, I hope your prosecution will be the means of sweeping an abominable nuisance from the face of the world.

That such an inquisition should grow up and maintain itself is an alarming symptom of the times. While I scorn obscenity as much as any one can, I would not have it put down by such high-handed means as will endanger liberty of thought. But it is not obscenity which is the trouble with you. You are a stronghold in the enemy's country, and a blasphemer. That Marsupial tract is no more obscene than any work on natural history. Your prosecution will be a road to glory and success, and will advertise your blasphemy world wide. You ought now to believe in divine Providence which employs even such reptiles as obscenity hunters to further its great ends.

Be assured that every well wish of mine is with you, and if you will give more space to the Spiritual in your enlarged paper, I shall hail it as a truth seeker indeed.

Yours most fraternally,
HUDSON TUTTLE.

DUNLEITH, ILL., Dec. 11, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: Enclosed find thirteen dollars and fifty cents, P. O. order from your Dunleith friends as a donation to assist you in your suit against mail agent Comstock. Names and amount sent. J. Crighton, 1 00; W. W. Powell, 1 00; Christopher Thill, 1 00; Ed. C. Smith, 1 00; Oliver Rice, 1 00; H. L. Ryder, 50 cents; Thos. McGuire, 1 00; John Miller, 1 00; A. Rose, 1 00; A. Mabee, 1 00; John Staudenmayer, 1 00; H. A. Dames, 1 00; Hugo Apfeld, 1 00; J. B. Branstetter, 1 00.

NEW HARTFORD, N. Y., Dec. 4, 1876.

DEAR SIR: About two weeks ago I sent you a postal card pledging myself to contribute ten dollars to help you fight those tyrannical bigots who have arrested you. But my card probably miscarried, for my name is not in the published list. I therefore now send you a money order for the money; for even should they not succeed in fining or imprisoning you the interruption to your business must cause you serious loss.

With cordial respect and sympathy,
WM. DUDGEON.

WAVERLY, IOWA, Dec. 2d, 1877.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: You have my sympathy. The Bible says, "Love your enemies," but I hate Anthony Comstock. Hate is a feeble word. Also do I hate his religion. I do hope and trust that those of your subscribers and friends that have the means will not see you suffer for the want of money to meet the expenses of your trial. Were I able I would send you some money, but as it is I cannot do so at present. I have a great many Christian friends; my father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for some time and I have read it considerably. My young mind has become poisoned by reading your paper, against the Christian theory. My school-mates sometimes speak disrespectfully of the Sabbath-school I attend, the Universalist. Hoping and believing that right will prevail, I remain your young friend.

C. MAY McCORMACK.

STEVENSVILLE, PA., Dec. 4, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: Please place me on the list of contributors to aid in your defense or in obtaining the repeal of Comstock's odious law, as may be most necessary, for the sum of five dollars. Whilst I will co-operate with every one to suppress the circulation of immoral or obscene literature intended to excite or stimulate licentiousness, I am more anxious to unite with every well-wisher of the race in the effort to circulate such philosophical knowledge as will teach mankind how to properly generate their species. The expense incurred in the effort to regenerate mankind through the instrumentality of sectarian churches and colleges, and that of maintaining the hopelessly unregenerate in prisons and asylums, is becoming an insupportable burden. We must insist not only upon the right to send publications relating to any and every branch of physiology through the mails, but to have them introduced to our common schools. No branch of education transcends this in importance. And nothing can be a source of so much misfortune and suffering to the human family as ignorance of the preservation and proper use of the reproductive functions.

Fraternally yours, J. BURROWS.

BROTHER BENNETT: I have just had a spirited discussion on the subject of the principal instigator in "opening the centennial grounds on Sunday." My opponents contended that it was Senator Morton, and that they had read in the papers that his being struck down by paralysis was, in the providence of God, for the same. I think they have confounded John S. Morton with Oliver P. Will you please set this matter right, explaining, &c., and oblige, L. F. J.

Our correspondent is quite right.—ED.

NAPLES, N. Y., Dec. 10, 1877.

DEAR FRIEND: No pen could describe my feelings when I first heard of your arrest. I felt for a short time as though I weighed at least a half a ton. It seemed to me that I could move a mountain by the mere exercise of my will. I thought for a time I would willingly be reduced to a skunk for the privilege of presenting my business end to that infamous Comstock.

So far from sending obscene literature abroad, from the first number of your paper until the present, not one word has been published that need give offense to any one of common sense.

I have read how oviparous ovoviviparous and other animals propagate their kind, but I never once thought of doing wrong or felt that my modesty was shocked.

As for your "Open Letter" you simply raised the curtain and let the people see the puppets behind, and the country has been shaking its sides with laughter ever since. If your "Letter" had been addressed to Joseph Smith or Mohammed or any other one of the hundred demi-gods, even the lily-pure Comstock would have regarded it as a fine joke.

Be not deceived in your customer. He would roast your body and scatter your ashes to the four winds. You are not to meet a "Foe of noble blood," but a companion of snakes and hypocrites. It is your manhood and not your obscenity that is distasteful to him.

The truth is, you have battered down the walls of superstition. You have dragged forth their imaginary gods and handled them with hot tongs before the people. You have danced out the priesthood, and shown that now as ever, these parasites have annoyed and not benefited the people. Never have the people been so bold and outspoken as since the publication of your paper. Twenty years ago a Liberal lecturer or meeting or convention was a thing unthought of. This is your offense, friend Bennett. Comstock don't care a rush about how "Marsupials propagate their kind" or who writes about it, or how they write. His object is to load you with expenses, to disgrace your character, weaken your influence and ultimately stop your paper.

And almost for the first time in my life I have felt a hankering to be rich. But alas, those whose hearts are most easily moved have the lightest purse. I have lost about four hundred dollars this last fall and that is quite a large sum to take from the hard hand of a mechanic. Nevertheless I am in tolerable health and a little below sixty. But like Pascal I have made up my mind that a man never dies so poor that he does not leave something behind. I send you one dollar from my scanty means and will send you more if the danger thickens.

There are a great many Liberal mechanics in the country; they rank among intelligent men and are great readers. Could they not be induced to club together in villages and cities and put in a half dollar or even a quarter each? They would not feel it, and in the aggregate it would amount to a considerable help for you. I hope the Liberal mechanics will be appealed to.

Very truly yours, JOHN PECK.

OSCEOLA, IOWA, Nov. 25, 1877.

Persecution has always strengthened a cause. D. M. Bennett's arrest is the best advertisement of the cause he advocates that could be devised. Christianity was persecuted and gained ground in spite of persecution, if not in consequence of it. The Protestant faith gained ground in spite of Catholic persecution, if not in consequence of it. Christianity persecuted the early scientists and drew attention to the opinions of the latter; so as to provoke inquiry into science, and with a similar result.

Christianity now persecutes to stop free enquiry and free expression of opinion. The ultimate result will be the same, viz.: to defeat its own object.

A court with power equal to the Spanish inquisition may give a decision against Bennett, and hinder expression of opinion for a time, but the case would become a landmark in the annals of the country like the Dred Scott decision—that "a black man has no rights which a white man is bound to respect."

The real issue in this case of Bennett's is not obscenity—that is the pretext only. The real issue is to stop a free enquiry and expression of opinion.

When I first came to America, "the freest country in the world" it was the only civilized country that tolerated slavery. Now the "freest country in the world" is the only one that would tolerate such a prosecution disguised under the plea of obscenity, but in reality to gag free expression through the press.

It matters not in judging of this case whether Bennett is right in his opinions, or Comstock in his—that is not the point. The real question is whether one man, or set of men shall have the power to stop free inquiry on any subject through the press.

The press when free is the palladium of human liberty. One half of it in America is under corrupt influence, and if the other half be gagged, liberty will languish or die, and be known only as an empty name.

F. J. EMARY.

JOLIET, Nov., 28, 1877.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: So the very worthy and Christian representative of Christ's elect has taken you in his warm embrace. What can I say to you that will comfort you? So this is the man (so called) one of the elect who claims that his sins have been washed away by the blood of Jesus. Well, I should think it quite likely. For he is one of that sort who would set himself up as a judge for the action of his betters. So it has always been and always will be. The ignorant and superstitious have ever held the power to persecute those that dare tell the truth. Why, bless you, brother Bennett, such people hate the truth, and will pay an exorbitant price for a falsehood, when the very Lord that they claim to love and serve has said the truth shall make you free. Much such tyrants know of freedom in any sense of the term! Freedom? 'tis a misnomer. There is no such thing extant to day. When Victoria Woodhull was passing through the furnace, she said it needed no prophetic vision to see the from the beginning. She said it was a dastardly blow, struck at the freedom of the press; and she told the truth, and in your case it is the same. And so this thing will keep going on, unless that portion of the Liberal element that have backbone enough will rise in their might and work for the repeal of that odious law. I confess to a little hope for Ingersoll for he is where he can sound the Congressional pulse, if it have any. Would to God that I could help you in a pecuniary point of view. I will enclose $1.00 in this and that is the best I can do now. May the good angels serve you well in this great trial hour. I believe in that kind of angels that come to our assistance when we are in need of them. I am called a Spiritualist, and I suppose I am, but I am a very matter of fact one. I want good and sufficient reason for every step I take.

Respectfully yours,

MARY J. MILLSPAUGH.

CHICAGO, ILL., Dec. 3, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: Enclosed please find $3.00 for trial papers. Fourteen names I sent you amounts to $2.80; please send a dollar's worth of Bob Ingersoll's challenge respecting the death of Paine and Voltaire, and I will distribute them and remit.

Brother Bennett, on learning of your arrest, I felt thunderstruck and could scarcely believe my eyes to read that it was possible in this enlightened nineteenth century that a government professing to be the most liberal in the world, could hire such an intolerant bigot as Anthony Comstock to violate the liberty of this country and arrest a good-meaning man as your instructive sheet proves you to be. Heed not; such a state of things cannot last long, but proves that Freethinkers throughout the country should organize, and if each individual contributed his mite every month, we could raise such a fund for our protection in such matters that would open the eyes of our sleepy legislators, and bid defiance to all mean snakes in the grass, such as Anthony Comstock, who disgraces the laws of his country and makes America the laughing-stock of some of the most enlightened nations of Europe.

Send on two or three of your petitions, and I will see that they are put in the right direction to obtain signatures, and will strive my utmost to get up a subscription to assist you.

Fraternally,

WM. McFARLANE.

WENDELL, MASS., Dec. 14, 1877.

DEAR SIR: I have just had the serene satisfaction of signing that petition that is to be forwarded to you. What will bigotry and fanaticism try next? I believe in light and liberty. The petition, taken throughout, is sound.

L. HOLMES, Clergyman.

ANAHEIM, CAL., Nov. 27, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: My heart throbs as beating for you in this your affliction; whatever happens, it will all be for the best. I looked for your arrest some time ago, for you have bravely ventilated the holy pages of the Bible, and made people look its obscenity square in the face. You can see ahead what is in store for the Freethinkers. I will assure you we are able to sympathize with you. Our association has met with foes without and within until no meetings are held; but I believe a good work has been done in letting the Christians know that we dare make demands, and I sincerely hope that you will be able to bring the question of obscenity in the courts, in such a shape that Anthony Comstock will be under no necessity to write decoy letters, or play stool-pigeon for the Y. M. C. Association with his eyes hooded by the law.

Yours for the naked truth,

MRS. K. PARKER

SCOTT, IND., Dec. 1, 1877.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: I write to give vent to my pent-up rage and indignation at the foul wrong perpetrated against the cause of humanity—your arrest for the great sin of publishing and distributing over our land the most sacred truths. And because you happen to differ in belief from that Anthony Comstock and his co-workers you must be arraigned to answer for—what? For telling the truth. But be of good cheer, dear Brother; you have many staunch friends who will not forsake you in the hour of trial, of which my husband and myself will give you some tangible proofs ere long. What a proud and lofty position is yours, to be persecuted for truth's sake and the sake of humanity, compared to that of one who could resort to forgery and pious fraud to obtain books on which to prefer a charge against an innocent man when he ought to know better! It seems to me he has stolen literature enough—if he had tried to post himself—to see that all such damnable atrocities as this and the whipping of Dr. Russell of Texas are only the dying struggle of old theology, and bringing truth and error nearer together, and one or the other must back down; but truth will prevail. I enclose fifty cents to get your brave little paper into more hands.

Yours truly, MRS. J. H. MOORE.

WHITE ROCK, NEV., Nov. 26, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: Enclosed find three dollars. I am sorry to see that you are in trouble and being persecuted by Comstock and the Young Men's Christian Association. But never fear; there is not a subscriber to your paper but will respond to our beloved brother's cause to the utmost of his ability. You certainly have friends all over the country, and no small number of them at that. I heard one say to-day if it was the last dollar he had or ever expected to have he would send it to aid his friend Bennett. Comstock and his backers find Bennett and his paper with his knock-down arguments are eye-openers, and thousands of good, honest people are daily receiving great benefit from them. If your paper continues on its course, which it certainly must, Comstock and all his kind will have a hard road to travel.

Mr. Chas. Wall requested me to say that you could chalk him down for five dollars, which you can have at any time when wanted. You can also put my name down for five dollars. Sorry I cannot make it ten times that amount. I had intended to send fifty dollars this fall for you to use for the good of the cause, but my friends, the crickets, made a raid on my crop again this season and did not leave me a potato or anything else, so I must let it pass for another year, but you will hear from me occasionally. Yours in friendship,

V. J. BORRETTE.

CLEVELAND, O., Nov. 26, 1877.

BROTHER BENNETT: Did not see THE TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 17 till Nov. 23d. Then I came to the conclusion that the affair of Dr. Russell of Texas was only one act in a drama (whose authors mean to make it a tragedy) and your arrest is another act out of the same book, with superstition as the lurking foe and rational Freethought as the intended victim. I am sorry for both parties, grieved that these occurrences should be, but glad that our enemies are showing their colors, though I despise their cowardly way of fighting. As hypocrites they are a success, as manly foes they are failures. I took the liberty to procure you some trial subscribers under the two months, 20 cents rule, and enclose them with this together with the money therefor. Where they will next strike "by the help of God" will probably be determined by their chances of success. I feel in the Liberals many concessions and much patience, like the converted pugilist, who was annoyed by rude men during his sermon. "Boys, this Jesus Christ business lasts just a minute and a half longer, and then I'll lick every G—d d—d one of you!" The time has nearly gone by when courteous treatment from Freethinkers will have power with bigots. I know the foe—crafty, scheming, law-abiding (!) polite, gold and office usury mortals, despising reason lest it should be discovered they have none. I can only say "Gold and silver have I none," but my good wishes and all the practical help I can render are at your service. We know the future has reward in store and unborn generations will reap the benefit.

"For 'tis the martyrdom to day Brings victory to-morrow."

Pardon my taking your time, With hopes that the right may win I am with you a truth seeker.

C. FANNIE ALLYN.

LOUDONVILLE, N. Y., Nov. 26, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, My Dear Friend—With regard to the petition you propose, I say that I would be glad to sign it and would make an effort to obtain other signatures. And I have several friends in different parts of the country who, I think, would also sign it. If you will send me three or four extra copies, I will forward one to each and request them to obtain all the signatures they can. They might not otherwise be called upon. If you succeed in getting Comstock's laws repealed, the Liberals of this country will immortalize your memory, and if there is a just God in the Universe, personal or impersonal, he will bless you. Whether bigots curse you or not, we will not care.

I cannot see how, under the circumstances, you can give the needed attention to the Teed-Bennett Discussion. Much as I am interested in the Discussion, I am, of course, very much interested in your health and welfare, and would rather have the discussion suspended for a time than have you injure yourself by over-work in your efforts to accomplish so much.

Yours for free thought and free speech.

F. E. ASPINWALL, M.D.

DUNKIRK, Nov. 27th, 1877.

FRIEND BENNETT: As the agents of the Prince of Peace are after you with a sharp stick, I enclose two dollars to renew my subscription, that in case you are sent over the Styx by those love-your-enemy fellows you can pay your ferriage dues. In the Art gallery of the Centennial Exhibition there was a painting in the French department which represented a man stretched upon the rack, with a priest taking his confession, while a subordinate was applying red-hot irons to the feet of the victim. I hope you won't experience the love of God to that extent.

I am glad the emissaries of the Church have resolved to suppress obscene literature, and hope that while they are about it they will prosecute all clergymen who read Nicodemus' cogitations about the manner of being born again, which they so often read before eating and drinking the body and blood of their Lord.

Although Infidels are generally men of limited means, the time has evidently come when they must prepare to sacrifice something of their worldly goods or the iron heel of Christian intolerance will be upon them. They must stand by each other. Yours, &c.,

HENRY SEVERANCE.

MOUNTAIN SENTINEL OFFICE,
UNION, OREGON, Dec. 5, 1875.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir and Brother: Your issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 17th ult. was read with that indignation which the true American alone can feel—for the true American is he who scorns and denounces oppression, and battles for that liberty for others which he claims for himself. Had I time, Bro. Bennett, I would delight in telling you and the world that I believe a new era is about to dawn and that the mercenary, Jesuitical Comstock has made unwittingly a bold stroke to hasten its advent. But the present seems more a time for action than for essays. Says Peter Maguire,

"—prayer is good in its place,

But then it don't suit this particular case."

Permit me, then, to call your attention to the $50.00 money order and the following:

To D. M. BENNETT, publisher TRUTH SEEKER: We, the undersigned citizens of Union Co., Oregon, having read your article in the TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 17th, entitled "It has come," beg leave to tender you assistance in defense of freethought and freedom of the American press, and request you to apply the amount as hereinafter designated. E. S. McComas $5.00, W. H. Huffman $2.50, L. Renillard $2.00, D. T. Chambers $2.50, J. B. Eaton, Jr., $2.50, Sieg. Baer $5.00, Geo. Starks $2.00, E. C. Brainard $5.00, Dan F. Moore $2.50, H. J. Geer $2.00, W. H. Dorris $5.00, James Hardinge $14.00. Total $50.00.

Use $14.00 as herein directed for papers, books, etc., and the remaining $36.00 you may use in paying fine, employing counsel, or defraying court costs. If, however, you do not wish to so apply it, or if the melting tenderness of the Christian-hearted Judge has been so moved by a sense of right, or more likely, fear of consequences, as to not require it, we would call your attention to the fact that we are desirous of organizing a Liberal Library in the Liberal town of Union, county seat of Union county, Oregon, and you may select for us such books as you think will best serve us. Hon. E. C. Brainard, County Judge of Union county, assured me he would give $50.00 if you need it. The Mountain Sentinel will honor your draft for $25.00 at any time, and if you need assistance, let me know, and I will canvass the State for you if necessary. "Truth crushed to earth shall rise again."

Should you send us books, address Your most earnest friend,
E. S. McComas,
Editor Mountain Sentinel.

MORE TRAIN OIL ON THE TROUBLED WATERS.

Mr. Train Knocking the Bottom out of Comstockism.

LANE'S CASE SHOWN UP IN VIVID COLORS.

COMSTOCK PITCHED OUT OF THE POST-OFFICE BY POSTMASTER JAMES.—THE Y. M. C. A. CO-PARTNERSHIP.

MADISON SQUARE, P. E. 48.

CITIZEN D. M. B.: All right! Count me in! I enlist for the war. I will do all I can to get you into jail!

The fact is, you have got the whole battle of ages on your hands. Woodhull! Train! Lant! Heywood! Bradlaugh! Swinburne! Foote! You are the last, and just the man to drive the rat into his hole! the owl into the wilderness! the pole-cat into his scent-box! the ghosts into their hobgoblin cave! Will mail you an article in advance!

MR. TRAIN CALLS COMSTOCK A LIAR IN THE NEW YORK SUN!

THE AMERICAN SPY NAILED TO THE PUMP.—A REPLY TO ANTHONY COMSTOCK.—GEO. FRANCIS TRAIN CONTROVERTS HIS ASSERTIONS.
[From the Sun, Jan. 11, 1877]

EDITOR OF THE Sun: Comstock. I was he not appointed secret agent of the Government to search mails for immoral matter? Why did Garfield, Chittenden, and Judge Hoar fight the bill so hard if there was no violation of public documents?

Comstock says, in reply to the Sun's charges: "Let me say explicitly that there is not the shadow of truth in any such insinuation. No law allows even the Postmaster-General to tamper with a letter sent through the mail to the humblest or the wickedest individual in the land, nor can he or any other man do so without exposing himself to conviction for a penitentiary offense."

"Neither I nor the Society for which I labor would, in the prosecution of our work, tolerate for a moment the violation of a beneficent law protecting the sanctity of the mails."

Who ever saw such consummate cheek? He beats the whole colony of Bees—Belknap, Babcock, Bliss, and Beecher.

Please inform us which are the mails. Why not publish the bill and Congressional debate on this infamous espionage on the press and mails? Comstock denies your charge and accuses the Sun of injustice in splendid Aminidab Sleek Pecksniff Mawworm language. Let him convict himself out of his own mouth.

Here are his identical words, taken down by T. D. Maitland, the short-hand reporter of the World, and published at the time:

Anthony Comstock was then sworn: Osborn.—Mr. Comstock, what is your occupation?

Comstock.—I am engaged as special agent in the post-office of New York, and also by the Association for the Suppression of Vice, Obscene Publications, and other things.

O.—How long have you been special agent of the Post-office Department?

C.—Over two years under present appointment.

O.—Do you know the prisoner?

C.—I do.

O.—When did you first know him?

C.—I think, sir, it was in the latter part of June or first of July. He came to the post-office. I knew his business from his own admission. He is editor of a paper called the Toledo Sun, which was published at 33 Park Row. I have a copy of the paper. I have several copies.

COMSTOCK'S DECOY LETTER.

The following is a copy of the letter by which Comstock accomplished his dirty work:

GREEN'S FARMS, CONN., July 23, 1875.

SIR: I enclose you $2 for two subscriptions of your weekly paper: one to be sent to myself and the other to be donated by yourself to any person you choose of your acquaintance where it will do the most good. Go on! Go on! Fear not. Keep a stiff upper lip and be sure you are right. Let my subscription commence with the first number, if you have any before the Train-Beecher Prayer. Have you any copies of your suppressed Ohio paper, that you could spare me one? I wish I could send more, but cannot at present. Keep on and perseverance will surely bring you your reward.

Yours, &c., E. SAMUEL, P. O. box 10.

When a man admits that he is a private spy and public informer; admits that he committed fraud in sending a decoy letter through the mails; admits that he forged another man's name, who need be surprised that he writes himself down a liar?

The innocent victim of this base fraud (Garfield admits that there was no "obscenity") is now bleeding at the lungs in a felon's cell in the Albany Penitentiary for publishing my prayer for Mr. Beecher! He has already had nineteen hemorrhages! His wife and three little children were left husbandless, fatherless, and penniless to face this cold winter at 626 Sixth avenue!

Does Comstock deny that he overhauled this young man's mail bag? Does Postmaster James deny that this espionage is a part of Mr. Comstock's duties as secret agent of the Post-office?

How is it that Congressman Cox failed to subpoena this man in the Hewitt investigation, who could have thrown much light on this dark-closet conspiracy against the rights of every citizen?

It is a singular fact that the Sun is the only journal in this city that has mentioned this Comstock affair.

G. F. T.

Mr. Train followed this up with this letter to the Telegram:

From the New York Telegram.

WHERE IS COMSTOCK?

WHY DOESN'T HE REPLY TO MR. TRAIN?

NEW YORK, Jan. 13, P. E. 47.

EDITOR EVENING TELEGRAM: "George Francis Train accuses Anthony Comstock of violating the mails under the pretext of protecting the public morals."—Telegram.

After four years' silence I resume my acquaintance with the Telegram. Why? Because, except the Sun, you are the only journal that ever mentions this Comstock espionage on the press. Lant is in prison at Albany for what I wrote. His poor wife is heartbroken, with her three little ones, at No. 626 Sixth avenue, who fears that unless her husband gets fresh air, she will never see him again. One indictment was for publishing one of Dr. Miller's medical books. Why does not Comstock arrest Dr. Miller? He is a responsible man, with three brown-stone houses in his hotel. He dares this public informer to touch him for what he arrested Lant for:

Dr. Miller in the True Republic.

"ANTHONY COMSTOCK.—Mr. John A. Lant, one of the purest-minded and truest men we ever met, is slowly dying in the Albany Penitentiary from the effects of an unjust arrest and cruel incarceration brought about by Anthony Comstock, the agent of the Young Men's Christian Association. Mr. Lant has a sorrowing wife and three helpless children, who are now dependent upon a few friends for support, while a kind husband and father is deprived of the opportunity to provide for them by nothing more than the personal spite of a man who professes to be a Christian gentleman. God pity such Christians! One of the books for publishing which Mr. Lant was arrested, bears the name of the editor of this paper as its author. At the risk of sharing Mr. Lant's fate at the hands of the merciless Comstock, for the benefit of Mr. Lant's family, we will send a copy of the book, "A Father's Advice," to any person sending us twenty cents."

Are there two laws—one for the rich, the other for the poor? If not, let Comstock arrest the Doctor if he dares.

As you have so often attended to this Comstock matter, I send you advanced "copy" of an article to appear in Wilson's G. F. T. paper.

The Congressional debate is important just now, and if the Telegram will demand that Congressman Cox shall call Comstock before the Hewitt Investigating Committee we may open some astounding revelations.

Lant writes me despondingly. He is afraid he will not weather the storm:

"If eighteen months in the penitentiary and the record of the Toledo Sun don't make me an evolutionist I will try and join you and the birds and children in the park for a change. I thought once, as you said, 'I would hardly stay eighteen months.' I have been bored with anger through and through almost literally, and have raised blood, little by little, from time to time, and was willing to submit to His inevitable fate, which no man escapes."

The young editor falls back on fate; but I think the Telegram will admit that it is a hard fate to die like a dog when guiltless of crime.

G. F. T.

My letters brought out Mr. Dana.

[From the Sun, Jan. 1877.]

LET MR. COMSTOCK SPEAK.

Mr. Anthony Comstock has been conspicuous for several years past as a conservator of public morals, in the way of preventing the transmission of immoral matter through the mails.

Now, we should like to be informed how Mr. Comstock executes his delicate and difficult official duty. How does he find out what envelopes contain before he breaks the envelopes open?

Who authorizes him to break open letters and sealed packages on which the postage has been paid? And who assists him in it?

The work in which Mr. Comstock is engaged has been regarded by our religious teachers with much favor. Some, however, have doubts whether the law under which he acts is in harmony with our Constitution and theory of government. They think that it was far from the purpose for which the Government of the United States was established to supervise the correspondence of citizens and see that it is not immoral. They regard his mode of proceeding as an evil or objectionable way of doing good.

If Mr. Comstock himself would explain fully and in detail, his whole system of operations, then people could make up their minds with a better understanding of the subject. Let him tell how his plans are executed without infringing upon the secrecy of the mails.

It was in reply to this that Mr. Train gave Comstock the lie direct, and the next day the Sun announced that Comstock had been kicked out of the Post-office in the following paragraph:

[From the Sun.]

COMSTOCK'S INTERFERENCE STOPPED.

Postmaster James said yesterday that Mr. Anthony Comstock, special agent for the suppression of vice, had been prohibited by the Postmaster-General from entering the mailing or business department of the Post-office for the purpose of interfering with letters or correspondence in any way. It was found necessary to take this action, because he insisted on detaining letters without consulting the Postmaster in the matter. Hereafter, when Mr. Comstock desires to act in cases where the mails are concerned, he will have to proceed through, and not independent of, the Postmaster. He has no more authority to detain letters than has any private citizen. Some time ago he attempted to detain letters addressed to initials in care of newspaper offices. Postmaster James was peremptory in his orders to the employees of his office not to allow Mr. Comstock to meddle with correspondences.

Here is where the matter ended. The Sun was silenced! The Postmaster crawled! Comstock lied! And now you and Heywood are arrested for publishing matter less broad than Lant's. What right has Postmaster James to stop Comstock in the face of the law? Comstock is above James, and can look over all our private mails by Congressional act! Is he in league with the vendors of obscene pictures to advertise their filthy trade? What infamy to mix up your classic writings with the vile trash he carts round by the ton for the Y. M. C. A. and members of Congress to gloat over!

Have the Christians the monopoly of selling all these pictures? Comstock has done more to advertise those dirty books and pictures than all the obscene vendors in the land. Everybody now is inquiring for the article. Is he a silent partner in the trade? Is he a Tweed ring all by himself? or are Jaffray and Wm. E. Dodge co-partners? Go for him! Nail his ears to the pump! The coin is spurious; stamp it down!

MADISON SQUARE, P. E. 48. G. F. T.

A BOMBSHELL AMONG THE BRETHREN!

MR. TRAIN AND THE PETITION.

MADISON SQUARE, P. E. 48.

To CITIZENS Wood & Holbrook, Publishers and Booksellers, Murray Hill Publishing Company, R. S. Newton, M.D., Professor in the New York Eclectic Medical College, Charles Winterburn, M.D., Wm. McLaury, M.D., John P. Jewett, Publisher, [who originally brought out "Uncle Tom's Cabin,"] New York News Company, A. L. Rawson, D.D., LL.D., Author and Artist, Warren, Barnes & Co., Paper Dealers, Crocker & Colyer, Printers, A. C. W. Carter, Ex-Judge, J. W. Nicholls, Photographer, E. M. Macdonald, Printer, D. M. Bennett, Publisher and Bookseller [All of New York]:

Your Petition finds me in a ten-day fast. But I never sign papers! 'Tis well enough for you, but I have evolved. I look upon Congress as a gigantic rum-shop, bagnio, faro bank, a huge spittoon of political filth. Petition! You forget yourselves. You are plaintiffs, and not the defendants, in this case.

DEMAND, DON'T PETITION.

Congressmen are our servants, and not our masters. Do we go down on our knees to our own domestics? Are we mendicants to those we honor? Are we paupers to men we elevate to represent us? Petition! Bah! You should demand. Are we slaves and they tyrants? What is the matter with the Americans? Have they no manhood? no independence? Must we beg our attorney not to send us to prison?

Your Petition is well worded, but it will not be heeded. Those men deliberately passed that law. Nothing can check their infamous legislation but the coming Cromwell.

THE TRUTH SEEKER'S RESPONSIBILITY.

You will have to fight the battle yourself. It is all on you. All the Liberal papers are namby-pamby. The Index goes up and down like a jumping-jack. The Crucible is in extremes, but deserves a better fate. Hull is game; but this fight is beyond Free Love. Heywood strikes square from the shoulder. Lant caters to the workingmen, who haven't a red! Miller has launched a book-case of papers that live from one number to fifteen.—Crusader, New Dispensation, La Commune, True Republic, The Train Men's Telephone, The Lamp Post, The Workingman—but these have all chipped in. The Boston Investigator was too respectable to even mention my case or father the book from which I took the Bible quotations! So you see, Mr. B., you have a big bonanza. Two thousand years of fraud to be burst at last by THE TRUTH SEEKER! G. F. T.

It is the fashion now among orthodox people, too, to disparage theology. "Do not preach theology," is the charge given to the young minister as he takes his ordination vows. "It is barren, rootless, and unfruitful. The people do not care for it; nobody knows anything about it. It is a mass of dry bones; a skeleton; let it rest."—O. B. Frothingham.

THERE remains in the faces of women who are naturally serene and peaceful an after-spring, and later, an after-summer, the reflex of their most beautiful bloom.—Richter.

Gems of Thought.

We must be afraid of neither poverty, nor exile, nor imprisonment; of fear itself only should we be afraid.—Epictetus.

Lay not the plummet to the line; religion hath no landmarks; no human keenness can discern the subtle shades of faith.—Tupper.

HAVE you not observed that faith is generally strongest in those whose characters may be called the weakest?—Madame de Staël.

THE greater the difficulty the more glory in surmounting it. Skillful pilots gain their reputation from storms and tempests.—Epicurus.

FAITH consists in believing things because they are impossible. Faith is nothing more than submissive or deferential incredulity.—Voltaire.

NOTHING is more noble, nothing more venerable than fidelity. Faithfulness and truth are the most sacred excellences and endowments of the human mind.—Cicero.

A MORE glorious victory cannot be gained over another man than this, that when the injury began on his part, the kindness should begin on ours.—Tillotson.

* WOE to falsehood! it affords no relief to the breast, like truth; it gives us no comfort, pains him who forges it, and, like an arrow directed by a god, flies back and wounds the archer.—Goethe.

FIRMNESS, both in sufferance and exertion, is a character which I would wish to possess. I have always despised the whining yelps of complaint and the cowardly, feeble resolves.—Burns.

A FLATTERER is said to be a beast that blithely smiling. But it is hard to know them from friends; they are so obsequious and full of protestations; for as a wolf resembles a dog, so doth a flatterer a friend.—Sir. Walter Raleigh.

FAME is a revenue payable only to our ghosts; and to deny ourselves all present satisfaction, or to expose ourselves to so much hazard for this, were as great madness as to starve ourselves or fight desperately for food to be laid on our tombs after our death.—Mackenzie.

A FATHER inquires whether his boy can construe Homer, if he understands Horace, and if he can taste Virgil; but how seldom does he ask or examine or think whether he can restrain his passions—whether he is grateful, generous, humane, compassionate, just, and benevolent.—Lady Herve.

KNOWLEDGE does not comprise all which is contained in the large term of education. The feelings are to be disciplined, the passions are to be restrained; true and worthy motives are to be inspired; and pure morality inculcated under all circumstances. All this is comprised in education.—Daniel Webster.

AFTER upwards of two thousand years, Epicurus has been exonerated from the reproach that the doctrines of his philosophy recommended the pleasures of sensuality and voluptuousness as the chief good. Calumny may rest on genius a considerable portion of a world's duration; what, then is the value of fame?—W. B. Chubb.

EVERY failure is a step to success; every detection of what is false directs us towards what is true; every trial exhausts some tempting form of error. Not only so; but scarcely any attempt is entirely a failure; scarcely any theory, the result of steady thought, is altogether false; no tempting form of error is without some latent charm derived from truth.—Professor Whewell.

THE new faith . . . meets the need of to-day. It is the child of to-day; and in to-day it lives. It answers the questions of to-day—not the questions of a thousand years ago or a thousand years to come. It grapples with the needs of to-day and not the needs of the last century. It ministers to the sorrows of men and women now living and suffering, not of the men and women who groaned and sorrowed a century or more in the past.—O. B. Frothingham.

NATURE has laid out all her art in beautifying the face; she has touched it with vermilion, planted in it a double row of ivory, made it the seat of smiles and blushes, lighted it up and enlivened it with the brightness of the eyes, hung it on each side with curious organs of sense, given it airs and graces that cannot be described, and surrounded it with such a flowing shade of hair as sets all its beauties in the most agreeable light.—Addison.

TIME is to arrest our speculations respecting chimerical worlds and incomprehensible mysteries, and to address our attention to the improvement of our human condition, and our endeavors for the practical exemplification of those beautiful principles of liberty and equality enshrined in our political institutions and the national Declaration of Independence. Time it is to heal the rancor raised by religious and legal disputes; to check the unscrupulous ambition of presumptuous priests, to lower the pride of ideal wealth, and to honor and ennoble honest industry. Time it is to recognize that every sorrow which corrodes the human heart, every vice which diseases the body and brain, every crime which startles the ear and sends back the blood affrighted to the heart—is the outcome of one evil, the foul product of one root, the dangerous progeny of one corrupt parent—Ignorance. And time it is to proclaim on the housetop, in city and forest throughout this great country, that we propose to turn our churches into halls of science, our schools of faith into schools of knowledge, our privileged colleges into state institutions for all the youth of our land.—Dr. Sara C. Chase.

Notes and Clippings.

MOODY and Sankey still put their trust in Providence—the R. I. article.

"Sicars, tobacco, and bulky saws" is said to be one of the worst signs of the times.

ELECTRICITY is the new antidote for sea sickness. A mild galvanic battery is brought to bear on the stomach.

THE Catholics of Germany are after Slade the slate-writer and declare he is surely in league with the devil.

THE Brooklyn Seventh Avenue Methodist Church has been sold by the sheriff under foreclosure of mortgage. Where is Kimball?

TEN per cent of the population of this city is made up of Hebrews. Yet the Hebrews contribute only about one per cent. to the criminal population.

A PHILADELPHIA clergyman, who was some time ago charged with preaching other men's sermons, and who partially owned up to having done it, now has a call to an important church at Rochester.

A high police official remarks: "We make from sixty to ninety thousand arrests per year and still crime goes on." Is this an indirect argument in favor of disbanding the police and saving the public the immense expense thereby incurred?

WINTHROP CHURCH in Randolph, Mass., was destroyed by fire on Christmas eve. This looks as if God either takes no care at all of his own property, or was busy at that time with his Christmas goose and sort of let things run along kind of loose like.

THIS is the time of year for church fairs, when the young sisters can sell kisses and pin cushions at their full value and obtain cash in advance or on delivery of the goods. It is understood that they do business on the C. O. D. plan, and all for the glory of the Church.

WHEN the president of a philanthropic society handles the money collected to compensate a free lecturer, and the same evening returns home with a new meerschaum pipe, these circumstances constitute to say the least a suspicious train of circumstantial evidence.

"SHAM jewelry, humbug watches, and quack medicines which never cure diseases are too freely advertised in the columns of the religious press." Oh, it's all about of a piece. Their advertising pages are just equal to their theology and their grand scheme of salvation by an innocent person's blood.

A HINT TO REFORMERS.—Don't try to do too much. A man not a thousand miles from this city attempted to teach his wife to eat with a fork, and since that lesson he has been wearing a piece of beefsteak over his left eye. The pathway of the reformer has ever been much like Jordan.

THE Rev. Jonathan Crane, pastor of the First Congregational Church in Middletown, N. Y., was stricken by apoplexy in the pulpit, on Sunday last, and died on Christmas day. Those who are firm in the faith that Providence directs everything are left to conclude that the omnipotent individual aforesaid was displeased with his servant, and took that means to displace him.

THE Rev. Simeon Dixon, formerly of Brooklyn, and who recently has had a church at Baxtertown, N. Y., has surrendered himself to the officers of justice, who for several days have been looking for him. Sarah Jane Williams accuses him of seduction. The reverend gentleman barely escaped arrest upon the evening of his recent marriage to Mary Agnes Kane. The good man was admitted to bail.

BETWEEN the scientific skeptics without and the clerical skeptics within, the citadel of orthodoxy is seriously menaced, and its reverend defenders are likely to have their hands full for the next few years in repelling assaults and suppressing more dangerous mutinies. It behooves them to be on the alert, and to make no compositions with the enemy. The times call for vigilance on the walls and aggressive courage in the field.—Sun.

DR. FARRAR, canon of Westminster, and author of the most popular "Life of Christ" of our time—read and admired of late years in thousands of Christian families—has been preaching at the Abbey on subjects relating to a future life. He renounced his faith in the beautiful doctrine of an endless and burning hell inasmuch that many pious souls are looking about in fear and trembling, not knowing what they will cling to if their devil and hell are snatched from them. Take these away, and what have Christians to hope for?

THE orthodox journals are pitching into Beecher for his sermon on hell. The Presbyterian vents its wrathful indignation by saying that "he erected in Plymouth Church an orthodox scarecrow, and commenced swearing at it, throwing mud at it, making faces at it, butting at it like an infuriated goat. Every time the red flag of his own fancy floated before him, he pawed and flung turf in the air; indeed, he stood in impotent rage, swearing most blasphemously, and striking at shadows." Verily, what loving kindness these Christians do show one toward another.

THE lads and the ladies are mixed up by the narrator of a baptismal scene at Lambertville in such a manner as to make it difficult to tell who is who, or which is what. He says: "The pastor baptized thirteen in the Delaware river, one of them being his only son, another one being a young lad, formerly one of the most active members of the Episcopal church, a young lady of much promise, and still another, the daughter of one of our deacons." The lad who is a young lady of much promise, and the other lad who is the daughter of a deacon, ought to have the best wishes of all Christian people.

GIVE us a dollar's worth of silver in our silver dollars (Chicago Journal). According to whose standard? By the standard of England there is now only 92 cents in our old silver dollar, but by the standard of France, Italy, China, India and three fourths of the people of the world who use money, our old silver dollar contained 108 cents worth of silver. Shall we by dissuading silver, of which we produce more than half of the world's product, depreciate its value and increase the price of gold, which is the product of England? Or shall we by using silver augment its price and diminish the price of gold?—Graphic.

AUNT 'LIZA GONE HOME.—"Doctor, is I got to go?"

"Aunt 'Liza, there is no hope for you."

"Bress de Great Master for his goodness. Ise ready."

The doctor gave a few directions to the colored women that sat around 'Liza's bed, and started to leave, when he was recalled by the old woman, who was drifting out with the tide:

"Marse John, stay wid me till it's ober. I wants to talk ob de old times. I knowed you when a boy, long 'fore you went and been a doctor. I called you Marse John den; I call you desame now. Take de ole mammy's hand, honey, and hold it. Ise lived a long, long time. Ole marster and ole missus hab gone before, and de chillun from de ole place is scattered ober de world. I'd like to see 'em 'fore I starts on de journey to-night. My ole man's gone, and all de chillun I nussed at dis breast has gone, too. Dey's waitin' for dere mudder on degolden shore. I bress de Lord, Marse John, for taken me to meet 'em dar. Ise fought de good fight, and Ise not afraid to meet de Savior. No mo' wo'k for poor ole mammy, no mo' trials and tribulations—hold my hand tighter, Marse John—fadder—mudder—marster—missus—chillun—Ise gwine home."

The soul, whilst pluming its wings for its flight to the Great Beyond, rested on the dusky face of the sleeper, and the watchers, with bowed heads, wept silently. She was dead.—Missouri Brunswick.

THE following is from a letter from London in the New York Times. However much we may boast that our free schools are a sufficient safeguard against the machinations of a wily priesthood, it is evident that not only here but in England are the Catholics slowly but surely advancing to power. The fact that in London a few years ago a "sister" would have been mobbed by Protestants, leaves not much choice as between the rule of the two great sects of Christendom. There is no logical stopping-place between Rome and Reason, and we trust it will not long before the American people renounce all allegiance to the former, including its legitimate offspring, the Y. M. C. A., and trust to Reason as their only guide. This letter shows rather interesting conditions existing in the country whose dominion encircles the earth: "The ritualists are once more coming to the front in a spirit of aggression, which is exciting the Protestant mind of England into a fit of angry remonstrance. Talking the other day to an intelligent and traveled American from the West, he assured me that one of the biggest troubles of the future in the United States would be 'the religious question.' He said the Roman Catholics were working might and main to get into their hands the control of the educating forces of America: that they were succeeding far more rapidly than was generally believed, and that the seeds were sown for a struggle which will one day shake the Republic to its centre. My friend may have been a religious fanatic; he may have spoken the truth, nevertheless. Once in a certain number of years there is a religious fight in Europe. England is the prize which the Papacy prays for. The son of a friend of mine is being educated at a Roman Catholic college on the Continent. One of the daily prayers is for the conversion of England. The revival of 'the true faith' in Great Britain, with its pomp and pageantry, its influence of office, and its power near the throne, is the dream, the desire, the hope of all good Catholics; and to hope and desire with them is generally to succeed; for they have the patience that commands all things, the patience to wait. Their schools, their churches, their convents dot the United Kingdom in all directions. Their vespers bells are heard in English valleys; their tolling priests are met on every country road. A few years ago a sister in her robes would have been mobbed in the streets of London. Now she goes about, with her rosary and her white head-dress, disregarded. The priest mixes in Protestant society. In Ireland the Established Church has been abolished; in England far-seeing men say the establishment is doomed. Not a week passes that does not send a convert to Rome out of some high family. The Ritualists are the intermediary agents between the English and the Romish Church. They educate their flocks to the shows and pageantry of the other church; they burn incense; they exalt the Virgin; they attack the superstitious with miracles; they make the service of the Church of England seem tame; they unhinge weak minds and force strong ones, even when they have obtained power, into that Church in which they can satisfy to the full the thirst which ritualistic mummeries have excited. Within my own journalistic circle there are half a dozen Roman Catholics who 10 years ago were Protestants. Mr. Tooth, at Hatcham, insists upon imitating the Romish service in his Protestant church. Mr. Machonachie will have crucifixes and images of the Virgin in his. They support their pretensions by insidious publications; they outrage their ordination vows; and yet no Bishop is found strong enough to evict them, and the law hesitates to put forward its arm against them. I don't say they are insincere men; I don't offer an opinion as to the truth of their principles. I only know they have no business in the Church. There are scores of clergymen today who are taking the money of the establishment, living by it, holding high positions through it, and who not only break their solemn ordination vows, but steadily undermine the house, in league with its enemies. These are stubborn facts, and they point to that same trouble which my American friend predicts for his native country. It is the fixed belief of many sober, thoughtful men that a far more serious trouble for England than the war in the East is developing in the remarkable progress of Roman Catholicism, which is one of our most significant signs of the times. Queen Victoria is not blind to this modern feature of religious education. She ignored the marriage of the Premier Duke of England, his Grace of Norfolk, because the bride was a convert from Protestantism—the latest triumph of our great social star, Monsignor Capel.

Events of the Week.

THE city hotel in Portsmouth, N. H., burned. SAMUEL BOWLES is getting better. Death is deferred indefinitely.

BOSTON has an eleven-year-old murderer. Feroocious precocity is perhaps Boston's forte.

A SHOE-FACTORY at Braintree, Mass., was consumed by fire. Loss, $50,000 or $60,000.

A PLANING-MILL was destroyed on Christmas morning at Pottsville, Pa. Loss, $25,000.

LOVELY December weather. A prettier Christmas day was never known. No snow yet and but little frost.

THE profits of the Third Avenue Street Railroad for the past year was $520,000. Rapid transit will undoubtedly lessen those fat profits materially.

FRANKLIN HAYES of Brooklyn shot his step-mother. He proposed at first to shoot himself but was prevented. It is best sometimes to let those fellows have their own way.

DR. T. S. LAMBERT, President of the late Popular Life Insurance Company, has been found guilty of perjury in the returns made as to the condition of the company. Sentence not yet passed.

MRS. A. T. STEWART, aged seventy, fell upon the marble stairs of her marble mansion, corner 34th st. and Fifth avenue, and broke the radius of her right arm besides bruising her shoulder severely.

SIX children between the ages of nine and twelve—four boys and two girls—have been arraigned for murder in Columbia, S. C. They murdered a negro boy in a cottonfield and nearly killed a negro man who molested them.

A FIRE occurred in the immense desk factory of Kerr, Killner, & Co., of Goerck st. It broke out in the engine and boiler room, causing a loss of $25,000. By the prompt action of the fire department a disastrous conflagration was prevented.

STILL THEY COME.—Twenty-one young priests were ordained by the Right Rev. Dr. De Groshland at Troy, N. Y. Now all the poor Mickeys and Brigets will have to do is to go to work and support those young candidates for heaven upon the fat of the land.

SCANT war news since the surrender of Plevna. The Turks are still anxious for peace. Great war preparations are being made in England, and it is thought she meditates taking a hand in the fray if the settlement is not made in a way that will be acceptable to her.

CHRISTMAS passed off rather merrily in this locality. The weather was delightful and equal to April. The parks were filled with pleasure-seekers, and the churches abounded in impressive ceremonies and services. One unpleasant recenter is, however, to be recorded. Four men engaged in a personal quarrel late at night on the corner of Bleeker and Sullivan streets. Two of the men were stabbed, probably fatally; the other two made their escape, but were arrested at night.

A TERRIBLE EXPLOSION.—On the evening of the 20th, between five and six, a terrific explosion occurred in Greenfield's candy factory on Barclay street, by which the front part of the four-story building was blown out and a fearful mass of ruins precipitated. Many girls, as well as men, were employed in the establishment, and all were busily engaged in putting up orders for holiday goods. It was thought at first as many as eighty persons were crushed to death in the ruins, but upon digging out the crushed bodies the probable number of deaths is reduced to one-quarter of the original estimate. Different theories exist as to the cause of the disaster. Some claim the boilers burst others that it was the smoke flue leading to the chimney, and others again that it was the explosion of kerosene lamps used in the establishment, and that the burning oil communicated with the dry powdered starch used in large quantities in the establishment. The building caught fire very soon after the explosion, and it was thought many of the girls were burned to death. Many saved themselves by jumping from the second-story windows.

BY HUDSON TUTTLE.

CHAPTER XII.—CONTINUED.

THE ULTIMATE OF RELIGIOUS IDEAS.

"Ye are gods, and behold ye shall die, and the waves be upon you at last:

In the darkness of time, in the deeps of the years, in the changes of things,

Ye shall sleep as slain men sleep, and the world shall forget you for kings."

THE progress of thought is in cycles, and history constantly repeats itself in what may be termed crises. Nearly two thousand years have passed since the dawn of the Christian Era, and we find society again entering a similar plane of organic disruption to that which prostrated the magnificent mythology of the Roman world. The wise Polybius records that it was allowable for writers to enlarge on miracles and fables to promote piety; and Strabo that women and the people generally could only be led to piety by myths and fables. It was an age of organized hypocrisy. The philosophers had no faith in the religion they encouraged in the people. Statesmen employed it as a convenience in the machinery of government. Augurs and priests smiled when they met. Authors ridiculed the legends of the gods to each other, while they wrote in exquisite prose and verse in their favor. The State became disintegrated, from the throne of Cæsar to the hut of the peasant; and hypocrisy so skillfully concealed the decay that no one saw the imminence of change.

After a wide circle, society again repeats this state of things. It has become an organized hypocrisy. In the United States, sixty thousand priests daily teach what their reason declares false. They have grasped the schools; they manufacture opinion, and throttle the Press. Dare the statesmen, lawyers, physicians, or authors come in collision with public opinion? Not they. The statesman wants office more than manhood, and joins the rabble to gain votes. He will even attend revivals, and become "converted," if he attain his ends thereby. Although a skeptic at heart, he is a ready tool to enact church-favoring laws. The lawyer seeks credit by owning a pew, and sleeping in it two hours each Sunday. To the physician, to be religious is a fair advertisement. The author, most sensitive to the breath of criticism, finds the popular side yield most honor and profit. The merchant finds a high-priced pew a good investment; and even the mechanic obtains more constant employment by belonging to some church.

While all detest this tyranny, and loathe themselves for yielding to its pressure, they consent to be slaves to each other. They feel they are hypocrites, but know not how to shake the horrid vampire off; and if they knew they dare not. The honest mechanic would lose his rank; the merchant's goods would remain on his shelves; the physician would have no patients, the author, no readers; and this, too, most paradoxically, in the midst of those who at heart believe just as they do, and who secretly honor them for openly avowing their belief. The members of the social fabric mutually consent to live lives of debasing hypocrisy, and to make their conversation unmitigated cant.

Our aim has been to show the baselessness of all extraneous systems of morals and worthlessness of religious opinions, as such, distinct from morality based on intellectuality. To gather up the scattered threads of evidence, the ultimate of our position may be briefly stated:

The ultimate of the God-idea is negation. The savage believes everything is God, and soon arrogantly claims to understand his will and purpose. As he advances in knowledge and civilization, he distrusts his capability to grasp the infinite, and with his growth in wisdom perceives more and more his weakness. God is invariably a reflection of the mind of the worshiper; and when the worshiper, instead of erecting altars and shrines, and addressing prayers to an ideal being, sets himself at work to purify and render himself divine, the end has been attained.

The Christ-idea, developed from a part of the God-idea—the approach of the Infinite to man through the medium of the flesh—is an imperfect expression of the divinity of man, of the infinite possibilities of his nature, and reaches its end when those great truths are received and embodied in noble and true lives.

Religious ideas are outgrowths of fancied relations between man and God. They rest on the assumption, expressed or understood, that God is a personal being, and interferes with the actions of men and the course of Nature, in whole or in part by miracle. Religious rites and observances can have but two motives—to appease the displeasure or gain the esteem of the gods, or God.

God must be personal to render such intercessions of any avail. The impersonality of the Infinite Cause disposes of all the ceremonies and forms which pass for religion. The moral faculties, which from immemorial ages have been persecuted by superstition, are consigned to the intellect, and man, instead of acting to please God, does right because such is the legitimate requirement of his perfected organization. He walks out of the blighting shadow of ritual and creed—the blind reliance on revelation and its interpreters; casts aside his fear of offended gods and demons, recognizing in himself divine powers which rightly used will lead him to divine ends. He does not determine the right and the true by written revelation, but by knowledge of the constitution of Nature. He is pure and upright, not because it pleases God, but because he has inherent capabilities for purity and nobleness of life.

The observance of the fixed order of his being is the right and true, and the harmony of his life will proclaim the measure of his knowledge and obedience.

Are these highlands of truth to be gained without a struggle? Are mankind to have the clouds of ignorance at once swept away from their mental sky? If so, this grandest of revolutions will be unique. Nay, planted on the impregnable rock of positive knowledge, the warfare will be waged between science and dogmatism, the hoarse bray of ignorance. Here entrenched, it has scorned to do more than defend itself against the moss-troopers of the religious marsh-land—the guerillas and bushrangers of theology. Gathering strength, it may become aggressive. The low cannonading of this struggle is heard in the distance. Rome, most sensitive to feel the popular breath, most quick to prepare for the red-handed struggle she has waged for her whole life against humanity, calls a great Council to reassert her dogmas, and give her strength to flesh her fangs on the first faint sign of rebellion to her rule. The Protestant churches are uniting and drawing tighter the reins of theological government.

On the other side, men arise who dare to think, and—thinking—dare to speak.

Shall we repose our confidence in Truth, and passively await the issue? Truth of itself has no power. Religious barbarism has repeatedly conquered civilization, and set the hand on the dial of progress backward many a weary century of blood. The Truth demands exponents and defenders.

Conservatism finds strength in the ignorant masses, and when we consider how few there are who think correctly, who are reliable in their judgments, unbiased and unprejudiced, we tremble for the cause of mental freedom.

Rationalism, the implacable foe of superstition, is slowly gathering its forces for a final struggle. The various battalions of Churchianity have waged many a hard-fought battle among themselves—have looked upon each other with spiteful hate—for slightest differences of opinion condemned each to a place it is almost profane to mention; but now, under the pressure of the accumulating power of Rationalism, they send their bugle blasts down the gale, calling their scattered hosts together, and wheeling their pliant subjects into line. Old and New School Presbyterians on the right; Episcopalians in the centre; Methodists, Baptists, and scattered divisions of various sects on the left; a picket line of Swedenborgians; while the whole is supported by the solid columns of Roman Catholicism, lumbering on with its heavy ordnance, its racks, gibbets, fagots, and dungeons.

In this contest money is as dross, and life itself is of value only as it purchases freedom. We who have come up out of the black shadow of death, traversing the Golgotha overshadowed by the withering shade of Churchianity; who are drabbled with the slime and ooze cast over us by the serpent-tongue of slander "for Christ's sake"—what are we doing? Allowing our children to travel the same road! Sending them to the Sabbath-school or church, and permitting them to drink at will of the same poisoned fountain! For their sakes, if not for our own, let us strive to make Rationalism a power commanding respect. Let us leave them the proud name of independent thinkers, and make it a title of honor.

The battle is no longer waged with the uncertain weapons of theology and metaphysics, but the thinker now wields the Damascus blade of positive knowledge, and the result will be decisive. Infallible authority, antiquity, miracles, saints, martyrs, popes, priests, majorities, dogmas, faiths, consciousness, all the trappings that have hitherto been received as divine, holy and sacred, will perish before the keen flame of what is known, and no more shall blight the expansive spirit, for ever.

What will be the outgrowth of this radical change, brought about by the accumulation of knowledge?

The Church, with its hollow shams, shall perish; but morality, the growth of intellect, freed from gross and perverting idolatry shall achieve a nobility of character unknown before. Faith in the doctrine of vicarious atonement, fear of offending a relentless God, the tortures of hell-fire, the authority of a book or a caste, shall pass away before the certain light of man's true relations and a positive development of morals.

THE END.

A Letter from James Parton.

The following letter was probably not designed for publication, but as it contains views so clear and reasonable connected with our constitutional and personal rights, and it being from a person so widely and favorably known, we trust we are guilty of no breach of confidence in laying it before our readers:

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., Dec. 19, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, My Dear Sir: I have read with care your pamphlet entitled "An Open Letter to Jesus Christ," and though I would not treat such a subject in that manner, I cannot hesitate to express my conviction that you were within your right, as an American citizen, in writing and publishing it. I know how painful it must be to millions of amiable people to have their religious system so ridiculed; but I am also sure that there are certain hymns and other writings, issued by and for religious persons, which give me as acute misery as anything in your pamphlet can give them. There is an individual called Hammond, who publishes a pious song-book full of the grossest superstition, and, as I think, most hostile to human happiness and virtue. Nevertheless, I think he is within his right in selling it. Moody and Sankey enjoy a clear revenue of over fifty thousand dollars a year from copyright on their books; which, I think, do great harm, and dishonor this country and this age. But I would fight for their right to publish them, and willingly concede that, in publishing them, they mean to do good to others as well as to themselves.

These things are matters of opinion, and there can be no safe and tranquil progress in human affairs unless opinion is free.

Respectfully yours,

JAMES PARTON.

The Bennett-Teed Discussion.

1.—JESUS CHRIST IS NOT ONLY DIVINE, BUT IS THE LORD GOD, CREATOR OF HEAVEN AND EARTH.

MR. TEED'S FIFTH LETTER.

MORAVIA, Dec. 20, 1877.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Fortunately, or unfortunately, for both of us, "the Universe is here"—that is, it is everywhere. "Matter is here," force is here; we see and feel them. But oh! where is mind? With what do we perceive them? I must needs "bottle up" a little that you may see it and feel it, that it may become tangible to your material and physical perceptions, before you can conceive of its existence! Is it essential for me to add that mind is here also? Or would this be another assumption on my part?

Is it difficult for you and the readers of your paper to comprehend me? No wonder! Your efforts appear to be directed to the rendering of my statements as obscure as possible. Nowhere have you or your readers seen a statement of mine that mind is distinct from matter or organized form. Again I repeat, they are correlates; neither can exist for one moment without the other. If you again charge me with separating them as independent of each other, I shall charge you with a very "obtuse" mind or a very obstinate purpose of misrepresenting me, with a view to befogging your readers that they may not perceive what I am "really driving at."

I would be glad to see your definition of "a mental and physical organization." If it is an organization without mind or mentality it is a singular anomaly.

I see you dodge the question embraced in your own statement, not mine, that all the mind that ever existed is the product of a mental and physical organization, and by your manner of disposing of it I infer that you consider the other position the preferable one—namely, that it is not the result of a mental and physical organization. It is or it is not—which will you have it? If it is, then there has been no time when mind did not exist. You say, by a mental and physical organization you do not mean an organization composed of mind, but an organization adapted to the production of thoughts or mental phenomena. As you adopt Webster as authority on the word function, would it not be well—being consistent—to adopt him as authority on the word product? A product is something, not nothing. Thoughts and mental phenomena can only be produced from thoughts and mental phenomena. If it were possible to produce them from anything else than thoughts planted in the will, then it is possible to gather grapes from thorns, and figs from thistles, and potatoes from pumpkin-seeds, and cats and dogs from the human spermatozoa. A mental and physical organism is essential to the propagation of the same. No mental and physical structure was ever propagated that was not preceded by a mental and physical structure. No thought was ever propagated that was not preceded by a thought generated in an organism composed of form and function, matter and mind. No potato, grape or apple ever existed that was not preceded by a potato, grape or apple! No human structure ever existed on the face of this earth, or any other, that was not the reproduction of the same arrangement of mental function related to its coordinate, the physical structure. The incarnation of the Lord is a representative instance of the law to which I refer.

Before I had heard the name of Darwin, the law of evolution was as familiar to me as my own name. By the same process of mental activity enabling me to reach the discovery of the law, my mind made the discovery of its coordinate, involution. In fact, the two concepts were born from my will (the seat of philosophy) into my intellect (the seat of science) at the same instant. All thoughts are born to me thus in pairs, male and female, the product of the garden of Eden.

It is very natural to suppose that if you and your readers have only reached in your explorations the discovery of one portion of a great principle, it will be difficult to comprehend these higher elements of thought. I trust you will be patient and persevering, however, and I will try my best to make the great truths, to which my mind is resurrected, clear to your perceptions. When you and the readers of your paper, those who are biased in your favor, can so enlarge the mind as to embrace the two principles which forever operate in unison—namely, involution and evolution—you never will be guilty of the glaring contradictions and inconsistencies in the use of terms that now characterize the statements and writings of your advanced thinkers. That you may not doubt to what I refer, I will give you an instance: Man, according to Mr. Darwin, is the product, in his rise through the kingdoms below him by evolution, of a descent up from the lower to the higher forms by ascending down through the ages. He has descended up through the various conditions, stages, changes, and forms of matter down to the present condition and time. He has descended up in his ascent down, till he is able to exclaim, like the philosopher he is, "As to what life really is our ignorance is dense," and then he assumes to argue the questions of life!

If you employ the term protoplasm for its true value—first-formed, which means, according to your authority, Webster, first-created, you are again subject to the charge of contradiction. For you deny the fact of there ever having been anything created. Your use, therefore, of the words protos and plastos—first and created—is not in consonance with your doctrine. You deny the fact stated by the word protoplasm. Again, you are inconsistent in the use of the word as employed by "scientists," because something existed, according to your own statement, before the thing you falsely call protoplasm. If you take the position that protoplasm (the scientific kind) was not the first stage of animal existence in a timic aspect, but only first as to quality—by which I mean highest—then I can readily perceive how and why you cherish Darwin's thought, "the descent of man" from the high type of existence, the jelly-fish, through the line of descent up through the lower stages of existence—namely, through toads, baboons, etc., till we come to that lowest of all products, the singular non-entity, the modern Infidel and Materialistic mind, which I consider more gelatinous than the jelly-fish itself.

The processes of creation or formation are to be viewed in a double aspect—as successive and simultaneous. The lowest forms or types of vegetable and animal life, exist now, as they did millions of ages ago, and as but a comparatively limited portion of the earth's surface has been explored by the modern investigator, you do not know but future explorations in those regions which have thus far eluded the enterprise of the physical explorer will reveal higher types of existence than any you are yet acquainted with as having existed on the earth as many millions of ages ago as you can now trace the lowest forms to. Again, the process of development is to be viewed in a double aspect in another relation. Evolution in its simplest phase provides for a physical development from a low to a high type of being. In other words, it provides for the rise of man. Involution in its simplest aspect provides for the fall of man—his descent. These two operations—the descent and ascent, or fall and rise of man—are both successive and simultaneous, and are both facts, according to the showing of nature. They are facts also according to the teachings of the Bible.

As it seems to be so difficult for you and those interested in the discussion to comprehend me, before entering into the deep and difficult problems to which it is my purpose to introduce your thoughts, it may be well for me to state a few of the thoughts embraced in our proposition. I deny the conclusions of so-called scientists. They are false. The physical universe has one spacie centre which is the focalization of millions of qualitative conditions at the same focal point in space, these qualities being the convergences of force from as many circumferences. Chemistry, as taught, is false. Astronomy, as taught, is false. Evolution, as taught, is false.

Not only is the physical universe composed of an absolute, and only one absolute, focal point in space, and an expanse and circumference to correspond, but the mental and spiritual or functional universe in its structure is the correspondent of the physical, and has its focal point or center, which is the central functional potency of all existence and being—the origin and source from which perpetually proceeds the life of all function and all form. This centre is both the source of all outflow and the receptacle of all inflow. As a beginning or source, it is constant and eternal, and as a receptacle or ending, it is just as constant and eternal. As a cause, it is the first or highest (interior); as an effect, it is the first (highest) interior, the complete or final effect, hence first effect. Ultimate or final effect is identical and one with absolute cause.

The highest—most interior—of mental, spiritual or soul life is both the origin and product of all activity, whether mental or physical. The law of mutation leads to this and no other conclusion, and the mind that will not perceive it is still in a state of stupor. Jesus reached this final and ultimate condition, and became the Universal Will, Jehovah or Lord. He did this through the law of mutation, completion or fulfilling (filling full) all law, thus being the beginning and the ending. Others before him at regular and stated intervals have reached the same state and, like Jesus, become one with this central power, and in regular and stated succession men will arise to this supreme condition, and adopt or become the everlasting Father, the Lord God and Creator. The above thoughts are a few of the ideas embraced in the proposition. They are not assumptions, but positive knowledges, and will be proved in the progress of the discussion only now begun. You may not be able to see how these things can be, and you may still fail to see what I am "driving at," but the statements are clear. As I have before stated, I shall show that there is a system of true science, and that it is in perfect agreement with the teachings of the Bible; and when Atheism is defeated, the name SAVIOR (Jesus) will be seen exalted above every name, even though earth and hell conspire to bring it down and degrade it.

As stars and the sun (in which is the central astral point or focus of the physical Universe) are related to one another through all the laws and forces that govern their relations, so are all minds in a corresponding manner related through soul, spirit and mental laws and forces to one another, and all mind focalizes in a universal focus or central will, not outside and independent of a physical and mental organism, but within humanity.

The laws of the emanation, reflection and refraction of light and heat and electric force in the physical creation correspond to the emanations of mental light and heat, their reflections and refractions in the mental creation. Mind is not matter, but it is substance, your assertion to the contrary notwithstanding. The word matter is a name, and applied to substance in one condition. The word mind is a name, and applied to substance in another condition. In my next I shall adduce argument.

Yours as ever, C. ROMULUS R. TEED.

"Is Christianity Declining?"

BY MRS. ELMINA D. SLENKER.

FRIEND D—: I received the paper thee sent containing the marked article headed "Is Christianity Declining?" and presume thee thinks its statements perfectly irrefutable. They do look so from the standpoint of the writer, who says:

"Why did not this moribund faith die with Jesus? . . . There always has been and always will be in man a desire for outside help. That help it does get from Christ, and does not from free religion. The Christian Church, from being in its worst estate, is in its best. There were more sincere Christian worshipers last Sunday than ever before in the history of the world. . . . To go no farther back than the beginning of this century, the first substitute for Christianity was Infidelity of the Tom Paine school, now confined to a knot of illiterate people in Boston, with a struggling newspaper, and a bankrupt Paine Memorial Hall, and a few similar coteries in Northern New England and the Lake States. Then came the Fourierite Brook Farm experiment, whose surviving upholders are now either Roman Catholics or indifferents. Charles A. Dana, for example, began life there as a sentimental lecturer on friendship; he ends it as the Nemesis of the American press. Transcendentalism was no more successful; its results were purely literary, and Bronson Alcott's conversations and Emerson's lectures never demolished a single church or created a single theistic society. Then Parkerism was to destroy Christianity; its remaining adherents in Boston have been unable to hire a minister most of the time during recent years. Finally, the Free Religious Association, once so hopeful, confines its attention to the hearing of a few annual papers, and the publication of a report of proceedings."

And all this might be true to the letter, but is it true to the spirit? There may be more people now than ever before who attend your churches, and who think and call themselves Christian; but remember, friend D—, that the Christianity of to-day is not the old-time belief our fathers held; it is an evolution, an innovation, and an outgrowth; it is Parkerism, Frothinghamism, Beecherism and transcendentalism figuring under the old names, forms and ceremonies, just as it once figured under those of the mythological beliefs of the pagans in its first young days, when being built up out of them; just as it is now grafting into its rubber-like substance the Infidelity of Paine, Voltaire, Hicks, Campbell, and other reformers of a later age. Christianity is daily growing more and more deistical and prayerless. It now believes in no real, personal God who hears and answers prayer, nor in a heaven with pearly gates, where endless ages are spent in singing praises to a fetish who feeds his choir on milk and honey. Hell and its horned, tailed and hooved devil disappeared long ago. And as far as enlightened Christianity is concerned, what is it but the Universalism and Free religion which our author seems to think is played out? The churches keep up the old names, forms and ceremonies as a sort of pageant or show, which seems to bind them into a body or community. Nearly all your preachers preach Christianity, not because they think it useful for the masses, just as Beecher preached temperance with the outward man while he drank wine for the inner man! As to there being in man always "a desire for outside help," that is as he is reared. If a child always depends upon his parents, will he ever be a true man, possessing stamina, strength and power? No, sir; he will be like a woman who wears stays and depends upon them till her body is unable to sustain itself without them, and if she leaves them off she feels as if she would "drop to pieces." Just so the dependers upon Christ for "outside help" feels when you take away his prop; for, imaginary as it is, it serves a purpose, though a worse than useless one, to him who would be an independent, self-sustaining, self-reliant individual. As to Christianity not dying with Christ, it is no wonder at all; for it was not born with him! That which it contains of good was eternal with all the past of humanity. Its best maxims are older than the oldest writings now extant, and will live when Christ shall have been so long forgotten that scarcely even an encyclopædia will mention his name.

The Bible lives not because it is divine, but because it has been made lawful to believe in it, swear upon it, and pretend to found laws upon it. Homer, Shakspeare, Arabian Nights, and Robinson Crusoe live because they contain intrinsic merits of their own that appeal to us all, because there is that in them that touches a chord in all hearts, so that they need no external aid to keep them in existence. But stop talking, writing and preaching about the Bible, stop urging and forcing it upon people, and in a few generations it would be an unknown work to the masses. There is nothing in it attractive or enticing save its curiosity as a collection of ancient writings showing the condition of society in the far-back past, and it is not even reliable in that light, for it has been so often mutilated, changed and fixed up, that the original is entirely lost in the suffixes and supplements.

To the "knot of illiterate people in Boston," etc., the world owes more than it realizes. The truths that have been written, printed and circulated by them and their coadjutors are making themselves felt in every household in the country. They have not the powerful machinery of the Church to work with, nor do they make vain promises to their constituents of an eternity of perfect bliss as a reward for believing their say-so, or, still worse, threaten them with an eternal, infernal damnation. But they speak plain, every-day fact and common sense, which, though not dressed in art and trickery, and made gaudy and attractive, is real and practical, and the only safe and sure doctrine. Novels and fairy tales, ghost-stories and narrations of unnatural monstrosities have always obtained more readers than simple unvarnished statements of actualities. But the wise and cultured mind prefers plain, substantial diet to a feast of condiments which, palatable though they may be, always produce indigestion and disease.

The pioneers are ever few in number, but they pave the way, and by the time the truths they utter are accepted they find themselves, like our dead heroes, Paine, Voltaire, and Parker, in the van; while others, born in a later day, become in turn pioneers of newer and more progressive truths. Is it, then, to be expected that this vanguard shall be equal in numbers to the great army that is following it? There are always more pupils than teachers. But the intelligence of the teacher exceeds that of a roomful of pupils. You may have numbers, but Freethought has the majority so far as brain-power is concerned. It has always had it and always will. Protestants have it in excess of Catholics, and it slowly but surely follows all evolutionists and progressives, in the church or out of it. Take, for instance, the Hard-shell Baptists, who cling more closely to the literal word of the Bible than any other sect and still practice the apostolic custom of foot-washing. They have a pride and glory in not even knowing how to read, quoting Bible passages from memory and hearsay, and making the most ridiculous mistakes you ever heard of. Determined to be ignorant of all save "Christ and him crucified," they are the very embodiment of "pure piety." The more ignorance, the more religion—as any one who has lived among negroes and drunkards can testify. Therefore I say, better is one "struggling newspaper" filled with gems of truth than whole libraries of false, delusive, degrading, debasing literature, bound up in morocco and gold, and backed by mints of money.

"The time has come to stand erect
In noble, manly self-respect;
To see the bright sun overhead,
To feel the ground beneath our tread,
Unruled by priests, uncured by creeds,
Our manhood proving by our deeds."

Sacred Paintings in Place of the Bible.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am about to try the experiment of introducing a sacred picture into our public schools as a substitute for the Bible, which of late is becoming a bone of contention.

The State claims the right to educate the child, and holds it to be a duty to see that it has a certain amount of moral instruction.

The Holy Bible having become of late rather unpopular on account of your unmerciful attack upon its divinity, I am induced to ask if you will coöperate with me, or if not, that you will not oppose me in this my great effort at reform. I have selected from God's many sacred subjects, as a model for my sacred painting, "God's two She-Bears," as being best calculated to prove to tender minds the unparalleled mercy and love of their Creator. I have painted a white spot on top of the good man's head so that it will be easy to tell which is the good man and which are the bears. The benign countenances of forty-two mothers shed a ray of light through the bloody atmosphere as they select such pieces of their little ones as they think they are entitled to, and as they return thanks for God's blessings, they seem to realize that "God's ways are mysterious and past finding out."

My next sacred picture will be of three hundred foxes meekly backing up to have their tails tied to a fire-brand. But the grandest and most sublime of all my paintings is the great hopper which contains nine-tenths of the human race and conducts down its spout a steady stream of living souls into an endless hell. This painting is so real that you can fairly smell the brimstone as its smoke ascends through the hole. Also, just at one side, there is an elevator which makes tri-weekly trips to heaven, loaded mostly with souls of Russian soldiers who have been killed in trying to establish Christianity in a heathen land.

If we can only get men to see God's works in their true light, we shall have no farther use for the Bible in our schools.

THE WIDE AWAKE MAGAZINE.—The Christmas number for January, 1878, edited by Miss Ella Farnham, is a high toned finely illustrated monthly journal of ninety pages of excellent reading matter for the young folks. We should like it better if the gifted editor would devote a portion of the columns to interesting articles pertaining to natural history, science and philosophy. Children love to learn when the instruction is entertaining and not compulsory.—Price $2.00 per year, or 20 cents per copy.

Principles and Personalities.

While we were quietly and honestly pursuing our legitimate business and exercising only the rights guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States to every citizen of the country, we were, more than six weeks ago, arrested upon an offensive charge and our property forcibly seized, with the threat that if we did not surrender it our entire goods, type, etc., would be seized and perhaps taken from our premises. We were forced before a U. S. Commissioner and held to appear for an examination, and if we could not have found a friend owning property in the city who was willing to go upon our bail bond we would have been thrown into prison and have laid there till this time. On the same day as well as on the following day it appeared in our city papers that D. M. Bennett had been arrested for sending obscene matter through the mails; that he was an avowed free lover; that he was the publisher of a vile sheet, and had been sending out matter too indecent to be repeated or named. Dispatches of the same tenor were sent to every city and village in the United States where telegraphic dispatches are received and the same appeared in hundreds of papers in various parts of the country.

Having violated no law, having published nothing obscene, having dealt in nothing indecent, and sent nothing of the kind through the mails, we very naturally felt aggrieved and that we had been very harshly and unjustly treated. Few men would wish to be arrested on such a charge and few would like to have their reputation thus blackened in all parts of the country. Few men would wish to be thus interrupted in the exercise of their Constitutional rights with the evident intent of crushing them and destroying their business.

It is perhaps not strange that we should resent such treatment; that we, who had all our life been loyal to our government and law-abiding in our conduct, should think we had been wrongfully used and that we should turn somewhat upon the person who had thus misused us. When we learned that he had boasted of sending nearly two hundred and fifty persons to prison for terms varying from six months to ten years; when we have seen our own friends stricken down and deprived of their liberty and their property when, in our honest opinion, they had committed no crime worthy of punishment; when we have seen that the U. S. court in this district has made very summary work of the cases brought before it by the party who arrested us; that nearly all have been convicted upon his individual evidence, and that juries have been instructed to find the accused guilty upon the evidence of one man only and no counter-testimony has been allowed; when the prosecutor has boasted that nearly all the cases that he brought before the court aforesaid resulted in convictions, it is not strange, we say, that we realized the peril we stood in; that we have spoken words of criticism, and that we have used some personal remarks in reference to those whom we could only regard as enemies.

But as much as we feel that we have been wronged; as much as we apprehend the injury that has been intended us, we do not wish to descend to a warfare of personalities. We prefer to deal with principles and to discuss the Constitutional rights of American citizens. The only object we should have in giving to the public the acts of any individual connected with this business is to show the character of some of the laws which have been enrolled upon our statute books and the means employed in their execution. This we feel we have a perfect right to do. We do not want to do a wrong to the worst enemy we have in the world, but simply feel it to be our duty to state such facts as ought to be known. But an article from the pen of another appeared in our last issue containing statements of a personal character, and some of them not immediately connected with the subject of the objectionable laws, the publication of which was ill-advised and which is regretted. We shall hereafter take time to investigate and inform ourselves of the correctness of statements made before admitting them into our columns. We certainly wish to wrong no person and to state nothing that is untrue. We prefer, as remarked, to deal with principles rather than individuals and to refer to individuals only as is necessary to give a clear view of the subject under discussion.

We feel confident that it was the design of the framers of our Constitution that no person should be oppressed on account of his religious opinions or for the want of religious opinions. We believe that many enactments have passed both houses of Congress and received the signature of the President that were hastily acted upon and not sufficiently considered. Some of these laws have been contrary to the spirit of the Constitution and oppressive upon the rights of individuals. Of this character were the sections passed in Congress four years ago and known as the Comstock laws. They are too sweeping, and do not define the crimes for which citizens were to be, and have been, severely punished. The terms "obscenity," "indecent," "immorality," are too vague and too varying in their interpretation to consign people to prison for ten years and to subject them to fines of $5,000 for offenses committed in their name as has been done. If there are crimes punishable by such severe sentences, they should have been accurately defined, that all persons could have understood them the same as with murder, homicide, manslaughter, arson, larceny, etc.

As ill advised as the passage of those statutes was, a still greater mistake was made in intrusting their execution to a single individual, and one who has proved himself wholly unfitted for such an important charge. He has been appointed to, or has assumed, the office of a censor of the U. S. mails, of the public press, of scientific works, of medical authorities, of medicinal preparations, of works of art, of surgical instruments, and various manufactured articles too numerous to mention.

It is to be regretted that the liberties, the property, and the very lives of the citizens of this country should be turned over to the tender mercies of an individual who evinces a morbid delight in sending to prison people whom he regards as not quite orthodox in religion, medicine and morals, and who often boasts of the numbers of his victims and the ease with which he has incarcerated them.

It can hardly be supposed that the intelligent Senators and Representatives really meant to make it so easy to throw friendless persons into prison for offenses they never would have thought of committing had they not been induced to do so by the very party who, as a spy and informer, laid plots to beguile them, and then, upon his own unsupported testimony, consigned them to a terrible prison for years.

It is a fearful thing for a man to be deprived of his liberty, and to be immured in a loathsome prison, where he can scarcely see the face of the sun for months; where vermin of all kinds crawl over him, and the food that is given him is repulsive in his sight. Liberty is the dearest right we possess, and it is terrible to be despoiled of it, especially upon unjust and insufficient grounds. It is very wrong to place it within the power of a single individual to send two hundred and fifty persons to prison on his unsupported testimony, and many of them without a chance to introduce rebutting evidence. That this has been done can be abundantly shown.

It is not our wish to be the champion of those who have been guilty of dealing in lewd and vile publications, nor would we depreciate the good that has been done in that quarter, but we would cheerfully say a word in defense of those who, under the name of obscenity, have been unjustly and cruelly deprived of their liberty and their rights, their happiness and their health, upon grounds far inadequate to the punishment, and in cases that have come to our knowledge, where no violation of the law had taken place at all. Should Congress see fit to appoint a committee of examination to enquire into what has been done in this line of prosecutions and persecution, a statement of facts can be disclosed, which, in point of cruelty and injustice, cannot be equaled since the palmiest days of the Spanish Inquisition, when the truth can be demonstrated that within the last four years we have had an American Inquisition here in our very midst, that lacked only the instruments of torture and death to make it equal in horror to its prototype of a very few hundred years ago.

We will, repeat, however, that, in opposing these aggravated wrongs, it is not our purpose to injure any one, and we shall refer to individual cases only when it is necessary to illustrate a principle. Equal justice to all should be the governing rule with the entire American people.

The Main Question.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE LIBERALS OF THE UNITED STATES:

The question that has been raised by my arrest for mailing "obscene and immoral" pamphlets has taken a shape in which every citizen, and especially every Liberal citizen, is deeply interested. It affects you and your posterity as much or more than it does myself. Shall we ask for the repeal or modification of the Comstock legislation of 1873, or shall we merely tinker it and ask for the dismissal of the old Inquisitor? In other words, shall the people of the United States stand by their rights under the Constitution, or shall we be frightened by Comstock and the bugbear of respectability into a surrender of them to the Christian Inquisition? These are matters for you to act upon, and I beg to submit them to you in all frankness.

These questions presented themselves to me upon reading the five-column editorial in the Index of the 20th inst.—the well-known Liberal and Free-Religious weekly of Boston—dissuading its readers from signing the Petition for the repeal or material modification of the inquisitorial laws alluded to. The Index article is too long to reprint in these columns, otherwise I would cheerfully lay it before my readers. The reasons given for its, to me, astonishing course are about these:

1. If we go for the Petition, as it is, respectable people may think that Liberalism and obscenity are one and the same thing.

2. That without these laws and inquisitions, children, especially school children, cannot be protected from obscene literature.

3. That efforts to repeal these laws will make Mr. Heywood and myself appear as champions of obscenity and really guilty of the offenses charged; and therefore damage our defenses, which must consist in showing that we are not included in the laws as "justly interpreted."

Now, it appears to me that the Index has "caught at the tap and lost the bung" in its lengthy consideration of this matter. The views it presents are certainly very fine and ingenious, but they may easily be disposed of when the public mind is made up upon the main question, which is the very substance of the Petition—viz.: Is THIS INQUISITION AUTHORIZED BY THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES? That it was a usurpation from beginning to end, and fraught with ever-increasing danger and evil to the people, has become my settled opinion.

I did not, however, send out that petition upon my individual judgment only. It was submitted to judicious and intelligent Liberal friends and able lawyers, Liberal and otherwise, so as to be sure that I was not asking others to stand upon unsafe ground. There was but one opinion among those consulted, and that was that the simple authority of Congress "To establish post-offices and post roads," and which are the only words referring to the post-office at all, could not by any possibility authorize these laws discriminating against the moral character of otherwise mailable matter, and certainly not in the teeth of the provisions securing freedom of conscience, of the press, of speech, referred to in the Petition itself. This sweeps away the ground taken by the Index, at once.

The Index does not pretend to controvert the position of the Petition on this question; it seems to grant it, and then, with singular inconsistency, asks us to sustain these laws, as though an unconstitutional law could be of any validity or use whatever! Nothing short of the Supreme Court of the United States will ever satisfy me that such laws as these were ever contemplated by those who framed and ratified the Constitution. But the objections of the Index seem to me to be less serious than it supposes.

1. The Index thinks that if we petition for the repeal of these laws, it will be taken for granted that we are champions of real obscenity and all its evils. THE TRUTH SEEKER at the outset guarded against this misapprehension. It has gone beyond the Index in protesting that this is not so. Take, for instance, the following from an editorial in these columns in the issue of the 8th inst.:

"It must not be denied that Comstock has done much good in suppressing a villainous trade in lewd and indecent prints and publications that never should be allowed to circulate, but he has done it in such an underhanded and ignoble way that it has detracted greatly from the good work sought to be accomplished; and, from a spirit of sectarian bigotry and intolerance, he has subjected many excellent men to his cruel legal tortures, depriving them of property, liberty and, in some instances, almost of their lives.

"In the work of capturing illegal and immoral books and pictures he has greatly detracted from the commendability of his conduct by gloating over his foul trophies, exhibiting them in the meetings of his society, keeping them on exhibition in his office, inviting his personal friends to call and look them over, and in filling his carpet-bag with the choicest ones—or, rather, the most abominable ones—and parading them before Members of the Legislature at Albany and Representatives and Senators at Washington, when he wished to carry out his purposes. These are his stock in trade, and on these he relies for his moral suasion and intellectual influence.

In this last paragraph was described the very "trap" into which The Index and many very worthy people have fallen. In order to avoid the "trap" of being supposed or represented as champions of obscenity, it has fallen into the trap of sustaining his inquisition and its laws. The true way is to keep clear of both traps by a sincere and manly opposition to both the obscenity and the inquisition. This is the only honest and judicious course for us to pursue, for however we may try to trim and sacrifice to meet the demands of the respectability of our opponents, it lies in the nature of things that we shall never succeed. The creeds are absolute and they judge of morality accordingly. Liberals are progressive. They see morality in a change for the better. The orthodox see it only in blind adherence to the past. We look at things from a different standpoint and purpose from them and will fail in our duty if we acquiesce in their judgment and standard of respectability. The Index is bending in the wrong direction.

The soul of Liberalism is reform. The attempt to play at Liberalism as a dilettante, intellectual exercise deceives no one. There is nothing but cruelty in breaking up the old creeds unless it be to clear the way for reformers who are the great body in the Liberal army. There is little use in falling out with the premises of our opponents if we accept their conclusions. The Reformers are our true friends. They may make wild work sometimes but their motives and their efforts are a guarantee that they cannot be promoters of real obscenity. They are rather its true opponents. They never deal in lewd literature and are never the people who seek to debauch the young for money. The Index may trust the public to know this though it may not at first approve of the Reformers' morality.

2. But are not these laws needed to protect children and schools against obscene literature? Can it be done otherwise? I think it can. Let us exhaust the power of the home government and of the States before we try to force this extraordinary jurisdiction upon the general government. The matter really seems very simple. At common law the child is under the control and keeping of its parents, teachers and guardians. When any danger is suspected or by way of precaution, let the second class or printed mail matter directed to children be delivered and the teachers or parents only. A list of the children's names left at the post-office is all that would be necessary. The matter could then be passed upon by the proper and lawful judges of the children's morality and welfare. The interception of all objectionable literature in this way would soon stop the business from want of profit to sustain it. At the same time it would afford the parent or guardian an opportunity to instruct his child or ward as to his true relations to the subject involved, social and moral.

The newspaper press could greatly assist in calling attention of those in charge of youth to this matter; and a little of that vigilance which is the price of purity as well as of liberty would undoubtedly be all that is really necessary. THE TRUTH SEEKER can assuredly be counted upon as one paper which would cheerfully lend its aid to this good work; and I would feel that I was thus doing far more effective good towards the rising generation than by upholding a set of unconstitutional laws which positively subvert the grand Charter of American liberties.

Let me urge that a little attention to this course is all that is necessary to protect youth and children from the wiles of those who would disseminate vile matter through the mail, but it is quite unnecessary to fall into "the trap" of supposing that this evil is really as great as Comstock, for his purposes, has represented. The Index quotes terrible statements from him, but wisely declines to "vouch for him as a witness," which it ought to have done, or have saved us from the terrors of the quotation. The talk of "tons of matter" is doubtless very useful to frighten young Christians, but ought not to have terrified the Index. There has never been anything in this "school business" that a few newspapers and schoolmasters could not have put an end to at any time the effort had been made. From experience as a physician and druggist, and after enquiry in this city, which has been the main source of supply, I think I can safely say that the magnitude of the evil under consideration has been grossly exaggerated. There is certainly no necessity for magnifying and distorting the evil, in order to make an excuse for sacrificing individual liberty so dear to every American citizen for the sake of counteracting it. Pray leave this work to Comstock!

But the Index proposes to amend these laws so as to remove the objectionable features. This I incline to think cannot be done. It proposes to define obscene publications as those "designed expressly to demoralize, pollute and corrupt by ministering to lewd passions for the sake of profit to the publishers." This is worse by far than the law as it is. Comstock would be able to "drive a coach and four" through such a law at any time and judge and jury would make what they chose out of it. The law as it is defines "obscene" to be "indecent," by saying "or other indecent publications," etc. This is as fair a definition as can be had on a subject that cannot be defined at all, and therefore should not be legislated upon. Under the Index amendment the spy or prosecutor would find that everything was published "for profit;" that anything he happened to think tended to demoralize, pollute and corrupt by ministering to lewd passions" was of course designed to do so.

No, friends, we must not leave our liberties to become a matter of taste and fanciful definition on the part of United States officials. We must claim our birthright of freedom under the Constitution itself, or we shall seek it hereafter in vain, though in sorrow and tears. The liberties of the whole people need not be sacrificed or endangered because a few parents or school teachers have failed to do their duty.

It is not enough to remove Comstock. We must sweep the ground from under his feet. We must kill, not scotch, the snake; for if kept alive at all it will be used to bite and repress with its venom the Liberal and Reform element among us.

Finally the Index seems to be anxious for our defense if we venture to petition for the repeal of those obnoxious laws. Here again it is mistaken. Our strength has been first, of course, in our real innocence; but secondly in the uprising and contributions of the Liberal people in all parts of the country against those laws. I feel convinced that they will not be satisfied if the effort in that direction is abandoned now. The responses that have come in from every quarter give an unmistakable interpretation of the state of feeling with the Liberal public upon this subject.

No one acquainted with the Editor of the Index can doubt his respectability, nor of his devotion to that commendable quality but valuable as that is, it is quite possible to purchase it at too dear a price. We cannot afford to sacrifice our liberties and personal rights to obtain it. I would emphatically place liberty and purity first and let respectability follow after.

In the language of the Petition, "all attempts of the Government, whether State or national, to enforce or to favor particular religious, social, moral, or medical opinions or schools of thought or practice, are not only unconstitutional but ill-advised, contrary to the spirit and progress of our age and almost certain in the end to defeat any beneficial objects intended. Mental, moral and physical health and safety are better secured and preserved by virtue resting upon liberty and knowledge, than upon ignorance enforced by governmental supervision. Even error may be safely left free when truth is left free to combat it. The greatest danger to a Republic is the insidious repression of the liberties of "the people."

If the editor of the Index does not like the petition that is being circulated and signed by thousands and is disposed to get up a better one, it is certainly to be hoped he will do so at an early day. The right of petition is a harmless right, and there can be no possible wrong in having two or three forms of petitions for a worthy object in circulation, and then persons can select the one they like best, or sign all, as they prefer. If he will get up such a petition I will almost promise in advance to not only sign it myself, but to advise others to sign it also.

For myself, personally, and the present status of my case, I do not believe that the District Attorney will change his already expressed opinion that the matters complained of are not prohibited by the law; but I regard myself very fortunate in having my case practically tried before this officer. The next Liberal arrested may not be so fortunate, and an unconstitutional law should not be left standing because one innocent man may for once have the good fortune to escape under it. The truth is, however, my case is not yet dismissed, though it was erroneously stated in The Daily Times that such was the fact. The expressed judgment of the District Attorney may be overruled, and I may be made to suffer, however innocent I may be. There is evidently a wish on the part of a number of those whom I cannot denominate friends, and who do not like my outspoken style of treating the subject, and who think I ought at least to be punished for my boldness if I have not been guilty of obscenity, and they may use their influence so that I may be still brought to a summary trial, and in the language of the attaches of the Court, be "sent up for a few years" to teach me humility. In this way it is quite possible I may yet be made to suffer. Whether this is done or not, it will not change my opinion of the necessity of removing unconstitutional and oppressive laws from our statute books. If I can in my humble way do anything to bring about this great result by my labors or my sufferings, I shall feel, as before expressed, that I have not lived in vain; and in no other way do I believe I can serve my Liberal friends and supporters so well. The means committed to me shall be faithfully devoted to this purpose.

With the greatest respect, your sincere and obedient servant,
D. M. BENNETT.

ON account of changes necessary to be made in our composing rooms to make room for more printers, we found it necessary to make changes in our office, and in fact we had to move everything. This kept us in a state of utter confusion for several days, and caused us to get behind with orders for books and with our correspondence. We ask our friends to be lenient with us if their letters and orders are not attended to as promptly as desirable. We have got a good deal behind, and our force is hardly sufficient for what is to be done; but if our friends will be patient we will try and catch up as fast as possible. Those who have to wait too long will please write us and state what they ordered, as some of our letters got lost in the changes that have been made.

Close of the Volume.

This is the last issue of Vol. IV., and with the inauguration of the New Year we will start out with renewed zeal with Volume V., each number containing sixteen pages in the place of eight as heretofore. This change will inevitably add greatly to our expenses, but we hope the value of the paper will be so largely increased that all our present patrons will remain with us, and that many new ones will be induced to join our ranks.

We would again urge it upon our friends to make personal efforts to obtain new subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. There are scores of thousands over the country who ought to be patrons of this journal who are not so many of them scarcely knowing that it has an existence. In publishing a paper of the size this is to become requires an extensive patronage, and unless it has it cannot survive. If those who for the past year have been reading a borrowed TRUTH SEEKER will decide that they will subscribe for themselves, and pay for it, it will help us out very finely. And if every friend will interest himself to the extent of sending us the name of a new subscriber, our success will be secured.

To new subscribers for a year we will add from this date ten numbers of the paper of the present year without additional charge. For $3.50 from new subscribers we will send the enlarged TRUTH SEEKER for a year and a copy of "The Truth Seeker Collection," or the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion," or "Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, Essays, Lectures," etc., as preferred. The volumes contain from 550 to 700 pages each.

For $5.00 from new subscribers we will send the TRUTH SEEKER one year and a copy of the "World's Sages, Thinkers and Reformers" (revised and enlarged edition), or "The Analysis of Religious Belief," by Viscount Almonbury (the London edition sold for $15.00), or the "Great Works of Thomas Paine," in one volume, or "The Champions of the Church" (as soon as issued), according to choice. Those who avail themselves of these offers will obtain large value for their money. The papers and the books will be sent, post-paid, to any part of the United States or Canada.

Those who do not wish to risk a subscription for a whole year can send $1.50 for six months, or 75 cents for three months, and at the expiration of that time we trust they will cheerfully renew.

Let us again request our patrons to promptly renew for the new volume. It is desirable that every one should renew as soon as possible. Remember hereafter, the price is to be $3.00 per year instead of $2.00 as heretofore. Those who have paid for all or part of 1878 will be credited as far as their payment reaches, being two-thirds as far as at former rates. Those who wish to pay for the entire year, and have paid but two dollars, will please remit another dollar.

Those who do not wish to remain patrons of the paper for the ensuing year, are again respectfully requested to inform us of the same by postal card or through their postmaster, but we hope the number who will feel like doing this will be small. Let us all continue together another year, and do all we can to advance the cause of truth and mental liberty.

AMONG the new features of the enlarged TRUTH SEEKER, we have been requested to add a Matrimonial Department. We have about concluded to do so. Matrimony is of prime importance in life, and it is perfectly legitimate to afford facilities for acquaintances being formed and negotiations being made. It will be for the use of patrons of this paper, or any friends they may recommend. Liberals, perhaps, need increased facilities in this direction. They are somewhat sparsely scattered over the country, and have not the same facilities of becoming acquainted with each other as though they were more numerous. Hence the necessity of the department referred to. It will be conducted in good faith and upon high moral grounds, and it is hoped none will attempt to impose upon us or upon our readers in this direction.

Since our last several friends have sent in money for the Defense Fund. Our columns are too crowded to publish them in this paper; but they will be given next week in our enlarged number.

The Index Wet Blanket.

EDITOR OF TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In common with most, if not all your readers, I was pained, although not surprised, at the attitude assumed by The Index on the most vital subject now agitating the Liberals of America, namely, the repeal of those odious and dangerous laws by which any official moral scavenger or theological bigot can subvert the liberties of the citizens, solemnly guaranteed by the Constitution and practically to restrict the freedom of the press.

I say I am not surprised, because a moment's reflection will show why a man who has been educated for the priesthood, and has officiated long in that capacity, is thereby necessarily rendered unfit for a leader in radical and reform movements. However honest he may be in his conviction (which Mr. Abbot undoubtedly is), his ministerial training and associations are such as to render him too conservative to lead a movement that is necessarily revolutionary in its tendency and shocking to the sensibilities of respectable society.

Freethought, when it leads no further than fine speeches in free religious conventions or scholarly articles in the Index, which utterances have become in a measure respectable through the persistence of the Freethinkers of the last generation who bore manfully all the odium and contumely which Mr. Abbot now fears to encounter, is in the eyes of such reformers as Abbot, respectable; but let it take the shape of attacking some of the great social evils, or respectable shams of modern society, or of calling things by their right names, then the cause is not respectable, and must not be "brought between the wind and the nobility."

Mr. Abbot is fearful that freethought shall become in the public mind identified with impurity, and predicts that the efforts now being made by Liberals to secure the repeal of the laws by which so much wrong and injustice is being done, will be interpreted as an endorsement of impurity!

He is in favor, he says, of modifying the law. But this would be only a compromise which would not effect the end proposed only in a measure. We insist on their repeal on principle, because we believe them to be unconstitutional and wrong in principle.

Let the evil of using the mails be as great as claimed, those that are arising and that may arise under such laws are a thousand times greater!

For example, imagine the amount of injustice and wrong that is possible by only one ruling and under these laws, which ruling is already become a precedent, namely, "that if a thing can be used for an improper purpose" (and what cannot be so used?) it may be seized, and its maker, importer, or seller, fined and imprisoned." Under such statutes the rights and liberties of no man are safe.

How long would the founders of the Republic have tolerated interference with their liberties?

That "eternal vigilance" which is the "price of liberty" needs to be awakened. So tame and servile have we been that law has become a kind of fetish to the average American, dignifying any statute purchased from a corrupt legislation by designing men for a sinister purpose, and all will bow to its authority equally as to one passed solely for the public welfare. Even although no other remedy could be found for the suppression of the circulation of obscene literature, we are free to declare that we shall still be in favor of their unconditional repeal; for great as is the evil which they were tacitly designed to suppress, it is the lesser of the evils of many that can and are perpetrated under them.

But there is a remedy, for the evil of impure literature easy of application—within the reach of all—and which will not jeopardize the interests and rights of the citizens.

Parental supervision and State and Municipal law will be found, ample for the correction of the evil, especially the former. Let parents and teachers inspect as they should all mail matter directed to their children and pupils before it is delivered to them, and a quietus will soon be put to the circulation of obscene matter through the mails except as it may be ordered by adults.

Too much liberty is allowed to children and youth in this country. It is one of the crying evils of modern society, and one that makes possible the traffic which the U. S. Government is invoked to stop. The true and most efficacious remedy is in our own hands.

No true Liberal will refuse to sign the petition for the unconditional repeal of these infamous enactments. He will accept a modification of them if nothing better can be had from our representatives in Congress, but satisfied he will not be until all such laws are taken from the statute books of the nation, nor will any such be deterred from so doing by the feeble logic of Mr. Abbot of the Index.

H. B. B.

Shall We Stand by the Constitution?

PLAIN OPINIONS OF A WESTERN LAWYER ON THE LAW AND THE FACTS.

Concerning the power of Congress to punish offenses, the matter stands as follows:—

When the Constitution was proposed for ratification, the States objected strongly, fearing lest their rights might be swallowed up by giving to Congress this power. In the Constitutions of the States were provisions carefully guarding the citizens against the possibility of being tried for offenses by juries not of the vicinage or neighborhood. That of Massachusetts, which I quote, was the same as the others. Part 1. 13th, "In criminal prosecutions the verification of the facts, in the vicinity where they happen, is one of the greatest securities of life, liberty, and property of the citizen." So New Hampshire. Part 1, 17th, "In criminal prosecutions the trial of the facts, in the vicinity where they happen, is so essential to the security of the life, liberty, and estate of the citizen that no crime or offense ought to be tried in any other county than that in which it was committed," 14th, "Where the same severity is exercised against all offenses, the people forget the real distinctions in crimes."

The word "jury" was defined as "twelve men of the vicinage, the peers of the accused."

One should read "Elliott's Debates," to find how far we have departed from the views of our ancestors. In the volume containing the Massachusetts debates, the remarkable speech of Mr. Holmes, depicting the very condition of things now prevailing, is worthy of attention.

The volume of the Virginia debates is especially interesting in this view. Patrick Henry objected to what was called the sweeping clause "giving Congress power to enforce the powers given." He said, "Unless there is some restraining clause, Congress may assume to punish all offenses from petit larceny up to treason." Mr. Randolph said, "It is impossible; for they have not power over any other offenses than treason, piracy, counterfeiting, felony on high seas, and offences against the laws of nations." "To continue their power as any greater would be treason to common language." Mr. Madison said: "It is not a clause giving any more power. The power to enforce powers given by appropriate legislation exists without the sweeping clause, which is superfluous. The power to enforce a given power is no grant of new power."

No man at that day ever dreamed that the Constitution gave Congress power to punish any offenses except those mentioned in the above clauses, yet States held out against ratification, and only ratified finally because they were assured that an amendment would be made. And the amendment was made, viz., Amendment No. 10, and Patrick Henry and all were satisfied, for it was as plain as language could make it. So this is the way the matter finally stands in the Constitution. "Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason" [but not to define it—that is done in the Constitution]. "Congress shall have power to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas and against the laws of nations, to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting," etc., "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." . . . to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district, etc., and forts, dock-yards," etc.

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

Could any one doubt? Is there anything left obscure as to the limitation of the penal powers given? The legal rule, in case of doubt, is to go to the words of the law-makers in their discussions on the subject. Plain as it is, we have still more light.

When, about 1800, the alien and sedition laws were enacted, Jefferson and Madison, who more than all others, were the very informing spirits of the Constitution, left in the Kentucky and Virginia resolutions their opinions. "Those enactments were unconstitutional because Congress had no power to punish seditious language, because Congress had no power to punish any offenses save those enumerated. And they triumphed. The alien and sedition laws were declared null and void for that reason. But to-day we have wandered far from the path. Congress has assumed to punish without stint or distinction, under pretense of enforcing the simple powers granted to it for very specific purposes, and especially under the post-office and revenue laws.

As the criminal statutes of Congress expand, the rights of States and individuals contract. The most insignificant act is made into a high crime or misdemeanor, punished as such. Nay, one Judge Miller has declared it matters not as to intent, and so punished the innocent and ignorant master for the act of his servant; expressing his regret and surprise at the statute, but bowing to the declared will of Congress. It might be "harsh and uncommon," he said, "but so Congress had ordained."

And now Congress has declared and does punish as crimes a thousand various acts, many of them innocent, just and necessary acts, from mixing naphtha and benzine, publishing books or papers, sending packages or letters, charging fees for services, attempting to collect claims, buying or having boxes, barrels, &c., stamped or unstamped, up to high treason.

Annually, as more statutes are made, more are violated; and the silly legislators, striving at perfection through severity, increase the penalties. And will it be credited, that men, especially in the South and West, are daily dragged from their homes and States to vast distances for trial before juries, not of the vicinages, but chosen from other States like Empires in extent, on trivial charges, compelled to defend themselves at their own cost, obliged to pay marshals, witnesses, and other fees; that within ten years thousands of citizens have thus been served, and broken up in mind, body and estate, on charges finally dismissed; and that never is there one penny reimbursed for expenses? It is a little singular that such awful aduses as these can exist for years and but one or two men be found to protest against them! A common farmer has been arrested on some paltry charge, carried hundreds of miles and imprisoned, because among strangers he cannot get bail; or if bailed, compelled to come, term after term, at a cost of hundreds of dollars for his and his witnesses' travelling and other expenses. If happily the case is dismissed, he goes home a ruined man. I have too much knowledge of the sorrows and tears for which these infernal abuses are responsible!

C. I.

The Crimes and Cruelties of Christianity.

There is one case which, as it throws light on the general feeling of Protestants at the time it occurred, deserves special mention.

In Geneva, Michael Servetus, a Spanish physician and a learned and pious man, having been arrested by the instigation of Calvin, was tried, condemned, and executed by the magistrates of Geneva. When going to the small mound where he was to perish by the flames, he exclaimed, "O Jesus, thou son of the eternal God, have mercy on me!" Farrell, the friend and colleague of Calvin, said, "Mend thy last word. If thou wouldst save thyself, call on Jesus the eternal son of God." He refused. When the martyr approached the fatal spot, Farrell said to the crowd, "You see here how mighty is the power of Satan. This wretch who is about to suffer is a very learned man, and perhaps even he may think that what he has done is right. But the devil has him in his coils, having taken entire possession. Take heed that a similar calamity overtake not yourselves." When, in response to the insolent appeal of Farrell, Servetus exclaimed, "My God, my God!" the former asked, "Can't you say something better than that?" to which he replied, "What better than to call on God in my utmost need?" He then asked the spectators to pray for him. For even that he was reproached. He was fastened to a stake by chains and ropes and burnt to death. The fuel being green oak wood, his agonies lasted a full half hour.

Thus perished Servetus, the Spanish physician, the man who first discovered the circulation of the blood, and whom Mosheim says was "one of the most thoughtful and learned men of his day." Soon after his arrest and before his trial, John Calvin wrote to a friend, "I hope he will be sentenced to death." He had privately said if he came to Geneva, he should never go thence alive. During the trial, at a time when it seemed possible that the life of Servetus might be spared, Calvin threatened in that event to leave Geneva and make his home elsewhere. And afterward Calvin wrote, "Am I guilty of crime because our Senate, at my instance, revenged itself of his (Servetus') execrable blasphemies?" Not only was this deed applauded by Calvin but it was generally approved and commended by the Protestants of that day. Mosheim says that while a few condemned, the majority endorsed the execution of Servetus, and applauded as worthy of immortal honor Calvin's zeal for religion. Melancthon even approved the deed. "The Church owes you," he wrote to Calvin, "and will owe you in future times, a debt of gratitude. I affirm that your magistrates acted justly, inasmuch as by judicial sentence they put to death that blasphemous man." And yet Servetus was himself a Christian and a Protestant, and his last words were "Jesus, thou son of the eternal God, take pity on me?" The principal offense with which he was charged was that "contrary to the true foundation of the Christian religion, and detestably blaspheming the Son of God, he said that Jesus Christ was not the son of God from all eternity, but only since his incarnation." (The foregoing details with others are given in Owen's Debatable Land, where authorities are carefully cited.)

Everywhere Protestants believed in persecution. "The right of the civil magistrate to punish heresy was maintained by the Helvetic, Scottish, and Saxon confessions. Luther, in reply to Philip of Hesse, distinctly affirms it; Calvin, Beza, and Jurieu all wrote books on the lawfulness of persecution. Knox, appealing to the Old Testament, declared that those who were guilty of idolatry might justly be put to death. Cranmer and Ridley, along with four other bishops, formed the commission in the reign of Edward VI for trying Anabaptists; and if we may believe Fox, it was only at the long and earnest solicitation of Cranmer that Edward consented to sign the warrant that consigned Joan Bocher to the flames. The only two exceptions to this spirit among the leaders of the Reformation seem to have been Zuinglius and Socinus. The first was always averse to persecution. The second was so distinctly the apostle of toleration that this was long regarded as one of the peculiar doctrines of his sect. With these exceptions, all the leading reformers seem to have advocated persecution, and in nearly every country where the boasted Reformation triumphed, the result is to be mainly attributed to coercion" (Hist. Rat., vol. ii, p. 5).

In Scotland the clergy organized themselves into legislative bodies and enacted laws for the government of the people. Refusal to obey them was punished with severity. Speaking of Scotland in the seventeenth century, Buckle says: "The arbitrary and irresponsible tribunals which now sprung up all over Scotland united the executive authority with the legislative, and exercised both functions at the same time. Declaring that certain acts ought not to be committed, they took the law into their own hands and punished those who had committed them. According to the principles of the new jurisprudence, of which the clergy were the authors, it became a sin for a Scotchman to travel in a Catholic country. It was a sin for any Scotch inn-keeper to admit a Catholic into his inn. It was a sin for any Scotch town to hold a market on Saturday or on Monday, because both days were near Sunday. It was a sin for a Scotch woman to wait at a tavern; it was a sin for her to live alone; it was also a sin for her to live with unmarried sisters. It was a sin to go from one town to another on Sunday, however pressing the business might be. It was a sin to visit your friend on Sunday? it was likewise sinful either to have your garden watered or your beard shaved. Such things were not to be tolerated in a Christian land. No one, on Sunday, should pay attention to his health, or pay attention to his body at all. On that day horse exercise was sinful, so was walking in the field or in the meadows or in the streets, or enjoying the fine weather by sitting at the door of your own house. To go to sleep on Sunday before the duties of the day were over was also sinful and deserved Church censure. Bathing, being pleasant as well as wholesome, was a particularly grievous offense, and no man could be allowed to swim on Sunday" (Hist. of Civilization, vol. ii, p. 310-312).

"The clergy deprived the people of their holidays, their amusements, their shows, their games, and their sports; they repressed every appearance of joy; they forbade all merriment; they stopped all festivities; they choked up every avenue by which pleasure could enter, and they spread over the country a universal gloom. Then truly did darkness sit upon the land. Men, in their daily actions and in their very looks, became troubled, melancholy, and ascetic. Their countenance soured and was downcast. Not only their opinions but their gait, their demeanor and their voice, their general aspect, were influenced by that deadly blight which nipped all that was genial and warm. The way of life fell into the sere and yellow leaf; the tints gradually deepened; its bloom faded and passed off; its freshness and its beauty were gone; joy and love either disappeared or were forced to hide themselves in obscure corners, until at length the fairest and most endearing parts of our nature, being constantly repressed, ceased to bear fruit and seemed to be withered into perpetual sterility. Thus it was that the national character of the Scotch was in the seventeenth century dwarfed and mutilated" (Ibid, p. 314).

"WHAT WAS HE? or Jesus in the sight of the nineteenth century." By William Denton. Considering that there is but very little of what purports to be authentic data in regard to the life of Jesus, and that even much or all of that is looked upon as doubtful by able critics, it seems astonishing that so many different "lives of Christ" can be written. But where the facts are few the field for the play of the imagination is more extensive, and therefore more inviting. Given a few facts,—or what by common consent are called facts—and a lively imagination, and scores of "lives" may be written by writers from different points of view, differing in all but the main points and interesting according to the ability of the writer. But each volume will present the ideas of the writer rather than the facts of the case. All so-called Lives of Christ must of necessity be of this character—fictions founded on facts.

In this little volume of 260 pages, Mr. Denton has carefully arranged all the passages in the Scriptures bearing upon the doings of Jesus, and, after careful comparison, rejected all conflicting statements, leaving a residuum of probable facts, by a careful and exhaustive analysis of which he endeavors to arrive at the truth as to the real character of Jesus. To those who are acquainted with Mr. Denton's writings, it is only necessary to say that this volume is fully equal to any that has preceded it from his pen; and if he has not solved the conundrum, "What was Jesus?" he has come as near a solution as it is possible to come by means of existinn data. It is a book which every inquiring person ought to read. For sale by the author Wellesley, Mass., as well as by ourselves.

NEW YORK, Dec. 24, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I had the pleasure of hearing J. W. Stillman deliver his lecture on the "Unknown God" before the New York Liberal Club. It is an able and very logical, anti-theological lecture. What pleased me most was that part of the lecture in which he shows that there is a real Supreme Being now unconsciously already recognized even in the churches, who will eventually supersede the anthropomorphic God in the popular mind. I wish the lecture could be delivered in every town and city of the United States.

G. L. HENDERSON.

Letters of Sympathy.

CAMPBELL HILL, ILL., Dec. 18, 1877.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: I have read with intense interest what has been printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER respecting your arrest by that myrmidon of the Church, Anthony Comstock, and write simply to express my sincere sympathy in your great calamity. I am not surprised, however, at the result, as I have long looked for something of the kind. Your well-written and fearless utterances have been a thorn in the side of the champion of the Young Men's Christian Assassins.

An old aphorism informs us that "misery loves company," and it may not be without interest to you to know that your correspondent and friend has recently been a victim of religious persecution in a small way. I unfortunately became entangled in a suit at law before a Justice of the Peace, and my adversary, a worthless but pious party, knowing the weakness of his cause, employed an unprincipled attorney to throw out my testimony, together with that of my only important witness, on the grounds of our unbelief in the popular dogmas of the Church. My opponent was permitted, without a word of inquiry or protest, to march up six witnesses to testify in his behalf, while the imbecile who constituted the "court," decided that myself and witness could not be allowed to testify. A verdict of $80.00, with costs against myself, was the result.

Believing that in the event of my being able to testify, the decision would be reversed, I appealed the suit to the Circuit Court. On the case being called, the attorney for the prosecution (the same charlatan who disgraced himself at the preliminary examination), again did all in his power to prevent my being sworn. For nearly an hour my self-constituted inquisitor labored to prove my ineligibility as a witness, but failed, as the Judge (M. C. Crawford) without a moment's hesitation, decided that I should be heard. Although every means, fair and foul, were brought to bear against me, the result of the trial was about equivalent to being decided in my favor.

Still I have been put to considerable expense and great inconvenience through a lawsuit of a year and a half's duration, simply through the insolent and tyrannical ruling of a petty Christian officer of the law. No one denies my being a man of average intelligence and respectability. I served throughout the late war in the Union army, and subsequent to that time I have paid a property-tax regularly, and am not in the habit of wronging any man of his just dues. But here lies the rub: I am a disciple of the doctrines of scientific materialism, and fearlessly denounce the clergy and the Church, which is a crime that society, as at present constituted, will not forgive.

However, the power of the church is rapidly passing away; still the sordid and imprudent men who live by it will doubtless make a fearful fight ere it wholly disappears. Thus it is that you, and I, and Lant, and Foote, and Train, and the Texas doctor, and thousands of other men are constantly feeling the relentless hand of that nineteenth century monstrosity, the Christian Church.

I look for this question to one day become an issue in our politics, when the whole Christian system will doubtless eventually follow its prototype, the institution of American slavery, into a well-merited oblivion.

"There is a weapon surer yet,
And better than the bayonet;
A weapon that comes down as still
As snow-flakes fall upon the sod,
And executes a free man's will
As lightning does the will of God;
A weapon that no bolts nor locks
Can bar; it is the ballot-box!"

Very respectfully, A. O. GENUNG.

—OHIO, Dec. 19, 1877.

FRIEND D. M. BENNETT: I send you this day one hundred petitions. Those signing it are not the off-scourings of earth, but the best, most respectable, and among the most responsible, financially, intellectually, morally and truthfully.

I am pleased to say not more than three or four asked refused to sign the petition, but it is of no material consequence; two out of the four are not responsible, truthfully or financially, for a loaf of bread, yet great sticklers for virtue, morality, and honor (to a popular side); also bitterly opposed to a change or modification of the present statutes for which we are petitioners. One of the sticklers for national honor and national virtue was arrested for seduction and bastardy only a few years ago, and was obliged to give bail for the maintenance of said bastard. "O, consistency, thou art a jewel!"

I have not the least doubt by a little exertion I could have swelled the number of signers to twice the size sent you. But should all the Liberals do one-half as well, it will require a dray with a span of mules to convey the petitions to the Senate and House of Representatives. Confident justice will win, I bid you be of good cheer. **

MEN do not make their homes unhappy because they have genius, but because they have not enough genius. A mind and sentiments of a higher order would render them capable of seeing and feeling all the beauty of domestic ties.—Wordsworth.

"Liberty of the Press."

We take the following from an editorial in the last Evolution, and thank the editor for his kind remarks about ourselves:

"Obscenity and blasphemy are words which are likely to attract much more than their share of expression for some months to come, owing to the intense stupidity or cupidity of a zealous employee of the Young Men Christians. All wise men must concede that nothing could be more stupid, as a matter of policy, than the arrest of such men as Heywood, Bennett, and Rivers in this country, or of Mr. C. Bradlaugh or Mrs. Annie Besant in England. The laws were never intended, by a majority of those who made the laws, to affect such men or their work. Those who guide in Christian circles would be the first to see the unwisdom of any attempt to abridge real freedom of the press. There is no desire to raise an issue of this kind here and now. Anthony Comstock, if he has half the sense of a dog, must know that the course he has taken will make these three first-named gentlemen famous martyrs, and result in flooding the country from end to end with the literature he pretends to condemn. Take our worthy old friend Bennett, for example. Already nearly one thousand dollars have been subscribed and largely paid in to his defense fund. It will likely reach five to ten thousand dollars before his trial comes off. A hard-handed son of toil—a "greasy mechanic"—happened into our office two or three days ago and expressed himself very warmly on the subject. He was a poor man, on reduced wages, others to support and his eager taste for good reading to satisfy. Yet so anxious was he that Mr. Bennett should have the best help in fighting the fire of St. Anthony that he declared he would give ten dollars to have such a man as Col. Ingersoll defend the case. Another man, as poor as the mechanic, immediately subscribed a like amount and the paper is ready for more pledges. In THE TRUTH SEEKER of last week the publisher announces that he will furnish the tracts condemned by the single one or by the thousand.

"All this increase of circulation must have been foreseen by Comstock, and he must have also foreseen that no twelve men are likely ever to convict on those charges. What motive, then, for these outrageous arrests, unless it be to make himself—Comstock—conspicuous and appear to be earning his big salary? Whether it be partisan stupidity or private cupidity which lies at the bottom of these outrages, the duty of every lover of freedom in America is plain. First, to satisfy himself whether either of these men have morally been guilty of obscenity. If either Messrs. Heywood, Bennett or Rivers have been guilty of writing or publishing anything for the purpose of ministering to a beastly looseness, to unrestrained passions, to excite the young prematurely or the mature unduly, or have gone out of their way as public teachers to mislead and deceive, or have prostrated their high office to inflame or corrupt their fellows for the purposes of lust or gain, then let every right and healthy man stand from under. Let them fall so deep that there shall be no resurrection. If, on examination, it appears that these men are earnest, honest men, who have faithfully endeavored, each in his own way, to teach things which all should know, to instruct in science, or to reform society and establish morality on more secure bases, to break down abuses, to uproot delusion and abolish venerable superstitions by way of preparing for a healthier state of things; if we find that these men, so far from being pimps or panders, are genuine reformers, pure-hearted, high-minded, good citizens, whose only mistakes are those of method and style, then let us, if we be men and not sheep, let us rally to their support as if we did not mean to be trifled with, as if we knew our rights, their scope and value, and knowing, dare maintain."

"As to D. M. Bennett, we know him well. We have watched him carefully since he started his little TRUTH SEEKER, in Paris, Ill., to the present date, and so far as the charge in question goes, it is utterly absurd. That Comstock knew he must play a desperate game to convict in this case, is evident by the fact that the day after Bennett's arrest several papers had an account in which Mr. B. was mentioned as a "free-lover." Now, there is perhaps not a man in New York to whom it is less applicable than to Mr. Bennett. Any one who knows how this man has worked day and night, continuously, from one year's end to the other, and lived in the most economical manner, that he might be able to propagate his long-cherished opinions; any one who has conversed often with him and read most of his own writings, as we have, must repel for him this outrageously false charge. Since some thirty-four years ago, when Mr. Bennett was a devout Christian, he has lived entirely devoted to his amiable wife, and true to her in thought and word and deed. He has been too busy fighting the demon of superstition to grapple with social questions like marriage, and there is not a particle of evidence in any of his writings or publications that he has any tendency toward new fangled notions on the marriage question.

"No one who knows Bennett personally, or has read enough of his writings to be imbued with his spirit, can fail to see that the man bears no malice in his heart. He has a disposition as amiable and harmless as a babe. To know that he had given actual pain would distress him greatly. We have gone thus far into the analysis of a unique character to show that he is very far from being the man whom our laws were made to suppress or interfere with. If such genial, warm-hearted, pure-souled men as D. M. Bennett cannot be allowed to run at large and publish their boldest heresies or their broadest, most farcical raileries, it is time to have another revolution in this country and ascertain whether priest or people rule here."

Mr. Wells Attends a Seance and is Not Convinced.

FRIEND BENNETT: I see in your paper of the 13th that you attended a seance given by Mrs. Lord. I also attended one, given by a Dr. Huntoon, in this city. The plan of operation of the doctor was the same as you give of Mrs. Lord. All mediums have some leading feature in their seances. In that of Dr. Huntoon's it was the striking of one hand by the other, as you describe. This is done before the light is put out, to impress you that the medium is busy in striking hands and cannot manipulate musical instruments, fans and other things.

Now, let me describe to you the plain facts as they occurred to me at the third seance held by Dr. Huntoon, with the avowed intention of convincing me of the truth of Spiritualism, hearing that I was an uncompromising skeptic.

Third Seance.—The chairs arranged in a circle by the doctor, a long consideration on his part how to seat each party, finally, I was placed between two ladies, both known to be Spiritualists; the Dr. places his chair in front of mine, so our feet touch; he begins to strike one hand on the other, orders the light put out, at the same time takes his seat. The striking continues; something moves through the air; a fan fans the circle; the fan is placed in the lap of a lady; silence; singing called for to encourage the spirits and make the circle harmonious. Silence called for. The slaps stop; a spirit is heard to speak (so some thought); raps begin; the fan moves briskly, taps people on the head; a hand is felt tapping our knees, our arms, the forehead. Some one expresses their desire of seeing a materialization. The doctor says, "the hand that touches you is materialized." The fan again moves; the ladies declare it delightful to be fanned by spirits; some talk of this evidence of the truth of Spiritualism. Silence. Singing called for. "Home, Sweet Home," sung. Slapping continues all of the time except when a spirit talks. The fiddle, tinkling, now moves through the air—some think it is hitting the wall, others say it is at the farther end of the room; quite an excitement from difference of opinion and rapid movements, the fiddle tinkling loud and rapid. The said skeptic concluded he would be a "meejum;" springs a light, and lo! there sat the medium, Dr. Huntoon, with the fiddle in his right hand, extended outward and upward as far as he could reach, his left hand slightly extended, having hold of something that I could not see distinctly for the want of sufficient light. I looked up to the fiddle in the doctor's hand. Then I looked him straight in the face. His eyes were as big as moons. I looked at his left hand; and this I repeated several times, wondering why the doctor held up so long. The light becoming dim, the doctor laid the fiddle on the floor; light out, the silence of death reigned!

So far as I have examined Spiritualism I have discovered in every case the basest fraud. The clapping of the hands when the seance begins is changed to slaps made by a "stage strap," made of leather, one end fastened to the left shoulder, while the other end is pulled by the left hand, thus leaving the right hand free to work the fiddle, fan and paper trumpet, which the medium whispers through: Could you have seen the ending of this seance, you could no more believe it the work of spirits than to see a person do any act, and then say, "I did not do it; it was the spirits."

After the light went out Dr. Huntoon left the chair, went to his friend Jackson, and talked as if uttering the words of spirits: "If the seance had not been disturbed, two little children would have materialized, hugged and kissed their friends, and then melted away. Before the disturbance of the condition of the circle, a little child was materializing on my lap, for I felt its legs—I am sure of it; I will swear it was so!" Shortly after, while the doctor was talking to his friend, or, rather, expressing the opinions of the spirits, I noticed a movement of his wife on my right hand; I knew it was she by the position she was in before the light was put out, and by a little light through an opening between the slats of the blind made by the flashlight. This confederate, Mrs. Huntoon, took the chair that the doctor had sat in, threw it over the circle, in doing so hit a stovepipe, the chair fell to the floor, making a loud noise. The doctor then calls the attention of the circle to the fact that he did not touch the chair, for his friend was holding his hands; but the moving of the chair was the work of the spirits and our skeptical friend will be convinced. At this point the doctor called for a light. We found his hand held in the hands of his friend Jackson. Mr. Jackson remarked that it was very dangerous to destroy the "conditions" of a seance, as it might throw the medium into spasms from which he might not recover. The joke took well with some, others thought it a very serious thing. Spiritualism, like other religions, requires certain conditions; destroy their conditions, no religion can exist.

The conditions of Spiritualism are all on the side of fraud—or so I have found it after many years of trial. When people learn the difference between ideality and reality, these delusions will cease. Yours, L. T. WELLS.

Wendell Phillips on Finance.

Wendell Phillips has lately written a long letter to Charles McLean, President of the State Central Committee of the Independent Greenback party, on the finance question, in which he says:

It is with great difficulty that the working class defends itself against the inevitable greed and injustice of our own capitalists; but when Europe joins New York to rob labor and increase the heavy burdens of taxation, the joint power becomes almost irresistible. Careless of everything but their own gain and success, they sit easy and content, while thousands starve. Blind and obstinate as Conservatism has always shown itself, they push their heartless policy so far and so remorselessly as to put in danger the supremacy of the law and the safety of capital. We must break this business and money vassalage to London. Founding our currency on the credit of the government, making it of paper and letting it have no value outside our borders, except what the credit of the government gives it, will go far to break the chain, and this form of currency furnished by the government itself, while the National banks are limited to being only banks of discount, with no authority to issue bills, will go far to curb the tyranny of our domestic despot. I need not tell any man our condition. Men fear to paint it in its true colors lest it drive labor mad and crush all hope in the hearts of those who have something still hid in bank vaults, and flatter themselves that better times will some day cure their wounds. But is God dead? Have seed time and harvest failed? Has the hand of man lost its cunning? Does this blight cover the whole world? No! There is a nation which the merciless enemy has just trampled in the dust eating up and carrying off half its garnered wealth. Paper money, government money, low rate of interest, and such an amount of currency as a young and comparatively poor and widespread nation needs—these are our watchwords. I would guard the South from doing wrong. I distrust her leaders. While I live I shall watch her jealously. But if men seek union, these, our watchwords, are the only threefold cord that will bind us together, possibly never to be broken. Our success will be the best guarantee of liberty and union, now and forever.

MR. EDITOR: I presume that I need not tell you that Infidelity and Atheism are looked upon in this most orthodox community as the worst vices which a man could possess. A person who does not believe in the God of the Bible and in Jesus Christ as the Savior of mankind, is looked upon as one who has sold himself to the Devil, and is immediately sentenced to Hell and eternal punishment, yet, if he but believes, never mind how fast his life may be morally, he is awarded a position in the seventh heaven, and honored and supported by all good Christians. And why is this? William Lawrence has said (and these words are good whatever other ideas of his may have been): "Where favorite speculations have been long indulged and much pains have been bestowed upon them, they are viewed with that parental partiality which cannot bear to hear of faults in the object of its attachment. The mere doubt of an impartial observer is offensive, and the discovery of anything like a blemish in the darling is not only ascribed to an entire want of discrimination and judgment, but resented as an injury." That this is true no liberal-minded person can doubt; yet what an unreasonable foundation upon which to base that which is most vital to the human race—that this religion of God and Jesus Christ is true because it has "been long indulged," because much pains have been bestowed upon it, because our fathers believed it, and because our mothers taught it to us in our infancy. Is a thing to be considered good, so good in fact that it must not be doubted, because it has been handed down to us by an ignorant and superstitious people? Was the first age of man, when his mind was governed by Superstition and Fear, when all religious beliefs came into being, the "Golden Age," and have we been declining since Reason, and its result, Truth, have gradually taken the place of Superstition and blind Faith? No! thanks to Nature, we are advancing; every year Reason is gaining sway over men's minds; she is constantly pointing out to us the false and the true because it is true?

Let the Christians claim that Faith is better than Reason, Superstition than Truth; let them heap the curses of God upon our heads for the work we are doing, brother Infidels yet they cannot avert the consequences of Free thought. Infidelity and Atheism will succeed Christianity as sure as the day succeeds the night. C. M. HAMMOND.

Mr. Train Again on the Track.

HE EXPRESSES HIMSELF ON COM-STOCKISM!

HE REPLIES TO MR. HEYWOOD THROUGH THE TRUTH SEEKER.—LANT'S CASE BEFORE OSBORN.—THE HARDY PHILANTHROPIST!—HAUL DOWN COMSTOCK!

MADISON SQUARE, P. E. 48.

CITIZEN D. M. B.: How long my writing mood will last this deponent saith not! My own amusement absorbs my pleasure. Ignoring Fame and Fortune through satiety, I surrender to Psychological affinity. You came to see me, and now I come to see you (on paper). For I am shut off from adult contact by evolution!

A certain stump speech said to have been made by a Tammany Politician, of the Gethsemane Ring—on the Mount of Olives—contains these words:

RESIST NOT EVIL.

Here is where the world stands on its head. Christianity was original. For some years we have been resisting evil. That kept it alive. The Infidels, Atheists, Skeptics, "Obscene Kusses," resist this man Comstock. That adds to his power. He already thinks he is Torquemada! His Spanish Inquisition examines our private mail bags! He will be hanging on a lamp post before you have been six weeks in jail—through Demonology!

Nothing but my Psychology can save him!

Conroy, whom he sent to Trenton for two years, came to see me the other day. You remember he tried to cut Comstock's throat in the cab. Note the scar when you see him in court. That stab gave Comstock $10,000 and a new lease of power. So I say follow that Ring Orator of Jerusalem—RESIST NOT EVIL!

Comstock and Beecher have done more to destroy the army of ghosts than all the Paines, Voltaires, Rousseaus, Fredericks, Humes, Gibbons, Lincolns, Washingtons, Franklins, and Ingersolls of creation. RESIST NOT EVIL!

MOSES AFTER COMSTOCK!

Moses Hull is as mad as a hornet with him. He sends me this in the Crucible:

We are now writing in the United States court room in Boston; the man whose name is at the head of this article sits before us, not ten feet distant. We have for near an hour watched his countenance, his eyes, the particular contraction of the muscles of his face—the shape of his head and his general contour.

He is not a religious fanatic, he is not an ignoramus, he is not a bigot. But if he is not the meanest scoundrel out of prison his countenance as well as his work betrays him.

In our opinion he has but two motives, one is money, the other is fame. Both of these he is getting; but, mark our word, he will yet meet a just retribution for his treatment of reformers.

Mr. Comstock is, by an especial legislative act, the paid agent of the government. His five thousand dollars a year come. Any dog who cares for nothing but his own bone could be tempted to worry a cat for food. This dog feeds at Uncle Sam's table, gets his feed for arresting innocent persons and dragging them to prison. He is probably, to-day, the meanest enemy to reform on earth. We reformers are not backed by United States authority, we write and speak under law, under espionage—truly the road of the one who would sow truth for those who need it, is strewn with thorns. Is it not time for reformers to unite and go into a concentrated war upon such paid, unprincipled braggarts as Anthony Comstock?

M. H.

I say unto you, Moses is wrong. Comstock is an Evil! Remember what that Brewery Captain Rynders said down in Judea!

RESIST NOT EVIL.

THE BOSTON BENNETT AFTER THIS COM-STOCK EVANGEL.

Mr. Heywood writes me:

PRINCETON, Nov. 21, 1877.

DEAR MR. TRAIN: Please read enclosed and send in all the facts you can about Comstock's past and present. We intend to give him a Waterloo defeat in Boston.

Truly yours,

W. H. HEYWOOD.

As I have no time to talk through letters—and your case covers the whole ground—let me answer Heywood through the T. S. As you may publish his letter, I only make an extract to show how wrong he is in RESISTING EVIL!

Neither will I ask why the United States clothes with its great powers a "special agent" to interfere with lawful business, and forge signatures to decoy letters, one of which Mr. Comstock wrote me under the name of "E. Edgewell," the following extract from which I printed in the Word, October, as genuine:

"Press on as you are going and be sure in the end justice will be done you. It is a long lane that has no turn. You have labored hard but many eyes have followed your efforts."

Nor will I dwell on the spirit of the man indicated in this extract from a letter written to Hon. O. L. Merriam, M. C., by Mr. Comstock to induce him to vote for the "law" under which he conspires against the liberty and lives of American citizens:

"There were four publishers on the 2nd of last March; to-day three of these are in their graves and it is charged by their friends that I worried them to death. Be that as it may, I am sure that the world is better off without them."

I will not now multiply facts to show that, masked under Federal law and the sacred forms of religion, we have here inordinate intolerance to which neither pro-slavery savagery, Puritan bigotry nor high-church proscription—nothing this side of Medieval Inquisitions will furnish a parallel.

When Southrons invaded the freedom of the mails to suppress anti-slavery publications, which they called "incendiary literature," the Union rang with denunciations of the outrage. The same spirit of tyranny, which assailed reformers then, now labels exposures of social evil "obscene literature!" Mr. Comstock's attempt to suppress Woodhull and Claflin's Weekly for ventilating clerical "scandal," the disgusting details of which afterwards filled American newspapers; his imprisonment of George Francis Train seven months in Ludlow street Jail, and of John A. Lant eighteen months in Albany Penitentiary for criticisms of reigning sensualism; his infliction of fines and costs amounting to five thousand dollars on Dr. E. B. Foote for publishing physiological facts that all people, young and old should know; and his recent arrest of D. M. Barnett, editor of the N. Y. Truth Seeker for "obscenity and blasphemy" should open all eyes to the relentless war he wages upon honest writers and publishers who favor theological and social reform. Twenty years, before the intelligent eyes and pure minds of New England citizens, have pursued my work unmolested, except by sporadic mobs from the streets which all reformers have to encounter; never before was my ability to use intelligent and chaste language questioned. Now I am gravely arraigned for "obscenity" by a money-seeking exponent of Sectarian Repression who comes from "nest-hiding" Brooklyn!

"CUPID'S JOKES."

A thin partition, so you see, 'twixt Cupid and cupidity. Heywood strikes back as you do. That won't do. RESIST NOT EVIL! This divine young evangel Comstock should be coddled. When you see him in court, carry out the Christian plan: go there and then and fall upon his neck and kiss him! 'Twill make him seasick. Cram his Christian maxims down his throat with kindness. Forgive him, for he knows not what he does. Send his wife a splendid bouquet for Christ's sake! Slop him over with ghostly love. To resist evil is to be lost.

Here is the law's idea about obscenity:

COMMISSIONER OSBORN'S IDEA OF OBSCENITY.

[Reported by T. D. Maitland, reporter of the New York World.]

HOW COMSTOCK ARRESTED THE EDITOR.

Here Mr. Lant interrupted the Commissioner, and asked if he might ask Comstock some questions, and he said he might when Comstock was through.

Comstock went on.—When I showed Mr. Lant the writing he said, "That's mine." He said also that he had intended to scratch it out. He acknowledged having sent the package to Semler. I then turned to the Marshal and said, "That's the man I want," and the Marshal took him over.

Lant—Didn't you say when you came into the office, "I have a package of papers containing writing on the margin, and the fine is $5?"

Comstock—No; I did not.

OSBORN ON HIS JUDICIAL DIGNITY.

An altercation here arose between Lant and Comstock on a question of veracity, which the Commissioner promptly stopped, and asked Lant if he had sent the papers, at the same time telling the prisoner that he did not want him to say anything that would incriminate himself.

Lant—"I don't know that I sent that paper now produced."

The Commissioner then, assuming the airs of a Mogul and a tone that admitted of no contradiction, said:

Now, it is for me to examine this paper. It is for me to determine what are its contents, and what is objectionable in the eyes of the law.

Lant—I should like to have Mr. Comstock point out to me such articles as he considers indecent.

Osborn—If you admit that these papers were deposited in the mail, that is all that is necessary now. Then it is for me (assuming an imperial air) to determine whether or not the matter contained therein is obscene. You don't deny that you are the publisher of the Toledo Sun?

Lant—No, sir; I am proud of it.

Osborn—Well, no matter about that. There is no doubt about this matter.

Lant—I object to the statement of this man (pointing to Comstock). He cannot tell the truth.

THE COMMISSIONER DISGUSTED.

The Commissioner, after taking this polluted language within his hallowed lips, looking upon it as an act of great contumaciousness, though there was nothing in it except a word that is used in every medical publication, thousands of which pass through the mail every day—the Commissioner then spouted some tobacco juice, and putting on a severely ironical air, addressed himself to Mr. Lant thus:

I suppose you are proud of that? Lant (unshaken by Osborn's proud irony)—I am proud of everything I have printed.

Osborn—There is another article, signed by G. F. T., which I shall not read, which is very disgusting, according to my idea of morality. There are others, then, of April 14 and May 24, 1871, signed G. F. T. I don't propose to read them; but it is for me to say whether this newspaper containing those articles ARE (irrespective of grammar) vulgar, indecent and obscene. Now, what do you say in defense, Mr. Lant?

Lant—I am not guilty of obscenity. Osborn—According to what school is this not obscene? I think it is unfit to reach the eyes of young girls and young men. Where do you find a standard?

CURIOUS DEFINITION OF OBSCENITY.

Lant—What do you call obscenity. Osborn—Well, what I call obscene in the community in which we live are papers containing articles that you, if you were a decent man, would be ashamed to let your daughter read, and that have a tendency to excite obscene desires. Whatever may be published in the press in a judicial investigation may be a matter of necessity, and this might be your argument; but it will not do. There is no such necessity for publishing matters in a paper like this as there is for the proceedings in a court of justice.

Lant—Do you consider Dr. Miller's letter in the first number, on the sexual relations, obscene?

Osborn—That is a medical article, and we have no comment to make on that question.

Lant—Mr. Osborn, I would like you to look at these articles and see if the good articles don't predominate, and if there is really anything obscene in any of them.

Osborn—Well, your paper is then like Byron's poems, but I can't take that as a sufficient extenuating circumstance. I must hold you in $5,000 bail for court.

A CHANCE FOR MRS. ELIZABETH THOMPSON.

This wealthy lady has twice been to see me to ask how I can help her invest her shekels of silver and ingots of gold to reform mankind. She never lets her right hand know the secrets of her left. She has done more generous things than the Astors, Stewarts and Vanderbilts, and nobody gives her credit. She gave Rev. Mr. Alger $6,000 to travel in Europe; Stephen Pearl Andrews $5,000 to publish his "Universology," Steele Mackaye two years' board in her Tenth street house for his whole family, besides bringing out his plays. She supports and educates two nephews in college. She has dozens depending on her charity. When I called I found $50 worth of bouquets on her elegant tables, magnificent pictures around the walls! Lately she has been running the Red Pepper Club of the College Medicals, and I am sorry to see, is scattering pills among the poor. Now, then, let her drop the globules which poison the body, and distribute THE TRUTH SEEKER which purifies the mind. Her essay prizes were nothing compared to scattering THE TRUTH SEEKER broadcast! G. F. T.

THE GAME OF FARO.—TWELVE MEN WHO KNEW ALL ABOUT IT—ONE MAN'S PREJUDICE.—The case of John Doe Tome, a man whose real name is said to be Burns, came up again before Justice Knox Saturday. The man is one of those characters known as a check guerrilla. He was accused of having picked up a $20 piece from the faro table at the Capital saloon, the money belonging to a player who was in a half intoxicated condition. Tome demanded a jury trial, and when the selection had been made each jurymen was asked whether he had any prejudices against the game. The following were the experiences of the twelve:

Juror No. 1—Have played a little; lost $1,200 at a sitting once, at Simpson's Corner; had won the money at poker the night before; won it of the fellow who dealt; have no prejudices against the game.

Juror No. 2—Have played faro some; lost nineteen straight bets at once at the Sawdust Corner—just my fool luck; think the game is all right; used to play faro once, but haven't played now for over a week.

Juror No. 3—Dropped about $40 once at Orndorff's, trying to call the turn; no prejudices.

Juror No. 4—Play faro occasionally—when ever I have any money; won $2,000 one night at the palace—busted the game; went back and tried to bust it again a few nights after; had to spar for my grub all the rest of the week; think I could beat the game blind if I had capital; no prejudice.

Juror No. 5—Am familiar with faro—slightly; stepped into Joe Stewart's one day and tapped the game for $500 in one deal; called the turn for $100, and then quit playing because the limit wasn't big enough; made enough to pay up that $5 assessment on my Justice stook; think faro is a good game.

Juror No. 6—Always liked faro when it was square; think there are some square games, but the splits give the game a big percentage.

Juror No. 7—Got $5,000 out of the rise in Ophir, and got ready to start back to the States [Here the juror wiped away a tear, and his Honor seemed much affected.] I struck one of the games—no matter which one it was—and in about two days hadn't a red.

The remaining five jurors related their experiences in a most affecting manner, and but one man was found who had any prejudice against the game. He said he never won a bet in his life. He always coppered and played straight at the wrong time. He'd been calling the turn steady for two years, and never caught it once. He thought faro was a swindle, but admitted that he had been playing it the night before. He was excused.

George Kritzer, the dealer of the game, testified as follows: I was dealing at the time McCarty came in and called for some chips. He had won about $50 when Tome first showed up; McCarty had the jack coppered, taking in the tray and queen—

The Court—Does the jury comprehend the situation?

The jurors nodded simultaneously, and the witness continued:

The tray lost and the jack won. So it was a stand-off, and—

The Court—Is this point clear to the jury?

The jurors again bowed with military precision.

Witness—Then, after two turns, he planked a $20 piece on top of the chips on the jack, and this man Tome reached for it. As soon as I saw him muzzle the sugar I sung out, but he slid off and was getting away with it when Officer Hanks snatched him and made him give it up.

Jailer McCarty related the admissions of Tome in the jail. He had admitted taking the money, but excused his conduct on the ground that he might as well have it as the game.

The jury stood eleven for conviction and one for acquittal, and being unable to agree were discharged, as was also the accused.—Virginia City Chronicle.

A FARMER, being poorly provided with materials of sustenance for his men, fed them with pork cooked with the rind upon it. A young man of the company, not liking that outer portion of the food, was observed by the host to be carefully removing the outside covering, whereupon the latter said, "Young man, we eat the rind and all here." To which the youth replied, "All right, old man; I'm cutting it off for you."

Gems of Thought.

GENTLENESS! more powerful than Hercules.—Enclos.

Let gentleness thy strong enforcement be.—Shakspeare.

The first and last thing which is required of genius is the love of truth.—Goethe.

What thou wilt, thou rather shalt enforce it with thy smile, than hew to it with thy sword.—Shakspeare.

The wheel of fortune turns incessantly round, and who can say within himself, I shall to-day be uppermost?—Confucius.

More hearts pine away in secret anguish for the want of kindness from those who should be their comforters than for any other cause in life.—Young.

When danger threatens, the friend comes forth resolved and shields his friend; in Fortune's golden smiles what need of friends? her favoring power wants no auxiliary.—Euripides.

True glory consists in doing what deserves to be written, in writing what deserves to be read, and so living as to make the world happier and better for our living in it.—Pliny.

Look not mournfully into the past—it comes not back again; wisely improve the present—it is thine; go forth to meet the shadowy future without fear, and with a manly heart.—Longfellow.

The light of genius never sets, but sheds itself upon other faces, in different hues of splendor. Homer glows in the softened beauty of Virgil, and Spenser revives in the decorated learning of Gray.—Wilmott.

There is, I know not how, in the minds of men, a certain presage, as it were, of a future existence, and this takes the deepest root, and is most discoverable in the greatest geniuses and most exalted souls.—Cicero.

To ME there is something thrilling and exalting in the thought that we are drifting forward into a splendid mystery—into something that no mortal eye has yet seen, no intelligence has yet declared.—Chapin.

It is a noble and great thing to cover the blemishes and to excuse the failings of a friend; to draw a curtain before his stains, and to display his perfections; to bury his weaknesses in silence, but to proclaim his virtues upon the house-tops.—South.

PERFECT friendship puts us under the necessity of being virtuous. As it can only be preserved among estimable persons, it forces us to resemble them. You find in friendship the purity of good counsel, the emulation of good example, sympathy in our griefs, succor in our distress.—Madame de Lambert.

What we call genius may, perhaps, with more strict propriety, be described as the spirit of discovery. Genius is the very eye of intellect and the wing of thought. It is always in advance of its time. It is the pioneer for the generation which it precedes. For this reason it is called a seer, and hence its songs have been prophecies.—Simms.

THERE is an ugly kind of forgiveness in this world,—a kind of hedgehog forgiveness, shot out like quills. Men take one who has offended, and set him down before the blowpipe of their indignation, and scorch him, and burn his faults into him; and when they have kneaded him sufficiently with their fiery fists, then—they forgive him.—Beecher.

When the first time of love is over, there comes a something better still. Then comes that other love; that faithful friendship which never changes, and which will accompany you with its calm light through the whole of life. It is only needful to place yourself so that it may come, and then it comes of itself. And then everything turns and changes itself to the best.—Frederika Bremer.

THIS faith in Christ, this system which builds on the Christ, call it by what name you will, call it Protestantism, call it Romanism, call it Christianity, is passing away. . . . It has lost its hold on the cultivated classes of society. The chief men of letters, the widest scholars, the recognized leaders in science, the chiefs of reform, have quietly dropped it. The men who occupy to-day the highest seats in philosophy reason about it, classify it, put it where it belongs, render it the honor that belongs to it as a phenomenon in history and a significant phase of the world's thought; but they do not submit their minds to it. . . . They look elsewhere for the light that is to be their guidance; for the law that is to be their strength.—O. B. Frothingham.

Nothing so cramps, dwarfs and narrows the intellect as continual confinement to the sewing-room, nursery and kitchen, never allowing the mind to dwell upon anything broader or wider than the little diminutive contracted sphere of home. If we would have women of great, broad, comprehensive intellects, and cultured, refined minds, who are capable of rearing and guiding our future men and women, they must mix or mingle with the great world of thinkers and doers; they must be allowed to enter our legislative halls, not as spectators merely, but as participators in the great business of law-making and law-executing, so that they may have new ideas being continually generated and born in their minds by friction with other great minds of the day. Fear not that these things will make her low, coarse or vulgar. Education ever refines, purifies and elevates. Our wisest women and men are always gentlest, kindest, and best. Beautiful thoughts, great aims, and noble efforts never tend to roughness or unfemininity.—Elmina D. Sienker.
